

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

<http://archive.org/details/nation156jannewy>

90080

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE,
DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

90080

VOLUME 156

JANUARY 2, 1943, to JUNE 26, 1943

THE NATION, Inc.
55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 3

- "Are you quite sure this is the Soviet delegate?" Low..... 584
 Beginnings of fellow-feeling Low..... 10
 "Can I interest you in life insurance?" Low..... 549
 Correlation of strategy Low..... 129
 Fighting a doubtful enemy..... 237
 Gather ye rosebuds while ye may Low..... 733
 Generals and Hitler, the A. Hoffmeister..... 55
 "Goebbels invites—sunbathers and visitors." Low..... 766
 Hitler comes to power G. Schreiber..... 202
 Hitler's three favorite war horses start a peace drive A. H. Bernal..... 344
 "I see der British talk of putting on an offensive." Low..... 667
 Inside Hitler's fortress A. Hoffmeister..... 632
 Labor-management relations Low..... 857
 Last bullets, the Derso and Kelen..... 703
 "Look what our fellows brought in today." Low..... 267
 No franksteins please Low..... 229
 Occupied areas Low..... 829
 Patient is immune, the Low..... 443
 Reconstruction plans, 1919-1943 H. F. Kraus..... 92
 Solving the transportation problem Rivero Gil..... 809
 Spanish republican prisoners, the A. Hoffmeister..... 164
 Still on and on and on Low..... 481
 "The Straightening the line" Low..... 300
 Sudetenland today, the A. Hoffmeister..... 525, 526
 Undermining the foundations of victory Low..... 650
 Waiting for the leavin's Low..... 334
 "We're coming, Joe!" Low..... 451
 What about the Spanish republican prisoners? Low..... 511
 Carver, George Washington, death; EP..... 75; see also C..... 286
 Casablanca, J. Agee; MP..... 283
 Casablanca conference, See Franco-American relations—North Africa
 Casals, Pablo, arrested in German-occupied France and returned to Spain L. Kaufman; C..... 36
 Castillo, Ramon S. See Argentina
 Catholic church. See Roman catholic church
 Catroux, General Georges. See Franco-American relations—North Africa
 Censorship
 Newspapers excluded from the conference on post-war problems of food and agriculture; EP..... 542; see also EP..... 794
 North African, clouds military and political situation; EP..... 74
 Of moving pictures by government, proposed J. McDonald; S..... 484
 Chamberlin, William Henry
 Historical background of the Russo-Polish friction; C..... 790; see also E..... 653
 Chandler, Albert Benjamin. See War, Pacific
 Chase, Stuart
 Jobs and unions on demobilization day; S..... 855
 Chiang Kai-shek, Generalissimo. See China
 Children
 Care of refugee, in Europe H. Pauli; S..... 437
 Schools and juvenile delinquency A. E. Benedict; S..... 51; see also C..... 144; C..... 178
 Chile
 Breaks relations with the axis powers; EP..... 148
 Hails Wallace as advocate of a real people's peace; EP..... 470
 Wallace's visit M. Secano S..... 634; see also EP..... 470; E..... 615
 China
 And Great Britain
 Relations between the two countries are strained..... 693; see also E..... 689
 And the United States. See United States—And China
 Industrial cooperatives can produce war materials with slight assistance; EP..... 723
 Political breakthroughs; Chiang Kai-shek keeps Kuomintang troops in position to oppose the Red army; E..... 220
 Present internal conditions..... 693; see also E..... 689
 Wanted: a political strategy for Asia Lin Yutang; S..... 91
 Chinese exclusion act
 Hearings on repeal of, open; EP..... 759
 Chinese-Japanese war
 Burma and our Pacific strategy D. W. Mitchell; S..... 189
 Casablanca conference promises sharp increase in and to China; EP..... 254
 China fails to understand the United Nations' decision to "beat Hitler first" E..... 689; see also..... 693; see also E..... 760; 763; 764
 Chinese views on the post-war fate of Japan..... 689; see also E..... 689
 Churchill intimates that an effort will be made to reopen the Burma road; EP..... 254
 Churchill's visit to Washington may pre-empt offensive action in the Pacific; E..... 725
 Japanese battle technique G. Cooper; S..... 731
 Japanese divisions routed at eastern end of Yangtze gorge; their advance base at Ichang menaced; EP..... 794; see also EP..... 823
 Japanese open offensives to drive China out of the war; fighting flares in Yunnan province, north of Shanghai, and at Changsha; EP..... 290
 Japanese offensives lack strength; EP..... 362
 Wanted: a political strategy for Asia Lin Yutang; S..... 91
 War from Madame Chiang Kai-shek's resistance may collapse without increased American aid; EP..... 220
 Christenson, Reo M.
 Whose taxes does the Ruml plan forgive? C..... 467
 Church, Roman Catholic. See Roman Catholic Church
 Churchill, Winston. See Great Britain
 Ciano, Count Galeazzo. See Italy
 Civil rights
 Supreme court holds incommunicado detention unconstitutional; E..... 402
 Civil service
 McKellar bill seen as effort to replace, by Senatorial patronage; EP..... 398
 see also EP..... 398
 Clark, Granville
 Proposes a compulsory war-service act D. A. Saunders; S..... 323 see also EP..... 323; C..... 323
 Coal
 Facts behind the hard-coal strike; E..... 114
 German view of the American coal strike Argus; S..... 778; see also EP..... 821
 Miners seek a $2 a day increase; E..... 446; EP..... 506; EP..... 821; E..... 568
 EP..... 650; EP..... 821; E..... 568
 Mines closed by strike again; Lewis' action provides an excuse for labor legislation; EP..... 877
 Servicemen's view of the miners' strike; EP..... 851
 Softcoal miners seek wage increase; EP..... 219
 Steelman, Dr. J. R., proposes guaranteed six-day work week to raise miners' annual incomes..... 580
 Strike closes steel blast furnace; EP..... 822
 Strike looms as operators reject proposals of the conciliation service; EP..... 614
 Why the miners follow Lewis S. C. Menefee; S..... 477 see also C..... 718; C..... 753; EP..... 877
 Colleges. See Education
 Comfort, Alex
 Hoc est corpus; P..... 313
 Communist. See Communist International
 Communist strike at dawn, the J. Agee; MP..... 139
 Commerce. See Business
 Committee on fair employment practices. See Negroes
 Commonwealth federation
 In Canada F. Underhill; S..... 447
 In England T. E. Withering; C..... 542
 see also EP..... 542
 Communications. See Federal communications commission
 Communist international
 Dies' reaction to dissolution; EP..... 759
 Dissolved by Stalin F. Kirchwey; S..... 762; see also..... 779; 834
 Reaction of British Labour party to dissolution K. Martin; S..... 808; see also..... 889
 Communist party
 And the Negroes J. Boyd; S..... 884
 Browder, E., claims the line after executions; EP..... 507; see also EP..... 362; C..... 466
 Convictions reversed in the Oklahoma criminal-syndicate case of 1940; EP..... 291
 Post-war relations between Russia and the western democracies R. Niebuhr; S..... 323; 324; see also..... 323
 Confederation of workers of Latin America. See Labor unions Congress
 Anti-New Deal coalition continues Dies committee, votes investigation of the FCC and a new agency-investigating committee under H. Smith; E..... 256
 Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill resolution for post-war international cooperation pending in Senate; EP..... 878
 Democrats against the party J. Farmer; S..... 412
 Eight hopefuls R. H. Rovere; S..... 294; see also C..... 431
 Goes gunning for the New deal I. F. Stone; S..... 7
 House passes Hatch-Hill plan for giving support to appropriate postwar international machinery; EP..... 878
 Its "unity" behind the President R. G. Gores; C..... 719
 McKellar bill would replace civil service by Senatorial patronage; EP..... 327; see also EP..... 398
 Republican anti-New Deal Democrats will fight measures for inflation control; EP..... 38
 Republican isolationists bloc names J. J. Davis to Senate foreign relations committee; EP..... 74
 Roosevelt seeks to jockey support among the various blocs I. F. Stone; S..... 115
 Congress in industry
 Submits report of mismanagement and inefficiency in handling of ships and cargoes; E..... 510
 Connolly, John
 Reviews of art exhibitions:
 Avery, Milton..... 871
 Bayer, Herbert..... 499
 Bush, Mrs. L. C. H...... 786
 College..... 643
 Cali, Salvador..... 643
 Diego, Julio de..... 643
 Ernst, Max..... 780
 Foran..... 817
 Gaige, Richard..... 871
 Klee, Paul, and A. Masson..... 391
 Matter, Herbert..... 750
 Maurer, Alfred H..... 871
 Model, Evsa..... 643
 Mondrian..... 499
 Moore, Henry..... 750
 New acquisitions at the Primitives gallery..... 391
 Raskal, Helen..... 714
 Rauter, Abraham..... 572
 Seligman, Kurt..... 572
 Smith, David..... 572
 Soutine..... 499
 Spring salons, young artists..... 786
 Tanguy, Yves, and Calder constellations..... 786
 Urruchau, Demetrio, and L. Herrera Guevara..... 714
 Vertes..... 499
 Zadkine..... 714
 Connolly, John
 Conquer by the clock J. Agee; MP..... 139
 Conscript. See Selective service
 Contracts, defense. See War effort
 Cook, Eliza
 Comment on the letter of F. E. DuBoisson against "mongrelism in the south"; C..... 467
 Cooper, Gordon
 How our enemies fight:
 1. Styles in strategy; S..... 696
 2. Germany: Blitzkrieg and blunder; S..... 805
 3. Japanese battle technique; S..... 731
 Cooper, Kent; his role in the Associated press; S..... 190
 Coordinator of inter-American affairs:
 Latin Americans feel that the agency supports the interests of American companies in South America; E..... 615
 Copland, Aaron B. H. Haggin; M..... 872
 Corporal
 Comments on M. D. Zabel's suggestion to name a New York square for Henry James; C..... 718; see also..... 596, 599
 Coudenhove-Kalergi, Count Richard N. See Pan-European conference
 Council of forty-nine. See Republican party
 Counterattack J. W. Krutch; D..... 248
 Cox, Edward Eugene
 His lobbying services for a Georgia railroad should be investigated I. F. Stone; S..... 753; see also EP..... 148
 Named head of a House committee to investigate the Federal communication commission; EP..... 148; see also..... 256; EP..... 290 Culbertson, J. W.
 World federation plan la Fischer; S..... 727; see also..... 582; S..... 723; C..... 788; C..... 818; C..... 846
 Czechoslovakia
 Czech government in exile; United States opposes Benes' Russian policy E. Bolley; S..... 408; see also EP..... 721
 Moravec and the St. Bernard..... 57
 Schweik serves the Germans..... 57

- Slovakia; collapse of a satellite. F. C. Weiskopf; E. J. Stone; S. 891
- Sudeteland today, the. F. C. Weiskopf; S. 524
- D
- Daily News, New York
- Defends J. L. Lewis; EP. 851
- Dali, Salvador. J. Connolly; A. 643
- Dance (articles by B. H. Haggin)
- Afternoon of a faun, the. 872
- Aldo. 464; 817
- Balanchine's "Apollo". 677
- Ballet russe de Monte Carlo. 454
- But the kid. 716
- Capriccio espagnol. 572; 817
- Coppelia. 872
- Dance index. 750; 872
- Dark legends. 464; 817
- El café de Chinitas. 845
- Elves. 872
- Gaité parisienne. 872
- Helen of Troy. 572
- Izrouchi. 872
- Le beau Danube. 872
- Lilac garden. 464; 817
- Magic swan, the. 872
- Nutcracker, the. 872
- Oklahoma. B. H. Haggin; S. 750; 872
- See also D. 572
- Petrushka. 464; 572; 611
- Pillar of fire. 464
- Rodeo. 872
- Romantic age. 464
- Roses and Juliet. 611
- Specter of the rose, the. 817
- Three-cornered hat. 677
- Wanderer, the. 817
- Danzon, Max D. 750; 872
- Danish
- Protests The Nation's editorial on the Ehrlich-Elmer executions; C. 466; 507
- See also EP. 176
- Dark eyes. J. W. Krutch; D. 176
- Darlan, Admiral Jean François. See Franco-American relations—North Africa
- Davenport, Peter
- Sikorski's opposition; S. 163; 466
- See correction. 347; C. 466
- Davis, Chester C.
- Boomer as food czar; E. 879
- Davis, Elmer. See War information, office of
- Davis, James J.; named to Senate foreign relations committee; EP. 74
- Davis, Stuart; exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. 284
- Defense, national. See War effort
- De France, Charles Q.
- Need for a genuine two-party system; C. 34
- De Gaulle, General Charles. See Franco-American relations—North Africa; Free French
- Democratic party
- Democrats against the party. J. F. Farmer; S. 412
- Denmark
- Election reveals Danish resistance to the Nazis; EP. 471
- Department of justice
- Maloney, W. P., replaced by O. J. Rogge as special prosecutor in government's session cases; EP. 254; 754
- Promotion of T. Arnold to the circuit court removes him from prosecution of the monopoly complaint against the Standard Oil Co.; EP. 255
- Should investigate Representative E. E. Cox's lobbying services for a Georgia radio station. I. F. Stone; S. 735; 754
- Also see EP. 148
- Derso and Kelen
- Last bullets, the; Ct. 703
- Desert victory. J. Agee; MP. 642; 827
- See also. 527
- Deutscher, Julius
- Program for Austria; AS. 345
- Diaz Escobar, Felix
- Spread of sinarquismo, the; S. 487; 827
- See also. 827
- Diego, Julio de. J. Connolly; A. 643
- Dies committee
- Administration must provide real leadership for the fight against its demagoguery. I. F. Stone; S. 223
- Attempts to stop payment of salary to W. F. Fickens, treasury employee; EP. 219
- Congress votes two-year extension; E. 256; see also EP. 181; 290
- EP. 290
- Dies' reaction to the dissolution of the Communist international; EP. 759
- House refuses to accept its charges against 38 government employees with special investigation; EP. 219
- Issues its report on Nazi activities in this country; EP. 579
- Its latest report on "subversive" activities; E. 40
- Voorhis, H. J., declares no meeting of the committee was held to discuss report issued by its chairman; E. 40
- See also Kerr committee
- Diffident invitation to a rationed dinner. I. Edman; P. 556
- Dilweg, LaVerne R.; liberal in Congress. R. H. Rovere; S. 294
- Dittmar, General Kurt. See Germany
- Dockery, Joseph H.
- Landau, A. attacks the New deal as fascist; C. 431
- Dodd, William E., Jr.
- Kerr committee upholds Dies's charge that he is unfit for government office; E. 761
- Retained by FCC despite Kerr committee findings. I. F. Stone; S. 662; 761
- See also E. 617; E. 761
- Dos Passos, John
- Tresca, Carlo, death; S. 123
- Doughbills, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 103
- Doughton bill. See Finance, public
- Draft. See Selective service
- Drama. See Krutch, J. W.; Marshall, M. (for reviews)
- Duchon, William J.
- Comments on "Refugees: burden or asset?" by K. R. Grossman; C. 216
- Dun and Bradstreet; being used as an army investigating agency? EP. 184
- E
- East, near. See names of countries
- Eberstadt, Ferdinand, represents big business control of our war production program; E. 113
- Eckhardt, Tibor, used by State department to attack Czech government-in-exile. B. Bolley; S. 183
- Economic warfare, board of
- Wallace takes over the RFC subsidiaries which buy metals abroad; RFC's task to be the actual disbursement of funds for BEW purchases; EP. 147
- Eden, Anthony. See Great Britain
- Edman, Irwin
- Diffident invitation to a rationed dinner; P. 556
- Life on the "obit" page; S. 707
- War and the liberal arts; S. 337
- Education
- Campaign begun to eliminate the word "kindergarten" from American usage; C. 39
- Mayor La Guardia fails to appoint Mrs. J. Lindlof to the New York board of education; EP. 687
- Nazis can be made over. H. Motherwell; S. 445
- Need for federal aid to the schools. I. F. Stone; S. 547
- New York city board of education rejects M. Starr as adult-education director; E. 474
- New York Times history quote, the. I. F. Stone; S. 547; see also E. 645; C. 717; C. 788; C. 903
- Progressive, defended, M. Lewishin; C. 393
- Violence in the classroom. A. E. Benedict; S. 51; see also C. 144; C. 178
- War and the liberal arts. I. Edman; S. 337
- Willkie warns against sacrificing tradition of the liberal arts; EP. 111
- Ehrlich, Heinrich; Polish labor leader executed in the Soviet union; EP 362; see also C. 466; EP. 507
- Eire. See Ireland
- Eisenhower, General Dwight D. See Franco-American relations—North Africa; War
- African
- Elections. See Presidential campaign of 1944
- Elk Hills. See California
- Ellington, Duke. B. H. Haggin; M. 716
- Ellison, Daniel; liberal in Congress. R. H. Rovere; S. 294
- Emigres. See Refugees
- England. See Great Britain
- Equal rights amendment; EP. 507
- Ernst, M.; minister. J. Connolly; A. 750
- European war. See War, European
- Everybody's business; articles by K. Hutchison 53
- F
- F. K.
- Willow and I, the; D. 32
- Fair employment practices committee
- Hearings on discrimination against Negro soldiers postponed by P. McNulty; J. Wechsler; S. 121
- Farbenindustrie I. G. See Standard Oil
- Farley, Charles
- Comments on "History without education" by I. F. Stone; C. 903; see also 547; E. 618; C. 645; C. 717; C. 788
- Farm security administration
- Big farmers seek to cut off funds for it in the agricultural appropriation bill; E. 581; see also C. 679
- Farmer, Jonathan
- Democrats against the party; S. 412
- Farming. See Agriculture
- Fascism and nazism
- Dies committee issues its report on Nazi activities in this country; EP. 579
- Government indictment of alleged seditionists denounced by B. K. Wheeler and C. Hoffman; E. 2
- Jewish terror in Europe, the. Bernstein; S. 48, 48, 158, 196; see also E. 293; 366; C. 503; EP. 754
- Maloney, W. P., replaced by O. J. Rogge as special prosecutor in government's session cases; EP. 254; see also Our State department. 187
- National socialism. I. F. Stone; S. 187
- See also Germany; Italy; Propaganda
- Fausett, William Dean; exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. 284
- Federal communications commission
- Cox committee's withdrawal, the. I. F. Stone; S. 735; see also EP. 148; E. 256; EP. 290
- Retains C. Watson and W. E. Dodd, Jr., despite Kerr committee findings. I. F. Stone; S. 662; see also E. 617; E. 761
- Federation of modern painters; comments on realistic art and democracy; C. 431
- Fifth seal; exhibition. 431
- Book of the month clubs attacked by EP. 579
- Fighting French. See Free French
- Films. See Moving pictures; Agee, J. (for reviews)
- Finance, public
- Carlson bill, the. H. C. Simons; C. 717; see also E. 509
- Conference on post-war problems planned; EP. 505; see also E. 545; 801
- Doughton bill. See Finance, public
- Drive starts in Congress for a federal sales tax; EP. 127
- Final tax bill is a diluted Ruml bill; EP. 841
- House ways and means committee drops the pay-as-you-go plan in favor of modified collection-of-the-source; EP. 397
- Increased taxation and savings are needed to stop inflation; E. 546; see also E. 654
- New House bill shifts the tax burden to the lower-income groups; EP. 614
- Pay-as-you-go certain of adoption, but probably without any real source of tax liability; E. 219
- Plan for pay-as-you-go taxation, a. J. Weinstein; E. 262
- President's budget message, the. E. 766
- Public Affairs pamphlet shows need for higher taxes in upper-income groups; E. 2
- Ruml plan, the; EP. 146; see also E. 219; P. 339; EP. 397; E. 434; C. 409; EP. 614; EP. 687; E. 723; EP. 821; C. 874
- Stiff capacity-to-pay taxation program will help to eliminate rising cost and static wages; E. 654
- Taxation and excess purchasing power. A. F. Sturmthal; S. 46; see also C. 251; C. 252
- Finland
- And the four freedoms. A. Kero; C. 430
- Her "peace" offensive. J. Gerber; S. 379; see also E. 182; E. 614
- Seeks an alliance with Sweden; EP. 182
- United States legation is withdrawn; EP. 614
- Fischel, Louis
- Average American's reaction to problems of war and peace; S. 775
- Death of Judge B. Linmy; S. 719
- Dissolution of the Communist international; S. 834; see also EP. 759; 762; 779
- Open letter to the President; S. 797; see also C. 902
- Peace—the Culbertson system. S. 582; see also 727; C. 752; 788; E. 818; 846
- Flannagan, John W., Jr.
- Attacks D. Ginsburg of the OPA as a draft-dodger; EP. 470
- Fleisig, Calmen
- Comments on B. Haggin's article on labor trouble in the New York public harmonic orchestra; C. 539; see also 392; 427
- Flynn, Edward J.
- Proposed as minister to Australia; EP. 73
- Testifies before Senate on his fitness to be minister; EP. 146
- Food
- Dehydrated. R. L. Holman; S. 299
- For Europe's children; E. 437; see also E. 88
- Law, R., submit British plan for post-war agricultural policies, to food conference; EP. 758
- Outlook for U. S. 622
- Walinsky and E. Sardi; S. 622

Press coverage of United Nations conference is restricted; EP.....542, 794
United Nations conference on post-war food and agriculture; EP.....541;
EP.....758
See also Agriculture; Rationing
Ford, exhibition, J. Connolly, A.....817
Ford, death of, EP.....794
Bulk of his holding bequeathed to Ford scientific foundation in what may be an effort to dodge inheritance taxes; EP.....822
Ford, Henry
Death of E. Ford raises problems of new company management; EP.....795
Observation development of working project at Willow Run. W. H. Jorjy; S.....655 War production
I. F. Stone; S.....187
Foreign relief and rehabilitation operations, office of United States department seeks control of the bureau. I. F. Stone; S.....259
United Nations conference on post-war food and agriculture; EP.....541;
EP.....542; EP.....758; EP.....794
France
Economic "collaboration" with Germany. F. Schulerberg; S.....863
End seeks Anglo-American accord on post-war relations with France. B. Bolles; S.....88
Falls the reticent chicken. H. Pauli; S.....88
French people are alarmed at power in North Africa. J. Alvarez de Vayo; EP.....182; see also E.....184
Himmler's new policy on hostages.....594
Letter from Paris; S.....250
Mandates, Georges, death, E. Buré; S.....861
Maurras, Charles. E. Buré; S.....739
Nazis issue blacklist banning certain books.....838
Residents of Marseille forcibly resist Nazi order for the evacuation of the port district; EP.....145
Treatment of the native population in North Africa. C. McKay; S.....663
Underground humor. J. Joesten; S.....736
United Nations ignore the "Jewish" movement. J. Alvarez de Vayo; S.....380
Yankies arrive, that a parody.....380
Francis, Harold C.
Comments on letter on post-war Russia by C. W. Sherman; C.....503; see also C.....323; 82
Franco, Francisco
Franco-American relations—North Africa
American policy condemned by E. A. Mosier; F. Kirchwey; S.....329
Anti-Jewish laws, the. S. J. St. Louis; S.....151; see also EP.....146; C.....323; EP.....361, 512
Britain and America
Africa compared; End seeks a common accord. B. Bolles; S.....442
British approval of General Eisenhower and American policy, voiced by B. Bracken. F. Kirchwey; S.....111; see also C.....216
Britain's reaction to the Darlan deal. Wintingham; S.....84
Casablanca conference; EP.....182; see also E.....184
Catreux arrives in Algiers to prepare for discussion between de Gaulle and Giraud; EP.....182
Criticism of Darlan deal approved. E. Garner; C.....35
Darlan assassinated. F. Kirchwey; S.; 3; see also C.....216
DeGaulle-Giraud union. F. Kirchwey; S.; 3; see also E.....39; EP.....74; 222; 272; EP.....686; 563; EP.....686; EP.....758; EP.....793; 809; 823; EP.....849
De Gaulle on trial by the United States. E. A. Murphy; EP.....563
De Gaulle on trial; see also C.....216
Essentialism
Murphy rift, the. S. J. St. Louis; S.....111; see also C.....216
Free French advance a program, the. 272
Giraud, Paul
Polish agency in charge of anti-Semitic activities. EP.....361
Giraud, General Henri Honoré, succeeds Darlan. F. Kirchwey; S.....3
Giraud's speech, reestablishment of promises. Reestablishment of the French republic. E. R. C. 100
Tunisian students' demonstrations in support of De Gaulle; EP.....686
MacMillan, Harold, named British minister to Allied headquarters; he is an opponent of Darlanism
Way; S.....111; see also C.....216
Military and political censorship; EP.....74
New case study on the "Jewish" movement. E. Buré; S.....861
Nogues removes the Morocco ban on foreign radio stations; EP.....594
Our policy is key to post-war success toward Europe's peoples. J. Alvarez de Vayo; S.....380
Peayoutout, Marcel
Secrecy in civil government. F. Kirchwey; S.....111; see also C.....216
Pervin, Nogues
Secrecy in civil government. F. Kirchwey; S.....111; see also C.....216
Obstacles to unity of Giraud and de Gaulle forces; EP.....470
Problems of the native population. C. McKay; S.....663
Roosevelt's pledge of total defeat of the axis is compromised by our policy. E. Kirchwey; S.....257
Spanish loyalist prisoners. F. Kirchwey; S.....221; see also C.....164; C.....283; 329; 310; C.....511; E.....39
C.....511
Spanish soldiers of France. A. D. Printer; S.....574
Welles, S., defends U. S. State department's policies; E.....488
Yankies arrive, that a parody.....380
Dilemma of the Free French
ting the Richelieu to join the Free French; E.....400; see also EP.....325; C.....434
State department's policy on action in Martinique, the. F. Kirchwey; S.....438; see also EP.....577; EP.....650
We should act to free the French government now. A. Revusky; C.....34
See also Free French
Fraser, Hugh Russell
Comments on J. F. Stone's "History without education"; C.....645, see also 547; E.....618; C.....717; C.....788; C.....794
Free French
De Gaulle is hailed by the liberated Tunisians; EP.....686
De Gaulle on trial by the United States. E. A. Murphy; EP.....563
Reception of, contrasted with that given the sailors of the Richelieu; EP.....325
De Gaulle may confer with Giraud on plans for French unity. F. Kirchwey; S.....3; see also E.....39; EP.....74; 222; 272; EP.....686; 563; EP.....686; EP.....758; EP.....793; 809; 823; EP.....849
De Gaulle's program for North Africa. F. Kirchwey; S.....272
French Guiana
Robert and chooses a de Gaulist governor. F. Kirchwey; S.....438
Sailors desert to join de Gaulle; EP.....325; see also E.....400; C.....434
See also Franco-American relations—North Africa
Free world association
Sees no possibility of lasting post-war reconstruction without the collaboration of Britain and Russia; EP.....435
Freedom of the press
And the Associated press. K. Hutchison; S.....190; 224; see also EP.....255; C.....357; EP.....224; see also C.....794
Newspapers
France on problems of post-war food and agriculture; EP.....542; see also EP.....794
Post office denies that de Gaulle has privileges to the Militant; EP.....363
Secrecy in the hearings on barring magazines from second-class privileges. G. Axtelle; C.....646
Fried, Hans Ernest
Generals and Hitler, the; S.....55
Fry, J.
Comments on "Undermining the underground" by J. Alvarez de Vayo; EP.....701
Fulbright resolution. See World War—Post-war reconstruction
Futtermann, Harry
What kind of music do soldiers want? C.....215; see also M.....69; C.....286; C.....502
G
Gaige, Richard J. Connolly; A.....871
Galarza, Ernesto
Letter to U. S. Welles on anti-labor activities of P. Bol, American ambassador to Bolivia; C.....59; see also 42; E.....77; 619; E.....690
Gandhi, Mahatma K. See India
Garner, S. E.
Approves The Nation's criticism of the American deal.....35
Gaulle, General Charles de. See France
American relations—North Africa
Free French
George, Ruth
Can this congress be "United behind the President"? C.....719
George, William
Board of regents votes to reemploy Dr. M. S. Pittman; EP.....216
Gerber, Jack
Finland's "peace" offensive; S.....379; see also EP.....182; EP.....614
Something to fight for; S.....417
Gerber, John W.
Europe against Hitler
1. How strong is the underground? S. 631
2. Guerrilla fighters, the; S.....666
3. Passive resisters, the; S.....703
4. See 701; C.....703
Germany
After the war. H. Motherwell; S.....152
Alarmist reports about the Russian front issued in effort to speed war production. Argus; S.....204
Anti-Nazi popular songs. Argus; S.....454
Beginnings of fellow-feeling. Low; Ct. Berlin hotel rooms reserved for victory parade. Argus; S.....490
Canine campaign. Argus; S.....528
Combating defeatist propaganda. Argus; S.....418, 635, 864
Comments on the American "White book." Argus; S.....130
Conditions in the bombed Ruhr. Argus; S.....702, 837
Death of her "time on our side" campaign. Argus; S.....303
Defense against "Anglo-American propaganda." Argus; S.....94
Dilemma of the Free French mans for invasion. Argus; S.....778
"Efficiency wages." Argus; S.....778
Fact and fiction about arms production. Argus; S.....892
Foreign workers in the reich. Argus; S.....347, 661
German and Vichy. H.....347, 661
S.....55; see also Ct.....585
German battle technique. G. Cooper; S. 805
German view of the American coal strike. Argus; S.....778
"Goebbels invites—and I get der visitors." Low; Ct.....766
Goebbels' anti-Jewish propaganda. Argus; S.....274; 347; see also Ct.....584
Goebbels attacks the enemy within. Argus; S.....166
Goebbels' speech. Argus; S.....327
Europe's Quislings; EP.....327
Himmler's country guard; the problem of the foreigner. Argus; S.....202
Hitler comes to power. G. Schreiber; S.....202
Hitler plans war monuments for nazis. Europe; Argus; S.....513
Hitler's last year of hope. P. Saar; S. 513
Hitler's proclamation reveals pessimism. Argus; S.....182
Hitler's speech is subdued; he warns against bolshevism and decries the American war. Argus; S.....593
Housing shortage. Argus; S.....593
How Hitler's rise to power was financed. A. Kantorowicz; S.....201
"I fear Britain's talk of going offensive." Low; Ct.....667
Increasing number of law suits reveals the public's mounting indignation. Argus; S.....593
Its army mobilized; Ct.....14
Its economic policy in conquered France. E. Schreiber; S.....863
Leadership in exile; political value of the emigration.....21; see also C.....206
Literature of the underground. Argus; S.....892
Morale in high society. Argus; S. 892
Meeting the need for manpower short of the war. Argus; S.....187
National socialism studied in a book issued by the American state department. P. Saar; S.....187
Nazis crack down on the Deutsche miß-täterschreibblatt, organ of the officer caste. Argus; S.....741
Nazis woo the middle class; the program that their program is "bolshevism." Argus; S.....564, 635
Propaganda attacks the nazis. H. Agnew; S.....148
Propagandists no longer conceal German reverses in Russia and Africa; EP.....145
Propagandists' report on the war in Russia. Argus; S.....580
Propaganda for "1918 and 1943." E.....4
Rationing consumer goods. Argus; S. 864
Rationing the nazis. H. Agnew; S. 445
Relations with Sweden strained by attacks on Swedish boats in Swedish waters; P. Saar; S.....651
"Rising irritation" in Konstanz. Argus; S.....810
Russia's factories. Argus; S.....810
Argus; S.....810
Russo-German war. See Russo-German war
"Salting information service." Argus; S.....892
Total mobilization. Argus; S.....239
182; see also EP.....594
University revolt against the nazi party. Argus; S.....810, 837
What has happened to Hitler? J. Joesten; S.....372
Workers' wages and employers' profits. EP.....131
See also War, African; War, European; World War
Giannini, Dusolina, sings Schumann's Lenua songs. B. H. Haggin; M.....284
Gibb, J. F.
Comments The Nation on its position on North Africa; C.....251
Ginsburg, David
Attacked as a draft dodger by Representative Flanagan; EP.....470
Giraud, General Henri. See Franco-American relations—North Africa
"Globalism" speech of C. B. Luce; E.....255
Godson, Joseph
Comments on "Capital notes" by I. F. Stone; S.....359; see also S.....100

- Goebels, Joseph. See Germany
Golden, Clinton S.
Union official named vice-chairman of the WPB; EP.....878; see also..... 691
Goody to children, M. Van Doren; C..... 313
Government agencies. See United States; names of agencies Government finance. See Finance, public
Granberg, John C.
Seeks information about post-war organizations for returning soldiers; C..... 502
Grandi, Dmo. See Italy
Great Britain
And China
Strained relations between the two countries.....693; see also E..... 689
Anglo-American relations
Americans in England. M. H.; C..... 501
British rebuke Argentina for about rift in, over Latin American policy; EP..... 39
British support of General Eisenhower and American policy in North Africa voiced by B. Bracken. F. Kirchwey; S.....111; see also C..... 216
Casablanca conference, the; EP.....182; see also E.....184, 221; 257
Churchill replies to Senator Chandler by urging defeat of Hitler first; E.....689; 693
Churchill's address to Congress stresses aerial warfare; EP.....758; see also Churchill's visit to Washington to press offensive action in the Far East; E..... 725
Disputed by one North African leader. F. Kirchwey; S.....111; see also C..... 216
MacMillan, Harold, named British minister to Allied headquarters in North Africa. F. Kirchwey; S.....111; see also C..... 216
McCormick, Colonel R. R., proposes that Americancede General Eisenhower to United States; EP.....615; see also EP..... 759
Purpose of Eden's visit. B. Bolles; S.....442; see also E.....399, Ct..... 584
Anglo-Indian relations
Open letter to Churchill. L. Fischer; S.....197; see also C..... 902
Waverly, Sir A. P., named viceroy of India; EP.....878
Anglo-Soviet relations
Churchill's speech reaffirms British rapprochement with Russia; indicates compromise on Russia's Baltic border claims; E.....473; see also E..... 436
Patient is immune, the. Low; Ct..... 443
Reaction of the British Labor party to the dissolution of the Communist international. C. Martin; S.....889
Beveridge and the Bourbons. S. K. Ratcliffe; S.....271; see also E.....548; Ct..... 549
By-election plan, the; press comment..... 95
By-elections reveal a growing leftward swing. T. Winttingham; S.....549; see also EP..... 542
Communists and the Labor party. C. Martin; S.....889; see also E.....880
Food subsidies system; E..... 879
Honors dead Nazi flyers; EP.....148
Its strategic advantage in the post-war struggle for air-route supremacy. K. Hutchison; S.....551
Labor-management relations. Low; Ct.....857
Laird, E. L., submits British plan for cultural plan to food conference; EP.....758
London in the spring. I. Treat; S.....629
Loversjed, J., Commonwealth candidate, elected to parliament; EP.....548
Morrison, H., explains the government's position on the Beveridge plan..... 291
New Commonwealth party, the. T. Winttingham; S.....548; see also EP..... 542
Parliamentary group votes against the amendment of the Beveridge plans. EP.....291; see also..... 548
Platform for the left. H. J. Laski; S.....302
Reaction to the Danneberg plan. T. Winttingham; S.....84
Tensions in British politics. R. Niebuhr; S.....869; see also E.....880
Two truths for the Labor party. T. Winttingham; S.....880
Wood versus Morrison; E.....880; see also..... 889
See also War, African; War, European; World war
Greenberg, Clement
Axis prisoners of war in the United States; S.....768; see also C..... 902
Reviews of art exhibitions:
American sculpture of our time..... 140
Hamlet on Rums. J. W. Alden; C..... 32
Contemporary American art..... 177
Cubist, abstract, surrealist art..... 284
Haves, Stuart..... 284
Hansen, William Dean..... 284
From Paris to the sea down the river Seine..... 248
Hanna..... 68
Greenwood, Arthur. See Great Britain
Grossman, Kurt R.
Captain Rickenbacker on the alien question..... 502
Grundy, J. Owen
Hague obtains his indictment for "tampering" with election records; EP..... 851
Lateral club in New Jersey seeks funds for club rooms; C.....180
Guadalcanal. See War, Pacific—Solomon islands
Guérard, Albert
Open letter to Governor Stassen; C..... 429
Guiana, French
Announces its adhesion to the Free French. F. Kirchwey; S.....438
Gumbel, J. A.
German leadership in exile; C.....21; see also C.....105
H
Habegger, C. T.
Program for economic freedom; C.....106
Hagen, Harold C. liberal in Congress. R. H. Rovere; S.....294
Hagen, Paul
Dissolution of the Communist international; S.....857; see also EP.....779; 808
Political value of German emigration; C.....105; see also..... 21
Hagin, B. H.
Articles on music..... 141
Berlioz's "King Lear"..... 392
Boston symphony orchestra heard in the first of its regular radio concerts..... 33
Budapest quartet..... 716
Duke of Windsor, Duke of Windsor..... 845
End-of-the-season concert..... 249
"Forza del destino" by Verdi..... 249
Giannini, Dusolina; Schumann's Lenua songs..... 284
Koussevitzky..... 141
Lehmann, Lotte; the Schumann lieder..... 284
Lincoln portrait, "by" A. Copland..... 249
"Marriage of Figaro"..... 141
Metropolitan opera association..... 907
Metropolitan's performance of "Aida"..... 787
Montux, Pierre..... 392
N.B.C. orchestra under Toscanini..... 392
New friends of music content; weak..... 392
New York philharmonic orchestra's labor troubles.....392, 427, 534; see also C..... 539
New York philharmonic performs St. Matthew passion..... 644
Record-libraries for the army..... 502
"Rosenkavalier" by Strauss..... 356
Roth quartet, the..... 284
Serenader series at the Museum of modern art..... 845
Sixth symphony by R. Harris..... 872
Strauss's "Salome".....750; see also D..... 572
Szegit, Joseph..... 141
Toscanini; estimate of his present work..... 787
Articles on the dance..... 872
Afternoon of a faun, the..... 817
Aleko..... 464, 817
Ballet russe de Monte Carlo..... 464
Billy the kid..... 464, 716
Capriccio espagnol.....572, 817
Coppelia..... 872
Dance index..... 750, 872
El café de Chinitas..... 845
Gaité parisienne..... 872
Helen of Troy..... 572
Igrouchi..... 872
Le beau Danube..... 464, 716
Lilac garden..... 464, 716
Magic swan, the..... 872
Nutcracker, the..... 572
Oklahoma.....750; see also D..... 572
Petrouchka..... 464, 572, 611
Pillar of fire..... 464
Rodeo..... 464
Romantic age..... 464
Romeo and Juliet..... 572
Season of the..... 872
Three-cornered hat..... 677
Tudor's "Dark elegies"..... 464, 644
Wanderer, the..... 817
Music recorded..... 500, 572, 611, 677, 716, 750, 817; see also C.....215; C.....286; C.....302
See also Book reviews..... 901
Hague, Frank. See New Jersey
Halbrook, W. E.
Urges ban on liquor sales in army camp areas; C.....106
Halsey, Admiral William F. See War, Pacific
Hamlet on Rums. J. W. Alden; C..... 32
Hanftaenger, Ernst, reported working for the State department. A. Strauss; C..... 251
Hansen also die. J. Agee; MP..... 640
Hanna..... 68
Stockler, Helene, death; C.....680
Hapsburg, Otto
"The legion"; E.....328; see also EP.....398; EP..... 759
Harari, Hananiah; oils. C. Greenberg; A..... 263
Hard way, the. J. Agee; MP.....395
Case against prohibition, the; C..... 180
Harlem at war. C. Williams; S.....86; see also C.....180
Harriet, J. W. Krutch; D.....426
Harris, J. B. H. Hagen; M.....872
Hart, H. C.
Objects to South's attitude toward Negroes; C.....143
Harvey, Joseph C.
Manpower for the farm; C.....752
Hastie, Judge William H.
National press club refuses to serve outstanding Negro jurist in dining room. I. F. Stone; S.....512; see also C..... 647
Hayes, Clinton; H. See United States—And Spain
Heaum, Lim A.
Protests inequalities in application of selective service to Chinese; C.....106
Hefner, George
Herrera Guevara, Louis; exhibition. J. Connolly; A.....391
Highet, Gilbert E.
Greek historians, the; S.....294
Highlander folk school; offers training in union work. M. Horton; C.....108
Hill, Ruth E.
Work of the FSA, the; C.....679; see also E.....581
Himmeler, Heinrich. See Germany
Hindus, Milton
Comments on "Goose step in Tishomingo"; C.....902; see also..... 768
Hirschfeld, Gerhard
Assails the American Beverage plan; EP..... 722
Hitler, Adolf
Hobbs bill. See Labor; Labor unions
Hoc est corpus. A. Comfort; P.....313
Hoffman, Clara E., denounces government indictment of alleged seditionists; EP.....2
Hoffmeister, A., cartoons..... 55
Hitler's three favorite war horses start a peace drive.....342
Inside Hitler's fortress..... 634
Spanish republicans' prisoners.....164
Sudenland today, the.....525, 526
Holman, Ross L.
Dehydrated foods; S.....299
Rubber from the farm; S.....520
Holmes, Calvin
Comments on "Why they follow J. L. Lewis"; my S. C. Menefee; C.....718; see also.....477; C.....753
Holt, Ruckham
Corrects Nation statement regarding the life of Dr. G. W. Carver; C.....286; see also EP..... 75
Hoover, Herbert
His criticism of the government's food program; EP.....850
Horton, Myles
Highlander folk school offers training in union work; C.....108
Housing
Collapse of the plan for a war-housing development at Willow Run. W. H. Jorjy; S.....655
Post-war plans call for prefabrication. R. M. Bennett; S.....340
Howells, Dorothy
Letter from England on the International brigade prisoners in North Africa; C.....285
Hull, Cordell. See United States—State department
Human comedy, the. J. Agee; MP.....426, 462
Hungary
Dangers in American appeasement of figure in Eden's discussions in Washington. B. Bolles; S.....442
Kavay, the..... 457
In 1918. L. Vogel; S.....231; see also C..... 457
Montgomery, J. F., former American ambassador, says: "Hitler's regime an unwilling slave of Germany"; EP.....471
To recall troops from Russia, but pledges to continue fight against bolshevism; EP.....94
See also American-Hungarian federation
Hutchison, Keith
Imperialism of the sky; S.....551; see also E.....255; EP.....326
Rural electrification administration; S.....3
Truth about the A.F.....190
1. Growth of a new trust.....226
2. Private news preserve, a.....226; see also EP.....266; C.....357; see also EP.....794
I
Ickes, Harold L.
Denounces Kerr committee findings against R. M. Lovett; EP.....722; see also..... 761 Reveals almost complete monopoly control of military and civilian production; EP.....113
Immigration
Hearings open on repeal of our Chinese exclusion act; EP.....759
In distrust of merits. M. Moore; P.....636
In the wind.....16, 54, 90, 127, 161, 200, 235, 270, 301, 342, 378, 414, 450, 486, 513, 560, 590, 620, 665, 700, 737, 774, 807, 833, 862..... 890

- India
Gandhi's fast is a token of political weakness; EP.....254; see also EP.....326
Indian army, the; C. S. MacLaren; S.....588
Moslem league meeting rejects any proposals for unity with the Congress party; EP.....651; see also C.....789
Open letter to Churchill; L. Fischer; S.....797; see also C.....902
Rioting gives way to disillusionment; jails crowded to overflowing; EP.....75
Wavell, Sir A. P., named viceroy; EP.....78
Industry. See Business
Inflation. See Inflation
Inonu, Ismet. See Turkey
International workworkers of America. See Labor unions
Italy
Bracco, Roberto, death. R. Altrocchi; C.....902
Fascism without Mussolini; G. Salvemini; S.....162; see also C.....465
Fascist party declines in numbers and prestige; EP.....721
Grandi's position in the government. G. Salvemini; S.....776
Italian rumormongers. G. Salvemini; S.....776
Its coming ordeal. D. W. Mitchell; S.....832
King Victor Emanuel reported about to abdicate; EP.....721; see also.....776
Mussolini dismisses Ciano in cabinet shake-up; sleep divisions reported within the ruling classes; EP.....218
Mussolini said to have broken with Count Ciano. G. Salvemini; S.....776
Pope Pius's speech on labor revolution; E.....893; see also EP.....849
Seeks reserves from Hitler as Rome's imminent defeat increases danger of allied invasion of Europe; EP.....541
Surrender before invasion? F. Kirchway; S.....853
Will Hitler abandon Mussolini? E.....724
J
Jackson, Gardner, dismissed from the Department of agriculture. F. Stone; S.....187
Jacobs, C.
For a vegetarian future; C.....251
Jacobson, Frank
Black markets and the OPA; C.....903
James, Henry
For a "Henry James Place." M. D. Zabel; S.....596; see also 599; C.....718
Hundredth anniversary. M. Marshall; S.....599
Japan
Admiral Yamamoto killed in air crash; EP.....759
American racial propaganda. S. C. Menefee; S.....17
Her racial propaganda. S. C. Menefee; S.....703
Japanese battle technique. G. Cooper; S.....731
Japanese-American war. See War, Pacific
Japanese-Americans
Report on our Japanese internment camps. A. Larson; S.....517
Jeffers, William M. See Rubber
Jews
Anti-Jewish laws in North Africa, the. I. F. Stone; S.....151; see also EP.....146; C.....323; EP.....361; 512
Anti-semitism drops up in investigations by military and naval intelligence investigators; EP.....184
Anti-semitism in Norway. H. Lie; S.....130
Dies's anti-semitism. I. F. Stone; S.....223
Escape from France; C.....70
Letter on "Mother of a people." A. Pilzer; C.....106; see also C.....143
Of Europe; how to help them. P. S. Bernstein; S.....8, 158, 196; see also C.....303
Rankin, Representative J. E., accuses Jewish propagandists of using Ehrlich. After executions to trouble American-Soviet relations; EP.....507
Rumania will permit the transfer of, if shipping is provided; E.....293
United States still neglects to take any steps in behalf of the European refugees; EP.....508
See also Refugees
Joesten, Joachim
Underground humor in France; S.....736
What has happened to Hitler? S.....372
Johnson, Colonel Robert W., named chairman of the Smaller war plants corporation; E.....150
Jones, Jesse. See Reconstruction finance corporation
Jordy, William
Flasco at Willow Run; S.....655
What your money won't buy; consumers' goods in war time; S.....233
Joughin, G. L.
Seeks data on the Sacco-Vanzetti case; C.....180
Journalism. See Newspapers
Journey for Margaret J. Agee; MP.....139
Journey into fear. J. Agee; MP.....283
Joyce, James, and Wilder. E. Wilson; S.....167; see also C.....327
Judd, Walter H., liberal in Congress. R. H. Rovere; S.....294
Jugoslavia. See Yugoslavia
Justo, General Augustin J. See Argentina
- K
Kalecki, M.
Proposes a plan to cut excess purchasing power. A. F. Sturmthal; S.....46
Kantorowicz, Alfred
How Hitler's rise to power was financed; S.....201
Kantorowicz, Alfred, and J. W. Gerber
Europe against Hitler
1. How strong is the underground? S.....631
2. Guerrilla fighters, the; S.....666
3. Passive resisters, the; S.....704; see also 701; Ct.....703
Kaufman, Louis
Urges campaign for freedom of P. Casals; C.....36
Kaufman, M.
Protests attack on Amerikai Magyar Nepzava in "Sikorski's opposition" by P. Davenport; C.....646; see also 163; correction.....347
Kennan, Joseph B.
Union official named vice-chairman of the WPB; EP.....878; see also 691
Kero, Arne
Finland and the four freedoms; C.....430
Kerr committee
Finds G. Watson and W. E. Dodd, Jr., "unfit to continue in government service"; reluctantly clears F. L. Schuman, F. Stone; S.....557; C.....761
E.....617; E.....761
Upholds Dies committee charges against M. Lovett subversive activity; EP.....722; see also.....761
Kettner, Frederick
Urges a "Four freedoms day"; C.....36
Keyes, Lord
Offers plan for post-war monetary stabilization; EP.....505; see also E.....545; 801
Kilday bill. See United States Army
Kilgore, Harley M.
Urges crop planning to solve the farm manpower shortage. J. D. Stone; S.....440
Kilgore-Pepper-Tolan bill. See War mobilization; office of Kirchway, Freda
Announces formation of Nation associates, inc., a non-profit membership organization; S.....253, 435, 649; see also C.....557; C.....684
Battle of Martinique, the; S.....438; see also EP.....577; EP.....650
Bernadina conference formulated strategic policy for helping refugees; S.....796
Darlan and after; S.....3
End of the Comintern; S.....762; see also EP.....834
Fall of Pantelleria; S.....813
French Guiana announces its adherence to the Free French; S.....828
Meaning of Algiers; S.....41
Mr. Babbitt explains about foreigners; S.....41
President pledges total defeat of the axis and an early invasion of Europe; S.....257
Red star rises, the; S.....293; see also.....12, 124; EP.....78
Russia's great offensive; the need for a second front; S.....221
Some political results of the Casablanca conference; S.....221
Spanish prisoners in North Africa, the; S.....510; see also 221, 329; E.....544
Speculations about the coming European invasion; S.....853
State department recognizes Argentina's new government; S.....881; see also E.....825
Washington-Rome-Madrid axis; S.....329
What next in North Africa? S.....111; see also C.....366
While the Jews die; S.....366; see also C.....503; C.....754
Will Italy surrender before invasion? S.....853
Kirk, Betty
Mexico's "Social Justice" party; S.....827
Kiss and tell. See W. Krutch
Klee, Paul; exhibition. J. Connolly; A.....391
Klutz, J., article on "Pity the Federal Worker"; comment by F. Brown; C.....36
Kotom, Mame Wellington
Warns that Chinese resistance may collapse without increased American aid; S.....220
Koussevitzky, Serge. Haggin, B. H.; M.....141
Kraus, H. Felix
Salute on the eastern front; Ct.....92
Krumm, John McGill
Comments on D. Swenson's charge of influence exerted by Roman catholic church on our State department; S.....143; see also C.....72
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Reviews of plays
Ask my friend Sandy.....283
Carratrack.....248
Dark eyes.....176
Doughirls, the.....103
Hunt mine.....426
Kiss and tell.....534
Men in shadow; D.....463
Moon wine, the.....321
Okla.....572; see also.....750
- L
Labor
Abolition of efficiency ratings urged for government employees. O. Schwartz; C.....215
Absenteeism
How to curb it. J. A. Wechsler; S.....290
The shipyards. S. C. Menefee; C.....626
Linked with unionism by Captain E. Rickenbacker; EP.....290; see also.....377; E.....471
Austin-Wadsworth bill for a labor act ignores workers' interests; E.....365
Coal strike. See Labor Wages
Connolly anti-strike bill passed by the House; EP.....822
Connolly-Smith anti-strike bill should be vetoed. E.....851; see also EP.....877
Forty-eight-hour week order labor shortage areas encounters opposition from management; EP.....255
House passes the labor and revolution bill; EP.....543
Jobs and unions on demobilization day. S. Chase; S.....855
National resources planning board's report on post-war employment. I. F. Stone; S.....405; see also E.....401, 855
Pop. Pius's speech on labor revolution; E.....893; see also EP.....849
Relations with management in Great Britain. Lord; Ct.....857
Wages and farm prices; E.....185
C. I. O. and A. F. of L. urge revision of "steel" formula; EP.....219
Campaign for increased hours under the wage-hour act is designed actually to cut wages. D. Saunders; S.....228; see also C.....323
Little steel formula must be adjusted to provide for increased production; E.....437; see also E.....185
Miners demand $2-a-day increase; E.....114; see also EP.....219; E.....437; 777; EP.....406; E.....542
E.....580; EP.....614; EP.....650; E.....688; C.....719; C.....753; EP.....821; see also.....85
President again requests an overall income limit of $25,000; E.....76
President issues an order freezing prices and wages; S.....346; see also EP.....542; E.....654; EP.....685
Senate finance committee approves measure to rescind the $25,000 ceiling; E.....437; see also EP.....471; EP.....542
Transport workers seek wage increase from the City of New York; E.....77
Unions accept the freezing of wages provided prices are rolled back to the same level; E.....685; see also EP.....685
Wage scales of white-collar employees. B. H. C.; Ct.....323
Labor unions
Confederation of workers of Latin America; its program. V. Lombardo Toland; S.....236
Hobbs bill seeks to make unions subject to penalties of the 1934 anti-labor law; S.....183
Lewis, J. L., seeks reaffiliation of United mine workers with the A. F. of L.; EP.....757
Nelson, D., may appoint two labor vice-chairmen to the WPB. I. F. Stone; EP.....691
On demobilization day. S. Chase; S.....855
Pettilo demands that companies pay a fee for each recorded transcription to provide fund for musicians unemployed as result of "canned" music; EP.....399
Story of union seamen's refusal to unload a ship at Guadalcanal on Sunday proved false; EP.....218; see also E.....510
Supreme court sets aside conviction of copper miners on technical grounds; trained in uncommunicated detention; E.....402
Training in union work offered by Highlander folk school; M. H. Jones; S.....418
Transport workers seek wage increase from the City of New York; rights of municipal employees, the; 77
Trouble in the New York Philharmonic orchestra. B. H. Haggin; S.....392
327, 334; see also C.....539
Two organizers
workworkers of America beaten in Mississippi; EP.....543
Unions mine at Elgin; E.....514
Dies imposed by J. L. Lewis; E.....114
Why the miners follow Lewis. S. C. Menefee; S.....477; see also.....718; C.....753

- Migrant workers, and the shortage of farm labor, S. C. Menefee; S. . . . 410
- La Follette, Robert M., Jr. . . . 723
- Opinion, the Rural plan; E. . . . 723
- La Guardia, Mayor Fiorello H. See New York City
- Lakeman, Mark R. . . . 144
- Praxis, for The Nation; C. . . . 144
- Lamb, David C. . . . 142
- Comments on The Nation's analysis of the Beveridge plan; C. . . . 142
- Lamberton, William P. . . . 142
- Accuses Roosevelt boys of evading service in active war zones; E. . . . 470; see also EP. . . . 543
- Landon, Alfred M. . . . 431
- Attacks the New deal as fascist. J. H. Dockery; C. . . . 431
- Larison, John . . . 517
- Report on our Japanese internment camps, S. . . . 517
- Laski, Harold J. . . . 302
- Platform for the left; S. . . . 302
- Latin America . . . 59
- And the anti-labor activities of State department representatives; E. . . . 77; see also . . . 42; C. . . . 59
- Feels that the Coordinator of Inter-American affairs supports the interests of American companies; E. . . . 615
- Inter-American affairs conference, D. L. Marsh; C. . . . 680
- Survey by a labor leader. V. Lombardo Toledano; S. . . . 236
- Wants tour and Roosevelt's visit to Mexico may strengthen our good neighbor relations; E. . . . 615
- See also names of countries
- Law, Richard. See Great Britain
- Lehman, Lotte; in Schumann lieder recital. B. H. Haggin; M. . . . 284
- Lend-Lease act. See United States—And the war
- Lewis, John L. . . . 114
- Anthraxite miners strike in refusal to accept his decision for an increase in union dues; E. . . . 114
- Defended by W. Peger and the New York Daily Mirror; EP. . . . 877
- His intransigence provides an excuse for passage of anti-labor legislation; EP. . . . 877
- Ignores the war against inflation; E. . . . 688
- Seeks enrollment of the United mine workers with the A. F. of L.; EP. . . . 757
- Why the miners follow him. J. C. Menefee; S. . . . 821; see also C. 718; C. 753; EP. 821; EP. . . . 877
- Lewis, Sir Willmot . . . 187
- London Times correspondent appears as witness for J. O'Donnell in suit against J. D. Stern. I. F. Stone; S. . . . 187
- Lewishorn, Margaret . . . 393
- Case for progressive education, the; C. . . . 393
- Liberties, civil. See Civil rights
- Lie, Haakon . . . 130
- Anti-Semitism in Norway; S. . . . 130
- Life . . . 718
- Reports on the food situation; EP. . . . 543; see also C. . . . 718
- Life on the "obit" page. I. Edman; S. . . . 707
- Lindloff, Johanna M. . . . 687
- Mayor La Guardia fails to appoint her to the New York city board of education; EP. . . . 687
- Lin Yutang . . . 91
- Wants a political strategy for Asia; S. . . . 91
- Lindsay, Judge Ben, death. L. Fischer; C. . . . 719
- Literature . . . 312
- Dante, M. Marshall; S. . . . 312
- Of the third Reich. E. R. Bentley; S. . . . 206
- Peguy, Charles. J. Rosenfeld; S. . . . 206
- Lombardo Toledano, Vincente . . . 236
- Survey of Latin America; S. . . . 236
- London Times. See Times, London
- Longo, John R. See New Jersey
- Lovershed, John. See Great Britain
- Lovett, Robert Morris . . . 761
- Dies committee charges against him of passive activities upheld by the Kerr committee; his record defended by H. L. Ickes; EP. . . . 722; see also E. . . . 761
- Low, cartoons . . . 370
- "According to plan"; S. . . . 370
- Adolf is a great little uniter. . . . 199
- "Are you quite sure this is the safe delegate?"; S. . . . 584
- Beginnings of fellow-feeling. . . . 10
- Be interested you in life insurance? . . . 549
- Gather ye rosebuds while ye may. . . . 733
- "Goebels invites—and I get der visitors?"; S. . . . 766
- "I see der . . . offensive?"; S. . . . 667
- Labor-management relations. . . . 857
- "Let's what our fellows brought in to day"; S. . . . 229
- No frankenstein please. . . . 229
- "Now supposing we all try to go some-where together?"; S. . . . 829
- Occupied areas. . . . 443
- Patient is immune, the. . . . 443
- Reconstruction plan, 1919-1943. . . . 415
- Still on and on and on. . . . 481
- "Straightening the line". . . . 300
- Undermining the foundation of victory. . . . 660
- What about the Spanish republican prisoners? . . . 511
- Luce, Clare Booth . . . 551
- Advocate of American air imperialism. K. Hutchison; S. . . . 551
- Outlines a policy for American post-war air supremacy; "globaloney" speech; E. . . . 255; see also EP. . . . 326
- Lukakol, Arthur . . . 178
- Comments on The Nation's film column by J. Agee; C. . . . 178
- Lynn, Winifred . . . 538
- Refuses to serve in the American army under segregation conditions. D. MacDonald; S. 268; see also C. 429; C. . . . 538
- M . . . 501
- M. H. . . . 501
- Americans in England; C. . . . 501
- MacArthur, General Douglas. See War, Pacific
- MacDonald, Dwight . . . 873
- Comments on J. Agee's review of "Mission to Moscow"; C. . . . 873; see also MP. 749; EP. . . . 651; C. . . . 818
- Naked case of Winifred Lynn, the; S. . . . 268; see also C. 429; C. . . . 538
- MacLaren, Colin S. . . . 588
- Indian army, the; S. . . . 588
- MacLish, Arthurdale . . . 368
- Words are not enough; S. . . . 368
- MacMillan, Harold. See Great Britain—Magazines. See names of magazines
- Maloney, William Powers; removed from prosecution of the case against seditionists. J. F. Stone; S. . . . 223
- Replaced by O. J. Rogge as special prosecutor in government's sedition cases; EP. . . . 254
- Mandel, Georges, death. E. Bure; S. . . . 861
- Manpower. See War effort
- Mansfield, Michael J.; liberal in Congress. W. B. Rogers; S. . . . 294
- Marcantonio, Vito. See Poll tax
- Mark, Jacob . . . 186
- Comments on "Hull and the press"; C. . . . 394; see also E. . . . 186
- Marsh, Daniel L. . . . 680
- Inter-American affairs conference, the; S. . . . 680
- Marshall, General George C. . . . 764
- Said to sack Senator Chandler "beat Japan first" photograph. I. Edman; S. . . . 763; see also E. . . . 760, 764
- Marshall, Margaret . . . 312
- Dante; S. . . . 312
- Hundredth anniversary of Henry; S. . . . 599
- Notes by the way; S. . . . 566
- Tomorrow the world; D. . . . 642
- Martin, Kingsley . . . 889
- Communists and the British Labor party; S. . . . 889
- Martini, Diego; his visit to Uruguay protested by Spanish government; EP. . . . 615
- Martintque . . . 646
- Bar of, the; Admiral Robert and the State department's Vichy policy. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . 438
- Robert, Admiral G. explains his reluctance to join the United nations; EP. . . . 577; see also EP. . . . 650
- Masson, Arnold; exhibition. J. Connolly; A. 391
- Matusewicz, Ernest, Polish-American in anti-Sikorski movement. P. Davenport; S. . . . 163; see also correction . . . 347; C. . . . 646
- Matter, Herbert; photograph. J. Connolly; A. . . . 750
- Maurer, Alfred H. Connolly; A. . . . 871
- Mattaras, E. . . . 739
- McCormick, Colonel Robert. Rutherford Urges Britain to cede her dominions to the United States; EP. . . . 615; see also EP. . . . 759
- See also Tribune, Chicago
- McDonald, John . . . 484
- Proposal for government censorship of moving pictures; S. . . . 484
- McGrath, M. . . . 287
- Comments on "The Antrobus and the Ewericks" by E. Wiskit; C. . . . 359; see also S. . . . 167; C. . . . 287
- McKay, Claude . . . 663
- African triangle; S. . . . 663
- McKay, W. . . . 902
- Cost of living in Canada; C. . . . 902
- McKellar bill . . . 327
- Would require Senate confirmation of federal jobs paying salaries of $4,500 or more; EP. . . . 327; see also EP. . . . 398
- Murray, Howard J.; liberal in Congress. R. H. Rogers; S. . . . 294
- McNutt, Paul V. See War effort—Manpower
- McWilliams, Joseph . . . 554
- His "Serviceman's reconstruction plan." V. Riesel; S. . . . 554
- Men in shadow. J. W. Krutch; D. . . . 463
- Menefee, Selden C. . . . 17
- How to speak to Japan; S. . . . 17
- Japan's racial war; S. . . . 203
- Oil for France; S. . . . 669
- Okies wanted for farm labor; S. . . . 410
- Waste of man-power and materials in the shipyards; S. . . . 626
- What Americans are thinking. S. . . . 764
- Why the miners follow Lewis; S. 477; see also E. . . . 688; C. 718; C. . . . 753
- Merrill, Herbert . . . 788
- Comments on "My plan a la Fischer" by E. Culbertson; C. . . . 818; see also 582; 727; C. . . . 752; S. . . . 788
- Metropolitan orchestra. B. H. Haggin; M. . . . 141
- Mexico . . . 691
- Concession for an aviation-gas plant brings Standard oil-State department feud into the open. I. F. Stone; S. . . . 691
- President Roosevelt's visit; E. . . . 615
- Spread of sinuismo. B. H. Haggin; Escobar; S. . . . 487; see also . . . 627
- Meyer, Annie Nathan . . . 512
- Comments on I. F. Stone's resignation from club that barred Negroes in dining room; C. . . . 647; see also . . . 512
- Meyerowitz, Arthur . . . 366
- Comments on "While the Jews die" by F. Kirchwey; C. . . . 503; see also . . . 366
- Miaja, General . . . 615
- protested by Spanish government; EP. . . . 615
- Michaëlis, Karin . . . 754
- Comments on "While the Jews die" by F. Kirchwey; C. . . . 754; see also . . . 366
- Migratory workers . . . 410
- And the shortage of farm labor. S. C. Menefee; S. . . . 410
- Mihailovich, General Draja. See Yugoslavia
- Milutinovic; denied second-class mailing privileges; EP. . . . 363
- Military training. See Selective service
- Miller, Elliott M. . . . 72
- Comments on "Jim Crow goes abroad" by J. Julian; C. . . . 72
- Mining. See Coal
- Mission to Moscow. J. Agee; MP. . . . 749; see also EP. . . . 651; C. 818; C. . . . 873
- Mitchell, Donald W. . . . 708
- Battle lines in Tunisia; S. . . . 708
- Bombing won't stop; S. . . . 453
- see also EP. . . . 758
- Burma and our Pacific strategy; S. . . . 189
- Coming battle of Italy; S. . . . 832
- Decline of the sea wolves. . . . 887
- MacArthur's problems in the Pacific; S. . . . 620; see also E. . . . 508; E. . . . 482
- Our coming offensive. . . . 482
- Red army offensive hits its stride, the; S. . . . 126
- Russian "miracle." . . . 315
- Second front reconsidered, the; S. . . . 44
- Showdown in North Africa; S. . . . 260
- U-boats and the second front; S. . . . 260
- Mitchison, Naomi . . . 574
- Urges liberation of Spanish republicans in North Africa; C. . . . 574
- Model, Eva. See Connolly, A.
- Mondrian; exhibition. J. Connolly; A. . . . 499
- Money. See Finance, public
- Monopolies . . . 147
- Associated press seeks a Congressional investigation of the government's anti-trust suit against it; EP. . . . 147
- Arnold, T. versus the railroads. I. F. Stone; S. . . . 331
- Arnold, T. removed from prosecution of the government's case against the AP by promulgation of the circuit court; EP. . . . 255
- In control of our military and civilian production; E. . . . 113
- Shipwreck: public-power project for the aluminum trust. . . . 475
- Truth about the Associated press. K. Hutchison; S. . . . 190, 224; see also E. . . . 147; EP. 235; S. . . . 794
- EP. . . . 794
- Montague, Helen Ruth . . . 35
- No work for older women; C. . . . 35
- Monteux, Pierre. See Haggin, M.
- Montgomery, John T. . . . 471
- Declares that Horthy's Hungary is an unwilling slave to Germany; EP. . . . 471
- Moon is down, the. J. Agee; MP. . . . 642
- Moon view, the. J. W. Krutch; D. . . . 321
- Moore, Henry; exhibition. J. Connolly; A. . . . 750
- Moore, Marianne . . . 636
- In distrust of merits; P. . . . 636
- We will walk like the tapir; S. . . . 866
- Members accused of draft evasion; EP. . . . 75
- Moran, Robert, supports E. J. Flynn for post of minister to Australia; EP. . . . 146; see also EP. . . . 73
- Moravec, Emanuel. See Czechoslovakia
- More the merrier, the. J. Agee; MP. . . . 844
- Morgan, J. P. . . . 398
- Morrison, Herbert. See Great Britain
- Motherwell, Hiram . . . 152
- Germany as Hitler; S. . . . 152
- Nazis can be made over; S. . . . 445
- Moving pictures . . . 484
- Censorship of by government proposed. V. J. McDonald; S. . . . 484
- Distortion of history in Mission to Moscow may impair Russian-American relations; EP. . . . 749; see also MP. . . . 749; C. 818; C. . . . 873

- For reviews, see AGE, J.
Mowrer, Edgar Ansel
Resigns from the OWI over quarrel with the state department on our North African policy. F. Kirchwey, S. 329
Murphy, Robert D. See Franco-American relations—North Africa
Museum of modern art shows early avant-garde films. J. Agnew, S. 844
Music (articles by H. Haggin)
Berlioz's "King Lear"..... 141
Boston symphony orchestra is headed by the first of the regular concertos. 392
Budapest quartet..... 332
Ellington, Duke..... 716
Giannini, Daisolina: See Franco-American songs..... 284
Koussevitzky..... 284
"La forza del destino"..... 141
Lehmann, Lotte; the Schumann lieder. 284
"Lincoln portrait," by A. Copeland..... 872
"Marriage of Figaro"..... 141
Metropolitan opera association..... 449
Metropolitan's performance of "Aida"..... 644
Monteux, Pierre..... 501
N.B.C. orchestra under Toscanini..... 787
New friends of music concert; weaknesses in their program-planning..... 392
New York philharmonic orchestra's labor troubles..... 392, 427, 534; see also C..... 339
New York philharmonic performs Bach's St. Matthew passion..... 644
Recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
"Rosenkavalier" by Strauss..... 356
Roth quartet..... 872
Third symphony by R. Harris..... 872
Songs in "Oklahoma"..... 750; see also D..... 177
Strauss's "Salome"..... 572
Szizeti recitals of Mozart sonatas..... 141
Toscanini; estimate of his present work 33; see also..... 787
Tudor's "Dark elegies"..... 644
Mussolini, Benito. See Italy
- N
NRPB. See National resources planning board
Nash-Kelvinator; advertisement on war aims. R. Bendiner; S. 449 Nation, The
Becomes Nation associates, inc., a non-profit, membership organization. F. Kirchwey, S. 253, 435, 649; see also C..... 557; S. 492, 553, 698, 684
Fifty years ago..... 684
Praised by a reader. M. R. Lakeman; C..... 144; see also C..... 35
Seventy-five years ago..... 804
Ten years ago..... 483, 628, 772, 888
Too fault-finding. F. C. Reid; C. 144
Twenty-five years ago..... 586, 734
National defense. See War effort
National federation of business and professional women
Revokes charter of the New York chapter for accepting Negro women as members; EP..... 435; see also C..... 574
National press club
Stone, I. F. resigns following club's refusal to serve him and a Negro guest in the dining room. I. F. Stone; S..... 512; see also C..... 647
National resources planning board
House denies funds for continuation; EP..... 327; see also EP..... 778
Its report on post-war social security. I. F. Stone; S. 401, C. 538; S. 405; see also E..... 401; C. 538; S. 405
Nazism. See Fascism and nazism; Germany
Near east. See names of countries
Negroes
Attitude of southern whites toward, criticized. H. C. Hart; C..... 143
Carver, George Washington, death; EP..... 73; see also S..... 286
Discrimination against, by southern draft boards. R. Wormser; C..... 790
Discrimination against, of E. trained by Boyden; C..... 429
Equality for, best propaganda to combat Japan's racial war. S. C. Menefee; S..... 203
Harlem at war. C. Williams; S..... 86; see also C..... 180
House majority favors anti-lynch bill; poll tax; EP..... 758
Improving Negro-white relations. J. Boyd; S..... 84
Letter on "Jim Crow goes abroad" by J. Julian. E. M. Miller; C..... 72
Lynn, Winfred, refuses service in the American army under segregation conditions. D. MacDonald; S..... 268; see also C..... 429
Marcantonio anti-poll tax bill passed by House; EP..... 795
McNutt, P., postpones hearings of the Fair employment practices committee on railroad conditions. J. Wechsler; S..... 121
National federation of business and professional women revoke charter of the New York chapter for accepting Negro women as members; EP..... 435; see also C..... 574
- National press club refuses to serve Judge W. H. Hastie. I. F. Stone; resigns in protest. I. F. Stone; S. 512; see also C..... 647
OWI issues booklet on "Negroes and the war"; EP..... 184
President may drop his fight against discrimination to win the southern bloc to the social security program. I. F. Stone; S..... 115
Status of, in government work; C..... 251
Neilsen, Donald. See War effort—War production board
Neilsen, Donald..... 770
Nelson, J. R. Longo for "tampering" with election records; EP..... 851
New Jersey
Hague obtains indictments of J. O. Grundy and J. R. Longo for "tampering" with election records; EP..... 851
New York city
Board of education rejects M. Starr as education director; C..... 474
Mayor La Guardia fails to reappoint Mrs. Lindolf to the board of education; EP..... 687
Violence in the classroom. A. E. Benedict; S..... 51; see also C..... 14
Wage controversy with the municipal workers union; rights of municipal workers, the; E..... 77
New York philharmonic orchestra; its labor troubles. B. H. Haggin; S..... 427, 534; see also 392; S..... 539
Newspapers
Minority denied second-class mailing privileges; EP..... 363; see also C..... 646
Truth about the Associated press. K. Hutchison; S..... 190, 245; see also EP..... 147; EP..... 255; C..... 357; see also Censorship; Freedom of the press
Niebuhr, Reinhold
Russia and the west; S..... 82, 124; see also C..... 323; C. 503; EP..... 793
Tensions in British politics; S..... 889; see also E..... 880
Nogue, General Charles. See Franco-American relations—North Africa
Norris, George W.
Testimonial dinner in his honor; EP..... 38; see also C..... 178
Norway
Anti-semitism. H. Lie; S..... 130
Novels. See Books
- O
OPA. See Price administration, office of O'Donnell, John
Sues J. D. Stern for attacking him as a renegade; I. F. Stone; S..... 187
Office of foreign relief and rehabilitation operations. See Foreign relief and rehabilitation operations Office of price administration. See Price administration, office of Office of war information. See War information, office of Office of war mobilization. See Mobilization, office of Oil
Aviation gas versus rubber. I. F. Stone; S..... 691
Concession for an aviation gas plant in Mexico brings Standard oil-State department feud into the open. I. F. Stone; S..... 691
Naval department's contract with Standard oil for developing Elk Hill reserves termed "detrimental to the public interest." E..... 852
See also Rationing
Oklahoma. J. W. Krutch; D..... 572; see also..... 750
Otto of Hapsburg. See Hapsburg, Otto
Outland, George E.; liberal in Congress. R. H. Roverer; S..... 294
- P
Paintings. See Art
Palestine
Should be opened to Europe's Jews. P. S. Bernstein; S..... 148, 196
Pan-European conference
Permanent director, Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, seeks to revive the Pan-European movement; would exclude Rumania; EP..... 435 Panellaria. See War, European Paraguay
Its anti-democratic leaders. S. Berto; S..... 18
Patents
Behind Standard oil's offer to give its rubber patents to the government royalty-free; EP..... 652
Patriots, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 248
- Patton, James G.
Why food is scarce; S..... 333, 374; see also E..... 327; EP..... 363; E. 472; C..... 501; EP..... 543
Paulsen, E. O.
Secretary of the Democratic national committee negotiates for aviation-gas plant in Mexico. I. F. Stone; S..... 691
Pauls, Herta
Suffer little children; S..... 88; see also E..... 437
Pay-as-you-take. See Finance, public
Peace and war. See United States—State department
Pegley, Westbrook, versus Mrs. Roosevelt; EP..... 75
Defends J. L. Lewis, EP..... 851
Perry, Charles. P. Ennsend; S. 276
Penaranda, General Enrique. See Bolivia
Perplexed millionaire
Comments on the Ruml plan; C..... 574
Pesota, Rose
Starvation in Puerto Rico; C..... 838
Petrillo, James Caesar. See Labor unions
Peyroument, Marcel. See Franco-American relations—North Africa
Phillips, Lena Madasin
Comments on decision of women's club to exclude Negro from membership. C..... 574; see also EP..... 435
Phillips, William, sent as American observer to India; EP..... 75
Photographs record. See Haggin, B. H.
Pickens, William; Dies committee seeks to strike him from government payroll on charge of subversive activities; EP..... 219
Pilzer, Avra
Comments on "Murder of a people"; C..... 106
Pinkett, Harold T.
Comments on "Jim Crow goes abroad" by J. Julian; C..... 36
Pittman, Dr. Marvin S. See Georgia
Plays. See Krutch, J. W.; Marshall, M. (for reviews)
Poems
Diffident invitation to a rationed dinner. E. Edman; S..... 556
Goody to children. M. M. Van Doren..... 313
Hamlet on Ruml. J. W. Abels..... 339
Hoc est corpus. A. Comfort..... 313
In distrust of merit. M. H. Deutscher..... 671
New Guinea. K. J. Shapiro..... 671
To a camoufleur. L. Riggs..... 384 Unknown army, the. M. Van Doren..... 707
- Poland
And the Soviet Union
Border controversy. V. Soukhomlinev; S..... 452; see also E..... 564
Czechoslovakia. E. 473; EP..... 613
E..... 653; EP..... 670; EP..... 686; C..... 790
Ehrlich, H..... 752; C..... 790
Labor leaders executed in Russia; EP..... 362; see also C..... 466; SP..... 507
Friction results from German story of slaughter of Polish officers in Russia; EP..... 613; see also E..... 653; 670; EP..... 613
Program for a people's government. Sikorski's opposition. P. Davenport; S..... 163; see correction..... 347; C..... 646
Political war
Allies' lack of leadership is rooted in the failure to see the war as one of fascism against anti-fascism. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 128
Average American's reaction to problems of war and peace. L. Fischer; S..... 775
Austria; post-war policy. P. Davenport; S..... 345
Czechoslovakia..... 57
Moravia and the St. Bernard..... 57
Schweik serves the Germans..... 57
Slovakia: collapse of a satellite. F. C. Weisskopf; S..... 523
Sweden; German policy. F. C. Weisskopf; S..... 524; see also Ct..... 825
Europe against Hitler. J. W. Gerber and A. Kantorowicz..... 525
1 How strong is the underground? S. 631
2 Guerrilla fighters, the; S..... 666
3 Passive resistors, the; S..... 704; see also 701; Ct..... 825
Europe's little man wants to know the post-war aims of the United nations. Gerber; S..... 417
File and remember..... 95, 132, 205, 240, 275, 305, 383, 419, 455, 491, 565, 642, 779
Finland's "peace" offensive. J. Gerber; S..... 379; see also EP..... 182; EP..... 614
France
Economic "collaboration" with Germany. F. Sternberg; S..... 863
Hitler's new policy for hostilities. Maurras, Charles. E. Buré; S..... 739
Nazi issue blacklist banning sale of certain books..... 838
Germany
Alarmist reports about the Russian front issued in effort to speed war production. Argus; S..... 204
Anti-nazi popular songs. Argus; S..... 454
Berlin hotel rooms reserved for the victory parade. Argus; S..... 490

- Cleanliness campaign. Argus; S. 528
Combating defeatist "propaganda." Argus; S. 518, 635, 664
Conditions in the bombed Ruhr. Argus; S. 702, 837
Comments on the American "White Shirts." Argus; S. 518
Death of the "time on our side" campaign. Argus; S. 303
Defense against "Anglo-American propaganda." Argus; S. 94
Dittmar, General K., prepares the Germans for invasion. Argus; S. 770
"Emergency wages." Argus; S. 832
Fact and fiction about arms production. Argus; S. 518
Foreign workers in the reich. Argus; S. 347
Generals and Hitler, the. H. E. Fried; S. 55
German leadership in exile; problem of value of the emigration. S. 21; see also C. 105
German view of the American coal strike. Argus; S. 778
Goebbels' anti-bolshevik line. Argus; S. 274, 347; see also Ct. 584
Goebbels attacks the enemy. Argus; S. 166
Himmler's country guard; problem of the foreign workers. Argus; S. 347
Hitler comes to power. G. Schreiber; Ct. 202
Hitler plans war monuments for Nazi Europe. Argus; S. 518
Hitler's three favorite war horses start a peace drive. A. Hoffmeister; Ct. 144
Housing shortage. Argus; S. 593
How Hitler's rise to power was financed. A. Kantorowicz; Ct. 201
"I see der British talk of putting on an offensive." Low; Ct. 667
Increasing number of law suits reveals mounting nervousness of public. Argus; S. 593
Morale in high society. Argus; S. 892
Nazis crack down on the Deutsche Mitteilungsblatt, organ of the official caste. Argus; S. 741
Nazis won the middle class with denials that their program is "bolshevik." Argus; S. 564
Propaganda about America. Argus; S. 19
Rationing consumer goods. Argus; S. 864
"Report" on the war in Russia. Argus; S. 518
"Rising irritation" in Konstanz. Argus; S. 810
Rumor factories in Essen and the Ruhr. Argus; S. 892
"Stalingrad information service." Argus; S. 362
Total mobilization. Argus; S. 810
University revolt against the Nazi party. Argus; S. 810
Workers' wages and employers' profits. Argus; S. 131
Great Britain
Beveridge and the Bourbons. S. K. Ratcliffe; S. 271; see also Ct. 549
Communists and the Labor party. K. Martin; S. 808
Platform for the left. H. J. Lauck; S. 302
Hungary
Possible play. EP. 94
Inside Hitler's fortress. A. Hoffmeister; Ct. 632
Italy
Fascism without Mussolini. G. Salvemini; S. 162; see also C. 465
Italian Renaissance. G. Salvemini; S. 776
Pope's appeal on labor and peace. Argus; S. 893; see also EP. 499
Japan
Her racial war. S. C. Menefee; S. 203
Prelude to war. S. C. Menefee; S. 203
Latin America
Fighting a double enemy. A. Bernal; S. 236
Galania, E., protests anti-labor activities of P. Boal, American ambassador to Bolivia. C. S. 59; see also E. 42, 614; E. 77; see also C. 690
Labor survey. V. Lombardo Tolodano; S. 216
Paraguay paradox. S. Berto; S. 38
Sinarquismo in Mexico. S. Diaz Escobar; S. 487; see also C. 827
Uruguay—model of a fighting democracy
War in Chile. M. Sebastian; S. 615
North Africa
Britain's eighth army. S. 527
Espionage and United Nations political council. S. 504
De Gaulle on trial. S. 563
Dr. Gaule's unity message. S. 809
J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 451
Post-mortem on Darlan. S. 272
De Gaulle's program for North Africa
Nazi—case study in opportunism. S. Burt; S. 562
Our policy is key to post-war attitude toward Europe's peoples. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 591
Spanish republicans. A. Hoffmeister; Ct. 164
Spanish soldiers in France. A. D. Winter; S. 488
Watch Spanish Morocco. S. 165
See also Franco-American relations—North Africa
Norway
Anti-semitism. H. Lie; S. 130
"Now supposing we all try to go somewhere together." Low; Ct. 129
Poland
Border controversy with the Soviet Union. V. Soukhomlinev; S. 451
See also E. 364; 442; E. 613; E. 653; 670; EP. 686; C. 752; C. 790
People's program. A. Hoffmeister; S. 304
Sikorski's opposition. P. Davenport; S. 163; see correction. 347; C. 646
Political unity first. N. Angell; S. 561
Striking the transportation problem. Rivero Gil; Ct. 809
Soviet union
Hitler's Baltic frontier. V. Soukhomlinev; S. 452; see also E. 364; E. 436; 442; E. 473; E. 613; E. 653; 670; EP. 686; C. 752; C. 790
Communist international dissolved. 779; see also EP. 759; 762; 809; 834
Salute on the eastern front. H. F. Kraus; Ct. 92
Second front and fear of Russia, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 451
Stop at Kiev. S. 274
"We're coming, Joe!" Ct. 451
Spain
And the bolshevik menace. S. 346
Franco, the peacemaker of Almeria. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 738
Her offer of negotiated peace wins Berlin's approval. S. 593
How to be a good Spaniard. S. 93
Non-intervention by Ambassador Hayes 131; see also S. C. Menefee; S. 669
Oil for Franco. S. C. Menefee; S. 669
Report on conditions under the Franco regime. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 415; see also S. 669
Russia's view on Spanish neutrality. S. 564
Sweden
Goebbels loses. K. Bernheim; S. 592
Undermining the underground. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 701; see also Ct. 703; 704; C. 818
United States
What Americans are thinking. L. Fischer; S. 775
Wanted: a political strategy. S. Lin Yutang; S. 91
Will the United Nations' second front forces be a genuine army of liberation? J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 451
Words are not enough. A. Macleish; S. 368
Poll tax
House majority favors abolition; EP. 758
Marcantonio anti-poll tax bill passed by House; EP. 795
President may drop the fight for poll-tax legislation to win the Southern bloc to his social security program. I. F. Stone; S. 115
Post-war policy association. See Republican party
Powell, A. Clayton, Jr.
Comments on "Harlem at war" by C. Williams; C. 180; see also C. 86
Power and power industry
Rural electrification administration. K. Hutchison; S. 53
Shipwreck scandal, the. I. F. Stone; S. 475
Tenth anniversary of the Tennessee valley authority. EP. 723
Powers girl, the. J. Agee; MP. 139
Prelude to war. Agee, James; MP. 844
President's campaign 1944
Lewis seeks to involve the A. F. of L. in his feud with Roosevelt; EP. 757
Parties build their fences for a "fourth-term" war; EP. 326
Republican party may be aided by anti-New Deal Democratic bloc. J. Farmer; EP. 412
Spangler, H. E., Republican chairman, presents a program for the campaign; EP. 542
Willkie, W. J., as a candidate. EP. 326; see also C. 36
Press. See Newspapers
Pretty much a free-for-all. See Freedom of the press
Prices. See Business
Price administration, office of Brown, P. M., orders grade labeling eliminated on certain canned goods. EP. 652
House votes to abolish its food-subsidy program. EP. 878
Moves to extend rationing. E. 185; see also E. 437
Needs adequate machinery to curb black market. S. 95; see also S. 685; C. 903
Proposes subsidies to the processor to make possible a roll back in prices; EP. 885; see also E. 879
Seeks revocation of increased railroad rates; EP. 291
Printer, A. D.
Spanish soldiers of France; S. 488
Prisoners of war. See World war—Prisoners Profits. See Business
Prohibition
Case against, the. G. Heffner; C. 395
Urged in army camp areas. W. E. Hallbrook; C. 106 Propaganda
Axis, on the Soviet-Polish break. S. 670; see also EP. 613, E. 653; 686
Fascist, makes little inroads among Negroes. C. Williams; S. 86; see also C. 180
For Germany "1918 and 1919." S. 40
German, about America. Argus; S. 19
German spokesmen seek to rally the people as the military situation deteriorates in Russia and Africa; EP. 145
How to speak to Japan. S. C. Menefee; S. 17
Japan's racial war. S. C. Menefee; S. 203
Psychological warfare. A. Macleish; S. 368
See also Political war
Public affairs committee. See Finance, public public finances. See Finance, public
Puerto Rico
Effect of the war on its economic life. W. A. Roberts; S. 155
Faces starvation. R. Passat; C. 158
Tugwell, Governor R., under fire. W. A. Roberts; S. 155
R
RFA. See Rural electrification administration
REC. See Reconstruction finance corporation
R. L. M.
Comments on A. E. Benedict's "Violence in the classroom"; S. 144; see also S. 51; C. 178
Radio
Advertisers urged to eliminate "commercialism." S. Warren; C. 143
Broadcast to the Czechs: Moravice and St. Bernard. S. 57
Schickel serves the Germans. S. 57
Cox, E. E.; his lobbying service for Georgia station should be investigated. I. F. Stone; S. 735; see also EP. 148
How to speak to Japan. S. C. Menefee; S. 17
Rae, Walter
Comments on Q. Reynolds' thesis that certain German people should be punished after the war; C. 286
Railroads
Discrimination against Negroes on trains. P. Boyden; C. 429
Hearings of Fair employment practices committee on discrimination against Negro railmen postponed by P. V. McNutt. J. Wechsler; S. 121
Monopoly practices. I. F. Stone; S. 121
OPA asks that rate increase be revoked on the basis of 1942 railroad profits; EP. 291
Ramirez, General
Argentina
Ramsey, E. L.
Comments on J. G. Patton's "Why food is scarce"; C. 501; see also S. 333, 374
Rankin, John Elliott
Accuses Jewish propagandists of using Ehrlich-Alter executions to trouble American-Soviet relations; EP. 507 Ratcliffe, S. K.
Beveridge and the Bourbons; S. 271; see also EP. 291; 548; Ct. 549
Rationing
Ban on pleasure driving; EP. 74; see also C. 902
Black markets and the OPA. F. Jacobson; C. 903 Difficulties in rationing. S. 556
ner. I. Edman; P. 556
Fact and fiction about the food shortage; EP. 472; see also C. 443
Food, scarcity, and the farm bloc. E. 327
Home fuel-oil coupons cut in value; EP. 74
How to curb the black markets. E. 795; see also E. 654; C. 903
Meat and butter shortage in New York; EP. 74
Meat scarcity. See Food
See also Vegetarianism. C. Jacobs; C. 251
Of shoes, begins. EP. 219
Outlook for consumers in 1943. S. Walinsky and S. 622; see also CH. 624
Plans for eliminating excess purchasing power. A. F. Sturmthal; S. 46; see also C. 251
S. 252
Speakers explaining extension of, by C. R. Wickard and Davis. S. 252
Wide response to such explanations are continued as needed; EP. 2

- Success of food curtailment will depend on flexibility of program; EP..... 2
- What your money won't buy: consumers' goods in war time. W. H. Jorcy; S..... 233
- Why food is scarce. J. E. Patton; S..... 333, 374; see also E..... 327; EP..... 363; E..... 472; C..... 501; EP..... 543
- Ratkall, Helen; exhibition. A. Rattner; Abraham; exhibition. J. Connolly; A..... 714
- Reconstruction finance corporation
BEW takes over many of the powers formerly held by J. H. Jones; EP..... 147
- Jones, J. H., finances Shipshaw dam in Canada for the aluminum trust; F. Stone; S..... 475
- Jones, J. H., refuses to submit records to audit; EP..... 579
- Recorded music. See Haggin; B. H.
- Refugees
Bermuda conference formulates a program of inaction; F. Kirchwey; S..... 796
- Caring for refugee children in Europe. H. Pauli; see also E..... 437
- Escape from France; C..... 70
- German leadership in exile: political value of the emigration..... 21; see also C..... 105
- Jewish, receive little aid in America and Britain in escaping from Nazi atrocities; E..... 293; see also EP..... 508
- Letter on "Reese" but not attacked by K. R. Grossmann. W. J. Duchaine; C..... 216
- Spanish. See Franco-American relations
- North Africa
Their knowledge and experience questioned. W. Victor; C..... 106
- While the Jews die..... 366; see also C..... 503; C..... 754
- Reid, A. V.
Comment on the Rickenbacker-Wolpert controversy; C..... 250; see also..... 117
- Reid, Francis C.
Finds The Nation too critical; C..... 144
- Republican party
Election gains will not result in stronger prosecution of the war. E. D. Todd; C..... 35
- Isolationist bloc in Congress resist efforts of Stassen and Willkie to broaden party views; EP..... 74
- Isolationists form Committee for Fourtyone to formulate post-war policy; EP..... 822
- May be ended in 1944 by the anti-New Deal Democratic bloc; EP..... 822
- Pro-Willkie group forms Post-war policy association to combat isolationists; EP..... 822
- Spangler, H. E., gives form for conducting the 1944 presidential campaign; EP..... 542
- Restes, I.
Commends The Nation's criticism of our State department's North African policy; C..... 359
- Revusky, A.
Allies should act to set up a French government now; C..... 34
- Richard III. J. W. Knecht; D..... 534
- Rickenbacker, Captain Edward
His attacks on labor; EP..... 290; see also..... 377
- His views on aliens deported. K. Grossmann; C..... 2
- Wall Street Journal* answers his efforts to link absenteeism and union activities; EP..... 471
- Riesel, Victor
"Serviceman's reconstruction plan" by J. McWilliams; S..... 554
- Riggs, Lynn
To a camoufleur; P..... 384
- Rights, civil. See Civil rights
- Rivero Gil
Solving the transportation problem; Ct..... 809
- Robert, Admiral Georges. See Martineau
- Roberts, W. Adolphe
Starvation in Puerto Rico; S..... 155
- Rogers, Will. Jr., liberal in Congress. R. H. Rovere; S..... 294
- Rogge, O. John
Replaces W. P. Maloney as special prosecutor in government's action against EP..... 254; see also..... 223
- Roman Catholic church
Archbishop Spellman reported soon to go to Moscow to negotiate a concordat between Russia and the Vatican; EP..... 687
- Its influence on our attitude toward Franco and O. Hapburg. D. Swensen; C..... 72; see also C..... 143
- Pope Pius's speech on labor and revolution; E..... 893
- Pope's address shows Italy in the midst of social upheaval; disclaims support of the war; EP..... 849
- Purpose of Archbishop Spellman's visit to the Vatican. F. Kirchwey; S..... 329
- Vatican repudiates Franco's appeal for peace. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 738
- Vatican's role in the politics of post-war "legitimacy." L. Vogel; S..... 231; see also C..... 357
- Rommel, Field Marshal Erwin. See War, African
- Roosevelt, Eleanor
Entertains army private; EP..... 75
- Roosevelt, Franklin Delano Administration
Budget message; the; E..... 76
- His American "Beveridge plan." F. L. Stone; S..... 405; see also..... 115; EP..... 327; E..... 538; EP..... 722; E..... 824
- His message to Congress over-optimistic and under-optimistic in report on war production. I. F. Stone; S..... 80; see also E.....
- His sons' accounts by Representatives Lambertson of evading service in active war zones; EP..... 470; see also EP.....
- Issues executive order freezing wages and prices E..... 546; see also E..... 654; EP..... 685
- Issues statements on proposed veto of bill containing rider to repeal the salary limit; EP..... 542; see also EP.....
- Promises total defeat of the axis and an early invasion of Europe. F. Kirchwey; S..... 257
- Stassen, H., leads House committee to investigate governmental agencies; E..... 256
- Letter of the union message to Congress; E..... 76; see also..... 506
- Votes Bankhead bill as a directly inflationary measure; EP..... 506
- Rosenfeld, Leonard
Comments on "Murder of a people"; C..... 143
- Rosenfeld, Paul
Charles; S..... 276
- Roth quartet, B. H. Haggin; M..... 284
- Rovere, Richard H.
Eight hopeful congressmen; S..... 294; see also C..... 431
- Rubber
Behind Standard oil's offer to give its buna patents to the government: royalty free; EP..... 652
- Experiments on farm products as a source of synthetic rubber. R. L. Holman; S..... 520
- Jeffers' synthetic rubber program said to hamper production of anti-submarine warfare weapons; EP..... 611
- Versus aviation gas. I. F. Stone; S..... 109
- Rumana
Iron guard plot to overthrow the government revealed; EP..... 110
- Ruml, Berdley. See Finance, public
- Rural, Land Reclamation administration. K. Hutchinson; S..... 53
- Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Russian people, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 103
- Russo-German war
"According to plan." Low; Ct..... 370
- Early spring checks Russia's offensive in the Ukraine; EP..... 325; EP..... 409
- German battle technique. G. Cooper; S..... 86
- German news from the western front in preparing the people for bad news; report Russian superiority of numbers; EP..... 109
- Germans hope to fall back intact behind the Dnieper; EP..... 254
- Germans recapture Kharkov; Russians continue to advance in the center and north; EP..... 397
- Goebbels plays down the German defeats. Argus; S..... 274
- "Look what our fellows brought in to day." Low; Ct..... 267
- Pincers attack on Rostov may force army to withdraw from Rostov to Stalingrad and the Caucasus; EP..... 1
- Red army hits its stride, the. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 126
- Russia's great offensive. F. Kirchwey; S..... 78, 293
- Russian "miracle," the. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 315
- Russians capture Kursk; EP..... 237
- Russians lift the siege of Leningrad; EP..... 109
- Russians take German "hedge-hogs"; EP..... 37
- Salute on the eastern front. H. F. Kraus; Ct..... 92
- Second front can prevent Nazi concentration of forces for summer offensive; EP..... 469
- "Straightening the line." Low; Ct..... 300
- Ryan, Monsignor John A.
Sees setback for labor if Republicans win the presidential election in 1944. J. Farmer; S..... 412
- S
SEC. See Securities and exchange commission
- Saar
Hitler's last year of hope; S..... 513
- Salaries. See Labor—Wages
- Saludos amigos. J. Agee; MP..... 283
- Salvemini, Gaetano
Fascism compared with Mussolini; S..... 162; see also C..... 465
- Italian rumormongers; S..... 776
- Saragat, Amintore, and L. Watkinson
Outlook for the consumer in 1943; S..... 622; see also CH..... 624
- Saunders, Dero A.
Men, jobs and politics; S..... 228; see also C..... 323
- Sawyer, Roland D.
Sees liberal initiative swinging from Roosevelt to Willkie; C..... 36
- Schreiber, Georges
Hitler comes to power; Ct..... 202
- Schumann, Frederick L.
Cleared by Kerr committee of charges of subversive activity. I. F. Stone; S..... 662; see also E..... 617; E..... 761
- Schwartz, Osias L.
Urges abolition of efficiency ratings for federal employees; C..... 215
- Schwarzschild, Leopold
German leadership in exile; C..... 21; see also C..... 105
- Searls, Frederick. See War mobilization, office of
- Securities and exchange commission
Passes resolutions for conditions to call annual stockholders' meetings. G. Adams; C..... 393
- Sedition
Hoffman, C. E., denounces government indictment of alleged seditionists; EP..... 2
- Maloney, W. P., replaced by O. J. Rodgers as prosecutor in government's sedition cases. I. F. Stone; S..... 223; see also EP..... 254
- Seger, Richard
German leadership in exile; C..... 21; see also C..... 105
- Selective service
And prohibition. W. E. Halbrook; C..... 106
- Bankhead leads move for deferment of workers; EP..... 290; see also EP..... 440
- Discrimination against Negroes in southern draft boards. R. Wormser; C..... 790
- How large an army? E..... 149; see also EP..... 326
- Kidday bill proposes draft exemption for married men until all unmarried have been called; EP..... 290; see also EP..... 434
- Letters from a pic; S..... 522
- Lynn, Winifred, refuses to appear for army induction because of segregation. D. Macdonald; S..... 268; see also C..... 429; C..... 538
- Mentiment of segregation by their cynicism about the war. C. Williams; S..... 86; see also C..... 180
- Who is fit for the army? Ch..... 448
- Works hardships on Chinese citizens. L. A. Heaum; C..... 106
- See also United States—War
- Seligman, Kurt, recent paintings. J. Connolly; A..... 572
- Seoane, Manuel
China is not Argentina; S..... 12
- Wallace in Chile; S..... 634; see also E..... 615
- Serbia. See Yugoslavia
- Shadow of a doubt. J. Agee; MP..... 139
- Shain, Sergeant Cy
Seeks hot jazz records for soldiers; C..... 502; see also M..... 69; see also C..... 215; C..... 286
- Shapiro, Karl
New Guinea; P..... 671
- Sheane, William H.
Comments on "Men, jobs and politics" by D. Saunders; C..... 323; see also 228
- Sherman, Charles W.
American banks, the; C..... 789
- Comments on "Men, jobs and politics" by R. Niebuhr; C..... 323; see also..... 124; C..... 503; EP..... 793
- Shipping
C. O. submits report of mismanagement and inefficiency in the handling of ships and cargo; E..... 510
- Stops of union seamen's refusal to unload a ship at Guadalcanal on Sunday proved false; EP..... 218; see also E..... 510
- See also World War—Sea warfare
- Shipshaw dam; public-power project for the aluminum trust. I. F. Stone; S..... 475
- Siam. See Thailand
- Sikorski, Gen. Jan. See Poland
- Simons, Henry C.
Comments on Congressional pay-as-you-go plans; C..... 717
- Simonson, Robert
Comments on "Violence in the classroom" by A. Benedict; C..... 178; see also C..... 51; C..... 144
- Sinarquismo; spread in the United States. F. Diaz Escobar; S..... 487; see also..... 827
- Singh, Anup
Comments on Nation editorial about the All-India Moslem league; C..... 789; see also EP..... 651

Sirvyas, Vt. Comments on "Russia's Baltic frontier"; by V. Soukhomlinev; C...:752; see also E...:436; 442; 452; E...:473; C...:752	Slovakia. See Czechoslovakia	Smaller war plants corporation. See War effort	Smith, David; J. Connolly; A...:572	Smith, David W. Heads committee to investigate govern- ment agencies; E...:256	His committee will supplement the Nazi deal activities of the Dies com- mittee; EP...:290	Social security American Beverage plan assailed by G. Hirschfeld; EP...:722	Beveridge and the Bourbons. S. K. Rat- cliff; S...:271; see also EP...:291; 548; C...:549	House denies funds for continuation of work by the National resources plan- ning board; EP...:327	President pushes the fight for adequate measures. I. F. Stone; S...:405	Report of the National resources plan- ning board. I. F. Stone; S...:405	see also E...:401; C...:538	Wagner, Senator R. F. H. Hirschfeld; anti-Jewish laws in North Africa, the; S...:151; see also EP...:146; S...:323; EP...:323	Attacked by C. Hull at press conference; S...:186; see also C...:394	General Biddle should investi- gate Representative Cox's lobbying services for a Georgia radio station; S...:735; see also EP...:148	Charming Mr. Baruch, the; S...:298; see also C...:394	Chicago Tribune declares American short- wave propaganda "extolling the Duce" hurts the alien; EP...:290	Cox committee's investigation of the FCC, the; S...:735; see also EP...:148; C...:256; EP...:259	Crumbs for small business; S...:187	Department of agriculture dismisses G. Jackson; S...:223	Dine and the bazaar shortage; S...:854	Downfall of Joseph Weiner, the; S...:882	Enter the new Office of war mobiliza- tion; S...:798	RUC holds fast; the; S...:662; see also E...:67	Farm bloc goes to war; the; S...:440; see also E...:327; E...:472; EP...:506	E...:879	History without education; the; Times history quiz; S. 547; see also E...:618; C...:645; C...:707	Maloney W. P., replaced by O. J. Rogie as prosecutor in government's edition cases; S...:223; see also EP...:254	Manufacturers are already returning to civilian production; S...:587; see also EP...:578; EP...:651	Marshall, General G. C., said to back Senator Chandler's "beat Japan first" campaign; S...:763; see also E...:689; 693; E...:764	National foreign trade council forms com- mittee to recover American property in axis-occupied countries; S...:691	Need for federal aid to the schools; Nelson, D., rumored about to appoint labor vice-chairman to the WPB; S...:691	New congress goes gunning for the New deal; S...:7	OWI reports on war production in the Detroit area; S...:187	O'Donnell of the Daily News says Stern for attacking him as a naziophile; S...:187	Our State department issues a book on national socialism; S...:187	Question of an aviation-gas plant in Mexico brings Standard Oil-state de- partment feud into the open; S...:691	Railroad monopoly practices; T. Arnold's anti-trust record; S...:331	Refusals from the National press club fol- lowing its return to seat; S...:647	Negro guest; S...:512; see also C...:59; E...:77; 187; C...:359; C...:394; 619; EP...:690	State department seeks control of Leh- man's foreign relief office; S...:259	War contracts and the house on R streets; S...:691	Strasser, Paul Applying the Atlantic charter to Africa; C...:70	Strauss, Albert Comments on State department's use of E. Hanfstaengl; C...:257	Strikes. See Labor	Stromberg, R. Comments on H. R. Fraser's letter on the history quiz; C...:717; see also 547; E...:618; C...:645; C...:788	Stuart, Miriam Comments on "What next in Africa?" by F. Kirchwey; C...:216; see also 111	Sturmthal, Adolf Rationing and excess purchasing power; S...:46; see also C...:251; C...:252	Submarines. See World war sea warfare	Sudetenland. See Czechoslovakia	Supreme court, United States Holds incompetent detention uncon- stitutional; E...:402	Suydam, Henry Comments on I. F. Stone's reference to J. C. Wiley in "Fighting the Fighting French"; C...:71	Sweden And the Russian bogey. B. Bolles; S...:799	Dr. Goebbels loses. K. Bernheim; S...:592	Relations with Germany strained by at- tacks on Swedish boats in home waters; EP...:651	War-time industrial expansion. B. Bolles; S...:799	Swensen, Dag Questions influence of the Catholic church on our policy toward Franco and O. Hapsburg; C...:72; see also C...:143	Szigeti, Joseph; M. H. Haggin; M...:141	T TVA. See Tennessee valley authority	Taft, Ron Australia in war time; C...:574	Tangany, Ives. J. Connolly; A...:786	Tariff. See Trade agreements	Taxation. See Finance, public	Taylor, C. Fayette Comments on "Peace—the Culbertson system" by L. Fischer; C...:752; see also 582; 727; C...:788; C...:818	Tedor, Stephen Comments on K. Hutcheson's "The truth about the A.P.C. New Deal"; see also...:190, 224	Tennessee Johnson. J. Agee; MP...:139	Tennesser. See Authority; celebrates tenth anniversary; A...:723	Tenor, T. A. Pleasure-driving ban in the east; this rock. J. W. Krutch; D...:74	Thailand (Siam) As a base for an offensive in the south- west Pacific. H. G. Q. Wales; S...:859	Theater. See Krutch, J. W.; Marshall, M. (for reviews)	This land is mine. J. Agee; MP...:642	This rock. J. W. Krutch; D...:355	Thomas, Norman Failure of Norris dinner committee to invite him to be a sponsor is questioned. C. Nelson; C...:178	Thormann, Werner German leadership in exile; C...:21	Three sisters. J. W. Krutch; D...:31	Times, London Urges that Russia be allowed to judge for itself the conditions necessary for the security of its frontiers; E...:436	Times, New York Conducts a history quiz. I. F. Stone; S...:47; see also E...:618; 645; C...:717; C...:788; C...:903	To a comfuser. L. Riggs; P...:384	Told, Edward Interpreting the Republican electoral suc- cesses; C...:35	Tolan, committee Should be continued as a standing com- mittee for the duration; E...:6	Tollefson, Alice A. Pioneer life in the midwest; C...:718; see also EP...:543	Tomorrow the world. M. Marshall; D...:642	Toscanini, estimate of his present work. B. H. Haggin; M...:33; see frontiers; E...:7	Totalitarian states. See Fascism and naz- ism; Germany; Italy; Japan	Trade. See Business	Trade agreements Free trade versus trade controls in the post-war economic world. M. S. Stew- art; S...:801	Republican party opposition to renewal of our reciprocal trade agreements; EP...:686	Vote on the reciprocity trade treaty pro- gram, the; EP...:722; see also 658	Welles, S., urges renewal of trade agree- ments acts; EP...:506	Transport workers union Its wage controversy with the City of New York; C...:77	Treat, Ida London in the spring; S...:629	Tresca, Carlo, death; EP...:73; see also 123
---	---------------------------------	---	-------------------------------------	--	---	---	---	---	--	---	-----------------------------	--	---	---	--	--	--	-------------------------------------	---	--	---	---	--	---	----------	---	--	---	---	--	--	---	--	--	---	---	---	---	---	---	---	---	--	--------------------	--	--	--	---------------------------------------	---------------------------------	---	--	--	---	---	---	--	---	--	--	--------------------------------------	------------------------------	-------------------------------	--	--	---------------------------------------	---	---	---	---	---------------------------------------	-----------------------------------	---	---	--------------------------------------	--	--	-----------------------------------	---	---	---	---	--	---	---------------------	--	--	---	--	---	--	--

- Tribune*, Chicago
Declares American short-wave propaganda "extolling the Soviets" hurts the allied cause. I. F. Stone; S. . . . 512
- Truman committee
Investigates charge against the Carnegie-Illinois plant of the United States steel corporation of selling defective steel plate to the government; E. B. Bolles; 474
- Tugwell, Rexford Guy; his governorship of Puerto Rico under fire. W. A. Roberts; S. . . . 155
- Tunisia. See War, African
- Turkey
Churchill-Inonu meeting suggests discussion of military action; EP. . . . 217
- U
U.S.S.R. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- U-boats. See World war—Sea warfare
- Underhill, Frank
Canada's rising Socialists; S. . . . 447
- Unemployment. See Labor
- Union of soviet socialist republics
And Great Britain. See Great Britain—Anglo-Soviet relations
- And Poland
Border controversy. V. Soukhomlinev; S. . . . 452; see also E. . . . 436; E. . . . 442; E. . . . 473; EP. . . . 613; E. . . . 653; 670; EP. . . . 868; C. . . . 752; C. . . . 797
Ehrlich-After executions. The . . . 500 see also C. . . . 466; EP. . . . 590
- Friction with Poland results from German story of Polish officers executed by the Russian government; EP. . . . 613; see also E. . . . 653; 670; EP. . . . 686
- And the Czech government in exile. B. Bolles; S. . . . 408; see also E. . . . 421
- And the Finnish "peace" offensive. J. Gerber; S. . . . 379; see also EP. . . . 182; EP. . . . 614
- And the United States. See United States—And the Soviet union
- Backs the Yugoslav partisans' constituent assembly; EP. . . . 182
- Fear of, and the second front. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. . . . 451
- Goebbels revives the anti-bolshevik line. Argus; S. . . . 452; see also E. . . . 436; 442; E. . . . 473; E. . . . 653; C. . . . 752; C. . . . 797
- Post-war relations with the western democracies. R. Niebuhr; S. . . . 82; 124; see also 293; C. . . . 323; C. . . . 503; EP. . . . 793
- Relations with the western democracies by Anglo-American appeasement of Spain; EP. . . . 578
- Reported seeking a concord with the Vatican; EP. . . . 687
- Stalin dissolves the Communist international. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . 762; see also EP. . . . 759; 779; 808
- Sweden fears Russian post-war designs on its territory. B. Bolles; S. . . . 799
- Unions, labor. See Labor unions
- United mine workers. See Coal; Labor unions
- United States
And China
America should act to improve Chinese-British relations. . . . 693; see also E. . . . 689
- Hearings on repeal of the Chinese exclusion act; EP. . . . 723
- Help for the Chinese industrial cooperatives; EP. . . . 723
- Lend-lease supplies. See Lend-lease supplies—sharply; figures on shipments contradict Roosevelt's statements in his annual message to Congress; E. . . . 114; see also EP. . . . 759; 779; 808
- Warning from Madame W. Koo that Chinese resistance may collapse without increased American aid; EP. . . . 720
- Withdrawal of Chinese military mission underlines our failure to aid Chinese army; EP. . . . 38
- And Czechoslovakia
Our State department opposes Benezes Russian policy. B. Bolles; S. . . . 408; see also EP. . . . 721
- And Finland
Our legation is withdrawn from Helsinki; EP. . . . 614
- And France. See Franco-American relations
- And Great Britain
Americans in England. M. H.; C. . . . 501
- British rebuke Argentina for stories of rift in Anglo-American relations; EP. . . . 39
- Bracken, B., voices British support of American policy in North Africa. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . 111; C. . . . 501
- Casablanca conference, the; EP. . . . 182; see also E. . . . 184; 204; 221; 257
- Churchill replies to Senator Chandler by urging defeat of Hitler first; E. . . . 760; see also E. . . . 689; 693; 763
- Churchill's address to Congress stresses aerial warfare; EP. . . . 758; see also Churchill's visit to Washington may prestage offensive action in the Far east; E. . . . 725
- MacMillan, Harold, named British minister to Allied headquarters in North Africa; F. Kirchwey; S. . . . 111; see also C. . . . 216
- McCormick, C. C. . . . 216 proposes that Britain cede her dominions to the United States; EP. . . . 615; see also EP. . . . 759
- Purpose of Eden's visit to the U. S.; S. . . . 442; see also E. . . . 399; C. . . . 584
- And India
Phillips, William, is sent as observer to New Delhi; EP. . . . 75
- And Italy
No deals with the fascists! EP. . . . 721
- And Japan. See Japanese-Americans; War, Pacific
- And Mexico
Roosevelt visits President Avila Camacho at Monterrey; E. . . . 615
- And Spain
Ambassador Hayes pledges our full aid to the Franco regime; EP. . . . 111; see also E. . . . 131
- American oil for Franco. S. C. Menefee; S. . . . 669; see also S. . . . 329
- Davis, E., states belief in Spain's sincere desire for neutrality; EP. . . . 3
- Franco seeks Anglo-American supply to bolster his regime; EP. . . . 434
- Roosevelt's pledge of total defeat of the axis is compromised by American supply to Franco; F. Kirchwey; S. . . . 257
- Visit of General Beigebider; Ambassador Hayes lauds American oil shipments. S. . . . 329
- Watch Spain Morocco! . . . 165
- And the Soviet Union
Chandall reaffirms Anglo-Russian rapprochement; urges friendlier relations between Russia and the United States; 473
- Davis, J. E., brings Roosevelt message from Stalin; EP. . . . 793
- Distortion of history in "Mission to Moscow" may impair Russo-American relations; EP. . . . 651; see also MP. . . . 749; C. . . . 818; C. . . . 873
- Lend-lease shipments unnecessary, contended at the height of the Soviet winter offensive; E. . . . 510
- Our appeasement of Franco increases Russia's suspicions of our intentions; EP. . . . 578
- Post-war relations. R. Niebuhr; S. . . . 82; 124; see also C. . . . 323; C. . . . 503; EP. . . . 793
- Stalin's reaction to American shipments of oil to Spain. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . 323; see also S. . . . 669
- Standley, Ambassador W. H., charges Russia fails to publicize American Lend-lease aid; E. . . . 263
- State department toys with idea of a Central European bloc to prevent the spread of bolshevism; EP. . . . 506; see also 408; E. . . . 544
- Wallace warns of the dangers of "double-crossing Russia"; E. . . . 399; see also EP. . . . 363
- And the war
Ambassador Standley charges Russians fail to publicize American Lend-lease aid; EP. . . . 362; see also E. . . . 399
- Average American's reaction to problems of war and peace. I. Fischer; S. . . . 775
- Bankhead, Senator J. H., proposes that we supply materials, the other allies to furnish the fighting forces; E. . . . 149
- Congress votes confidence in Lend-lease aid to China over the Burma road proves negligible; EP. . . . 254; see also E. . . . 114
- Lend-lease shipments to Russia unnecessarily delayed at the height of the Soviet winter offensive; EP. . . . 510
- Lend-lease; Waiting for the leavins; C. . . . 334
- M. Babbitt explains about foreigners. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . 111
- Nationwide poll urged on post-war policy and peace machinery. S. H. Zebel; EP. . . . 537
- "Peace and War"—an American White Book. R. Bendiner; S. . . . 119; see also EP. . . . 130
- Roosevelt's pledge of total defeat of the axis is compromised by our relations with Spain. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . 257
- What Americans are thinking. S. C. Menefee; S. . . . 764
- Army
Abraham Lincoln brigade charges veterans of the Spanish war are barred from combat duty and advancement. I. F. Stone; S. . . . 512
- American soldiers in England. M. H. C. . . . 501
- Austrian legion formally disbanded; EP. . . . 759; see also C. . . . 329
- Draw injustices against the Negroes. R. Wormser; C. . . . 790
- How large should it be? EP. . . . 326; see also EP. . . . 183; EP. . . . 326
- Inequality in methods of promotion and advancement. Corporal; C. . . . 818
- Kilday bill proposes draft exemption for married men until all unmarried have been called; EP. . . . 290; see also EP. . . . 434
- Letters from a pfc; E. . . . 522
- Letter on "Jim Crow goes abroad" by J. Julian. E. M. Miller; C. . . . 72
- Lynn, Winfred, refuses to serve in the American army because of race segregation. D. Macdonald; S. . . . 268; see also C. . . . 429; C. . . . 538
- Need for political training for soldiers. Air Trainer; C. . . . 178
- Program for training Negro pilots sabotaged; EP. . . . 184
- Record libraries. See Army; War, Pacific
- H. Haggins; M. . . . 69; see also C. . . . 215; C. . . . 286; C. . . . 502
- Senate adopts Frankfurter-Johnson bill to defer farm workers. I. F. Stone; S. . . . 440; see also EP. . . . 290; EP. . . . 434
- Use of dehydrated foods. H. Haggins; M. . . . 299
- Using Dun and Bradstreet as an investigating agency; EP. . . . 184
- Veterans. See Veterans—Who is fit for the army? Ch. . . . 448
- Congress. See Congress—Diplomatic appointments
- Flynn, Edward J., appointed minister to Australia; EP. . . . 73; see also EP. . . . 146
- Phillips, W., sent as American observer to India; EP. . . . 75
- McKellar bill would replace civil service by Senate trial of soldiers. Post-war "Beveridge plan." I. F. Stone; S. . . . 405; see also E. . . . 401; C. . . . 722; E. . . . 824
- State department
And Martinique; EP. . . . 577; see also S. . . . 4; EP. . . . 650
- "Goldbergh" activities of A. A. Berle's statement that idea of a buffer state is dead; EP. . . . 506; see also S. . . . 544
- Anti-labor activities of P. Boal, American ambassador to Bolivia. I. F. Stone; S. . . . 42; see also C. . . . 59
- Denies recent Nation and PM stories on Bolivia and North Africa; E. . . . 186; see also C. . . . 690
- Does nothing to facilitate emigration of Jews from Europe; EP. . . . 508
- Finland Standard Oil's attempts to obtain Mexican concession for an aviation gas plant. I. F. Stone; S. . . . 691
- Hull, C., attacks I. F. Stone; E. . . . 186; see also C. . . . 394
- Issues book on national socialism. I. F. Stone; S. . . . 187
- Issues "Peace and War" as a record of American diplomacy over ten years. B. Bendiner; S. . . . 119; see also EP. . . . 37
- Its policies on "legitimate" post-war leaders in Europe. L. Vogel; S. . . . 231; see also C. . . . 357
- Protest over the North African middle grows; P. H. Appleby resigns from the department in protest; EP. . . . 146; see also S. . . . 823
- Refuses exit permits to sailors going to Canada to join the Free French; EP. . . . 434; see also EP. . . . 325; E. . . . 400
- Reported to be missing. E. Haggins; as an adviser. A. Strauss; C. . . . 251
- Seeks control of Lehman's foreign real estate office. I. F. Stone; S. . . . 259
- Should act to obtain the repeal of North Africa's anti-Jewish laws. I. F. Stone; C. . . . 323; EP. . . . 162; 663
- Versus the Four freedoms. S. Bristol; C. . . . 501
- See also Franco-American relations
- United States steel corporation
Carnegie-Illinois plant charged with selling defective steel plate to the government; E. B. Bolles; S. . . . 474
- United States supreme court. See Supreme court, United States
- Unknown army, the. M. Van Doren; P. . . . 707
- Urchurga, Demetrio; exhibition of monotypes. J. Connolly; A. . . . 391
- Uruguay
Model of a fighting democracy. . . . 19
- Spain protests visit to Montevideo of Argentine naval and General J. M. J. Spanish republicans; EP. . . . 615
- V
Vambury, Rustem "Washington Metterichs" Comments on; V. Vogel; C. . . . 231
- Replies to L. Fischer's open letter to Churchill; C. . . . 902; see also 797
- Van Doren, M. . . . 707
- Goody to children; P. . . . 318
- Unknown army, the; P. . . . 707
- Vatican. See Vatican—Vatican and General J. M. J.
- Vayo, Julio Alvarez del. See Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
- Vertes; exhibition. J. Connolly; A. . . . 499

- Veterans, war
Seeks information about post-war organization for returning soldiers. J. C. Cravens; C. E. 502
- "Serviceman's reconstruction plan," launched by J. McWilliams. V. Riesel; S. 554
- Vichy
Victor Emanuel, King. See Italy
Victor, Walther
Comments on the knowledge and experience of refugees; C. 106
- Visas. See Refugees
- Vogel, Lucien
State department policies on post-war "legitimate" leaders in Europe; S. 357
- Voorhis, H. Jerry; leaves the Dies committee for post on the Smith committee investigating government activities; EP. 290
- Vox populi, inc. R. Bendiner; S. 449
- W
W.L.B. See War labor board
Wages. See Labor
Wagner, Robert F. See Social security
Wales, H. G. Quaritch
Bureau's stumbling block; S. 859
- Walinsky, Louis, and E. Sard
Outlook for the consumer in 1943; S. 622
- Wall, George
Efforts to limit absenteeism and union activities; EP. 471
- Wallace, Henry Agard
His views on post-war aviation attacked by C. B. Luce as "globalization"; E. 255
- His visit to Chile. M. Seane; S. 634
- See also EP. 470
- Urges use of our surpluses in post-war period to raise living standards of other nations; EP. 363
- Warms of the danger of "double-crossing Russia"; E. 399
- See also EP. 363
- Wallis, W. Allen
Proposes progressive spending tax to cut excess purchasing power. A. F. Sturmthal; S. 46
- See also C. 251; C. 252
- War, African
American and British forces maintain constant assault on Axis installations and supply lines; EP. 110
- American forces bog down as Rommel seeks to effect a juncture with the Nazi Tunisia army; S. 74
- Battle for Font de Sahy; S. 613
- Battle lines in Tunisia. D. W. Mitchell; S. 403
- British army ready for the offensive as the rainy season ends; S. 325
- Eisenhower, General D. D., placed in supreme command of military operations; EP. 218
- North African offensive opens the way for an attack on the European continent. D. W. Mitchell; S. 44
- Rommel faces last-stage defense in the Bizerte-Tunis triangle; EP. 469
- Rommel seeks to widen the gap between the allied forces and the British eighth army; EP. 289
- Rommel thrusts toward the Krenamsa plateau; EP. 289
- Spanish refugees carry out desert assignments in the British eighth army. F. Kirchwey; S. 329
- Tunisia and allied forces; S. 165
- Watch Spanish Morocco
See also Franco-American relations
- War effort
Achievement
How to curb it. J. A. Wechsler; S. 377
- In the shipyards. S. C. Menefee; S. 626
- Linked with unionism by Captain E. Sternberg; EP. 471
- See also 377; EP. 471
- Allied war production will greatly surpass that of Germany in 1943. F. Sternberg; S. 265
- American war production will turn the tide of Allied strength in 1943. F. Sternberg; S. 265
- Carnegie-Illinois plant of the United States steel corporation charged with selling defective steel plates to the government; E. 474
- Civilian casualties; EP. 290
- Conscription. See Selective service
- Contract
Anaconda wire company receives light sentence for delivery of defective material to the government; EP. 850
- Cost-plus basis results in labor-hoarding. S. Menefee; S. 626
- Criticism for small business; report of the Smaller war plants corporation. I. F. Stone; S. 259
- House on R street. I. F. Stone; S. 691
- Johnson, Colonel Robert W., named chairman of the Smaller war plants corporation; E. 150
- Navy's contract to Standard oil for developing Elk Hill oil reserves termed "detrimental to the public interest"; E. 852
- Small plants remain idle as big business concerns receive the bulk of our war orders; E. 113
- Cost of American weapons; Ch. 79
- Curtalement of consumers' goods production in war time. W. H. Jorj; S. 233
- Dollar-a-year men attacked by W. A. White; EP. 722
- Effect of housing on war production; the fiasco at Willow Run. W. H. Jorj; S. 655
- Ickes' report to the Small business committee reveals almost complete monopoly control of military and civilian production; E. 113
- Inflation. See Business
- Lag in production of anti-submarine weapons; EP. 110
- Manpower
Agricultural. See Agriculture
Austin-Wadsworth war-service bill; E. 365
- Compulsory civilian labor plan submitted by G. Clark; EP. 3
- Congress seen opposed to withdrawing additional workers from production to increase our armed personnel; EP. 183
- McNutt, P. W., postpones hearings of Fair employment practices committee. J. Wechsler; S. 121
- McNutt's voluntary program fails; E. 365
- Military; and civilian. S. 149
- No work for older women. H. R. Monague; C. 35
- Senate's adoption of the Bankhead act for deferment of farm workers undermines efforts to formulate an integrated manpower policy; EP. 440
- See also EP. 440
- Shortage of, continues to be an argument against army increase set for 1943; EP. 326
- Sound overall policy endangered by the Kilday bill for draft exemption of married men; EP. 434
- See also EP. 434
- Voluntary or compulsory manpower mobilization? D. C. Saunders; S. 229
- Waste of, in the shipyards. S. Menefee; S. 626
- Weaknesses in War manpower commission revealed by representatives of war committee; E. 726
- Manufacturers are already returning to civilian production. I. F. Stone; S. 651
- See also EP. 788
- National resources development report reveals that production is scaled down as costs have risen; E. 654
- Nelson cuts farm machinery quotas and concentrates production in the hands of small firms; EP. 147
- Office of war mobilization created. I. F. Stone; S. 726
- See also EP. 726
- Office of price administration. See Price administration, office of
- Office of information. See War information, office of
- Outlook for the consumer in 1943. L. Walinsky and E. Sard; S. 624
- See also CH. 624
- Poor management in the shipyards. S. Menefee; S. 626
- Price. See Business
- Rationing
Roosevelt's report to Congress on war production seen as optimistic and uncritical. I. F. Stone; S. 80
- See also E. 76
- Shipbuilding and the U-boat campaign. D. W. Mitchell; S. 110
- See also EP. 110
- Steel production a key factor in war. F. Sternberg; S. 479
- Strikes. See Labor
- Taxation. See Finance, public
- War production board
Backs OWI report of production in the Detroit area. I. F. Stone; S. 187
- Behind the military-civilian struggle. I. F. Stone; S. 394
- Nelson appoints D. D. Whiteside as chairman in charge of civilian requirements; EP. 578
- See also E. 852
- Nelson may appoint labor-vic-chairmen. I. F. Stone; S. 691
- See also EP. 878
- Nelson opposes Maloney bill which would set up an independent civilian supply agency; EP. 587
- Will Baruch head a new production superboard? I. F. Stone; S. 394
- See also C. 394
- War, European
Airs over Germany and occupied Europe increase in intensity; EP. 110
- See also E. 292
- Bombing won't win the war. D. W. Mitchell; S. 758
- British press criticizes high-level day bombing as resulting in destruction and heavy civilian casualties; S. 578
- Coming battle of Italy. D. W. Mitchell; S. 832
- See also EP. 849; 853; 893
- Europe again. H. J. W. Gerber and A. Kantorowicz
1. How strong is the underground? S. 631
2. Guerrilla fighters; S. 666
3. Passive resisters, the; S. 704
- See also 701; C. 703
- Fall of Pantelleria. F. Kirchwey; S. 853
- Feed Europe's children; EP. 88
- See also 88
- German army mobilized; Ch. 14
- German battle technique. G. Cooper; S. 805
- German efforts to fortify Europe drain its manpower reserves; EP. 109
- "Goebbels invites—and I get der visitors. Low; C. 766
- Heavy Anglo-American air raid aims at submarine bases; EP. 325
- Hitler and Mussolini meet to survey continental reserves as Rommel's defeat appears imminent; EP. 541
- "I see der British talk of putting on an offensive." Low; C. 667
- Second front. See World war
- Undermining the underground. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 703
- See also C. 703; 704
- Will Hitler abandon Mussolini? E. 724
- See also World war
- War information, office of Davis, E., discounts prospects of Italian revolt against the Nazi overlords. G. Salvemini; S. 162
- Davis, E., issues statement on extension of rationing; EP. 2
- House votes to abolish its domestic activities; EP. 878
- Issues booklet on "Negoties and the war"; EP. 184
- Report on Detroit war production and the Ford Willow Run plant is truthful despite pressure for publicity. I. F. Stone; S. 187
- Seeks right to censor moving pictures before the public sees them. J. McDonald; S. 484
- Spain sincere in desire for neutrality, according to E. Davis; EP. 3
- War labor board
Little steel formula must be adjusted quickly to provide a floor for real wages; E. 219
- Might not survive the passage of the Connolly-Smith anti-strike bill; E. 851
- See also Labor—Wages
- War mobilization, office of Byrnes, J. P., chooses B. M. Baruch and F. Secaris as production advisers; S. 850
- Is no substitute for over-all agency proposed in Kilgore-Pepper-Tolan bill. I. F. Stone; S. 798
- Report of Kilgore committee on war production shows need for an overall agency; E. 726
- War, Pacific
Admiral Halsey and General MacArthur divided on question of air versus seapower; E. 508
- Battle of Bismarck sea; EP. 361
- Burma and our Pacific strategy. D. W. Mitchell; S. 859
- Case for greater air power, the; E. 508
- See also E. 579; 620
- Chandler, Senator A. B., launches "heat Japan first" campaign; EP. 693
- See also 689; 763; 764
- Reconquest of Burma. H. G. Q. Wales; S. 859
- Churchill's visit to Washington suggests offensive action in the Pacific; E. 725
- Gather ye rosebuds while ye may. Low; C. 733
- Japanese battle technique. G. Cooper; S. 731
- MacArthur's problems in the southwest Pacific. D. W. Mitchell; S. 620
- See also E. 579
- New Guinea; capture of Buna Mion safeguards our supply routes and opens way for an attack on Burma; EP. 39
- Our coming offensive in the Pacific. D. W. Mitchell; S. 482
- Solomon islands
Story of union seamen's refusal to unload a ship at Guadalcanal on Sunday proved false; EP. 510
- See also E. 510
- Talk on Guadalcanal. I. Wolfert; S. 250
- See also EP. 617
- Toyko raid, the; E. 617
- Wanted: a political strategy for Asia. Lin Yutang; S. 91

- War shipping administration
Should investigate charges contained in C.I.O. report of mismanagement and inefficiency in the handling of ships and cargoes; E..... 510
- Warren, Dale
Urges radio advertisers to eliminate "commercials" from programs; C..... 143
- Washington letters, articles by I. F. Stone:
7, 42, 80, 115, 151, 187, 223, 259, 298, 331, 405, 440, 475, 512, 547, 587, 626, 691, 735, 763, 798, 826, 854..... 882
- Watson, Goodwin
Kerr committee upholds Dies charges that he is unfit for government office; E..... 761
- Retained by F.C.C. despite Kerr committee findings. I. F. Stone; S..... 761
- Wavel, Sir Archibald Percival. See India
- We will walk like the tapir. M. Moore; S..... 866
- Wechsler, James A.
How to curb absenteeism; S..... 377
- Pigeonhole for Negro equality; P. McNutt moves against the Fair employment practices committee; S..... 121
- Weiner, Joseph L. See War effort—War production board
- Weinstein, Jerome
How to pay as you go; S..... 262
- Weiskopf, F. C.
Slovakia: A false satellite; S..... 891
- Sudenland today, the; S..... 824
- Welles, Sumner
Urges renewal of trade agreements act; EP..... 506
- See also Franco-American relations—North Africa; World war—Post-war reconstruction
- Wheeler, Burton C.
Denounces government indictment against alleged secessionist group; EP..... 2
- His remarks on alleged Russian-Japanese rubber deal questioned. H. H. Burnstine; C..... 216
- White, William Allen
Attacks the dollar-a-year men; EP..... 722
- White book. See United States—State department
- Whitehead, Arthur D. See War effort—War production board
- Wickard, Claude R. See Agriculture; Rationing
- Wiesner, Arthur P.
Letter on B. Taper's "Life with Kaiser"; C..... 72
- Wildor, Thornton, and Joyce. See 1950; 167; see also C..... 287; C..... 394
- Wiley, John C.
His diplomatic activities defended. H. S. Suydam; C..... 71
- Williams, Charles
Harlem at war; S..... 86; see also C..... 180
- Williams, Ivor
Prisoner of war urges books to be sent to prison camp in Italy; C..... 646
- Wilkie, Wendell L.
Presidential candidate in 1944? EP..... 326
- Pro-Wilkie Republican bloc forms Post-war policy association to combat isolationists within the party; EP..... 822
- Seen holding liberal initiative today. R. D. Sawyer; C..... 366
- Warns against sacrificing the tradition of the liberal arts in education; EP..... 111
- Willow and I, the. F. K. D..... 32
- Wilson, Edmund
Wildor and Joyce; S..... 167; see also C..... 287; C..... 394
- Woodcott, Alexander, and Fourier; S..... 194
- Wings up, J. Agee; MP..... 844
- Winsor, Mary
Comments on the charge that T. Wilder has "borrowed" from Joyce's "Finnegans wake"; C..... 287; see also S..... 167; C..... 394
- Wintringham, Tom
Britain's political revival; S..... 548; see also EP..... 542
- British reaction to the Darian deal; S..... 84
- Wireless. See Radio
- Wolf, Eleanor
Seeks date on Negro-Jewish relationships; C..... 287
- Wolfe, Ira
Talk on Guadalcanal; S..... 117; see also EP..... 183; C..... 250
- Women
Equal rights amendment, the; EP..... 507
- Woodcott, Alexander, death. E. Wilson; S..... 194
- World federation plan. L. Fischer; S..... 582; see also 727; C..... 652; C..... 846
- World war
Adolf is a great little unit. Low; Ct..... 199
- Allied and German military strength in 1943. F. Sternberg; S..... 265
- Aviation, post war. See Aviation
- Casablanca and a United Nations political council 204
- Case for greater air power, the; E..... 508; see also S..... 579; 620
- Chandler, Senator A. B. See 1950; States to "beat Japan first"; E..... 760; see also E..... 689; 693; 763; 764
- China fails to understand the United Nations' decision to "beat Hitler first"; E..... 693
- Churchill replies to Senator Chandler urging the defeat of Hitler first; E..... 760; see also E..... 689; 693; 763; 764
- Correlation of strategy. Low; Ct..... 129
- France appeals for peace to prevent the spread of bolshevism. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 738
- German army military 14
- Hitler's last year of hope. P. Saar; S..... 513
- Hitler's proclamation offers a choice between negotiated peace and a bolshevik Europe; EP..... 182
- Hitler's three favorite war horses start a peace drive. A. Hoffmeister; Ct..... 344
- How our enemies fight 805
- Killed in action, 1942. Ch..... 404
- Nature of this war and the allies' lack of leadership. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 128
- New developments in United Nations' strategy; E..... 148
- Post-war reconstruction
And the Jews of Europe. P. S. Bernstein; S..... 196
- Applying the Atlantic Charter to Africa. P. Strasser; C..... 70
- Aviation. See Aviation—Post-war
- Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill remains pending in Senate; EP..... 878; see also 764
- Berle, A. A., declares that idea of a buffer state is dead; State department toys with idea of a Central European bloc to prevent the spread of bolshevism; EP..... 506; see also E..... 544
- Chinese views on the fate of Japan 693; see also E..... 689
- Churchill urges strengthening of friendly relations between Britain, Russia, and the United States; E..... 473
- Comment on G. Reynolds' thesis that all of the German people must be punished. W. Rae; C..... 286
- Conference on post-war monetary problems planned; EP..... 505; see also 545
- Carterson's world federation plan. L. Fischer; S..... 582; see also 727; C..... 752; C..... 788; C..... 818; C..... 846
- Economic basis for post-war peace. Stewart; S..... 801
- Eden seeks Anglo-American accord on post-war relations with France and Russia. B. Bolles; S..... 799
- Employment. See Labor
- Europe's little man wants to know the post-war aims of the United Nations; J. Gerber; S..... 417
- Food conference, the; R. Law, British delegate, submits plan for post-war agricultural policies; EP..... 758
- Free world association sees no possibility of reconstruction without the collaboration of Britain and Russia; EP..... 435
- Future relations between Russia and the western democracies. R. Niebuhr; S..... 293; 293; 293
- Germany after Hitler. H. Motherwell; S..... 323; EP..... 793
- House passes Fulbright resolution for appropriate international machinery; EP..... 878
- McCormick, Colonel
That Britain cede her dominions to the United States; EP..... 615; see also EP..... 759
- Monetary stabilizers; plans the American White plan compared with Britain's Keynes plan. M. S. Stewart; S..... 801; see also 504
- Myths can wreck the peace. M. S. Stewart; S..... 658
- National foreign trade commission forms committee to recover American property in axis-occupied countries. I. F. Stone; S..... 691
- Open letter to Governor Eisen. A. Guérard; C..... 429
- Pan-European conference aims at the revival of a pan-European movement without the participation of Russia; EP..... 435
- Peace—the Culbertson system. L. Fischer; S..... 582; see also 727; C..... 752; C..... 788; C..... 818
- People's Poland, a 304
- Platform for the left. H. J. Laski; S..... 302
- Push-Russians horsing controversy; EP..... 613; see also E..... 633; EP..... 686; C..... 790; EP..... 364, 442; E..... 473
- Political unity first. N. Churchill; S..... 561
- Pope Pius and Europe's underground workers; E..... 893; see also EP..... 491
- Program for Austria. J. Deutsch; S..... 345
- Russia and the anti-bolshevik 491
- Argus; S..... 274; see also 293
- Russia's Baltic frontier. V. Soukhomline; S..... 452; see also E..... 436; 442; E..... 473; C..... 752
- Security see also 115, 271; EP..... 127
- E..... 401; C..... 538, 548; Ct..... 549; EP..... 722; E..... 824
- State department's "legitimate" leaders in Europe. L. Vogel; S..... 231; see also S..... 357
- Strategic frontiers and collective security; E..... 364
- Swedes fear Russian designs on their territory. B. Bolles; S..... 799
- United nations' economic policy of "food and agriculture"; EP..... 541; see also EP..... 542; EP..... 758; EP..... 794
- Wallace, H. A., urges understanding between Russia and western democracies to avoid another war; EP..... 363
- Wallace, H. A., urges use of our surplus to raise living standards of other nations; EP..... 1
- Wallace warns of the dangers of "double-crossing Russia"; E..... 399
- Weller's Toronto speech; EP..... 326
- What Americans are thinking. S. C. Menefee; S..... 374
- What, again? Low; Ct..... 515
- Will the invasion armies of the United Nations seek to stifle the hopes of Europe's peoples? J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 591
- Prisoners
American, in Italy, seek books; C..... 646
- Axis, in the United States. C. Greenberg; S..... 768; see also C..... 902
- Propaganda for Germany—"1918 and 1943"; E..... 4
- Sea warfare
Bombing does not prove effective against U-boats. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 773; see also EP..... 758
- C.I.O. submits report of mismanagement and inefficiency in the handling of ships and cargo; E..... 510
- Decline of the U-boat menace. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 887
- Military critics charge that production of anti-submarine weapons is hampered by Jeffers' synthetic rubber program; EP..... 129
- Occupied areas. Low; Ct..... 210
- U-boats and the second front. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 260
- United nations' to keep pace with our losses; production of American anti-submarine weapons bogs down; EP..... 110
- Second front
And bombing tactics for Europe; E..... 292
- Bombing is no substitute for an invasion. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 773; see also EP..... 758
- And fear of Russia. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 451
- And the U-boat 260
- Anglo-American commanders must take risks against the Russian offensive this year; EP..... 254
- Can prevent Nazi concentration of forces for summer offensive in Russia; EP..... 469
- Casablanca conference hints at a new front in the making; E..... 184
- Continuing battle in Italy. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 832
- European versus Pacific; the case for the second front in Europe; E..... 149
- Hitler and Mussolini's surprise meeting continental reserves as Rommel's defeat appears imminent; EP..... 541
- Inside Hitler's fortress. A. Hoffmeister; E..... 632
- Plans lag as Russia's offensive gains power. F. Kirchwey; S..... 758
- Possibilities of 1943 not yet considered. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 59
- Roosevelt pledges an early invasion of Europe. S. H. Kirchwey; S..... 257
- Scale of French uprisings suggests the imminence of a cross-channel attack; EP..... 397
- Speculations about the European invasion. F. Kirchwey; S..... 853
- Tunisia and after; E..... 687
- Waviness coming to Joe? 451
- Will Hitler abandon Mussolini? E..... 724
- Will the United Nations' invasion forces be a genuine army of liberation? J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 591
- Still on and on and on. Low; Ct..... 491
- Undermining the foundation of victory. Low; Ct..... 660
- Undermining the underground. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 701; see also Ct..... 703; 704; C..... 818
- United nations must not ignore Europe's underground movement. A. Guérard del Vayo; S..... 738
- United nations must not make a deal with Italy's Darlans; EP..... 721
- Wanted—a political strategy Lin Yutang; S..... 91

See also War, African; War; European; War, Pacific
Wormer, F. Davenport: S.	790
Southern draft boards and the Negroes; C.
Y
Yamamoto, Admiral, death; EP.	759
Yankes arrive, the; a parody.	380
Young Mr. Pitt. J. Agee; MP.	283
Yugoslavia
Anti-Sikorski Pole, I. Matuzewski, linked to anti-democratic "Greater Serbia" grasseurs. P. Davaport: S.	163
Civil war between Mihailovich and the partisans; E.	5
German launched campaign against the Mihailovich forces; rumors report peace between the partisans and the royal government-in-exile, EP.	182
Russians reported seeking to heal split with Mihailovich; EP.	110
Scale of guerrilla activities, the. J. W. Gerde and A. Kantorowicz; S.	66
Shake-up in the cabinet in exile; EP.	38
What kind of post-war government would Russia prefer? EP.	182

Z
Zahel, Morton Dawuen
For a "Henry James place"; S.	596;
see also.	718
Zadkine, exhibition. J. Connolly; A.	714
Zehel, Sydney H.
United Nations poll on post-war policy and peace machinery; C.	537

BOOK REVIEWS
Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.
The following explanatory letters are used in the index:
B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer
Adams, Grace; R.	390, 496
Adams, Mildred; R.	168
Africa: Facts and figures. A. M. Maisel; B.	673
Against a darkening sky. J. Lewis; AN.	320
Aglion, Raoul
Fighting French, the; B.	839
Air offensive against Germany, the. A. A. Michie; B.	292
Aldano, Mark
Fifth seal, the; B.	609; see also EP.
Alfred Nobel: Dynamite king—architect of peace. H. E. Pauli; B.	26
Allen, Hervey
Forest and the fort, the; AN.	533
America, Russia, and the communist party in the post-war world. L. Childs, G. S. Counts, and others; B.	492; see also C.
America: The story of a free people. A. Nevins and H. S. Commager; B.	314
American pioneer arts and artists. C. W. Drepper. Foreword by R. Kent; B.	247
American spirit, the. C. A. and M. R. Beard; B.	314
André Gide and the crisis of modern thought. R. Manin; B.	422
Angell, Norman
Let the people know; B.	133; see also C.
Anglo-American literary relations. G. S. Gordon; AN.	677
Anglo-American League that works. Lewis; AN.	786
Another Claudia. R. Franken; B.	748
Another secret diary of William Byrd of Virginia. Edited by M. H. Woodfin. Decoded by M. Tintin; B.	390
Anthology of Latin American poetry, an. Edited by D. Fitts; B.	168
Anthology of Norwegian lyrics. Translated by C. W. Stork. Introduction by C. J. Hambro; AN.	139
Appeasement. The Franco regime in Spain. T. J. Hamilton; B.	421
Arrows into the sun. J. Lauritzen; AN.	245
Art and Freedom. H. M. Kallen; B.	814
Artists in America, the. C. Zigrosser; B.	531
Austin, A. B.
W. landed at dawn: The story of the Dieppe raid; B.	351
Autobiography of a curmudgeon, the. H. L. Ickes; B.	671
B Bakeless, John
Tragic history of Christopher Marlowe, the. Two volumes; B.	66
Balcony empire: Fascist Italy at war. R. and E. Packard; B.	134

Backer, George; R.	66, 138
Barracks, 3, room 12. M. Haedrich; AN.	460
Barry, Richard
Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina; AN.	463
Barzun, Jacques; R.	135, 459
Bates, Ralph; B.	101, 135, 243, 320; 492; see also C.
537; C.	679;
R.	568, 869
Battle for the Solomons. I. Wolffert; B.	277
Baudelaire the critic. M. Gilman; B.	780
Beard, Charles A. and Mary R.
American spirit, the; B.	314
Behemoth Japanese mask. J. F. Steiner; B.	332
Belden, Jack
Retreat with Stilwell; B.	494
Benham, Frederic
Great Britain under protection; AN.	786
Ben-Horin, Elihu and M. Berchin
Red army, the; B.	135
Beneš, Edvard; E. L. Oron; E.	320
Berchin, Michael, and E. Ben-Horin
Red army, the; B.	135
Berryman, John
Poms; B.	569
Between the dark and the daylight. N. Hale; AN.	748
Between the thunder and the sun. V. Sheean; B.	566
Beveridge, Sir William
Financial insurance and allied services; B.	172
Billingler, Karl; R.	275
Black-out in Grelley. J. B. Priestley; AN.	320
Blankfort, Michael
Time to live, a; AN.	533; see also R.
Blood for a stranger. K. Jarrell; B.	176
Bogan, Louise; R.	176
Borgin, C. A.	894
Borkin, Joseph, and C. A. Welsh
Germany's master plan: The story of the industrial offensive; B.	895
Brauto, Bjarne; R.	350
Brady, Robert A.
Business as a system of power; B.	870
Brennan, Frederick Hazlitt
Memo to a firing squad; AN.	245
Brenner, Anita
The photographs that swept Mexico, the. Photographs assembled by G. R. Keighton; B.	811
Briekman, Richard
Is Germany incurable? B.	812
Bridenbaugh, Carl and Jessica
Rebels and gentlemen: Philadelphia in the age of Franklin; B.	424
Brinin, John Malcolm
Lincoln lyrics, the; AN.	248
Broch, Theodor
Mountain wars, the; B.	350
Brooks, Alden
Will Shakespeare and the dyer's hand; B.	315; see also C.
348; C.	575
Burchhardt, Jacob
Force and freedom: Reflections on his early work. Edited by H. Nichols; B.	530
Burden of British invasion, the. G. F. S. ras and L. Rostas; AN.	391
Burnham, James
Machievellians, the: Defenders of freedom; B.	636
Burrows, Raymond, and B. C. Redmond
Symphony themes; B.	104
Business as a system of power. A. Brady; B.	870
By nature free. H. Haydn; B.	570
Byrd, William, autobiography; B.	390
C
Cain, James M.
Three of a kind; B.	744
Calamari, Paul
Eulogy of the judges; B.	280
Caldwell, Erskine
Georgia boy; AN.	712
Cameron, Elizabeth B.
Prologue to appeasement. A study in French foreign policy; AN.	68
Campbell, Grace
Can our cities survive? AN.	320
Can our cities survive? AN. ABC of urban problems, their analysis, their solutions. J. L. Serti; B.	612
Can we win the peace? P. Einzig; AN.	714
Caproni, X. Herbert; B.	842
Captain of the Andes: The life of José de San Martín. M. H. Harrison; B.	745
Carroll, Charles, biography. E. H. Smith; B.	390
Cassidy, Henry C.
Moscow catalogue; B.	840
Charles Carroll of Carrollton. E. H. Smith; B.	390
Chase, Stuart
Goals for America: A budget of our needs and resources; B.	319
Cheever, John
Way some people live, the; AN.	533
Chevigny, Hector
Lord of Alaska. Baranov and the Russian adventure; AN.	499
Childers, James Saxon
War eagles: The story of the Eagle squadron; B.	746

Childs, John L. G. S. Counts, and others
America, Russia, and the communist party in the post-war world; B.	492; see also C.
537; C.	679
Chile. E. Ferguson; AN.	677
Chilean popular front. The. J. R. Stevens; AN.	677
Chinese room, the. V. Connell; AN.	67
Choice, the. Mills; B.	712
Churchill, Henry; R.	782
Circle in the water. H. Hull; AN.	171
Citizen Tom Paine. H. Fast; B.	675
City, the. Its story of a free people, its future. E. Saarienen; B.	606
Cloete, Stuart
Congo song; AN.	424
Coastal command. British air minister; B.	746
Colonel Effingham's raid. B. Fleming; AN.	388
Commager, Henry Steele, and A. Nevins
America: The story of a free people; B.	314
Command of the air, the. G. Douhet. Translated by D. Ferrari; B.	462
Complete Roman drama, the. Edited by G. E. Duckworth; B.	103
Congo song. S. Cloete; AN.	424
Connecticut wits, the. L. Howard; B.	316
Connell, Vivian
Chinese room, the; AN.	67
Conrad and his contemporaries. By J. H. Reinger. Illustrated by F. Topolski; AN.	499
Constantine the great. L. B. Holsapple; AN.	463
Coomaraswamy, Ananda K.
Comments on E. Schuehr's review of "Warning to the west" by Shridharani; C.	179; see also R.
25; C.	142; C.
180; C.	215
Corson, John J.
Manpower for victory; AN.	714
Corwin, Edward S.
Explains his review of H. Hazlitt's "A new constitution now"; C.	35; see also C.
34
Coulter, John Wesley
Fiji: Little India of the Pacific; AN.	463
Counts, George S., J. L. Childs, and others
America, Russia, and the communist party in the post-war world; B.	492; see also C.
537; C.	679
Cripps, Advocate extraordinary. P. Strauss; B.	243
Crossroads. B. Versissimo; AN.	245
Culbertson, Ely
Summary of the world federation plan; B.	582; see also R.
727; C.	750
C.	788; C.
818; C.	846
Curie, Eve
Journey among warriors; B.	781
Current, Richard Nelson
Old Thad Stevens: A story of ambition; AN.	391
D
Dali, Salvador
Secret life of Salvador Dali, the. Translated by H. M. Chevalier; B.	212
Danse macabre. F. Masereel; AN.	213
Dark wedding. R. J. Sender. Translated by E. Clark; B.	602
Darkness and the deep. V. Fisher; AN.	460
Darlan, Admiral, the enigma of. A. de Montmorency; B.	708
De Capite, Michael
Maria; AN.	137
De France, Charles Q.
Comments on error in grammar in review by F. Jones; C.	647; see also R.
278; C.	502; C.
575; C.	680
Dennis, Nigel
Comments on M. A. Hamilton's review of "Let the people know" by N. Angell; C.	285; see also R.
133
Dinesen, Isak
Winter's tales; B.	894
Disciplines for democracy. T. V. Smith; B.	281
Dos Passos, John
Number one; B.	384
Double, double, toil and trouble. L. Fauchet; B.	675
Doubet, Giulio
Command of the air, the. Translated by D. Ferrari; B.	462
Dream department, the. S. J. Perelman; AN.	320
Drepper, Carl W.
American pioneer arts and artists. Foreword by R. Kent; B.	247
Dress rehearsal. The story of Dieppe. Q. Reynolds; B.	351
Dudley-Gordon, Squadron leader Tom
I seek my prey in the waters: The coastal command at war; B.	746
Duff, Charles
Comments on L. Trilling's review of "The itching earrot" by J. J. Fernández de Lizard; C.	358
Dufield, Marcus; R.	277, 351, 494, 530, 638, 710, 746, 781.
Duranty, Walter
Search for a key; AN.	533
Dust tracks on the road. Z. N. Hurston; B.	244
Dynamite cargo: Convoy to Russia. F. Herman; B.	710

Eastman, Max	E	German by the E. Caldwell; AN	712	Human comedy, the	W. Saroyan; B.	3	18
Easton, Robert	714	Germany's master plan: The story of the industrial offensive. J. Borkin and C. Welsh; B.	895	Human nature and destiny: A Christian interpretation. H. Human destiny. R. M. Nabigh; B.	457
Ebenstein, William	424	Gibbs, Willard, biography. M. Rukeyser; B.	895	Humphries, Rolfe; R.	173, 493
Nazi state, the; B.	174	Gide, André, biography. K. Mann; B.	422	Hurst, Zora Neale
Eberhart, H.	183	Gidion, Marguerite; B.	675	Dust tracks on the road; B.	244
Economics and ideas; B.	569; see also C.	Gilligan, Edmund	780	Hutchison, Betty; B.	64
Economics in uniform; Military economy and social structure. A. T. Lauterbach; B.	895	Goals for America: A budget of our needs and resources. S. Chase; B.	319	Hutchison, Keith; R.	26, 319, 387, 784
Edman, Irwin; B.	314; see also C.	Golden wedding. J. Pagano; AN	571
Education between two worlds. A. Melike-John; B.	430	Goldman, Eric B.	784	I seek my prey in the waters: The coastal crumpled at war. Squadron leader T. Dudley-Gordon; B.	746
Einzig, Paul	714	Goodman, Paul, M. Liben, and E. Roditi	278	Icelandic poems and stories. Edited by R. Ickes, Harold L.	714
Eisenstein, Sergei M.	714	Gordon, George Stuart	278	Autobiography of a curmudgeon; B.	671
Film sense, the. Translated and edited by J. Leyda; B.	579	Anglo-American literary relations; AN	679	If there is time. H. Plummer; B.	569
English, writers, English; B.	133	Graebner, Walter	639	In commemoration of William James: 1942; B.	208
R. Ritchie; B.	133	Grand canyon, V. Sackville-West; AN	31	Is Germany incurable? R. Brickner; B.	812
English social history: A survey of six centuries. R. Trevaylan; B.	387	Grattan, C. Hartley; R.	673	Italy from within. R. G. Massock; B.	385
Enigma of Admiral Darlan, the. A. de Montmorency; B.	708	Great of Great literature. E. H. H.	173
Enjoyment of life in America, the. R. Woodman and C. E. Slatkin; AN	139	Great Britain under protection. F. Benham; AN	786
Erenburg, Ilya	899	Great offensive, the. The strategy of coalition warfare. M. Werner; B.	101	Jake Home. R. McKenney; B.	388
Eulogy of Julius, P. Calamandrei; B.	280	Greek historians, the. Edited by F. R. B. Greenberg, Clement; R.	72, 24	James, Alice, journal; B.	60
Experiencing American pictures. R. M. Pearson; AN	355	Greenhood, David	608	Limitations of Dickens, the—a review reprinted from The Nation of December 21, 1865; .	595
		Hill, the; B.	391	James, Henry	671
		Greenland, V. Stefansson; AN	698	Janeway, Eliot; R.	671
		Grene, David	355	Jansen, John B., and S. Weyl	279
		Three Greek tragedies in translation; AN	355	Jarrell, Randall	176
Fall of Paris, the. I. Erenburg; B.	899	Grew, Joseph C.	65	Blood for a stranger; B.	279
Fantastic interim. H. M. Robinson; B.	608	Report from Tokyo; B.	29	Jastrow, Joseph; R.	812
Fast, Howard	675	Griffith, Richard; R.	29	Physics and philosophy; B.	640
Ferguson, Erna	677	Guérard, Albert; R.	277	Jefferson himself. Edited by B. Mayo; B.	135
Chile; AN	677	also C.	357; R. 606, 708, 839, 894	Jervis, J. W. W. R. V. R.; AN	139
Feuchtwanger, Lion	675			Joel, George; R.	570
Double, double, toil and trouble; B.	675			John Bach McMaster, E. F. Goldman; B.	784
Fifth seal, the. M. Aldanov; B.	609; see also E.P.			John and Williamsburg. A. B. Shepperson; B.	496
Fight for air power; W. B. Hunt; B.	462			Johnson, Charles S.	496
Fight: Little India of the Pacific. J. W. Coulter; AN	839			Patterns of Negro segregation; B.	496
Fighting French, the. R. Aglion; B.	623			Jones, Alfred Winslow; R.	870
Films, Louis; R.	211, 608			Jones, Frank; R.	502, 575, 647, 800; see also C.	681
Film sense, the. S. M. Eisenstein. Translated and edited by J. Leyda; B.	579			Jones, Philip Chapin	874
Fincham, Paddy, biography. J. Reynolds; AN	391			Comments on D. Trilling's book reviews; Journey among warriors. E. Currie; B.	781
Fischer, Louis	816; C.
Comments on R. Niebuhr's review of "Warning to the west" by Shridharani; C.	142; see also R.
Week with Gandhi, A. B.	568
Fischer, Louis; R.	96, 421, 566, 582; see also 727; C.
Fisher, Vardis	460
Darkness and the deep; AN	460
Flanders, M.	460
Comments on H. P. Lazarus' review of "Ruins and visions: Poems 1934-1942" by S. Snyder; C.	359; see also R.
Flanner, Hildegard	569
If there is time; B.	569
Flight from Berlin	388
Colonel Edinham's raid; AN	388
Flood of terror. O. Strasser and M. Stern; B.	458
Fodor, M. W. R.	170
Follette, John W.	170
Error in grammar in review of F. Jones; C.	502; see also R.
Force and freedom: Reflections on history. R. Nichol; B.	530
Forest and the fort, the. H. Allen; AN	530
Forester, S.	815
Forever young: A life of John Keats. B. C. Williams; AN	786
Foundations, the. A. T. Lauterbach; B.	824
Francis Parkman, M. Wade; B.	211
Franch, Harry A.	869
Rediscovering South America; AN	677
Frank, Morris. A study. E. Marchand; B.	352
Frank, Waldo	869
South American journey; B.	869
Franklin	748
Another Claudia; B.	496
Frazier, E. Franklin; R.	496
Freedom, the. C. and E. Nicotri. With foreword by R. Sforza; AN	67
Friedman, Joseph	460
Never call retreat; B.	458
Front line: The official story of the civil defense of Britain; B.	784
Gaunt, William	G
Pre-Raphaelite tragedy, the; AN	67
Gaunt, William E. Gilligan; AN	171
George, Stefan
Poems. Translated by C. N. Valpoué and E. Morwitz; B.	743

- Life in a putty knife factory. H. A. Smith; B. 570
- Life of Johnny Reb, the: The common soldier of the confederacy. E. J. Wiley; AN. 714
- Lights around the shore, the. J. Weidman; B. 815
- Lilly Crackerell, C. Slade; B. 248
- Lippman, Walter
U. S. foreign policy: Shield of the republic; B. 894
- Lister, "Alamy"; T. Mann; B. 244
- London calling. Edited by S. Jameson; AN. 355
- Lonely ones, the. W. Steig. Foreword by J. Weidman; B. 102
- Longstreet, Stephen
Land I live, the; AN. 320
- Looking glass, the. W. March; AN. 171
- Lord Alton, the. Baranov and the Russian adventure. H. Cheviginy; AN. 499
- Lothar, Ernst
Beneath another sun; AN. 320
- Let's wife. M. Eastman; AN. 714
- M
- MaeCormac, John
This time for keeps; AN. 677
- Machiavellians, the: Defenders of freedom. J. Burnham; AN. 636
- Mackey, Sylvie Edith
Sing for your supper; B. 278
- MacNeice, Louis
Poetry of W. B. Yeats, the; B. 348
- Maise, Albert
Africa: Facts and forecasts. B. 673
- Make this the last war: The future of the United nations. M. Straight; B. 96
- Malamaus, Jean
Men from nowhere; B. 602
- Manpower for victory. J. J. Corson; AN. 714
- Man's most dangerous myth: The fallacy of race. M. F. A. Montagu. With a foreword by A. Huxley; AN. 68
- Mangione, Jerre
Munt Allegro; AN. 137
- Mann, Klaus
The tide and the crisis of modern thought; B. 422
- Turning point, the. B. 64
- Mann, Thomas
Germany!; B. 244
- Marb, William
Looking glass, the; AN. 171
- Marchal, Lem
Vain. Two years of deception; B. 241
- See also C. 357
- Marchand, Ernest
Frank Norris: A study; B. 352
- Maria, M. De Capite; AN. 137
- Marshall, Margaret. R. 312
- Martin, Cole, and Lt. Commander J. Morrill, U.S.N.
South from Corregidor; B. 530
- Masefield, John
Muses, M. Musae, and Pavlaltukay: Two tales in verse; B. 569
- Maseroli, Francis
Dance measure; AN. 213
- Massey, Dan
Italy from within; B. 385
- Mathematical recreations. M. Kraitchik; AN. 320
- Max Nordau; A biography. A. and M. Nordau; B. 898
- McFee, William
Comments on T. Spencer's review of "Will Shakespeare and the dyer's hand" by A. Brewster; C. 575
- McKenney, Ruth
Jake Home; B. 388
- McMaster, John Bach, biography. E. F. Gold; B. 784
- Meiklejohn, Alexander
Education between two worlds; B. 306
- Memo to a firing squad. F. H. Brennan; AN. 245
- Men from nowhere. J. Malakaquis; B. 602
- Menden, H. L.
Heathen days, 1890-1936; B. 499
- Mexican oil. H. S. Person; AN. 499
- Michie, Alan
Anti offensive against Germany, the; B. 292
- Milano, Paolo; R. 280
- Miller, Henry; R. 422
- Mills, Charles
Choice, the; B. 712
- Miracle in Hellas: The Greeks fight on. B. 896
- Mirror of Baudelaire, the. Edited by C. H. Ford. With a preface by P. Eluard; B. 780
- Mitchell, Donald W.; R. 65
- Moberg, Vilhelm
Ride this night; B. 842
- Modern Japan and Shinto nationalism. D. C. Holton; AN. 786
- Monkey. Wu Ch'eng-en. Translated by A. Waley; B. 492
- Montagu, M. F. Ashley
Man's most dangerous myth: The fallacy of race. With a foreword by A. Huxley; AN. 68
- Montmorency, Alec de
Enigma of Admiral Darlan, the; B. 708
- More stories of famous operas. E. Newman; B. 747
- Morrill, Lt. Commander John, U.S.N., and Martin
South from Corregidor; B. 530
- Morris, Edith
My darling from the lions; B. 842
- Morse, Robert
Two Persephones, the; B. 278
- Moscow dateline. H. C. Cassidy; B. 840
- Motherwell, Hiram
Peace we fight for, the; B. 674
- Motherwell, Hiram; R. 137
- Mount Allegro. J. Mangione; AN. 137
- Mountain waits, the. T. Broch; B. 350
- Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina. R. Barry; AN. 463
- Mr. Winkle goes to war. T. Pratt; AN. 388
- My darling from the lions. E. Morris; B. 842
- Myklebust, Tor
They came as friends. Translated by T. M. Ager; B. 350
- Mytinger, Caroline
Headhunting in the Solomon islands; AN. 355
- N
- Nagel, Ernest; R. 640
- Nameless, the. L. Williams; B. 278
- Natalis, the. E. and Pavlaltukay: Two tales in verse. J. Masefield; B. 569
- Nazi conquest of Danzig, the. H. L. Leonhardt; AN. 68
- Nazi state, the. E. Hensten; B. 174
- Near east, the: Problems and prospects. Count C. Sforza and others; B. 567
- Never call retreat. Freeman; B. 460
- Nevis, Allan, and H. S. Conmager
America: The story of a free people; B. 314
- New directions, 1942. Number seven. Edited by J. Laughlin; B. 497
- New history of music, a: The middle ages to Mozart; B. 320
- New York plans for the future. C. Rodgers; B. 782
- Newman, Ernest
More stories of famous operas; B. 747
- Nicotri, Gaspare and Franco
Freedom for Italy. Foreword by C. Sforza; AN. 67
- Nielshu, Reinhold
Comments on R. Bates's review of "America, Russia, and the Communist party in the post-war world" by Counts and Childs; C. 577
- Human nature and destiny: A Christian interpretation. H. Human; C. 492
- Nielshu, Reinhold; R. 25; see also C. 142; C. 179; C. 180; C. 215; R. 244, 281, 353, 530, 604
- Nobel, Alfred, biography. H. E. Paul; B. 636
- Norden, Anna and Maxa
Max Nordau: A biography; B. 898
- Nordau, Max, biography. A. and M. Nor. 352
- Norris, Frank, biography. E. Marchand; B. 384
- Number one. J. Dos Passos; B. 384
- O
- O'Brien, Kate
Lost of summer, the; AN. 712
- Offord, Carl Ruthhaven
White face, the; AN. 815
- O. Henry memorial award prize story, 1942. Edited by H. Brickell; AN. 67
- Old shod, the. T. J. Wertenbaker; AN. 31
- Old Thad Stevens: A story of ambition. R. N. Curran; AN. 694
- One world. W. Willkie; B. 301
- Ormsbe, David
Soldier of an American, the; AN. 68
- Otis, William Bradley
Comments on L. Trilling's review of "Survey-history of English literature" by H. Otis and M. H. C. 323
- Our lady peace and other war poems. M. Van Doren; B. 209
- Outline of political geography, an. J. F. Horrabin; AN. 391
- Overcoming anti-semitism. S. A. Fineberg; AN. 677
- P
- Packard, Reynolds and Eleanor Balcony empire: Fascist Italy at war; B. 134
- Pagano, L.
Golden wedding; AN. 570
- Parker, Henry Bamford
World after war, the; B. 353
- Parkman, Francis, biography. M. Wade; B. 211
- Patterns of Negro segregation. C. S. Johnson; B. 496
- Paul, Herta E.
Alfred Nobel: Dynamite king-architect of peace; B. 26
- Peace we fight for, the. H. Motherwell; B. 674
- Pearson, Ralph
Experiencing American pictures; AN. 355
- Pen, John
You can't do that to Svoboda; AN. 533
- Perelman, S. J.
Dream department, the; AN. 320
- Person, Harlow S.
Mexican oil; AN. 499
- Person, place and thing. K. J. Shapiro; B. 63
- Phillips, William; R. 136
- Philosophy of G. E. Moore, the. Vol. IV of the Library of living philosophers. Edited by P. A. Schillip; AN. 391
- Physics and philosophy. Sir J. Jeans; B. 640
- Pieces of three. M. Liben, P. Goodman, and E. Roditi; B. 278
- Poems. J. Berryman; B. 569
- Poems. S. George. Translated by C. N. Valpohe and E. Morwitz; B. 743
- Poems of this war by younger poets. Edited by P. L. Edward and C. Strang; AN. 355
- Poetique muses, sous forme, six leçons. I. Strawinsky; B. 459
- Poetry of W. B. Yeats, the. L. MacNeice; B. 348
- Porter, Katherine Anne
Explains her translation of "The itching parrot" by J. J. Fernández de Liard; C. 358
- Powell, Dawn; R. 744
- Pratt, Theodore
Mr. Winkle goes to war; AN. 388
- Pratt, Raphaelite tragedy, the. W. Gaunt; AN. 67
- Priestley, J. B.
Black-out in Gretley; AN. 320
- Prologue to appeasement. A study in French foreign policy. E. R. Cameron; AN. 68
- Prunieres, Henry
New history of music, a: The middle ages to Mozart; B. 320
- R
- Rame, David
Tunnel from Calais; AN. 320
- Rand, Ayn
Fountainhead, the; B. 842
- Ranshofen-Wertheimer, Egon
Victory is not enough; B. 170
- Reids and general. Phil. R. Burrow of Franklin C. and J. Brienbaugh; B. 424
- Red army, the. M. Berchin and E. Ben-Horin; B. 135
- Rediscovering South America. H. A. Frank; AN. 677
- Redmond, Desmond Carr and R. Burrow
Symphony themes; B. 104
- Report from Tokyo. J. C. Grew; B. 65
- Reisinger, J. H.
Conrad and his contemporaries. Illustrated by F. Topolski; AN. 499
- Retreat with Stilwell. J. Holden; B. 494
- Revolutionists, the. S. Rodman; AN. 193
- Reynolds, James Wing commander Paddy Finucane R.A.F., D.S.O., D.F.C.; AN. 391
- Reynolds, Quentin
Dress rehearsal: The story of Dieppe; B. 351
- Rice, Philip Blair; R. 176
- Richter, Conrad
Tacey cormell; AN. 67
- Ride this night. V. Moberg; B. 842
- Ripley, Dillon
Tide of the money bird; AN. 355
- Rise and fall of the house of Ullstein, the. H. Ullstein; B. 529
- Ritchie, Andrew C.
English painters: Hogarth to Constable; B. 133
- Road to Victory, 1943. The Simon. Translated by J. A. Corbett and G. J. McMorrow; AN. 103
- Robinson, Henry Morton
Fantastic interlude; B. 608
- Rochester, Earl of (John Wilmot)
Satire against mankind and other poems; a; AN. 786
- Rodgers, Denis
New York plans for the future; B. 782
- Roditi, Edouard, M. Liben, and P. Goodman
Pieces of three; B. 278
- Rodman, Selden
Revolutionists, the; AN. 193
- Rosenfeld, Isaac; R. 839
- Rosenfeld, Paul; R. 839
- Rostas, L. and G. F. Shirras
Burden of British taxation, the; AN. 391
- Rothschild, Lincoln
Sculpture through the ages; B. 242
- Rougemont, Denis de La part du diable; B. 457
- Rougemont, Denis de R. 457
- Round trip to Russia. W. Graebner; B. 639
- Ruins and visions: Poems 1934-1942. S. Spender; B. 359
- Rukeyser, Muriel
Willard Gibbs; B. 97
- Russians, the: The land, the war, and why they fight; A. R. Williams; B. 98
- Rutledge, John, biography. R. Barry; AN. 463

- Saarienen, Eliel
City, the; Its growth, its decay, its future; B..... 606
- Sackville-West, V.
Grand canyon; AN..... 31
- Salvemini, Gaetano; R.....134, 385, 867
- San Martin, Jose de, biography. M. H. Harrison; B..... 745
- Saroyan, William
Human comedy, the; B..... 318
- Sassoon, Siegfried
Weald of youth, the; B..... 138
- Satire against mankind and other poems, a J. Wilmot, Earl of Rochester; AN..... 745
- Saxton, Mark
Year of August, the; AN..... 320
- Schwartz, Delmore; R..... 63
- Schwarzchild, Leopold; B..... 529
- Scott, John; R..... 98, 639, 840
- Scott, Winfield Townley
Sword on the table, the: Thomas Dorr's rebellion; AN..... 786
- Sculpture through the ages. L. Rothschild; B..... 242
- Search for a key. W. Duranty; AN..... 533
- Secret life of Salvador Dali, the; S. Dali. Translated by H. M. Chevalier; B..... 212
- Sender, Ramon
Dark wedding. Translated by E. Clark; B..... 602
- Sert, Jos Luis
Can our cities survive? An ABC of urban problems, their analysis, their solutions; B..... 62
- Seventeenth century background, the; B. Wiley; AN..... 67
- Sforza, Count Carlo, and others
Near east, the: Problems and prospects; B..... 567
- Shakespeare and the nature of man. T. Spencer; B..... 136
- Shakespeare, Will; B..... 315; see also C..... 465; C..... 538; C..... 575
- Shapiro, Karl
Person, place and thing; B..... 63
- Sheean, Vincent
Between the thunder and the sun; B..... 516
- Shepard, Odell; R..... 496
- Shepperson, Archibald Billing
John Paradise and Lucy Ludwell of London and Williamsburg; B..... 496
- Ship, the; C. S. Forester; B..... 813
- Shirras, G. Findlay, and L. Rostas
Burden of British taxation, the; AN..... 391
- Shoolman, Regina, and J. E. Shoolman
Enjoyment of art in America, the; AN..... 139
- Shridharani
Warning to the west; B..... 25; see also C..... 142; C..... 179; C..... 180; C..... 215
- Siberia; C. E. Lenzey; AN..... 714
- Silent war, the; B. Jansen; B. Weyl; B..... 279
- Simonon, Georges
Tropic moon; AN..... 171
- Simon, Yves R.
Road to Vichy, 1918-1938, the. Translated by J. A. Corbett and G. J. Mc Morrow; AN..... 103
- Sinclair, Upton
Wide is the gate; AN..... 137
- Sing for your supper. S. E. Mackey; B..... 278
- Singapore is silent. G. Weller; B..... 494
- Singh, Anup
Comments on R. Niebuhr's review of "Warning to the west" by Shridharani; C..... 215; see also R..... 25; C..... 142; C..... 179; C..... 180
- Slade, Caroline
Lilly Crackle!; B..... 842
- Slatkin, Charles E., and R. Shoolman
Enjoyment of art in America, the; AN..... 139
- Smith, Charles Powers
Turn of the dial; AN..... 320
- Smith, Ellen Hart
Charles Carroll of Carrollton; B..... 390
- Smith, H. Allen
Life in a putty knife factory; B..... 570
- Smith, T. V.
Disciplines for democracy; B..... 281
- Social insurance and allied services. Report by Sir William Beveridge; B..... 172
- Some odes of Pindar. Translated by R. Lattimore; AN..... 213
- Some poems of Friedrich Hoelderlin. Translated by F. Prokosh; B..... 839
- Sound and idea. R. Elberhart; B..... 569; see also C..... 681
- Sound of an American, the. D. Ormsbee; AN..... 68
- South American journey. W. Frank; B..... 869
- South from Corregidor. Lt. Commander J. Morrill, U.S.N., and P. Martin; B..... 530
- Southwest passage. J. Lardner; B..... 530
- Spencer, Theodore
Shakespeare and the nature of man; B. 136
- Spencer, Theodore; R..... 315; see also C..... 465; C..... 538; C..... 575
- Spender, Stephen
Ruins and visions: Poems 1934-1942; B..... 98; see also C..... 359
- Stefansson, Vilhjalmur
Greenland; AN..... 391
- Steig, William
Lonely ones, the. Foreword by W. Gibbs; B..... 102
- Steiner, Jesse F.
Behind the Japanese mask; B..... 532
- Stern, Michael, and O. Strasser
Flight from terror; B..... 457
- Stevenson, John Reese
Chilean popular front, the; AN..... 678
- Stevens, Thaddeus, biography. R. N. Current; AN..... 391
- Stewart, H. W. S.
Story of Dr. Wassell, the; J. Hilton; B..... 710
- Story of weapons and tactics from Troy to Michael Gerard, the. T. Winttingham; B. 386
- Straight, Michael
Make this the last war: The future of the united nations; B..... 96
- Strasser, Otto, and M. Stern
Flight from terror; B..... 457
- Strauss, Patricia
Cripps: Advocate extraordinary; B..... 243
- Strawinsky, Igor
Poetique musicale sous forme de six legons; B..... 459
- Study of war, a. Q. Wright. Two volumes; B. Summary of the world federation plan. E. Culbertson; B..... 582; see also 727; C..... 752; C..... 818; C..... 846
- Sweeney, James Johnson; R..... 531
- Sword on the table, the: Thomas Dorr's rebellion. W. T. Scott; AN..... 786
- Symphony Bismarck. R. Burrow; B..... 104
- Redmond; B..... 786
- T
Tacey Cromwell. C. Richter; AN..... 67
- Taffrail
White ensigns; AN..... 670
- They call it Pacific. C. Lee; B..... 530
- They came as friends. T. Myklebust. Translated by M. Ager; B..... 350
- This is Congress. R. Young; AN..... 499
- This time for keeps. J. MacCormack; AN..... 677
- Thomas Wolfe's letters to his mother, Julia Elizabeth Wolfe. Edited by J. S. Terry; B..... 811
- Thorn-apple tree. G. Campbell; AN..... 320
- Thousand-year conspiracy, the: Secret Germany behind the mask. P. Vand; B. 385
- Three Greek tragedies in translation. D. Grene; AN..... 755
- Tilda, M. A. K. B. Blankfort; AN..... 174
- Thwaites, Lt. Michael. R.N.V.R.
Jervis bay and other poems, the; AN..... 139
- Tina, Van Doren; AN..... 570
- Time to live, a. M. Blankfort; AN..... 677
- Tokyo record. O. D. Tolichus; B..... 532
- Tolichus, Otto D.
Tokyo record; B..... 532
- Torres Risco, Arturo; B..... 745
- Tragic history: Christopher Marlowe, the; J. Bakelès. Two volumes; B..... 66
- Trail of the money bird. D. Ripley; AN..... 355
- Treasury of the familiar. A. Edited by R. L. Woods; B..... 420; see also C..... 538
- Tregaskis, Richard
English social diary; B..... 277
- Trevelyan, G. M.
English social diary: A survey of six centuries, Chaucer to Queen Victoria; B..... 387
- Trilling, Diana; R. 60, 137, 171, 242, 320, 388, 424, 460, 533, 570, 609, 675, 712, 748, 815, 842; see also C..... 874; C..... 899
- Trilling, Lionel; R..... 602
- Replies to W. B. Dits's letter on his "Survey of the history of English literature"; C..... 214; see also C..... 285
- Tropic moon. G. Simonon; AN..... 171
- Tucker's people. I. Wolfert; B..... 811
- Tunis expedition. Colonel D. F. Zanuck; B. 638
- Turn of the dial. D. Rame; AN..... 320
- Turn of the dial. C. P. Smith; AN..... 320
- Turning point, the. K. Mann; B..... 64
- Two Persephones, the. R. Morse; B..... 278
- U
Ullstein, Herman
Rise and fall of the house of Ullstein, the; B..... 529
- U. S. foreign policy: Shield of the republic. W. Lippmann; B..... 894
- V
Vambyer, Rustem; R..... 568, 898
- Van Doren, Mark
Comments on S. Hook's review on "Education between two worlds" by R. Niebuhr; C..... 108; C..... 430; see also C..... 293
- Our lady peace and other war poems; B. 293
- Tilda; AN..... 677
- Van Loon, Hendrik Willem; B..... 139
- Van Loon's lives; AN..... 139
- Verissimo, Eric
Cross roads; AN..... 245
- Vichy: Two years of deception. Mar. chal; B..... 241; see also C..... 357
- Victory is not enough. E. Ranshofen-Wert- heimer; B..... 170
- Vivas, Eliseo; R..... 514
- Voice of the trumpet, the. R. Henriques; AN..... 424
- Voyetichow, Bogdan
Last days of Sevastopol, the; B..... 896
- W
W. B. Yeats: 1865-1939. J. Hone; B..... 348
- Wade, Mason
Francis Parkman; B..... 211
- War of the world. The story of the Eagle squad. Fon. J. S. Childers; B..... 746
- Warning to the west. Shridharani; B..... 25; see also C..... 142; C..... 179; C..... 180; C..... 215
- Warren, Robert Penn; R..... 209
- Wason, Betty
Miracle in Hellas; The Greeks fight on; B..... 896
- Way some people live, the. J. Cheever; AN..... 533
- We cannot escape history. J. T. Whitaker; B..... 567
- We landed at dawn; The story of the Dieppe raid. A. B. Austin; B..... 351
- Weald of youth, the; B..... 138
- Week with Gandhi, a. L. Fischer; B..... 168
- Weidman, Jerome
Lights around the shore, the; B..... 815
- Weller, George
Singapore is silent; B..... 494
- Welsh, Charles A., and J. Borkin
Germany's master plan: The story of the industrial offensive; B..... 895
- Werner, Max
Great offensive, the: The strategy of coalition warfare; B..... 101
- Wertenbaker, Thomas Jefferson
Old south, the; AN..... 31
- Weyl, Stefan, and G. R. Jansen
Silent war, the; B..... 279
- Whitaker, John T.
We did not escape history; B..... 867
- White ensigns. Taffrail; AN..... 670
- White face, the. C. R. Offord; AN..... 815
- White heart, the. H. Howe; AN..... 245
- Wide is the gate. U. Sinclair; AN..... 137
- Wiley, Bell Irvin
Life of Johnny Reb, the; The common soldier of the confederacy; AN..... 714
- Will Shakespeare, the; J. Jansen; B. Brooks; B..... 315; see also C..... 465; C..... 538; C..... 575
- Willard Gibbs, M. Rukseyer; B..... 97
- Wiley, Basil
Seventeenth century background, the; AN..... 67
- Williams, Albert Ray
Russians, the; The land, the people, and why they fight; B..... 98
- Williams, Biancole Colton
Forever young: A life of John Keats; AN..... 786
- Williams, Lew
Nameless, the; B..... 604
- Wilkie, Wendell L.
One world; B..... 278
- Wilmot, John, Earl of Rochester
Life against mankind and other poems, the; AN..... 786
- Wind that swept Mexico, the. Text and captions by A. Brenner, photographs assembled by C. R. Leighton; B..... 811
- Wing Commander Paddy Finucane, R.A.F. S.O.M.O. D.F.C. J. Reynolds; AN..... 391
- Winkler, P.
Thousand-year conspiracy, the: Secret Germany behind the mask; B..... 785
- Wint, the; B. Dinesen; B..... 894
- Winttingham, Tom
Story of weapons and tactics from Troy to Stalingrad, the; B..... 386
- Wolf, M. A. K. B. Blankfort; AN..... 174
- Wolfe, Thomas, letter to his mother; B. 811
- Wolfert, Ira
Buckler, people; B..... 277
- Woodward, W. E.; R..... 424
- World after war, the. H. B. Parkes; B..... 353
- World of yesterday. Stefan Zweig; B..... 711
- Wright, Quincy
Study of war, a. Two volumes; B..... 28
- Monkey. Translated by A. Waley; B..... 492
- Wylie, Elmor
Last poems; B..... 493
- Y
Year of August, the. M. Saxton; AN..... 320
- Yeats, William Butler, biography. J. Hone; B..... 348
- You came to do this to Svoboda. J. Pen; AN..... 543
- Young, Roland
This is Congress; AN..... 499
- Z
Zabel, Morlon Duwen; R..... 133, 242, 348, 780
- Zanuck, Colonel Dargy; F. F. Zanuck; B..... 638
- Zigrosser, Carl
Artist in America, the; B..... 531
- Zweig, Stefan, autobiography; B..... 711

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 2, 1943

NUMBER 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- Darlan—and After by Freda Kirchwey
- 1918 and 1943
- Ominous Parallel
- Back the Toian Committee

ARTICLES

- Prospects for the New Year by I. F. Stone
- The Jews in Europe. I. The Remnants of a People by Philip S. Bernstein
- Castillo Is Not Argentina by Manuel Seoane
- Franz Boas by Ruth Benedict
- In the Wind

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- How to Speak to Japan by Selden C. Menejee
- Paraguayan Paradox by Silva Berio
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus
- German Leadership in Exile. Political Value of the Emigration by Gerhard Seger, Werner Thormann, J. A. Gumbel, Leopold Schwarzschild

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- The Greek Historians by Gilbert Highet
- The Intelligent Man's Burden by Reinhold Niebuhr
- "The Devil Knows . . ." by Albert Gubard
- A Study in Contradictions by Keith Hutchison
- War—and Peace by G. A. Borgese
- Eisenstein on the Film by Richard Griffith
- Drama: "The Three Sisters" by Joseph Wood Krutch
- Art by Clement Greenberg
- Music by B. H. Haggin

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

L. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor

RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

VICE-PRESIDENT HENRY WALLACE, IN HIS radio address on the occasion of Woodrow Wilson's birthday, again showed that he has a broader view of post-war problems and the way to solve them than any other ranking statesman of the United Nations. Since his great speech last summer on the century of the common man, isolationists, anti-New Dealers, and business reactionaries have ganged up to distort his proposals and to jeer at him as a soft-headed visionary. Now he has made a trenchant reply exposing these critics as small-minded men whose lack of vision after the last war ruined Wilson's efforts to organize an international society and in the economic field promoted anarchy abroad and depression at home. Mr. Wallace is an idealist, but his idealism is based on common sense. He realizes that after the war our surplus productive capacity will be greatly enhanced and that we shall head straight for a new unemployment crisis if we do not use that surplus to raise the standards of living of other nations. But this implies a willingness to let down our barriers against foreign goods instead of exchanging the fruits of our labor first for doubtful securities and second for unconsumable gold. These were the results of G. O. P. Realpolitik in the twenties, and the aftermath has underlined the message of the Scriptures: "Where there is no vision, the people perish." ✕

HITLER IS DISCOVERING THAT THE RED Army which he has so often "annihilated" has as many lives as a cat and as many arms as an octopus. Those arms are now thrusting powerfully in various directions through the German winter lines, probing the soft spots and enveloping and isolating strongly held places. Soviet strategy appears to be to avoid at the present time direct assaults on the main Nazi garrisons and to try to cut their communications. The probable objective is to break the nerve of the German High Command, forcing abandonment of carefully prepared positions and a retreat through the snow. The Russian commanders have not forgotten the débâcle of Napoleon's army. Neither, it appears, have the Germans; but if the two Soviet columns now converging on Rostov make a junction, Hitler may have no alternative to an attempt to extricate his forces from the Stalingrad pocket and the recesses of the Caucasus. A significant feature of the Russian offensive is the large number of prisoners it is yielding. This suggests that German morale is waning.

✱

A NEW ERA IN PUBLIC RELATIONS ON THE home front was, we hope, inaugurated by Secretary Wickard and Elmer Davis in their exceptionally able explanations of why a great extension of food rationing is necessary. Housewives finding bare shelves at the stores have become convinced that limited but secure supplies of essentials are better than no supplies at all, but lacking authoritative information about why shortages have developed, they have become a prey to distorted tales and false rumors. It was high time that discontent thus engendered was dispelled by a full explanation of the facts. We cannot doubt that there will be a wide response to Mr. Wickard's appeal for public cooperation, provided that the educational process now started is continued. Rationing in a country like this cannot be enforced by police measures; it can only succeed if the vast majority of consumers and storekeepers accept it as fair and necessary. Given the good-will and cooperation of 90 per cent of the people, the authorities can be assured of public approval in dealing sternly with a minority of chiselers and hoarders. We imagine considerations of this kind influenced Mr. Wickard in his bold decision to announce the rationing of canned goods well in advance in spite of the risk that a rush on the stores might follow. We believe that the majority of consumers, assured that a high standard of nutrition will be maintained and that supplies will be fairly divided, will justify the risk by refraining from abnormal purchases in the next few weeks.

✱

THE SUCCESS OF THE FOOD RATIONING program will depend largely on the flexibility with which it is administered. There is perhaps no field in which people's tastes and habits differ more widely than in the consumption of canned fruits and vegetables. The range in the use of these foods is tremendous. There are undoubtedly many farm families who use no canned goods apart from those prepared at home, while at the other extreme there are doubtless families, in which the wife is employed, that depend almost exclusively on commercially canned products. Obviously some special provision should be made for working wives in a period when the government is attempting to induce some three or four million women to seek work in war industries. Some flexibility will be provided by a system of point rationing such as is now in preparation. But point rationing alone cannot cover the wide differences in the use of commercially prepared canned products. Special allotments should be made for areas in which there is a shortage of fresh fruits and vegetables, for working wives, and for any other groups in the population whose needs are manifestly greater than the average. To offset these extra allotments, it might be wise to curtail rations in areas where there is an abundance of fresh vegetables the year round, and in country districts where consumption of commercially canned foods is normally low.

✱

THE NEED FOR STILL HIGHER TAXES ON upper and middle income groups as a safeguard against inflation is clearly demonstrated in the current Public Affairs pamphlet "How Can We Pay for the War?" This pamphlet, based on a study by the National Bureau of Economic Research, estimates the total consumer income for 1943 at $109 billion, but points out that owing to war-time restrictions only $61 billion worth of consumers' goods and services will be available for purchase. This leaves $48 billion in excess spending power which must be absorbed by taxes or war bonds if inflation is to be avoided. It is estimated that at least $15 billion of this amount must be taken by increased taxation, and it is suggested that an even greater increase in taxes would be desirable. An analysis of the distribution of the $48 billion of excess spending power among economic groups provides one of the most satisfactory guides to tax policy yet published. Taking into account rationing, shortages of goods, and other emergency factors, it is estimated that the group with incomes of less than $1,750 a year will have roughly $3 billion left; the $1,750-to-$10,000 group will have $31 billion; and the group above $10,000 about $14 billion. The corporation and excess-profits tax, the pamphlet shows, falls primarily on the upper income group, and thus might be still further increased, while a sales tax or increased pay-roll taxes under the Social Security Act would fall most heavily on the lowest and lower-middle income groups. We trust that Congress will study these estimates.

✱

ADMIRERS OF SENATOR WHEELER IN THE days before there was an America First Committee have hoped in vain that he would recover his balance and return to a level of political decency. The Montana Senator has at last come up out of the silences, but it is only to put in a word for twenty-eight alleged seditionists, headed by George Sylvester Viereck, Gerald Winrod, Elizabeth Dilling, and William Dudley Pelley. Along with Representative Clare Hoffman of Michigan, Wheeler denounces the round-up as an "inquisition." Special Assistant Attorney General William Power Maloney obtained the indictments from a grand jury which heard detailed evidence over a period of seventy-one days, and Attorney General Biddle has invited Wheeler to submit any "specific information" he may have concerning "improper conduct" in the procedure. Wheeler has failed to respond to the invitation. Instead, he and Hoffman are demanding a Congressional investigation of the Department of Justice. The move has the earmarks of desperation. The same signs are betrayed by Cissie Patterson's Washington Times-Herald, which suggests that the indictments were inspired by a privately financed "super defamation organization," meaning presumably the Anti-Defamation League. What fear drives Wheeler and Hoffman to such lengths? Is it the guilty knowledge that if these defendants are convicted, certain Congressmen will stand condemned for having placed the Congressional Record at the disposal of seditionists?

✱

THE PLAN FOR NATIONAL WAR SERVICE FOR civilian labor submitted by Grenville Clark, author of the original Selective Service Act, deserves careful consideration by Congress. It is a tough plan designed for a tough war. It is based on the assumption "that an obligation rests upon every person . . . to render such personal services in aid of the war effort as he or she may be deemed best fitted to perform." There must, Mr. Clark believes, be legal power to transfer and assign war workers wherever they are needed. Without that authority, even the most carefully prepared man-power program is bound to fail. In this we concur fully with Mr. Clark. The weakness in his plan lies in the failure to recognize that compulsion can be successful only if it has the support of the vast majority of the workers involved. Mr. Clark seems almost wholly unaware of the safeguards which are necessary to make a compulsory man-power plan acceptable to labor. It is true that his plan does call for a Congressional declaration that it will not affect existing labor laws or procedures, but the provision that no war worker shall be compelled to join a labor union should be modified to prevent it from being used to undermine and destroy established unions. No provision is made for protecting the seniority rights of workers who are shifted into war industries, and there is no recognition of the necessity for giving labor adequate representation in the administration of the proposed civilian selective service. These essential safeguards are in no way inconsistent with the need for compulsion; but they should be brought into the picture from the start.

✱

OUR APPRECIATION OF ELMER DAVIS AND OF his work as head of the Office of War Information makes it hard for us to understand his comment on the visit to Lisbon of General Gómez Jordana, Franco's Foreign Minister. According to Mr. Davis, "all the evidence indicates that the Spanish government is quite sincere in its desire to remain neutral and collaborate with Portugal in an Iberian bloc outside the war." It may be that the OWI has been favored with an inside report of such convincing nature as to counterbalance everything we have lately heard about Franco's "neutrality." It is possible that the submarines which recently refueled in the port of Palos were not German but British. Perhaps the tourists who have been pouring into the country in such unusual numbers were agents not of the Gestapo but of Scotland Yard, brought to Spain on the suggestion of Sir Samuel Hoare to protect Franco against any attempt on his life by his former Nazi friends. It is possible that even the last Franco speech as reproduced in the New York Times was a long typographical error. Perhaps—but just the same, while it would be inappropriate to ask a government official to reveal the sources of his evidence, we would have preferred from Mr. Davis a statement either a good deal more explicit or a little more restrained.

Darlan—and After

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE assassination of Darlan was a free gift to the United States. Everyone felt this, no matter what he said publicly. Even the inevitable official denunciations had a hollow sound. It is possible to imagine that some responsible officials were chagrined to find their North African policy shown up quite so violently; but they can hardly have been taken in by their own expressions of horror and disapproval. To describe the shooting as "first-degree murder" or as "odious and cowardly" may have been good protocol; it was inexcusable from any other point of view. Assassination is not a nice weapon; it can be justified only as an act of desperation bred by tyranny. But it is not a weapon chosen by cowards. The young man who killed Darlan died two days later, his examination and execution wrapped in a most suspicious secrecy, and he died bravely, taking full responsibility for his act. Cowards do not invite such a fate.

So far the authorities in Africa have concealed the assassin's identity. An early report that he was either Italian or German quickly collapsed. It was followed by the admission that he was a Frenchman, but radio and press have carried frequent assurances that he had an Italian mother. To emphasize this fact while refusing to reveal his name or political affiliations or the findings of the military court is a form of censorship which can only irritate the public and convince it, without further evidence, that the assassin was a patriot and not a Vichy-Axis agent. If he had been, people reason, surely the censors would have told us so. I suggest to Elmer Davis and those above and around him, here and in North Africa, that an honest, full account of the killing of Darlan would allay suspicion and provide a healthy antidote to official hypocrisy.

What the unknown Frenchman gave America was a second chance. The President's promise that Eisenhower's deal with Darlan was only a "temporary expedient" has been ironically fulfilled: the Admiral is out of office and the fruits of expediency are mostly in the basket. Already the other Vichy generals have shown their readiness to continue the fight against Hitler under the leadership of Giraud, and as this issue goes to press, the Fighting French are moving toward an arrangement with the new North African command. Only a failure of political understanding equal to that which dumped us into the Darlan hornets' nest can spoil our second chance in North Africa. Such a failure would be inexcusable. We have been given an expensive lesson in political warfare; we have learned how closely the inexpedient can follow on the heels of expediency, how dangerous it is to leave political decisions to men innocent of politics or ready, in an emergency, to ignore the certain consequences of such decisions. We also have been given a chance to eat our cake and have it, but the terms are not such as to encourage other ventures of the same sort. Attentats are too close to revolution to be worth gambling on.

The choice of General Giraud as French High Commissioner in Africa—it is to be noted that he is not assuming Darlan's self-bestowed title of Chief of State—opens the door to that general concentration of French power which would have been impossible under Darlan and which may have momentous consequences for the winning of the war. If General de Gaulle and General Giraud can actually combine their forces, we shall have, as George Fielding Eliot pointed out in the New York Herald Tribune, "the whole of the French African empire, plus Syria, the Pacific islands, and the French West Indies, fighting as a unit for the liberation of the mother country." And as a second result, young Frenchmen who have been inhibited by the bitter divisions in France itself will feel free to escape by thousands to join their bolder brothers who form the existing army of Fighting France.

It is General Giraud's good luck that he was a prisoner of the Nazis after the defeat of France. By this accident of fate he was spared the necessity of making a choice which might have wrecked his opportunity of leadership today. The Germans preserved him in an almost miraculous purity for the day when he could serve as a link between his country's divided forces of resistance. In addition he has the advantage of being a military rather than a political man. We have the word of Pertinax that his political leanings are far toward the right; but it is not by these inclinations that he is known. He has become a symbol of patriotism and the will to fight, and he is uncontaminated by the slightest smear of treason or defeatism. So by all the most important tests for this particular time Giraud offers the best chance of bringing together the recent converts among the Vichy generals in North Africa and the stubborn Fighting French.

Before this issue appears, De Gaulle may have gone to Africa to confer with Giraud and the Americans. He carries with him not only the power of his armed forces on sea and land but also the backing of all the organized groups of resistance in France. He represents the faith of the French people in their fight for freedom. This gives him great bargaining power. It imposes on him an equally great responsibility. How he discharges it will determine the character of the coalition he hopes to form. He will be dealing with men most of whom have only contempt for the democratic elements in France, the democratic aims of the war. Noguès and Bergeret, Boisson and Chatel are little better than Darlan. It is they who, as governors of the Vichy African possessions, were responsible for the arrests, the concentration camps, the enforcement of Vichy's anti-Jewish laws in their respective bailiwicks. In spite of the American occupation, in spite of President Roosevelt's protests, those fruits of fascist rule persist. De Gaulle is faced with the inescapable necessity of insisting as the price of his cooperation on the immediate ending of Vichy's repression in Africa. This is a prerequisite to everything else. And it will be the first duty of the American authorities to give him their unqualified backing in establishing actual freedom in the regions we are supposed to have freed.

How successfully we meet this clear-cut test will demonstrate how well we have taken advantage of our second chance. When the last son of Fighting France, the last Czech or German or Polish refugee, the last Jew, the last Spanish Loyalist emerges from the prisons and work camps of Africa, then we shall have reason to believe that the lesson of Darlan's death has been learned by America.

1918 and 1943

COLONEL BRITTON," the British radio mystery man who put over the "V" campaign, has emerged again to popularize a new slogan. He is asking his listeners in the occupied countries to chalk the figures "1918" wherever they can as a reminder to their taskmasters of that fateful date. Now that the initiative is passing to the hands of the United Nations, this seems a good idea around which to build up a new offensive in the war of nerves. For while 1918 offers a message of hope to the enslaved peoples of Europe, it rings ominously in German ears. Moreover, Goebbels is unwittingly turning German thoughts in the same direction, for, compelled to cover up unfulfilled boasts of success on the Russian front, he is now explaining that this is a war of attrition and stressing the defensive strength of the Axis.

Attrition is a word with sinister connotations for the Germans. In the fourth winter of the last war they began to realize that they were its victims, and not all Goebbels's skill will suffice to persuade them that this process can now work in their favor. They know, too, that Hitler's plans in 1939 called not for a war of endurance but for Blitzkrieg. Now they see that a brilliant chain of rapid victories has proved Dead Sea fruit, and they are invited to hold on grimly, not so much to achieve the victory which has eluded them as to avoid total destruction. There is a note of defeatism in this new Nazi propaganda line which should serve as a definite encouragement to our exponents of political warfare. The analogies between the situation at the dawn of 1918 and the present time are sufficiently striking to provide material for radio broadcasts designed to undermine German morale.

Probably the people of the Reich are rather better fed at the present time than they were in the winter of 1917-18, but they have clearly before their eyes signs that the economic machinery is running down. The worsening of the transport situation cannot be hidden, and the wastage of man-power in Russia is reflected in the increasing hordes of unwilling foreign workers.

And now, however much Goebbels may minimize the importance of the Mediterranean battles or attempt to depict Rommel's flight as a strategic victory, the Germans are aware that there is a second front in being which menaces the weakest flank of the Fortress of Europe. They must be reminded how, in 1918, while the main German armies were still intact and even winning victories in France, Allied pressure in Palestine, in Bulgaria, and in Italy was crumbling the resistance of their allies. These collapses in the rear, together with the deterioration of morale on the home front, were potent factors promoting defeatism among the soldiers in France.

It is good to remind the Germans of these things. But we must remind ourselves that the forces of attrition will only work on our side if they are assisted by a crescendo of military blows. Six months ago the cause of the United Nations was at its nadir. Rommel was at the gates of Egypt, the Nazis were advancing steadily toward their objectives in southern Russia, and the Japanese were consolidating their vast conquests. Today, at the start of a new year, the military picture is vastly brighter. Everywhere we and our allies have gained the initiative. On the long eastern front the Red Army is beating the same kind of tattoo against the weather-bound Germans that softened Ludendorff's defenses in France in the summer of 1918. In the dwindling corner of Africa that remains to the Axis, Americans, Britons, and Frenchmen are uniting to throw back the enemy across the Mediterranean. In the Pacific, if we have regained but little territory, we are waging a campaign that is compelling the Japanese to expend ships and planes at a faster rate than they can be replaced.

So we can look forward with some cheer to 1943. But we must remember that the final triumph in 1918 was preceded by a year of bitter fighting, including one last desperate German offensive in France that came uncomfortably close to success. The possibilities of strategic action remaining open to Hitler are circumscribed, but he may still prove capable of striking an unexpected and dangerous blow. The best way to guard against such a contingency is unremitting pressure, and we hope that, before the year is very old, this will include the establishment of that third front in the west which Premier Churchill has forecast. Russian resilience combined with the African campaign has served to force the Axis on the defensive and to inculcate an undeniable mood of defeatism both in Germany and Italy. A powerful punch nearer to the enemy's heart might well serve to collapse the foundations of the Nazi regime and repeat in 1943 the story of 1918.

Ominous Parallel

SINCE The Nation first drew the attention of its readers to the civil war which is now going on in Yugoslavia, many new facts have come to light. At a later date we shall sum up this new evidence, but for the time being there is one aspect of the problem which seems more important than any other. It is now universally agreed that the U. S. S. R. is supporting, with propaganda and with arms, the intensely militant partisans. At the same time London and Washington are continuing to give both moral and practical aid to General Mihailovich.

In pointing out the grave dangers represented by this division we quote from two extraordinary and, to say the least, ominous articles that appeared in the New York Times of December 20 and 21. Harold Callender, who has lately seemed to echo the State Department view of things, writes that the dispute in Yugoslavia foreshadows what "will be the great diplomatic enigma that will hang over the efforts of peacemaking after this war—the question of long-term relations between Moscow" and the democratic powers. Citing diplomatic quarters as his source, he goes on to say: "Just as the civil war in Spain, which was in part an aggression by the Axis, proved a prelude and rehearsal for the World War of today, so the struggle in Yugoslavia seems to be a preface to the great unresolved conflict of the future." We hope we misunderstand Mr. Callender's words. We should like, indeed, to believe that his informants did not mean what he said. But the plain meaning of this comparison of the Spanish and Yugoslav civil wars as preludes to greater struggles is that someone in Washington is thinking in stage whispers about eventual war with Soviet Russia.

The rest of Mr. Callender's stories consists of an extremely adroit entry on the records. The partisan movement in Yugoslavia was not of spontaneous origin, Mr. Callender says. Communists organized it after June, 1941, not for political ends but to step up the campaign against the Axis. This assertion, far different from the earlier charge that the partisans were criminals and bandits, is perhaps intended to soothe the Kremlin's feelings a little, but also to prepare public opinion for another unpleasant possibility. "In case our forces made an invasion through this region they would be embarrassed to choose local allies unless the two Yugoslav groups unite, for to line up with one group might incur the enmity of the other."

The dilemma which Mr. Callender hints at here will seem all the more sharp to those who have followed the recent propaganda efforts of the two groups. The Free Yugoslavia radio station, much quoted in Moscow, has just made the astonishing statement that Mihailovich has lost all power within Yugoslavia. The same station reports the formation of the first constituent assembly to be held on liberated soil. Since the task of a constituent assembly is either to govern or to draw up a constitution, a new government would appear to be coming into existence. We hardly need point out the tremendous difficulties such dual authority would present to the United Nations. Again we urge London and Washington and Moscow to intervene jointly and to seek a common solution to this problem. The partisans must be recognized. The royal government-in-exile should reform itself. But beyond all this the three great powers concerned must formulate provisional peace plans now. Whatever the statesmen may believe or want, the common people are not fighting this war as a prelude to "the great unresolved conflict of the future."

Back the Tolan Committee

WE HOPE that our readers will write to Speaker Rayburn of the House and to Minority Leader Martin demanding that the Tolan committee be given the funds it needs to continue its work. No other committee of Congress has done so much to help us understand the domestic problems created by the war as this Select Committee Investigating National Defense Migration; no other has thrown so much light on the measures necessary for total mobilization of man and machine-power. Had it not been for the hearings this House committee has been holding since the spring of 1941, we should know immeasurably less than we do about the war effort on the home front. The latest fruit of its work is the Tolan-Pepper-Kilgore bill for an Office of War Mobilization, and the support this measure has evoked is an indication of the respect the committee has won for itself in both houses of Congress.

The chairman of the committee is a Democrat, John

H. Tolan of California. The two other Democratic members are John J. Sparkman of Alabama and Laurence F. Arnold of Illinois. The two Republican members are Carl T. Curtis of Kansas and George H. Bender of Ohio. All deserve praise for the public-spirited, thoughtful, and non-partisan manner in which the committee has conducted itself. Special commendation is due the chairman for his progressive leadership, and the research staff of able young men and women under Robert K. Lamb. The constructive work accomplished by the Tolan committee is, among other things, the best answer to current attacks on Congress.

Progressive organizations and labor unions can find no better way to educate their members in the problems of the war effort than by circulating among them copies of the six reports so far made by the Tolan committee. We should have saved ourselves much trouble if we had paid more attention earlier to its findings and recommendations. The first report, issued in October, 1941, was the fruit of hearings in several rapidly expanding centers of war industry. It stressed the need for improving housing, health, education, and recreation for migrants; for minimizing migration by fuller utilization of local labor (through training programs and elimination of discriminatory practices); and for spreading defense work more widely. The committee warned that concentration of arms contracts was creating ghost towns as well as boom towns.

The committee's most noteworthy hearings were those it held immediately after Pearl Harbor, when it questioned Under Secretary of War Patterson, William S. Knudsen, and a panel of engineers made up of Morris Llewellyn Cooke, Alex Taub, Harlow S. Person, and S. T. Henry. The testimony of this panel is still the best guide we have to the basic problems of arms production. The result of the hearings was embodied in the committee's Second Interim Report, "Recommendations on Full Utilization of America's Industrial Capacity and Labor Supply in the War Effort." This report played a part both in the decision to shut down automobile production for the duration and in the establishment of the War Production Board. The problems of small business and the need for utilizing it more fully in the war program were emphasized in the third report. The fourth, a study of the evacuation of the Japanese from the West Coast, warned against a similar evacuation of German and Italian aliens from the East Coast by military authorities. The Attorney General's recent order removing the label of enemy alien from 600,000 Italians was in line with the committee's recommendations.

Both the committee's fifth report, issued in August, and its better-known sixth report of last October dealt with the problems of man-power, production scheduling, materials control, and better labor utilization. Its findings and recommendations in these reports have been of the greatest value to members of Congress, public officials, business men, and the press in helping them to understand current war-production difficulties. The few thousand dollars the committee has spent is very little considering the economies and increased efficiency it has helped to bring about in the handling of the war effort. The Nation appeals to both parties to make the Toland committee a standing committee in the House for the duration, as a means of keeping Congress and the country informed of the progress on the home front.

Prospects for the New Year

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 27

SOUNDINGS here and in the Middle West during recent weeks indicate the danger of serious domestic conflicts in our country during 1943. These would amply compensate the Nazis for our presence in North Africa and our increased military strength. Developments on the American domestic front might make it possible for the Nazis or their German successors to emerge from the war via a negotiated peace with much of their territorial and economic loot intact. This suggestion may seem far-fetched, if not fantastic, to those who mistake first successes on the periphery of the new German and Japanese empires for decisive military victories. But they will be considered seriously by those who try not to underestimate Hitler, who do not fall into the error of imagining that there will be no more surprises in this war, and who understand the supreme importance of the political factor in its development.

The points of danger are these: Too many industrialists still hate Mr. Roosevelt much more than they do Hitler, if it can be said that they hate Hitler at all. Their state of mind might be described by saying that while they don't mind fighting the Japs, they are not particularly interested in fighting the Nazis. This is certainly true of many in top management in Detroit, and there are others like them elsewhere. These men feel that they have Mr. Roosevelt on the run at last, that the time has arrived to smash the New Deal and the labor movement. Basically, they are more interested in fighting this battle on the domestic front to a victorious conclusion than in the war itself. Just as they turned 1941, which should have been a year of all-out preparation, into a year of business as usual, so they intend to turn 1943, which should be the year of an all-out offensive, into a year of politics as usual.

These forces have an instrument made to order in the new Congress. Their purposes are better served by the nominal but precarious Democratic majority than they would have been by a Republican Congress. A Republican Congress would have forced right-wing Democrats to follow the President's leadership; a nominally Democratic but anti-New Deal majority will force the President to follow or anticipate the wishes of the right-wing Democrats if he wants to get anything through Congress at all. It is more convenient for the Republican Party to have New Deal legislation repealed or amended by a bipartisan conservative coalition than to face the 1944 elections with full responsibility on its own shoulders. A Republican Congress would have clarified the issues and simplified the tasks of the President. The need for keeping the Democratic majority together in this Congress, on the other hand, entails new compromises, which in turn further compromise the President in the eyes of the people.

To set this new Congress in motion on the task of dismantling some of the New Deal reforms—to get rid of all of them by frontal attack is hopeless—something like a "Reichstag fire" is required, some sensational outbreak that can be used to inflame the public against labor. A succession of provocations, for example, in a great war-production center like Detroit would make it more and more difficult for labor leadership to prevent strikes. It would tend to drive a wedge between the turbulent rank and file and the harassed leadership, and at the proper time a wave of strikes would provide the necessary basis for a new and successful legislative attack on labor. If this went to the extent of forcing the government to call out troops, it would further separate the Administration from the workers and add to the demoralization of the labor movement. In a situation of that kind the President would become completely the prisoner of the anti-New Deal forces. Just such a situation is feared by labor leadership in the Detroit area and is apparently being fomented by the attitude of management toward grievances in the plants of General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler.

In this coalition of reactionary elements in big business and in both parties in Congress a small but dangerous fascist-minded and pro-Nazi minority is skillfully manipulating a larger mass that is conscious of no unpatriotic or defeatist purpose. Just how bold and confident this minority has become may be seen from the threats in Congress to investigate the Department of Justice for its recent indictment of seditionists linked with the America First Committee. This minority and the copperhead press may be expected to go beyond a mere anti-New Deal program into a sphere of action openly encouraging to pro-Axis forces. Their plans will be helped by the fact that this year the war will really begin to be felt on the home front in the form of greater sacrifices for civilians and diminishing profits for industrialists.

Instead of waiting for the coming Congressional attack and then being forced to retreat, the President has already chosen a policy of orderly withdrawal to prepared defensive positions. From Mr. Roosevelt's point of view, 1944 is more important than 1943. He may figure that it is best to let the opposition lunge forward and be thrown off balance by the absence of an expected head-on collision with the Administration; to let it reveal its strength and perhaps to overreach itself and evoke a reaction. The President is a resourceful man and will keep his political powder dry until he gets closer to the next election. The possibility of a successful appeal to the people may be enhanced after they have got a full taste of the anti-New Deal coalition in action. It will be interesting to see how far the President goes in the direction of an "American Beveridge plan" in his message to the new Congress. Just as surely as he is now casting about for a new and electrifying idea with which to appeal to the aspirations of common men everywhere, it is certain that he will hold back the complete details of his new program until the psychological moment in 1944. This, the President feels, is the time for a Byrnes. There will be time for a Wallace, too. But later.

What forces can be set in motion to help the President? Measures must be taken to keep the copperheads on the defensive. There are Congressional committees dominated either by New Dealers or by a coalition of New Dealers and conservative Republicans—as the Truman committee—united by a common desire for an all-out effort. It would do a great deal of good, for example, to throw the spotlight of a Senate inquiry on the festering sores in the Detroit area. There is real need for a new mass organization in which patriotic Americans of both left and right could unite for action on the great problems of the war.

The home front will be the dangerous front in 1943.

The Jews of Europe

I. THE REMNANTS OF A PEOPLE

BY PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN

THREE considerations prompt the writing of these articles. First, there is the hope to impress on the conscience of free men the vastness and the ghastliness of the Jewish tragedy in Europe. If they will realize that the Jews are the worst victims of this war, if they will understand that life or death is at stake for this whole people, then perhaps when occasions arise to help, whether through international political action or the giving of relief or the temporary relaxation of immigration restrictions, their decisions may be influenced by compassion, not by self-interest alone.

Second, it is imperative to perceive that what is happening to the Jews is but the foreshadowing of the fate of other peoples under Nazi rule. It has been the strange role of this unhappy people to mirror in its life the destiny of mankind. The oppression of the Jew has been the symptom of decay; it has led inexorably to tyranny, war, and collapse. In their early attacks upon the Jews, the Nazis revealed the pattern of their treacherous and ruthless assault upon the whole Western world. And now in their mass slaughter of Jews they demonstrate what is in store for other peoples as frustration further embitters their mean spirits in the fourth year of war. What we can do to prevent this is still unclear.

Finally, there is the desire that men of vision should at last realize that the solution of the Jewish problem in Europe is not the concern alone of the Jews or of the Christian conscience. Tough-minded statesmen must understand that the future peace of the world is bound up with it. For centuries the Jews have been the scapegoats for Europe's frustrations. They have been the easy prey of ruling classes under attack, of rulers defeated in war, of impoverished, embittered masses. They have been an ever-present temptation to demagogues in quest of power. Unwittingly, they were an obstacle to the genuine solution of Europe's problems; it was easier to attack the Jews than the basic causes of those problems. "Anti-Semitism is the socialism of fools," said a wise German leader. Attacks upon the Jews and their expulsion from various countries have been an unsettling force in Europe. A peace treaty which does not include provisions for solving the Jewish problem will be incomplete. A normal secure status for the Jews of Europe is a prerequisite for the establishment of the Four Freedoms for mankind.

In this series of articles I propose first to state the facts, then to discuss the possibilities for help in the near future, and finally to consider the long-range solution of the problem. What are the facts? Here will be presented only such evidence as has been authenticated by our own State Department, by responsible heads of governments-in-exile, by established Jewish agencies functioning in Europe, by trusted eyewitnesses who have escaped from Hitlerite persecution, by letters from known persons in Europe sent to known persons and organizations in this country, and by official statements of the Nazis themselves. The picture is not complete; it will never be. Innumerable Jews have perished without record, as though swallowed up by the earth. Thousands of young Jewish children will never know who their parents were, and tens of thousands of Jewish mothers and fathers will never know what became of their children. The report at this moment takes on a fragmentary character. The gaps cannot be filled until the war is ended. But the main outlines are stark clear. They reveal the most horrible suffering of this war and the most frightful desolation in all Jewish history.

The tragedy of the Jews in this war is unique. Other peoples are suffering keenly under the savage assault of Hitler's forces, but they suffer as enemies of the Nazis in the ravages of war. Hitler promises to make peace with them in his new order, even though their role in that order may be an inferior one. But with the Jews there is to be no peace. They are being slaughtered in cold blood wherever the Nazis can lay hands upon them. Hitler's henchmen are swiftly executing his threat of January 30, 1939, that this war would result in "the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe."

This extermination was initiated in Germany itself. There were 600,000 Jews in that country when Hitler came to power. By 1939 oppression and forced migration had reduced the number to 200,000. Today there are only 40,000 elderly, weakened Jews in Germany, who cannot long survive. Their death rate is five times that of the rest of the German civilian population. Since the beginning of the war more than 100,000 Jews have perished in Germany through pogroms, suicides, exposure, privation, and expulsion. An authenticated letter dated April 8, 1942, from a responsible person in Germany vividly describes what has happened:

Since the outbreak of the war between Germany and the United States, the vilest crimes against Jews have been perpetrated. They are being deported to unknown destinations. Many have already committed suicide—about 1,200 to date. You can readily understand the attitude of these hopeless creatures who prefer immediate death to being killed by slow torture. The first transports of Jews sent to Litzmannstadt (formerly Lodz), each one consisting of 1,500 souls, have not been heard from in five months, doubtless because the area is infested with epidemics. The people are dying like flies. . . . The transport which left on January 25 surpassed all previous transports for the bestial treatment accorded the Jews. One thousand human beings, among them children, were crowded into cattle trains in freezing weather. . . . These human beings were locked in the cattle trains for eight weeks, and not a single one remained alive. . . . These people died miserably from hunger and cold.

This program of mass expulsion has completely wiped out the Jewish population of many German cities. Even the tombstones have been torn from the earth. The Nazis have systematically set out to destroy every physical evidence of the organic connections of the Jew with German history.

The defeats in Russia and the bombings of Germany have intensified Nazi anti-Semitism. Howard Smith in "Last Train from Berlin" reports how the Nazis have diverted the sense of frustration and the rising wrath of the German masses to the traditional scapegoat—the Jews. On June 12 of this year Propaganda Minister Goebbels wrote in Das Reich that the Jews would "atone" for the R. A. F. bombings of Cologne and other German cities "with the extermination of their race in all Europe, and perhaps even beyond Europe." Immediately after the first R. A. F. attacks on Cologne, 258 Jews were arrested in Berlin. They were marched to the Gross Lichtenfelde barracks and shot in the presence of photographers and reporters. This "reprisal" was widely publicized.

The most important Nazi leaders openly advocate the annihilation of the Jews. In the speech delivered in Munich on November 8 Hitler reminded the Jews that once they had laughed at his threat of extermination. But now, he boasted, "countless numbers of those who laughed then are no longer laughing." It was a certain Hermann Backe who last summer presented to Hitler a diabolical plan for the mass destruction of the Jews which has since been adopted. Until now the Jews have received approximately half as much food as the Poles, who have received only half as much as the Germans. Herr Backe, the New York Times reported on December 8, has now been appointed Food Minister of Germany, and as such he will possess absolute authority to starve those Jews who escape violent death. The Nazis have found a typical rationalization for these murders. Writes Karl Rudolf Werner Best, chief jurist of the Gestapo, "History teaches that the annihilation of an alien people is not contrary to the laws of life, providing the annihilation is complete."

It is in Poland that the Nazis have given the fullest implementation to their policy. Perhaps this is because of Hitler's special venom for Polish Jews as revealed in "Mein Kampf," or because Poland is near the eastern front, where the impact of war has obliterated such civilian restraints as still obtain inside Germany. Conditions seemed frightful in Poland even last summer. Driven from their homes, denied normal means of subsistence, Jews huddled in ghettos, half-starved, perishing from epidemics, living in hourly terror of reprisals for Nazi setbacks. Their able-bodied men were forced into slave labor. Their synagogues were burned. They were, they felt, at the bottom of the pit.

But something was happening which even they, injured to suffering, could not believe. It was heralded by the suicide of Adam Czerniakow, the full import of which was not immediately understood. This distinguished Jewish leader had been burgomaster of the Warsaw ghetto since its establishment. In the most trying circumstances—he was severely beaten by the Nazis on several occasions—he conducted himself with dignity and courage. Although he carried a vial of poison with him at all times, he never lost hope. Moved by an inescapable sense of duty, he went about his business of rebuilding Jewish community life and relieving distress wherever possible. Then one day in August it was announced that Adam Czerniakow had taken his life. This was not like the man whose sense of responsibility alone would have sustained him. But it was his sense of responsibility which undid him. For the Nazis had demanded, it was revealed, a list of 100,000 Jews to be deported to "an undetermined place." He refused—to the point of death. His motive subsequently became clear. The Nazis had begun their systematic slaughter. Czerniakow was being requested, in effect, to provide the victims. He chose, rather, death for himself.

But this did not modify Nazi relentlessness. They unleashed a program of mass murder of civilians which has no parallel in recorded history. Deputy Prime Minister Mikolajczvk, head of the Polish National Council, now in London, reported concerning this phase:

In the Warsaw ghetto, behind walls cutting them off from the world, hundreds of thousands of doomed are awaiting death. No hope of rescue exists for them. . . . On the pavements lie unburied bodies. Daily a prescribed number of victims amounts from eight to ten thousand. . . . Children who cannot walk by themselves are put into trucks. This is carried out in such a brutal manner that very few reach the ramparts alive. Mothers go mad watching this. At the ramparts railway cars wait. People are packed so tightly that those who die cannot fall but remain standing side by side with those still living or dying slowly from fumes of lime and chlorine, from being deprived of air, water, and food. . . . Wherever and whenever death trains arrive they contain only corpses. . . . What has been going on in the Warsaw ghetto has been going on in hundreds of the larger and smaller Polish places. . . . All are perishing.

"HOW HARD FOR US POOR PEOPLE OF DUSSELDORF—"
"—AND OF WARSAW, ROTTERDAM, BELGRADE, COVENTRY....."

BEGINNINGS OF FELLOW-FEELING

Cold statistics testify to the effectiveness of this pogrom. In March, 1942, 433,000 ration cards were issued to the Jews of Warsaw. Seven months later only 40,000 were printed!

Recent official confirmation of this slaughter appears in the joint declaration of the United Nations issued on December 19:

In Poland, which has been made the principal Nazi slaughterhouse, the ghettos established by the German invader are being systematically emptied of all Jews except a few highly skilled workers required for war industries. None of those taken away is ever heard of again. The able-bodied are slowly worked to death in labor camps. The infirm are left to die of starvation and exposure or are deliberately massacred in mass executions. The number of victims of these bloody cruelties is reckoned in many hundreds of thousands of entirely innocent men, women, and children.

The same official declaration reported the fate of the Jews in other European countries: "In Yugoslavia 99 per cent of the country's Jews and those who had taken refuge there from other countries are now dead." In Slovakia "65,000 Jewish men, women, and children were deported to Polish ghettos, and the deportation of the remaining 20,000 is imminent."

Equally authentic reports indicate that not more than 270,000 Jews are left of the 900,000 who lived in Rumania proper in 1939. Of the 185,000 deported to the prison camps at Transistria, some 75,000 have perished. Fewer than 10,000 Jews remain in Belgium of the 85,000 who lived there in 1940.

The assault upon the Jews goes beyond the destruction of human lives. Nearly every synagogue on the European continent has been bombed, burned, or converted to some vulgar purpose, such as a latrine or a stable. The sacred scrolls of the law have been desecrated, and public worship forbidden. Except for those who escaped early, the leading rabbis have been imprisoned or murdered. The great centers of Jewish culture have been completely obliterated. Vilna, the "Jerusalem of Lithuania," was for centuries a fountainhead of spirituality and learning. In October, 1942, the Nazis announced gleefully that Vilna was Judenrein. Gura Kalwaria near Warsaw was a center of Jewish mysticism, Hasidism. The Nazis bombed it out of existence. Since the pogrom of 1903, Kishineff in Bessarabia had been a hallowed Jewish community. Now, the Nazis boast, no Jew is left in the city. No one can yet measure the meaning of such losses, for these communities sustained Israel with faith and hope and enriched the totality of man's spiritual life.

Nor can we yet measure the damage done by the Nazis to the position of the Jews in the world. By the most unscrupulous and efficient propaganda in history they have made the word "Jew" a stigma, not a name. In a decade they have wiped out the gains of 150 years of emancipation. To this melancholy fact France gives eloquent testimony. The Jews of revolutionary France were the first in Europe to win full civil rights. And now a French government under Nazi control has withdrawn those rights and reduced them to their medieval status. Even if defeated the Nazis will have made it very difficult for the Jews to achieve security in Europe. For they have accustomed the nations to a lowered status for the Jews; at best they have made the rights of Jews again a debatable question in the world.

This account would be incomplete without some reference to the reactions of Jews and Christians in Europe to these frightful events. Among Jews, there are terror, numb despair, and a bitter struggle for survival. But there are also courage, dignity, and determination. Reports emerge of a vigorous communal life organized in the ghettos. A letter comes from a man about to die at the hands of the Nazis: "The greatest trial has now arrived. When you receive these lines I shall be no more. I ask only one thing, that you be stronger than ever." Dr. Leo Baeck, Germany's leading rabbi, who might have fled but chose to remain at his post so long as there were any Jews left in Germany, offered this prayer at Rosh Hashanah: "We bow our heads before God, and remain upright and erect before man. We know our way and we see the road to our goal. . . . Therefore, let us throw back the insult, evil, and malice aimed against us." For this, of course, he was again arrested.

European Christendom, at first confused and silent before the Nazi assault, has more recently reasserted its righteous indignation and its humanity. In the Catholic denunciations of the expulsion of French Jews and the shielding of Jewish children by the Paris police, in the Dutch Protestants' voluntary wearing of the yellow badge of David and the conduct of German men and women who quietly take their places in shopping lines with Jews—in these countless acts, great and small, are found the reaffirmation of Christian principles and the promise of better days to come. It is precisely because Hitler knows that the Christians of Europe would rebel against his monumental inhumanity that he finds it necessary to move the Jews to eastern wastelands for execution.

What a pity that this reaction comes so late! A clearer perception ten years ago of the meaning and intent of Hitlerism might have spared the world this holocaust. As Cauchon asks in Shaw's "St. Joan," "Must then a Christ perish in torment in every age to save those that have no imagination?"

[This is the first of three articles on the position of European Jewry. Dr. Bernstein's second article, to appear next week, will discuss what may be done to help Hitler's Jewish victims now and immediately after the end of the war.]

Castillo Is Not Argentina

BY MANUEL SEOANE

Santiago, Chile, December 5

DURING my recent trip to the United States I met dozens of people who criticized Argentina for not having broken off relations with the Axis. Some of them believed that Argentina was pro-fascist, others that it aspired to be the great imperialist power of the South. Some told me that the Argentines were proud and nationalistic and that they should be dealt with more firmly. Others said they were people who hated the United States. Very few of them knew the real story.

The Argentines are, in general, a peace-loving, democratic nation; they may be divided into a large working class and a middle class inclined to liberalism. Politically, they are in strange contradiction to their government, which is pro-fascist and came into power in the first place through fraudulent elections. It would thus be a serious mistake to judge the country by its present President. Castillo is a reactionary politician, put into power and supported by a minority of two thousand land-owning families who are in a constant fear of democracy, socialism, or any kind of freedom for the Argentine people.

You will ask why the Argentine people have not demanded the resignation of President Castillo. The best answer I can give is to cite the Spanish civil war. That, too, was a struggle between a fascist minority—a very strong one—and a democratic majority of the people, who were unorganized.

Certain factors greatly facilitate Castillo's execution of a policy of "prudent neutrality." The most important of these is his country's position as one of the major producers of meat and grain in the world. More than half its annual production normally goes to Europe. In 1939, when conditions were still almost normal, Argentina exported 36 per cent of its wheat and meat to England, 12 per cent to Germany, and 6 per cent to France, a total of 54 per cent. In the same year the United States took only 12 per cent of Argentina's exports. Castillo and the people he represents think first of Europe, which they consider a permanent market for their products; inter-American solidarity is but a vague second thought. They do not ask themselves who will win the war but who will be the dominant power in Europe.

Argentine exports did not substantially diminish after the outbreak of the war, except those to Germany. In 1939 Great Britain took 564,000,000 pesos' worth of Argentine exports; in 1940, 544,000,000 pesos' worth.

In 1939 France's purchases were worth 76,000,000 pesos, and in 1940, 82,000,000.

With so heavy a stake in foreign trade, Castillo is in continuous dread of German submarines. Argentina owns some two dozen merchant ships that ply between Buenos Aires and the United States or between Buenos Aires and those European zones still open to non-belligerents, mainly Spain and Portugal. These ships are the only means of alleviating the congestion on the docks of Buenos Aires, Rosario, and Bahía Blanca, where great stocks of meat and grain are piling up. So far, only two or three Argentine ships have been torpedoed by German submarines, according to Castillo, who, playing right into the hands of the Axis propagandists, contends that if Argentina broke off relations with Germany, Italy, and Japan, the two dozen merchant ships would be sunk or would have to remain in port.

But internal politics are the real cause of Argentina's "prudent neutrality." Castillo is pro-fascist and anti-democratic because the triumph of democracy in the world would inconvenience him and his regime. Castillo is president of Argentina by accident. He succeeded Roberto M. Ortiz, a former radical who, after gaining office by the fraud that has obtained in every Argentine election since 1932, turned against his new backers and reestablished free elections. The accident was Ortiz's illness in 1940. At first Acting President, Castillo succeeded to the Presidency on the death of Ortiz and began immediately to undo all the good his predecessor had accomplished. He now governs Argentina as a dictator, resolved to remain in power at any cost, and he is well aware that if the Axis loses, he will be swept from the Casa Rosada in Buenos Aires. Thus his political, personal, and group interests coincide with those of the fascists. On the other hand, the political interests of Castillo's opposition, which unquestionably comprises the majority of the nation, lie with the United Nations.

Which of these groups represents the true Argentina? It will be well to remember that of the three great Argentine political parties, two are pro-United Nations and the third is divided between neutrals and those who want relations with the Axis broken off. The most powerful of the three is the Radical Party, which controls 60 per cent of the votes. The death of its two leaders, Irigoyen and Alvear, and its prolonged persecution at the hands of the government have brought it now to a crisis. But its principles are democratic, and its representatives in the Chamber are fervent anti-fascists. The Socialist Party, which receives 15 per cent of the electoral vote, is definitely for breaking with the Axis. In the Conservative Party, which controls 20 per cent of the voters, there is pro-Allied sentiment, but it is repressed by powerful elements favoring neutrality.

The Chamber of Deputies, where Radicals and Socialists form the absolute majority, has asked the government on three different occasions to break off diplomatic relations with the Axis. It also ordered the investigation of Nazi activities by a special commission presided over by the young Radical Raúl Damonte Taborda. In October, 1942, the Radical deputies publicly accused Castillo's Minister of Foreign Affairs of not paying any attention to the Axis spy ring.

The Argentine press, one of the best in the world, is strongly pro-United Nations, in agreement with the majority of its readers. All the major cultural organizations, workers' syndicates, and student groups, have expressed democratic views. An important mass-meeting that received little attention in the United States press was held in Buenos Aires on September 20 to ask that relations with the Axis be broken. The five speakers who addressed the gathering were all ex-ministers of the republic: namely, Carlos Saavedra Lamas, a Conservative and winner of the Nobel peace prize in 1936; Julio Roca, also a Conservative and an ex-Vice-President; and the Radicals Jacinto Bioy, Tomás Lebreton, and Honorio Pueyrredón. Mass support of the United Nations has also taken a practical form. A Buenos Aires committee has already collected more than three million dollars, which has paid for sending four boatloads of food to Russia, three to England, and one to China, in the name of the Argentine democrats.

The presidential elections of 1944 offer the progressives their first opportunity to get rid of Castillo. Each group has already begun its political maneuvering. The Conservatives vacillate between the president of the Senate, Robustiano Patrón Costas, and the Minister of Instruction, Gustavo Rothe, who is of German descent and the "man behind Castillo." On the surface both are for "neutrality," but in practice they are pro-fascist. The Radicals are having a moment of confusion. No one man has come out of their ranks capable of succeeding Irigoyen or Alvear. The man who seemed best fitted to lead them, the ex-Governor of Córdoba, Sabattini, is now neutral because his leader, Irigoyen, was neutral in the last great war. Sabattini may therefore be discarded. Damonte Taborda is strongly pro-Ally but extremely young.

In the confusion a powerful presidential possibility has arisen in the person of General Agustín P. Justo, another ex-Radical, who attained the Presidency in the sham election of 1932. Justo wants the people to forget his old sins and take him again to their hearts. Knowing their sentiments, he has declared himself in favor of the democracies and of breaking with the Axis, and has offered his sword to the Brazilian government. He has a large following in that half of the Conservative Party that sympathizes with the United Nations. But Justo wants the support of the Radicals, who have no good presidential candidate of their own. Rebuilding his old ties, he has persuaded the delegations from Mendoza and Santa Fe to propose him indirectly as a candidate, and each day he spreads his snares farther among those he persecuted in 1932.

The Socialists also favor Justo, since they know they have no chance at all of electing their own candidate. They would like a platform of National Union identified with a man like the ex-Minister Pinedo, who upon his return from a visit to the United States said the two countries should act in accord. But they know that this is theory, and that in practice Justo, at the head of a democratic coalition pledged to break relations with the Axis, would be virtually invincible.

Though Castillo might defeat a Radical candidate in civilian dress, or a Socialist candidate, he would find it much harder to win against an ex-President of the republic who is in addition a general in the army, with friends in the armed forces and in the ranks of the Conservatives. The battle between Justo and Castillo has now begun. When General Tonnazzi, a friend of Justo's, resigned recently as Minister of War, Castillo may have been sounding out the military element. Slowly and surely Justo is driving in his rivets, trying to convince all groups that he is the candidate with the best chance of success.

Should Justo become President, Argentina's break with the Axis would be a certainty. And since Argentina's moral influence is very great throughout the continent, the break would have tremendous repercussions. It is well to remember that it was the Argentine armies, with San Martín at their head, that helped to bring freedom to Chile and Peru in the nineteenth century. It was an Argentine statesman, Drago, who, when a European fleet was threatening Venezuela, established the doctrine that debts cannot be collected by compulsion. The classical Argentine writers—Sarmiento, Mitre, Alberdi—are beloved in all our countries. It is a mistake to think that Brazil could supplant Argentina in its progressive role. Brazil has a different language, and its history has never been joined with ours. Argentina's press and radio cover the entire continent. Its tango and its movies are popular everywhere. Only Mexico exercises a similar dominating influence.

We Latin Americans do not want to see Argentina isolated; it is too much a part of our own physical and spiritual body. We do not want to see it threatened, for we cannot envision a solidarity based on threats or fear. We want Argentina on our side, pro-democratic and anti-fascist, as it really is.

THE GERMAN ARMY MOBILIZED

SINCE THEN:

HAVE BEEN CASUALTIES OR PRISONERS

ARE BELIEVED TO BE EMPLOYED IN GERMANY AS GARRISON TROOPS OR SECURITY POLICE

MUST BE KEPT IN OCCUPIED OR SATELLITE EUROPE AND IN AFRICA

THEREFORE ONLY

SHOULD BE AVAILABLE TO MAN THE VAST RUSSIAN FRONT

BUT,

HALF OF THESE

ARE NEEDED TO GUARD THE REAR AND MAN COMMUNICATION LINES

Franz Boas

BY RUTH BENEDICT

FRANZ BOAS was a great scientist. Though he lived fifty-six years of his life in America, no one who knew him would think of speaking of him merely as a great American scientist. He was born in Germany of Jewish parents and was educated in Germany; he passed his adult life in America; but as an anthropologist he took the world for his province. A man of passionate loyalty to both Germany and the United States, he believed that the best good of any country can be attained only through the well-being of all countries. A scientist of immense learning, he probably knew better than any other man the differences among peoples; yet he was convinced that these differences needed only open-eyed and intelligent understanding to become the basis of world cooperation and fair dealing.

Franz Boas brought to the social sciences from his early training in physics and mathematics a mind sensitive to the necessity of framing scientific questions so that they could be answered by investigation. He brought also a conviction that most problems needed new, first-hand investigation and could not be answered by mere examination of existing knowledge. By pressing forward in the social sciences on the basis of these two rules, he laid the foundations of modern anthropology and was himself responsible for many of its greatest achievements. As a scientist he labored indefatigably and his integrity was unquestioned.

It was as a scientist, too, that he took up heavy responsibilities in the world outside the classroom. He never understood how it was possible to keep one's scientific knowledge from influencing one's attitudes and actions in the world of affairs. What he had learned by patient investigation and impersonal research helped him to make up his mind on the questions of the day; and for him it was as much a part of his scientific responsibility to make the application as to publish the detailed research. He collected and analyzed masses of data on the physical anthropology of primitive peoples and of New York City children, but that did not absolve him from condemning publicly the "Nordic nonsense" of Nazi Aryan theories and of race prejudice in the United States. His tireless investigation and recording of the ideas and acts of the Kwakiutl impressed upon him how many different patterns of living can command deep loyalty and enthusiasm from peoples brought up in them. All his studies of other cultures reinforced his conviction that cultural differences are vital and valuable. He believed the world must be made safe for differences.

He spoke out therefore against all efforts by Americans to set themselves up as arbiters of the world. In 1916, when the emotions of the war were running high, he rebuked the American who "claims that the form of his own government is the best, not for himself only, but also for the rest of mankind; that his interpretation of ethics, of religion, of standards of living is right." Such an American, he said, is mistakenly "inclined to assume the role of a dispenser of happiness to mankind" and to overlook the fact "that others may abhor where we worship." "I see no reason why we should not allow the Germans, Austrians, and Russians, or whoever else it may be, to solve their problems in their own ways instead of demanding that they bestow upon themselves the benefactions of our regime."

He made only one condition: "so long as any nation respects the individuality of other nations." A lack of such respect, whether it was shown by the degradation of a people to peonage or wage slavery, or by the humiliation of national groups, or by the arrogance of race prejudice, Boas believed to be a creeping sore that must be healed or it would infect and destroy the whole body politic. In his diagnosis, it was the cause of our ills today; rather than nationalism or capitalism or militarism as such, it was the object of his attack. He believed in the innate dignity of individual men and of groups of men, and he believed that this dignity could be realized when they were not humiliated and pushed about. "I can imagine myself much more at home in a company of sympathetic Chinese, Malays, Negroes, and whites who have interests and ideals in common than in a bigoted or presumptuous company of whites."

As an anthropologist he knew, too, that a fundamental attitude of respect for others is not simply a matter of individual ideals. Under certain arrangements of the social order respect for others cannot become general. He fought therefore against all "laws which favor the members of one nation at the expense of all other members of mankind"—though, as he said, "the very respect I have for the individuality of each nation implies that each has the right to maintain its individuality if it seems threatened by the course of human migration." He fought against all abrogation of civil liberties. He fought against all the conditions in our schools which limit intellectual freedom. Forty years ago he was working to further cultural understanding between the United States and the Far East, between the United States and Latin America. It seemed to him that ignorance of the way of life in other countries was breeding an indifference and callousness among nations which were becoming increasingly threatening as, with modern inventions and modern commerce, the world shrank to smaller and smaller dimensions.

He planned, back in 1902, a school for the study of the cultures of the Far East, a school which should not only conduct research but disseminate information about Asiatic peoples. "Our opportunities in the Far East," he said at that time, "will not become evident to us until we know what we have that is of value to the people in the Orient, and until we learn that they too have accomplished work which may become of value to us." To support the undertaking, he gathered together a group of men among whom were Jacob H. Schiff and Clarence H. Mackay. One anthropologist, the late Berthold Laufer, was sent to China for several years. But America was not yet ready to maintain such an institution as Franz Boas had hoped for. Unfortunately, the funds were not forthcoming.

In 1908 he tried to organize a center for pan-American cultural cooperation and research, the International School of Mexico. He raised money for it personally and spent a year teaching and doing research under its aegis. But again, the decade was not ready to support a center with this comprehensive scope. A week before he died he spoke of the failure of these attempts to further international cultural understanding. "Some things have been done," he said, "but we are handicapped because they are done so late."

The striking of the eleventh hour, however, was to him no reason for giving up the fight. In these last years he has been proud that his letters and articles were used by the underground in Germany, and he has never been too busy or too weak to help with his counsel. He had faith that among the generation now over forty in Germany there were many who were still democrats at heart, and with these he believed the United Nations could cooperate after the war. But he saw that it was necessary to keep in touch with them, and to let them know that they have strong comrades outside of Nazi Germany.

Throughout a long life Franz Boas kept faith with his ideals. He had an incomparable right to the title of elder statesman in science; yet he evoked more enthusiasm from the younger generation than from those closer to him in years. At eighty-four he had not sold out, or stultified himself, or locked himself in a dogmatic cage. He had set a standard of intensive scientific work in all fields of anthropology which no student could hope to match. After his retirement as head of the Department of Anthropology at Columbia University in 1936 he only felt himself freer to work to preserve those ideals for which we are fighting today. He was a great man, and at this moment we have need of such as he.

In the Wind

REPUBLICAN LEADERS in Congress may vote against a continuation of the Dies committee. They are reported to feel that a committee headed by one of their own party members could serve a more useful purpose in the 1944 elections.

THE POLITICAL DEMAGOGY in Archduke Otto's attempts to assume the leadership of Austrians in this country emerges, according to a group of Austrian liberals, in the recruiting literature of Otto's Military Committee. A letter recently mailed from the committee's headquarters says that "volunteers, whether ultimately accepted or not, will receive free of charge a badge of honor which will mark them before the whole world as Austrian volunteers and as loyal fighters for liberty and democracy" (italics ours).

CONSTRUCTION WORK on army camps in this country is reliably reported to be at a virtual standstill. From now on much of the pre-combat training of American troops will be done at our overseas bases.

THE AMERICAN TOBACCO COMPANY, makers of Lucky Strike cigarettes, is advertising in Oregon and other Northwestern states a pipe tobacco called "Nigger Head." A number of Negro organizations are urging that protests be made to the company.

DR. J. FRANK NORRIS, a Detroit Baptist clergyman, recently delivered a sermon advertised in the newspapers under the title: "The Bureaucratic Price Fixing—the Mark of the Beast, One of the Sure Signs of the End of All Things and the Coming of Christ."

BECAUSE CERTAIN CHEMICALS used in munitions plants are injurious to the skin, British women workers in many plants are required to protect their faces with cosmetics. An inspection is held before every shift to determine whether they have enough make-up on. The cosmetics are supplied free by the government.

MRS. ROOSEVELT is still being plagued by the "Eleanor Club" stories, which she believes were started by Nazi agents. A current version has it that she constantly harasses Washington hotel-keepers by phoning to reserve rooms for Negroes.

NEW YORK NEWSPAPERS are still worried by one aspect of the recent drivers' strike. Several advertisers went on the radio while the papers were not being delivered and may continue to advertise through that medium.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

How to Speak to Japan

BY SELDEN C. MENEFEE

FROM the point of view of our experts on psychological warfare General Hideki Tojo's empire is by far the hardest nut to crack of all the Axis countries. The Japanese people are almost completely isolated from the outside world, both physically and psychologically.

Our first problem, then, is to make ourselves heard in Japan. Until we do this, the best propaganda in the world will have little or no effect there. At present we are beaming daily short-wave radio programs of news and commentaries to Japan. Two San Francisco transmitters are used for these broadcasts—KKEL, the 50-kilowatt station formerly run by General Electric, and KWID, a new station using 100 kilowatts. Our signal comes in strongly in most of eastern Asia. The trouble is that all of the nearly four million pre-war licensed radio receivers in Japan were built for medium-wave reception only, according to figures in the latest available "Japan-Manchoukuo Yearbook."

The Japanese have put some of their domestic programs on short-wave frequencies, indicating the existence of at least a few short-wave sets in outlying parts of the empire or among overseas troops. But in Japan proper our audience is probably limited to government monitors and a handful of private individuals who listen covertly by means of illegal short-wave sets. Consequently our present efforts are little more than exercises looking toward future propaganda warfare if and when conditions permit.

Japan's large medium-wave audience, however, could be reached from transmitters located at roughly the same distance from Japan as the points from which long-range bombing of the islands could be carried out. Vladivostok, which is only 800 miles from Japan's principal cities, would be an ideal location for a transmitter. It cannot be used now for obvious diplomatic reasons. Eastern China would be next best, and powerful medium-wave broadcasts from the outer Aleutians could be heard by at least some Japanese. Yet after a full year of war, so far as is known, we are still without an effective propaganda channel into Japan.

Ambassador Grew has pointed out that we could hardly expect to crack Japanese morale by propaganda alone, even if we were able to reach the radios of Japan. The people have been too long indoctrinated exclusively with the nationalistic precepts of Shinto and the whole Kokutai theology to be readily receptive to our message. Furthermore, as long as Japan is winning the war the effect of its victories will outweigh anything we can say on the radio. But if we could reach even a few thousand listeners in Japan proper we could lay the groundwork for an all-out propaganda offensive later, when the military tide has turned.

As for the content of our propaganda, the central issue, and the subject of heated verbal battles among experts on the Far East, is whether the Emperor should be immune from attack. One faction argues that while Hirohito is a figurehead and hence of little importance in his own right, the loyalty he commands is of the same order as that given by Catholics to the Pope. They maintain that to attack him would merely enrage the Japanese people and strengthen the present military regime; many see the further possibility that the present Emperor or his son might be used at some future time by the "opposition" in Japan in the same manner that the Emperor Meiji was used half a century ago in the overthrow of the feudal Shogunate.

The opposite point of view was expressed succinctly by A. Grajdanzev of the Institute of Pacific Relations in Amerasia last June: "... peace with Japan cannot be a peace with the Japanese Emperor. . . . Dethronement of the Emperor would be the death blow to the idea of his divinity and would destroy the meaning of the former system of indoctrination. . . . Remove the Emperor and the military clique, and the system will collapse."

Our government policy is based upon the former position. American broadcasts to Japan attack the ruling military clique but never the Emperor. The military counterpart of this official policy was embodied in General Doolittle's orders to his men not to drop bombs on or near the Imperial Palace in Tokyo. There are good arguments on both sides, but our present policy would seem to be justified, at least at this stage of the war. When Japan is losing the war, there will be time enough to reconsider.

The details of our propaganda to Japan are a carefully guarded secret. It is known, however, that our broadcasts point out the fundamental antagonism between Germany and Japan, stress American military and productive power, and report war news in such a way as gradually to create confidence in our information service and reflect discredit upon the fantastic claims of the Japanese military. It is obvious that Japan's domestic propaganda is not adequately challenged by the various American arguments just cited. The Tokyo radio, in broadcasts made available by the Office of War Information, appeals constantly to the Japanese people's hatred and fear of the United States and Great Britain. Race issues particularly are emphasized, with frequent recitations of instances of discrimination against Orientals in this country and much stress on the exclusion of Asiatics under our immigration law of 1924. Exaggerated or wholly fictitious accounts of our "mistreatment" of evacuated Japanese-Americans are headlined. The war is blamed on our imperialistic desire to maintain white supremacy over East Asia. Instances of discrimination against progress in America are played up and interpreted as evidence of the hypocrisy of our democratic pretensions.

Japan no longer portrays this country as a weak, soft nation without fighting spirit, as was the case during the first few months of war. Japan's armed forces are still described as invincible, but only if the people on the home front work harder and make greater sacrifices. On the anniversary of Pearl Harbor Radio Tokyo told Japan that "America and Britain are the most powerful nations in the world." Kazuo Aoki, head of the Greater East Asia Ministry, said, "This is a war of life or death." Such statements closely resemble Dr. Goebbels's recent attempts to instill a desperate, last-ditch mood in the German people.

The best answer we could make to Japan's appeal to racial hatred would be action proving that the Japanese propagandists are wrong. The indiscriminate internment of all Nisei (American citizens of Japanese parentage) makes us extremely vulnerable, for example, in view of our government's liberal treatment of Italian citizens and even of Germans resident in America. We can best correct this by rapidly releasing the Nisei who are found on investigation to be loyal Americans, while keeping in custody Japanese citizens and Kibei (Japanese-Americans educated in Japan) unless they are known to be harmless. This process is already under way, but it should be speeded up and publicized—especially in propaganda aimed at Japan and East Asia.

Appeals to a pro-democratic minority in Japan will be useless for some time to come because no real tradition of democracy as we know it exists in Japan. Propaganda emphasizing the hardships of war will be equally ineffective, for the Japanese are used to hardships and find them challenging rather than discouraging. On the other hand, Japan's superstitions and its characteristic fear of ridicule may be used to good advantage if our propagandists understand the Japanese mind well enough. Some of the best talent for this sort of psychological warfare is still lying fallow in the Japanese relocation camps in the Western states.

The only adequate answer to Japan's "win or die" propaganda is to assure the Japanese that they will not be destroyed as a nation if they are defeated. This, however, must wait upon the formulation of a post-war program which is barely beginning to take shape. When we do have something positive to offer the Japanese, we should present it coldly and realistically. We should not disguise the incontrovertible necessity of ending once and for all the rule of the Japanese military machine, of stripping the country of offensive weapons, and of restoring all territories which Japan has annexed, including Korea and Formosa and, of course, Manchuria, to their former status. Any attempt to sugarcoat our post-war program would be interpreted as a sign of weakness and hypocrisy by the Japanese.

At the same time, Japan must be made to understand that if it overthrows the present military rulers and establishes some form of representative government it will be guaranteed full national sovereignty; that it will not be required to pay impossible reparations; and that it will be welcomed as a full-fledged member of a world federation organized to guard against future wars and to provide for a just distribution of raw materials among all nations, in a free world market.

Paraguayan Paradox

BY SILVA BERTO

PARAGUAY, smallest of South America's republics, was the first one to break off relations with the Axis. That it should do so at all came as something of a shock to its people, for the small group of self-styled "revolutionaries" who run the country is outspokenly and uncompromisingly anti-democratic.

Following the Nazi pattern, they have established a Ministry of Propaganda which controls the press, the radio, all educational and scientific institutions, and even lectures, meetings, and the theater. El Nacionalista, the newspaper edited by Manuel Bernades, a secretary of the President, sets the style for the press. Hailed by his friends as the leader of Paraguayan National Socialism, Bernades prints articles flaying England, the United States, and the Allied cause in general. Since the liberal daily El Pais was forced to change its policy and to accept as its editor Marcus Fuster, another of the President's secretaries, there has not been an articulate opposition. Foreign newspapers cannot be distributed without permission; even the Buenos Aires La Nacion is subject to confiscation.

However, the people of Paraguay have not so far succumbed to the propaganda. A sizable police force with an active Bureau of Investigations has to be kept on the job. To augment its ranks a school for police cadets has been founded under the protection of the well-known adventurer Rolando degli Uberti, who plans to turn out a Nazi S.S. in miniature. At Pena-Hermosa is the only concentration camp in South America in which a country interns its own nationals. Behind its walls men and women from all ranks of society can now be found—doctors, lawyers, students, workers, employers, even a few dissenting army officers.

But perhaps the strangest paradox is the position of the German colonies. Numerically and financially the most powerful minority in the country, they are still under Gestapo supervision and are run by their own Gauleiter. The Colegio Aleman, the Banco Germanico, and similar institutions are conducting business as usual, with no fear that the open break with the Axis will change anything. As a result Paraguay has become a refuge for all kinds of shady conspirators—Nazi fugitives from other countries, spies, and saboteurs. The frontiers of Paraguay are wide; and with German colonies situated at strategic points, it is easy to slip from one country to another.

In this atmosphere such an organization of democrats as the "Society of the Allied Nations" finds the going pretty rough. When not long ago it held a meeting in honor of the United States, and students dared to cheer the Mexican ambassador's reference to Allied leaders and democratic victory, the meeting was allowed to proceed, but next day the chief offenders were arrested and sent to Pena-Hermosa. The fact that the struggling society exists at all appears to be Paraguay's only answer to United States loans and Rockefeller grants.

Democracy at Its Best

Uruguay, on the other hand, is proving itself a fighting democracy. The new vice-president, Alberto Guani, who showed his mettle during his term as Foreign Minister, has learned something from the course of events in Europe during the last ten years. He knows that fascism cannot be conciliated—that it must be annihilated.

A week after the elections the new government proceeded to take action against the trouble-makers in the ranks of the defeated pro-Nazi Herrerista Party. The Tribunal for National Defense, presided over by the distinguished Judge Julio de Gregorio, gave the order for a raid on the "Patria y Orden," the Herreristas' main clubhouse. The literature seized on that occasion showed that under the cloak of the Herreristas, the Nazi-patterned groups which the Uruguayan government had brought to trial two years ago were again in full swing. As a result of the raid dozens of the Herreristas' most active members were arrested, among them Alejandro Gallinal Herbert, son of Uruguay's wealthiest landowner, a man who has always regarded himself as beyond the reach of the law.

Uruguay seems to have decided to abandon the pretense of "freedom for all"—fascists included—which has wrecked so many democratic countries, and to adhere to the sound principle of "compulsory democracy."

POST-MORTEM

When they heard the word that Darlan had been shot, most American radio listeners had one thought—"a De Gaullist, a French patriot." A few moments later questions may have arisen in their minds. But from the point of view of psychological warfare, it was that first reaction that counted. In that spontaneous impulse of relief lay the condemnation of a policy that has offended every liberal capable of thinking for himself.

On the other hand, the attempt still being made by certain newspapers and officials to defend the deal in North Africa shows that, should another similar situation arise, another Darlan might again be accepted as its solution. And so it is not to resurrect the past but rather to anticipate the future that we add here a word about Darlan and Darlanism.

Whether or not it was a "popular court martial" that put an end to the life of the French Quisling in Algiers, that was the fate ultimately awaiting him as it awaits all of his breed. The advocates of "expediency," and the more dangerous and subtle advocates of a new balance of power, may go on setting up all the Darlans they can collect. Left to themselves, the peoples of Europe will take care of them. But from that fact arises the most important question we have to face: Will Americans permit the immense power of their country to be used against the peoples in their fight to overthrow all the Darlan regimes that bar the road to real liberation? The fortuitous death of one fascist French official does not provide the answer to that question.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

WHAT are the Germans hearing about America these days? A year ago the emphasis was on this country's moral turpitude. It was asserted constantly that the Americans were solely to blame for the war. Then came the months in which the new opponent failed to make an appearance in Europe and suffered blow after blow in the Pacific. The leit-motif during this time was scorn of America's impotence and of its loud-mouthed boasts about its "astronomical" production program. Lately, since North Africa, a different tone has been used. There has been a show of objectivity, with frequent references to America's strength, though at the same time its weaknesses have been carefully underscored.

The new line was authoritatively introduced on December 15 in a radio address by the leading commentator Hans Fritzsche. "It would be the greatest mistake," he declared, "to dismiss the war effort of the United States with a contemptuous shrug of the shoulders." He himself, he insisted, was completely free from prejudice; he did not want to seem dogmatic; but he felt obliged to say that if the American program were examined closely, it appeared to be mostly bluff. Take the so-called records in shipbuilding. "A certain Henry Kaiser," he said, "was astonishing the childishly credulous North Americans by the speed with which he was building ships; he was continually reducing, first, the number of months needed, then the weeks, and finally the days. The outside world snickered, for it understood the kind of tricks he was using. When Kaiser held up his accomplishments as a model to the British and criticized their slowness, the patience of certain English newspapers snapped, and they blurted out that it was just fooling people to spend a long period prefabricating the sections of a ship and then announce they had been put together in record time."

American production in every field is deprecated in the same way. Germans are not told that America is doing nothing but simply that it is not producing in the tremendous amounts reported, that it is producing less, in fact, than is being turned out in Germany plus the rest of Europe plus Greater East Asia.

And what about America's actual instrument for war—its army? Have the Americans been able to create an army capable of an assault on the European fortress? The set type of answer to this question was indicated on December 1 by General Dittmar, regular military expert of the German radio. The General's objectivity was striking. He was generous with his praise. "From our experience in World War I," he said, "we esteem highly the fighting qualities of the American soldier. He showed stubbornness in defense and dash and contempt for danger in the attack. . . . He loved daring adventures and had great personal pluck, the heritage of pioneer times." Moreover, the United States is much better prepared than it was in 1917. "Since the outbreak of the war it has been supplying our enemies and is therefore better organized for war than it was then."

But after admissions like these had convinced his hearers of the speaker's scrupulous objectivity, the "howevers" appeared. The Americans, however, cannot put a strong enough army in the field to contend against Germany. Under the exceptionally favorable conditions of the First World War they were able to send a maximum of 250,000 men a month to Europe only because "for weeks and months" they sent them over "without arms or equipment. They transported only men, neglecting everything else—artillery, horses, food, even airplanes. These hastily dispatched troops were for a long time dependent for equipment on what could be provided by the Entente powers." Today the shipping situation is "immeasurably worse," as a result of the submarine warfare and the losses inflicted by the Japanese. And America has now no allies in Europe who can fit out its army.

The little offensive in North Africa has bogged down because sufficient supplies could not be transported.

The troops America does succeed in bringing over will lack something else that was a decisive factor in the First World War. "Today America's allies have no veteran troops in Europe behind which the green American units can be assembled, acclimatized, and trained. And a favorable base on French soil no longer exists. If the United States wants to make its weight felt in Europe today, it must first establish a front by fighting. And it must do the fighting itself."

Finally, though the American troops of 1918 deserved respect, they were rated only second class even then. "The men from the United States were good fighters but by no means good soldiers. The officers of all ranks were—and are—unpracticed, lacking agility, little capable of making decisions. They reflected the absence of a military tradition in their country." In no respect has any improvement been effected since then. Indeed, there has been a fundamental deterioration—and for racial reasons. "There have been great changes in the American people since 1918. The influx of alien elements at the turn of the century, through the immigration of non-Nordic peoples, is affecting the military worth of the whole nation." Germans can be quite sure that "we are superior to the Americans."

Such are the elaborate and specious arguments used of late to allay German anxiety about America. With their one-sixth of truth, two-sixths of falsehood, and three-sixths of omission, they certainly make more skillful propaganda than last year's coarse insults. But that is incidental. What is significant is that a change was thought necessary. America's prestige in Germany was always very high, especially in the technical and industrial field, and its entrance into the war caused widespread depression. It should have been apparent from the first that this feeling went too deep to be combated by stupid name-calling. After North Africa a new stimulant was palpably necessary. The daring experiment of adding a few drops of pseudo-objectivity to the dose was at least worth trying.

"Collaboration"

AN ELDERLY Dutchwoman was arrested for listening to B. B. C. broadcasts. When haled before the magistrate she pleaded: "The Führer said he would be in London in June, 1940. Since then I've listened every day to make sure I wouldn't miss what he said when he got there."

Complaining of the lack of cooperation of many educational institutions, the Nationalsozialisten, a Danish Nazi paper, points to the municipal library at Regards Alle, where the catalogue card for National Socialism reads "See Nazism"—and the "Nazism" card reads "See Concentration Camps."

German Leadership in Exile

THE POLITICAL VALUE OF THE EMIGRATION

IN THE Political War section for December 5 a German anti-Nazi contributor discussed in rather pessimistic terms the political value of the German emigration. He concluded his analysis with four questions which he suggested might be used as a basis for further comment. We publish below the replies of several distinguished refugees of varying views. In a later issue we shall present the opinions of others who have expressed their interest in the subject of the debate. The questions follow:

1. What forces in Germany—besides the Nazi Party—do you consider a menace to the peace of the world and to the freedom of the German people? How would you propose to deal with these forces?
2. Are you for a unilateral disarming of Germany and the policing and reeducating of the German people from outside?
3. Are the German people responsible for the material damage caused by Hitler's armies in the occupied countries? Are they under moral obligation to make restitution?
4. What kind of relations do you advocate between post-Hitler Germany and the Soviet Union?

A Socialist Solution

I am glad of the opportunity to answer the four questions posed by your contributor. But I should like first to take exception to one of his statements, namely, that none of the political groups of the emigration are squarely facing the fact that the fight against Hitler is a fight on the issue of a new social and economic order. One group—the Association of Free Germans—does recognize this, as is evidenced by its recently published program for post-war Germany.

Question 1: The other forces in Germany which threaten the peace of the world and the freedom of the German people are the army, heavy industry, and what is left of the landed aristocracy. The army must be got rid of permanently this time. There must be no repetition of the aftermath of 1918, when, for example, the French generals of the Inter-Allied Military Control Commission, instead of carrying out the military provisions of the Treaty of Versailles—which would have helped the German Republic to function as a civil democracy—played along with the German generals because they feared that German disarmament might lead to universal disarmament, which would have put them in the discard.

Question 2: Yes, I am in favor of a unilateral disarming of Germany. I am also in favor of the international policing of Germany, provided each police contingent has at its head an American top sergeant. As for reeducation, I advocate that the supervision of educational institutions and the revision of textbooks be in the hands of an international body, but that the actual work be left to German democratic educators.

Question 3: No, not entirely. I believe that the responsibility of the German army and the German people ought to be shared in some degree by the appeasers in other countries who for many years stood idly by while Hitler prepared for the present war. Sometimes they went so far as actually to support him, because they swallowed his line about saving Europe from the menace of bolshevism.

Question 4: Since I am not in favor of reinstating every European country in its sovereignty, but hope rather for a post-war settlement which will look to the creation of a United States of Europe, I do not believe that any one country should take an independent position on relations with the Soviet Union. If, however, a European federation should not be created, I definitely favor the best possible relations between Germany and Russia, provided they are based on the democratic principle of non-interference in each other's domestic affairs. I am still of the opinion that the Weimar Republic made a wise move when it recognized the Soviet Union as early as 1921.

GERHARD SEGER

A Liberal Catholic Answer

Question 1: There are three recognizable forces in Germany, besides the Nazi Party, which constitute a menace to world peace and to the freedom of the German people. They are, first, the great landowners of eastern Germany who furnished the old Prussian state with its officials and its army officers; second, the industrialists who encouraged Hitler's rise to power in order to do away with the social reforms of the Weimar Republic and to preserve for themselves the profits of a vast rearmament program; third, the intellectuals of the pan-German school.

The first group could be liquidated by converting the great agricultural estates of the Prussian nobility into peasant-owned cooperatives. By socializing Germany's heavy industries within the framework of a political regime that guarantees collective security, the industrialists can be stripped of their power. As for the pan-Germans, their influence must be destroyed by thorough educational reform.

Question 2: The unilateral disarming of the aggressor nations should be only a first step in the abolition of all national armed forces with a view to creating an international police force for the preservation of world peace. In the long run the policing and reeducating of the German people can be accomplished only by Germans themselves. There will be a transition period during which help and support from abroad will be required, but this should be in the hands of civilian authorities even if the country is under military occupation.

Question 3: We must discriminate between moral and political responsibility. Hitler, his followers, and his backers are morally responsible, but the German people as a whole bear the political responsibility. That there is an obligation to make restitution to the occupied countries cannot be denied, but a way should be found to lay the burden on those morally responsible for the damage. Furthermore, since the Nazis and Quislings of the occupied countries share the blame with the German Nazis and their army, they too must be made to pay.

Question 4: The relations between post-Hitler Germany and the Soviet Union should be no different from those between Germany and the other United Nations. The German democracy of the future must seek the friendship and collaboration of all the peoples of the world. In the case of Russia, there are common economic interests which should serve to strengthen this cooperation.

WERNER THORMANN

From an Independent Democrat

Question 1: The Nazis did not rise out of hell. They are the friends and accomplices of the German imperialists; and are trying to finish what was begun in 1914. The Nazis conquered Germany by the same methods which they applied, successfully in the beginning, in their struggle for world domination. The Nazis and Junkers cannot be judged separately. Their goal is the same. The Junkers, their sons the generals, and their brothers-in-law the big industrialists, are potentially even more dangerous than the Nazis, for they can enlist sympathy at levels of society where the Nazis are doomed to fail. For the sake of European security, and the freedom of the German people which is essential to it, they must be expropriated. It is unlikely that the job can be done peacefully, through the abolition of tariffs and similar means. It can be achieved only through a true German revolution.

Question 2: The kind of disarmament established after the last war gave the Freikorps the opportunity to kill the revolution, while the Reichswehr became the center of all anti-republican activities. The Reichswehr created, financed, and armed the Nazis who killed the republic. After the present war Germany must, of course, be disarmed, but that is not enough. Fascism must be disarmed and the causes of its rise eliminated once and for all.

The German people must be given a chance for repentance and reeducation. But just preaching the word will have little meaning. The methods of American democracy cannot simply be superimposed on countries where its antecedents do not exist. The pedagogic value of an occupying army is very doubtful; German youth would profit more from an opportunity to enjoy education in civilized countries.

Question 3: The German people never gave Hitler a majority in a free election. Hitler's plebiscite majorities of 99 per cent were falsified by terror and other means. But none the less the German people did not resist Hitler adequately. Therefore they share the moral guilt of the Nazis. But the principle which decrees that the vanquished must pay has little relation to the question of guilt. The damage that has been done is so great as to be largely irreparable. What Germany can do is to co-operate in the rebuilding of Europe, putting into the effort all its ability and man-power. But it should not be made to pay a new crop of reparations profiteers.

Question 4: Germany's and Europe's attitude toward Russia will depend, among other things, upon Russia's own development. An Asiatic form of socialism is not suitable for European countries. A post-war German democracy will collaborate with all the forces working for peace. But no solution of the German problem can be found except through a solution of the European problem, and vice versa. For both problems I see only one practical and hopeful solution—a United States of Europe.

J. A. GUMBEL

A Counsel of Pessimism

In attempting to answer your correspondent, I must start by saying that if I interpret his article correctly, I think he misunderstands the situation in nearly every respect.

First, we must not confuse "emigrants" with "exiles" or "refugees." According to Webster, the difference is that only the latter want to return to the country from which they fled. The truth is that the overwhelming majority of those Germans who have come to America or to England since 1933 now regard themselves as "emigrants" in the classical sense, just like their predecessors in 1848. Nothing but the sheer impossibility of making a living in the new country could persuade them ever to return to the old. Fundamentally their approach to all German problems is that of members of the outside world and no longer of Germany itself. I think the percentage of refugees—even of so-called "political" refugees—who in utter disgust or pessimism have written off their old allegiance and transformed themselves into genuine emigrants is incomparably larger in the case of the Germans than of any other European nationality.

But the small remaining percentage would have to be sifted still further to find a residue who are prepared to accept your correspondent's view that "the fight against Hitler is a fight on the issue of socialism." Personally I do not share this opinion by any means. While this interpretation seems to gain some ground in the world in general, the very opposite is going on in the minds of those who know most about German conditions. The fact of the matter is that Hitlerism itself has instituted socialism in Germany. I am fully aware of how strange this must sound to many ears, but I venture to say that in a few years it will be a commonplace that in the economic field Hitlerism amounted to socialism. Although the famous word "expropriation" has been avoided, the "means of production" have been completely seized by "society," that is, the state. While nominally private property exists, it has virtually been abrogated by superimposing upon it the overlordship of the state, which controls and operates the whole apparatus. If tomorrow your correspondent were to succeed Hitler and set about making the country socialist, he would discover that in the economic sphere practically everything had already been done.

What he would have to change would be something entirely different: the human aims in the service of which this economic machinery is being operated. The spirit would have to be changed. And this reveals the crucial point! Hitlerism has finally proved that the mere fact of economic socialization does not in itself mean anything. If it is not practiced in the necessary human spirit, socialism is likely to be even worse than its predecessor. To create and guarantee this radically different spirit is the real task—and it is a task entirely separate from and independent of any economic transformation. That is why I believe that an organization conceived in conventional leftist terms would not gain many adherents. Of the small percentage of real exiles comparatively few would subscribe to your correspondent's pre-condition.

Even in this narrow group it would be difficult to find that "common platform" which he envisages. There is one very serious practical obstacle—the incomparably different weight of the Communist and Socialist partners to such a compromise. It is clear that the former will never be free agents expressing their own opinions, but are exponents of the superior and changeable will of a government. Would not the presumptive Socialist partners shrink from a coalition of such crushing inequality? But that is not all. In these two varieties of socialism, democracy and totalitarianism are in conflict. This does not necessarily exclude compromises and common platforms. But compromises are usually effected for an immediate purpose, where definite circumstances and definite relations of strength between the partners prevail. A compromise based on the assumptions of some future moment, whose accompanying circumstances no one can now foresee, would be, I think, quite as difficult to arrange between conflicting varieties of the left as between any other groups.

Let us go farther. Suppose that everything were to succeed—the association, the establishment of a leadership, and the elaboration of that mature compromise platform for a people's peace in and for Germany. I am sure that even then the whole thing would flatly miss its purpose. It would not have the slightest effect on the Germans in Germany. Never in history has there been so water-tight a partition between exiles and their home people as in the German case today. What matters more is that no "masses" on earth can be set in motion and "inspired with confidence" by papers, resolutions, and programs. What inspires confidence is human beings they know and trust, or power on which they can depend. In the whole German emigration—on the left as well as in the center or on the right—there is not one person among the pre-Hitler politicians who could still attract the Germans in any degree. Nor is it possible technically or spiritually to foist upon the German mind from abroad any new, unknown, and untested successors. The same applies to the former political parties. The "ignominious capitulation" of all the anti-Nazi parties of which your correspondent so rightly speaks has left even deeper marks than he seems to realize.

What will determine Germany's course will either be home-brewed—and it may be a very nasty brew, by the way—or it will be suggested or imposed under the authority and prestige of the victorious nations. But nothing labeled the product of any coalition of exiles whatsoever will have a market. The very fact that this is its source will make it unsalable.

The German exiles must resign themselves to the fact that the scepter has passed into other hands. Any attempt to play a role of their own, an independent and direct role, during and after Hitler's dislodgment, will be vain. Their special knowledge and ideas can make themselves felt in an indirect way only, by being placed at the service of the Allied governments. The intellectuals and politicians can inform, explain, warn, suggest. It may well be that a number of today's exiles, returning to Germany after Hitler's downfall, will have a function to perform there. As hommes de confiance, backed by and representing America, or Britain, or the Soviet Union, some of them may play an extremely useful, and some a rather harmful, role. What matters here is that no one will be able to play a role of his own.

LEOPOLD SCHWARZSCHILD

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE GREEK HISTORIANS

BY GILBERT HIGHET

THERE they stand, in the inviolability of classicism and the monumental dignity of two thousand years. It is difficult to approach them closely enough to see them clearly. We have to make an effort—not to cross the gulf of time, for they are in many ways easier to understand than our own recent ancestors, but to convince ourselves that they are accessible, that they can be inspected and criticized, rightly blamed and truly praised. We assume that they are great, which is true; and that their greatness means that they are faultless, which is false.

They have their faults. Herodotus is garrulous. Thucydides chops logic. Xenophon is pedestrian. They are all honest, as few historians have been since their day, and their honesty makes them a little ingenuous, unafraid of the obvious. They do not struggle to impress their readers. They have an uncomfortable power to make us aware of our own bad taste. But they do not leave us ashamed, or disgusted, or cynical. To read them enlarges the spirit.

One of the main difficulties in the way of understanding them is that their methods need some explanation.

Herodotus, for instance, realized that history must cover the whole of a world process. It takes in military, political, economic, religious, cultural, ethnological, climatic, and geographical events, along with folklore and biography and everything else human. Few historians, and not many politicians, have understood that. We are being told every morning, as if it were an exciting discovery, that the various parts of the world are politically and geographically interconnected. But Herodotus understood that the unity of the world is deeper than mere politics and geography. At the same time, he was more aware of the differences and conflicts between its parts than many geopoliticians and globalists of today. When he set out to tell the story of that great and vital war, the Persian invasion of the Greek world, he treated it as part of the conflict between East and West. Therefore he described, as far as was necessary and possible for his readers, the whole of the East and West.

Because he did it, and did it so richly and simply, we tend to take it for granted. We have hardly anything to compare it with except Gibbon. But only a Herodotus could have given us a real history of the Crusades; or of the white invasion of America, with its Indian wars and massacres and conversations, from Argentina to Alaska; or of the rise of Christianity. Our lack of these histories shows us what we owe to him and to the Greek tradition of which he was a part.

That has to be explained first. New readers of Herodotus think he is rambling. He is not. He is trying to get all that heterogeneous and yet interconnected mass of data into one book. A modern author would do it in two or three books. Suppose he conceived a history of the Indian wars. He would write it in four different books: one for the Inca empire, one for the Aztecs, one for the other Central and South American Indians, and one for the Indians north of Mexico. Having thus split up his material, he would subdivide it further. There would be an appendix on the Asiatic origin of the Amerindians; another on the Mayas; another on Catholicism in Latin America; an excursus on the Jesuit administration in Paraguay; and so forth. Then there would be voluminous footnotes, or possibly backnotes, gathered together in a lump at the end and numbered 1 to 8,367. These would take up Algonquin religion, Mayan sculpture, Peruvian chronology, and God knows what. The author would thus insure that the subject and the reader would both be exhausted. The result would be, not a work of art, not even a book, but a multiple-floored department store.

Herodotus, with Greek good taste, determined to write a book: to make something which would be worthy of a good artisan and artist. Therefore it must be a unity, and at the same time contain all the richness of its various elements. He made his subject one by penetrating through the diversity of data to the fundamental facts behind them: hoc opus, hic liber est! What he saw was the political conflict between East and West; behind that, the moral conflict of Greek reason and moderation with Oriental passion and extravagance; and behind that, the religious distinction between God and man. He began and ended the book, naively and at first sight casually, with two shocking stories of Oriental lust and violence and perversion. They are interesting stories, nevertheless. The first tells how the king of Lydia, proud of his wife's beauty, hid his lieutenant, Gyges, behind the bedroom door so that he could see her naked. The other tells how the Persian empress caught one of her rivals, cut off her nose, her lips, her ears, and her breasts, and threw them to the dogs. Both stories are utterly un-Greek; but both are memorable enough (Gautier rewrote the first into an excellent short story), and both make the same moral without stating it directly. Between these little anecdotes stretches the huge story of the origin, growth, power, arrogance, and fall of the Persian empire. One introduces it, and with the other it closes. It requires the peculiar spiritual blindness of today not to realize that such an arrangement is meant to have a profoundly moral effect, and forms a unity out of the hundred different aspects of Herodotus's subject matter. This is only one example of the device, which recurs again and again; and this is only one of many such devices.

But we are blind nowadays. We believe that history can be written as "facts," without a moral intention or effect, whereas, even if a historian tries to write without a moral attitude, his work will still have a moral effect of some kind. (One odd example of this "scientific" confusion is Marx, who stated the principle that people were dominated by economic motives and therefore not dominated by morality, and yet indulged in the most fervently moral diatribes against the rich, whom he accused of behavior which, on his own principles, was perfectly natural and inevitable, and therefore right.) It is, nevertheless, this moral grandeur which we feel, however dimly, in reading the Greek historians; just as a person ignorant of music apprehends something of symphonic form when he hears a great and simple symphony. We are aware of the diversity; yet we feel something larger making it into a unity. If we read the entire work, the impact it makes on our minds is perfectly single. It is difficult to write like that: one must have a particular type of mind, and a particular tradition and method, to do it.

Once the method of the Greek historians has been explained, their aims and their achievement become much clearer and much greater. But scholars are reluctant to explain such things, while lesser folk cannot know them by the light of nature. How many Latin teachers have tried to convince their classes that Caesar was a historian full of excitement and fascination, when in fact he was deliberately not writing history—which is emotional—but the bare scientific groundwork of history, and was therefore trying not to be exciting and emotional? Similarly, it is exceptional to find an editor or commentator who points out the obvious fact that Thucydides puts the tremendous tragedy of the disastrous Athenian invasion of Sicily directly after the debate between the Athenian representatives and the Melians, in which the right of the stronger is asserted with implacable logic. In itself the Melian "incident" was small—certainly not worth all those chapters, all that reasoning. As a symptom it was terribly significant. Most of these facts, then, are obvious; but since we are blind, they must be pointed out.

Professor Francis Godolphin of Princeton has brought out a robust two-volume collection of the Greek historians in translation.* The translations themselves are competent without being inspired—Rawlinson's Herodotus and Jowett's Thucydides. The binding and printing of the two volumes—uniform with the same publishers' "Greek Tragedians" and "Latin Dramatists"—are good, if undistinguished. There are large indexes to each author, an appendix containing several smaller works of capital importance, and, as far as I could see, one map only. Professor Godolphin has contributed a twenty-six-page preface in which he discusses the nature of history and the four chief historians whose works follow. It is full of truths: for example, "We may wonder whether some classical archaeologists' passion for the exact measurement of every potsherd may not be a pseudo-scientific delusion. . . . It may be that much which can be measured, and hence appears to be a scientific occupation today, is really less important than the written records which can convey human insights and aspirations together with an expression of the values and limitations of human life." I found it most interesting, myself, and stimulating. Only I think it is not addressed to a Random House public. It is above the heads of undergraduates; it is much too complex for the average extra-mural buyer; and it is not quite suited for a learned reader. It would have been better to write a separate exposition of each of these very different authors, as well as the general preface on the type of history they were writing; and possibly to add notes which should bring them together, showing their dependence on one another, their similarities, and their differences. We should be grateful to have the text of these great historians so well arranged and indexed. But

* "The Greek Historians." Edited by Francis R. B. Godolphin. Random House. Two Volumes. $5.

If they were to be explained at all, they should have been explained more fully.

The average man, who is anxious to learn but spent too much time on "activities" in school to read many books, may buy this work and settle down to read through it. He will automatically tackle the historians in it as if they were modern writers, and apply today's standards to Herodotus and Thucydides. Since our standards are lower than theirs, they will lose in the process. He will hurt them and himself. I wish that Professor Godolphin had added a detailed introduction to each of the four main authors, describing their principles and methods and the structure of their books. Taking them straight, the average reader is apt to choke. At best, he will read them with a half-awakened admiration for their greatness, like Mr. Boffin listening to "Decline and Fall of the Rooshan Empire": "staring with his eyes and mind, and so severely punished that he could hardly wish his literary friend Good-night."

The Intelligent Man's Burden

WARNING TO THE WEST. By Shridharani. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

SHRIDHARANI'S new volume is hardly as significant as his recently published "My India, My America," which won the instant acclaim of the American reading public, but it contains some very good writing. The various essays in the volume are not too well organized, and some of them are no more than occasional journalism. The unity of the volume is achieved by the consistent resentment, expressed in all of them, against the white man's arrogance. Shridharani, like most Indians, has no illusions about the purpose and ambitions of Japan. He is quite certain that Japan would fasten an even more vexatious tyranny upon the Orient than that of the "white Sahib." But even while calling the attention of the West to the fact that resentment against the white man's arrogance has been one of Japan's most potent weapons in the Orient, the author, like many of his compatriots with similar sentiments and convictions, cannot completely throttle or hide an occasional mood of satisfaction over Japan's success in kicking the superior white man in the pants.

The revelation of the depth of Oriental resentment against the pride of the West is probably the greatest value of the book. Not that this is a new revelation. We have known it all along. But we do not know it inwardly; and our pride has not been qualified or mitigated by it. It is, in fact, becoming apparent that even if we succeed in solving every other vexing problem in international relations, we shall probably not solve the problem of ethnic friction in time to save the world from further catastrophe.

Shridharani is not always profound in dealing with the problem of racial prejudice. He makes the ridiculous assertion for instance that "there is no race problem save in the mind of the white man." It is an understandable but nevertheless pathetic illusion of minority or exploited groups, whether Jewish, Negro, or Oriental, that the sins of racial bigotry from which they suffer are the exclusive evils of their tormentors. The illusion is understandable, for it may be too much to expect victims of one particular form of pride to be conscious of their own analogous, though less potent or successful, forms of it. The illusion is nevertheless pathetic; and it prevents a fully mature approach to the problem of racial friction.

In the case of India it is particularly foolish to make such a charge. For the deep chasm between Hindu and Moslem is racial as well as cultural and religious; and the caste system of India, the most rigid form of class snobbishness in history, is not without its racial overtones or undertones. Furthermore, Shridharani can scarcely conceal the fact that his own resentment against white arrogance is partly prompted by the fact that he considers himself a member of the white race who has been excluded from it because "the tropical sun may have imparted pigmentation to the skin of the Indo-Aryan." He insists that the "white man has denied membership in the white group to millions of Asia's whites. Driven into another grouping they are too proud to deny their color classification." Which means that they are not too proud to resent with special vigor prejudice against superficial color which obscures basic racial affinities.

All this gives us no excuse. It is an obvious fact that the white man's genius in developing a technical civilization has exaggerated the natural pride which he shares with all racial groups to the point where it will destroy his otherwise high contribution to the community of nations. That is why it is important to have men like Shridharani, who can express resentment eloquently, speak to us. But they might speak even more effectively if they understood the depth of the problem of ethnic friction.

One of the most interesting chapters in Shridharani's book reproduces the correspondence, hitherto unpublished here, between the Japanese poet Noguchi and Tagore. The Japanese man of letters seeks to persuade the greatest of Indian poets to accept the Japanese "new order." Tagore answers Noguchi's implausible pretensions with such honesty and sincerity and with such a fine sense of the spiritual issues involved in the present struggle that one realizes at once how wrong it is to speak of the defense of "Western civilization" when defining the issues of our day. Certainly any definition which does not include what Tagore believes as against what Noguchi champions could not do justice to the real issues. This debate helps us to understand and to justify the resentment of the Eastern world against our spiritual arrogance as well as our racial pride.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

"The Devil Knows . . ."

LA PART DU DIABLE. By Denis de Rougemont. Brentano's. $1.50.

THE Kingdom of Satan is within you." Most cunningly hidden: Satan's supreme artifice is to deny his own existence. In diabolical doctrine there is no evil for which man should hold himself personally responsible; the fault always lies with some external factor—the endocrine glands, society, or a whole array of pseudo-scientific scapegoats. If there be guilt in man, it is always found in the other fellow—Adolf Hitler, for instance. The devil's most impregnable fortress is our self-righteousness.

Against this loose mass of evasions Denis de Rougemont erects anew the proud doctrine of personal responsibility. There constantly is a choice, and we choose at our peril. Blindness is no excuse; we are blind because we are too cowardly to open our eyes.

This austere law is as ancient as the hills, as contemporary as the latest snare of "expediency." Whoever places a petty idol above the law—class, race, nation, sect, worldly success—is capitulating to Satan.

A sermon? Not quite. For sermons are usually preached at others, and this is a challenge to our inmost selves. It could be subtitled "A Manual for Diplomats." But diplomats—in every field—are not De Rougemont's scapegoats. Diplomats serve the devil only because they are our servants. Evil is within us.

I wish I could convey the strange beauty of this truly great book. There is no form of writing I admire more profoundly than moral philosophy freed from technical jargon and delusive rigor. Such philosophy is a blend of earnestness, poetry, and humor. It embraces books as diverse as "Jonah" and "Zarathustra," men as different as Plato, Pascal, Goethe, Vigny, Carlyle, Unamuno—a family in the spirit that transcends all divisions of ages, languages, or creeds.

I am with De Rougemont at the beginning—the Cosmic Choice—and at the end—the immediate practical decision. The link between the two, however, is not a system, and not even a symbol; it is a myth. So it is presented, very properly, not in scientific or rationalistic terms, but through a blend of lyricism and irony. If De Rougemont's myth were to harden into a dogma, I should fight it tooth and nail; my own favorite myth to explain the nature of evil is totally different.

Lyricism and irony: is not that the perfect romantic formula? Yet De Rougemont's final counsel would be strictly classical. With Pascal he would say, "Let us strive to think accurately." "The devil knows that whenever we call a spade a spade, evil recedes and loses its magic power." Yes, let us repeat after Boileau: "J'appelle un chat un chat, et Rollet un fripon"; and we all know whose name Boileau would insert today.

ALBERT GUERARD

A Study in Contradictions

ALFRED NOBEL: DYNAMITE KING—ARCHITECT OF PEACE. By Herta E. Pauli. L. B. Fischer. $3.

ALFRED NOBEL has been dead nearly fifty years, but his works live on. If the explosives he invented have become obsolete for purposes of war, the great international industrial organization he created, subdivided into national groups, is munitioning both sides in the present war. Meanwhile the peace prize he founded has gone unawarded for four years, and the members of the committee of the Norwegian Storting, whose task it was to nominate the winner, are either exiles or Nazi prisoners.

As a chemist, Nobel's major achievement was the adaptation for practical purposes of the original work of other men. Nitroglycerine, the foundation of his fortune, was actually the discovery of an Italian professor, Ascanio Sobrero, who, to quote Miss Pauli, was "too kindly a soul for developing explosives" and so turned to other studies when he realized the potentialities of the deadly liquid he had produced in his laboratory. Nobel had no such compunctions. Five men, including his youngest brother, were killed as a result of his early experiments. His comment was: "You cannot expect an explosive substance to come into general use without loss of life."

Matching his ruthless search for knowledge was his vigor in exploiting it. Miss Pauli stresses the point that he was much happier in the laboratory than in the counting-house, but I think that she underestimates his share in the organization of his business. Certainly he was not one of those inventors so wrapt in their studies that they lose the monetary fruits thereof. But by the shrewd selection of partners and subordinates he was able to free himself of bothersome details and to remain happily ignorant of some of the manipulations which inevitably attend the creation of an international monopoly. At the bar of history, however, he cannot disclaim responsibility. The entanglement of the French Nobel company in the Panama scandal was primarily the result of the ambitions of his associate Paul Barbe, who, as Nobel had long been aware, had "a conscience which stretches like india rubber."

This excellent new life of Nobel does not pretend to give the reader a complete appreciation of his scientific work, nor does it attempt to unravel the complicated skeins of the monopolistic organizations he founded. It offers, instead, an impressionistic sketch of a fascinating personality, of a man who, away from the explosives to which his life was dedicated, was a shy, neurotic, unhappy, cynical intellectual.

The contradictions in his nature are cleverly developed by Miss Pauli, whose approach is sympathetic but always objective. She brings out the fact that, despite all his pessimism, he was a true creature of the optimistic nineteenth century—a man with a mission to "spread light," believing "that any addition to knowledge was bound to be beneficial in the end." It did not occur to him that there might be a contradiction between his invention and promotion of deadly weapons and his life-long antagonism to war. When, under the influence of the famous pacifist Bertha von Suttner, he began to apply his mind increasingly to the problems of peace, his first thought was to invent a weapon "of such horrible capacity for mass annihilation that thereby wars would become altogether impossible."

Eventually—did he foresee how Hitler would twist this same idea?—he abandoned this mechanical solution of the problem for a monetary one—another idea characteristic of the age of materialism. The final version of his will left his whole fortune to be held in trust, with the annual income to be awarded in prizes "to those persons who during the previous year have rendered the greatest services to mankind." One part was to be given "to the person who has done the most or best work for the brotherhood of nations, the abolition or reduction of standing armies. . . ." The other four parts were assigned to reward outstanding work in physics, chemistry, physiology or medicine, and literature.

Not the least interesting pages in this book are those devoted to an analysis of the awards since 1900, but unfortunately a complete list of the prize-winners is omitted. Many of the greatest scientists of our time and some of the greatest

"... I cannot put out of my mind the importance of its message." —SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE

GENERALS AND GEOGRAPHERS

THE TWILIGHT OF GEOPOLITICS

By Hans W. Weigert

A book that puts Haushofer's geopolitics into its true perspective. $3.00

"... The book has fascinated me so that I finished it without stopping. The value of the book is not only that of a mere analysis but a guide to victory. . . . May many read this book. It deserves wide attention."—Sat. Review of Literature.

"... a remarkable book. . . . This is a book that demands and merits thoughtful reading. It should be studied and digested by American and British statesmen."—The Hartford Times.

"... an unusually lucid statement of the basic facts about geopolitics. . . . Mr. Weigert has definitely opened the subject to numerous readers."—George N. Shuster, President, Hunter College.

"... an important book and doubly important through being so timely."

—Vilhjalmur Stefansson.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Avenue New York

authors have been among those honored. But as Miss Pauli points out, there have been some questionable choices and some unforgivable omissions. A notable example is the passing over of Tolstoy. All too many of the peace prizes have been won by stuffed shirts, but the last selection, Carl von Ossietzky, who died in a concentration camp rather than deny his convictions, made some amends. Let us hope that the next Nobel peace-prize winner, to whom Miss Pauli bravely dedicates her book, will be as worthy.

KEITH HUTCHISON

War—and Peace

A STUDY OF WAR. By Quincy Wright. The University of Chicago Press. Two Volumes. $15.

THE first and final feeling of the reviewer toward Quincy Wright's colossal study of war is obviously awe. Sixteen years of labor by a leading scholar and thinker, assisted by scores of specialized researchers—four parts in forty chapters, each chapter a full treatise in several sections, and all together escorted by a retinue of 45 appendixes in small type—1,500 pages plus 50 of indexes, the large majority of them rising from pedestals of footnotes—two brick-thick tomes, bound and wrapped in the strong colors, purple, gold, and scarlet, of blood and battle—these are some of the externals and figures that impress the onlooker ere the reader takes his place. A quantitative eulogy, however, might sound like a slight were it not presently joined by the statement: first, that Quincy Wright's learning, as we all know, is throughout of superior quality, with only such minor flaws as omniscience alone could avoid in so vast an aggregate of knowledge; second, that his factual science is illumined by a judgment as penetrating as it is wise and human. Plain clearness is the constant asset of his style; yet not seldom we meet a passage enhanced by literary elegance, and a smile of temperate humor enlivens time and again our journey through so serious a landscape.

The abundance of the treatment entails of course its risks. "Wars," we read almost at the outset, "in the broadest sense of the word, have occurred between physical entities, but this study is limited to organic history which began perhaps a billion years ago"—a limitation, if that is the word, of perplexing size. "The history of war attempted in this volume," the author states, with just pride, elsewhere, "covers the struggles of life throughout the world from animals to contemporary world-civilization. It therefore approaches a philosophy of history." Many are the things we learn in this Summa, from the way of life of "the Mesozoic ancestors of lions and tigers," who "were very mild," to the date, 1573, when Poland entered modern civilization; from the genealogical stem of the human race to the dialectical data of the issue whether history is a science or an art; and the more we are offered, the more exacting grows our appetite. Completeness, indeed, in a study of war would include everything that is in heaven and earth; and there is no satisfactory reason why a book of this sort, while granting so ample a room to ants and simians, should omit the lives of the great captains or the history of the Red Cross. Thus, with the longing for totality inevitably frustrated, the encyclopedic wealth may verge on miscellaneous essayism, and the many trees may hide from the doubting traveler the forest.

He will have his due, if he does not make more stock than strictly necessary of the statistical and mathematical material wherewith Quincy Wright props his philosophy of war and peace. Atlases, diagrams, questionnaires, tabulations, remind us occasionally of Eddington's poetic impatience and poetic justice when, in "The Nature of the Physical World," weary of centipede-equations on the generation of waves by wind, he leaps up reciting:

There are waters blown by changing winds to laughter
And lit by rich skies . . .

In the "Study of War" there are formulas even of the balance of power, starting with a moderate $R_1 = S_1 - (Pr - P_1)$, then in due course of pages to bristle up in a twofold two-line array of symbols duly ending in ciphers. Poetic or unpoetic, the unmathematical reader reacts with the plain conviction that the balance of power won't do. This is, after all, the author's ethico-political conviction, regardless of elusive theorems; neither does his attitude toward the method of the physical sciences, when applied to human history, exceed the boundaries of an open-minded skepticism.

His philosophy of war and peace does not depend on ultimate assumptions about the nature of war and its correlation with the nature of man. A trend of thought which can be traced from Heraclitus down to Nietzsche and fascism makes of war the substance of all being; another trend, represented by founders of high religions or by lay moralists such as Marx or Thorstein Veblen, makes of war an aftermath of original sin or an execrable innovation, due to economic and spiritual enslavement, at the dawn of history. Quincy Wright seems to incline toward the latter view—a more hopeful one, since there are more chances of weaning man from behavior extrinsic to his primal essence than of extirpating characteristics that were inherent in his biological destiny. Whatever the beginnings, however, he neatly sees the ends. Meandering but never disoriented, his purpose—and achievement—is to demonstrate that war, especially in the modern era, has made for dilapidation rather than for the integration of societies, and that the march of our wish and will must head "toward a warless world."

There is profit in implementing with the documentation of this treatise the general but vague notion that wars in the modern era, while tending to lesser frequency (even though "from 1840 to 1940 there were about twenty-six hundred important battles involving European states"), tended also to greater destructiveness. Their causes were manifold, and the prudent scholar does not wish to ascribe primacy to any of them. It would seem, however, hardly arbitrary to contend that the common denominator has been and is the lack of supreme power vested with judgship above the nations, and that no philosopher ever worded the problem more stringently than Dante did when in the opening sentences of his political manifesto he stated that the goal of human life is perfectibility both in intellect and action, that perfectibility requires peace, and that peace can be enforced only by a unitary authority ruling the world. Quincy Wright's thought is strongly and faithfully international. It is not yet supra-national enough. Like most among the best in our years, he has not stepped resolutely enough beyond the concept of Kant as embodied in Wilson. That concept, generous and progressive though it was, had something of the squaring of the circle inasmuch as it proposed a unitary federation of independent nations, a sovereign whole made of sovereign parts. A warless world will not emerge even from a Nazi defeat unless, dismissing all hesitance, we oppose the idea and fact of the world republic to the otherwise ever-recurrent phases of the competition for world empire.

It is this hesitance that accounts for Quincy Wright's reserved accent when writing (p. 256 f.): "The twentieth century appears to be witnessing the supercession of the secular sovereign states by something else. Exactly what cannot be said." Much farther on, in a chapter of fervent humility, he suggests that the task of synthesis and practice is for poets and statesmen rather than for jurists and political scientists. Poets will shape the world myth apt to change the heart of man; statesmen will make the myth into a deed. Thus the concluding pages look somewhat pale in comparison. Of the general directions, however, he is firmly aware; and of contemporary statesmen he writes, generically yet pertinently: "They lack the power to organize the world, but the world will condemn them if their activities are confined to organizing the nations" (p. 1,049). The unrheterical phrasing adds to the severity of the warning.

Hastier readers may not devote to the "Study of War" as much time and thankful application as this leisurely reviewer did. But many will give it a place of honor among reference books, in so far as it is a book of science. Many more, in so far as it is a book of hope, will find in it an outstanding testimonial to the faith of an age which—not ironically at all—is fighting a planetary war for a planetary peace.

G. A. BORGES

Eisenstein on the Film

THE FILM SENSE. By Sergei M. Eisenstein. Translated and Edited by Jay Leyda. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

EISENSTEIN's book on aesthetics has been awaited so long by film students that its appearance is to them an expected satisfaction rather than a surprise. But it will hold many surprises for those—inside as well as outside the movie business—who were unaware that Eisenstein is the cinema's foremost teacher and theorist as well as one of its master-spirits. "The Film Sense" is not a technical handbook or even a consideration of the film per se but a broad and catholic survey of the relationships between all the media of art. In the comparatively brief course of his 216 pages the author has recourse to examples from painting, poetry, music, the novel, the short story, theatrical costuming, and Chinese ideographs; the names of Pushkin and Da Vinci occur more frequently than do those of film makers. This insistence upon the unity of art is gratifying not only as a principle but also as evidence of the lively historical sense which increasingly infuses Soviet culture. His investigation of the old theory of "absolute" correspondences between colors, sounds, and ideas is complete and discriminating, and his rejection of that theory is of considerable significance. The rejection is made under the influence of Freud and of mod-

AMUSEMENTS

"The most effective and the most satisfactory play about the war yet to reach our stage."
—Joseph Wood Krutch, Nation.

THE PLAYWRIGHTS' COMPANY Presents

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A new play by Maxwell ANDERSON Cast of 25, Incl. Aline MacMAHON
CORT 43th ST. E. of B'WAY, Eves. 8:40, $1.10 to $3.30, 281 seats $1.10.
Kale Wed. & Sat. 2:40, $1.10-$2.75. Seats selling for next 3 weeks.
Extra Matinee New Year's Day Mail Orders Filled

PUBLICATION

Free Churchill Pamphlet

The new Archbishop of Canterbury was appointed by Prime Minister Winston Churchill against the wishes of Tory reactionaries in Britain. A large audience in the Albert Hall, London, heard the Archbishop declare for transference of taxes from production equipment to ground values. (See Christian Century, October 7, 1942.) Churchill himself, in a volume recently issued in New York, says: "Who could have thought that it would be easier to produce by toll and skill all the most necessary or desirable commodities than it is to find consumers for them? It is certain that the economic problem with which we are now confronted is not adequately solved, indeed is not solved at all, by the teachings of the textbooks, however grand may be their logic, however illustrious may be their authors." Churchill is also for the taxation of ground rental values.

Send at once for free copy of Churchill pamphlet, edited by Louis Wallis.

THE HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
30 East 29th Street New York City, N. Y.

BUY YOUR BOOKS THROUGH THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C.O.D.

Readers' Service Division

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

Please enter my subscription to your magazine

- ☐ 1 Year $5
- ☐ 2 Years $8
- ☐ 3 Years $11
- ☐ Introductory Offer: 13 Weeks for $1
- ☐ Remittance is inclosed

Canada $1 a year extra Foreign $1 a year extra Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

THE Nation

55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

ern anthropology—of science, in short—and throughout the book inherited theories are constantly tested by fact, by concrete example.

The focal point of his discussion is "montage," a term which he did much to establish and which he now seeks to interpret more deeply. "Montage" was originally defined as the most important single act in film composition—namely, the joining of images in such a way that they "explode" into a new concept which conveys more than the sum of the images themselves. This method of composition, which allows the spectator's imagination to participate in the creative work, completes itself in the actual physical editing of the celluloid. It is therefore a classic principle of film theory that the writing of the script and the production itself should look forward toward the moment when the separate images are joined. Acting, staging, and all other film devices become subordinate to the master-device of editing, through which the film realizes its capacity to disregard temporal and spatial relationships and use all the materials of the visual and aural world to develop a theme.

This was the "editing principle" proclaimed as the unique property of the film medium, and it was upon this principle that such masterpieces as "Potemkin" and "Ten Days That Shook the World," were produced. Yet we find Eisenstein stating here as his principal thesis that the juxtaposition of images to create a "third something" is not, after all, a device peculiar to film editing but is to be found in the work of all great artists. Leonardo's notes for a painting of the Deluge are shown to be sequential in character, and the painting, if it had been realized, would therefore have been "executed in accordance with features that are characteristic rather of the temporal than of the spatial arts." The present time is a "period in which montage thinking and montage principles [have] become widely current in all the border arts of literature—in the theater, in the film, in photo-montage, and so on." Such insights as these light up the whole aesthetic landscape and start trains of thought which make the reading of "The Film Sense" a lingering pleasure. But Eisenstein concludes from his examples that "there is no inconsistency between the method whereby the poet writes, . . . the method whereby the actor acts his role within the frame of a single shot, and that method whereby his actions and whole performance, as well as the actions surrounding him, forming his environment [or the whole material of the film], are made to flash in the hands of the director through the agency of the montage exposition and construction of the entire film." This statement is misleading. In Eisenstein's generalized definition of montage there is indeed no difference in kind between the montage methods of the various arts. But the difference in degree is so great that it becomes for practical purposes a difference in kind. The montages of theater and film, for example, are not only the whole range of the scale apart; they also conflict when an attempt is made to combine them. In "Cavalcade" two honeymooners stand on the deck of a ship, picturing the future. As they move away from the rail, they reveal a life preserver marked "S.S. Titanic." This simple montage is entirely legitimate in the theater, where all physical disasters must take place "off." But when this scene was transferred bodily to the film version of the play one felt that the medium had been violated; we should have been shown this great disaster as the screen alone can show it—as an actual happening, not a symbol or suggestion. We were not thus shown it because the film's director had surrendered the whole task of exposition to the actors. Eisenstein attempts to meet the danger suggested here by emphasizing the words "within the frame of a single shot," and in theory he is correct; so long as the director edits the single shots, he controls the exposition of the theme and even the meaning of the actor's performance. In practice, however, the actor, far from developing within his art a "montage" in keeping with film editing, tends constantly to revert to the traditional methods of delivering dialogue on the stage. When this happens, the editing is no longer determined by the requirements of the theme but by the length of time needed for an actor to speak his lines; the film becomes a photographed play.

To encourage this trend is far from Eisenstein's intention. But I feel that by emphasizing the resemblances rather than the differences between film montage and the other arts he has contributed to a current confusion concerning the proper methods of the film. In Hollywood since the advent of spoken dialogue, and to some extent in Russia since the production of "Chapayev" (1935), directors have been all too easily content to reproduce the arts of acting and dialogue rather than to compose a film in terms of the editing of images. For a classic example of montage it is today necessary to look back to the early Eisenstein or still farther to D. W. Griffith; hence the art of film composition tends more and more to become associated with an archaic art form, the silent film, while the contemporary and aesthetically unjustifiable compromise between stage and screen enjoys the flavor of modernity. That Eisenstein should give the appearance of associating himself with such false progress must arise, in my opinion, from the fact that he has for more than ten years been engaged in a controversy with other Soviet film makers, the issue being whether editing on the one hand or acting and "story" on the other were the controlling factors in film composition. Eisenstein's opponents disliked the "abstraction" of his first films and attributed it to montage, which they thereupon disowned. This abstraction, if such it was, was actually inherent in the themes of those particular films, and it may well be that the present book represents Eisenstein's attempt to clear the confusion between form and content by demonstrating the existence of principles analogous to montage in every art form.

If lack of space compels me to treat Eisenstein's new thesis as a heresy, this is not to say that I consider either the thesis or its source unimportant. On the contrary, both serve to demonstrate the enthusiastic atmosphere in which Soviet film making takes place, and reveal that in the Soviet Union every film is rooted in the history of culture and is consciously planned to express human needs and aspirations. If this statement needs the point of contrast, consider Hollywood and Elstree, where each film is still an isolated commercial venture, and where montage has been debased to mean the "art" of plugging continuity gaps with successive shots of leaves falling from calendars and clock hands twirling round. Now, if ever, is the time to consider the terms of that contrast, and Eisenstein's book is one of the keys to it.

RICHARD GRIFFITH

IN BRIEF

DRAMA

THE OLD SOUTH. By Thomas Jefferson Wertenbaker. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

In a volume as readable as it is learned and judicial, Professor Wertenbaker follows his previous book on the Middle Colonies with one on Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas. He discusses the national origins of the settlers, the character of the civilizations they established, and the local factors which contributed to the molding of a South that is not and never has been "solid." Education, economics, social history, architecture, all are examined in a documented study which is leisurely without being slow. As far as a layman can discover, errors are limited to details of proofreading. The twelve text figures and forty-three plates are an integral and charming part of the book.

GRAND CANYON. By V. Sackville-West. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

An Englishwoman who has seen her own country through the blitz perhaps finds it difficult to contemplate without bitterness America's lack of experience of the same kind of horror, but a person of Miss Sackville-West's literary standing should have tried to control her unpleasant fantasies. Instead, she has written a revenge story on the theme of what will happen to us over here unless we learn to be "realistic." It is 1945, two years after Britain has been defeated by the Germans and two years after America has signed a Pacific Charter leaving Europe in the status quo of September, 1939; as a result of this deluded appeasement, England is Nazi-dominated and the United States necessarily becomes an armed camp. Presently Germany and Japan combine to give America an air and naval workout that makes the attacks on England in the present war seem mere child's play. This is Miss Sackville-West's political warning; in its own small way, as a message to America, it can only rank in impudence and bad taste with Mr. Luce's famous letter to England. The rest of the novel has to do with a pair of virtuous English refugees, residents of the Grand Canyon Hotel, who, when Colorado is attacked, lead their fellow-guests to safety at the bottom of the canyon, where we follow their idyllic adventures with a certain bewildered interest until we discover that they are all really dead.

"The Three Sisters"

IT IS not very often that the New York drama critic is faced with the ineluctable necessity of passing a clear judgment upon a revived classic either ancient or modern. In nine cases out of ten he can, with some show of reason, remark that certain defects in the production make the whole rather difficult to judge, and he can thus avoid the necessity of disagreeing too violently with anybody. Those who, for instance, find "Hamlet" boring can be told that so, at many moments, did he; those who would indignantly deny that Shakespeare ever nods can be granted that he probably doesn't—when played in a fashion more nearly adequate than Mr. X and his colleagues managed to achieve. And thus it can be maintained that the classics are classic, but that it is just as well not to produce them too frequently.

For once, however, the critic will look in vain for this comfortable out and be compelled to admit that it is hard to imagine a better production of Chekhov's "The Three Sisters" than that which Katharine Cornell is offering at the Barrymore Theater. Driven to absolute desperation, one might, I suppose, take cowardly refuge in muttered allusions to what one saw the Moscow Art Theater do on their home grounds; but short of that there is no escape. Here is a real all-star cast which for once seems to have forgotten that it is anything of the sort and works as a unit for the glory of nothing except the production as a whole; here is a direction—in the hands of Guthrie McClintic—which is both delicate and firm, elaborating a thousand little details without allowing the curiously wavering but never really broken outlines of the whole to be obscured. Miss Cornell, Judith Anderson, and the newcomer Gertrude Musgrove play the three sisters as three distinct individuals who nevertheless never really compete for attention; Ruth Gordon, perhaps quite properly the most flamboyant of the cast, makes Natasha the terrifying little savage that she is. Nor are the chief male roles any less well handled. Tom Powers, Edmund Gwenn, Alexander Knox, and Eric Gresser—this does not yet exhaust the list—are certainly likely to be remembered in their present roles at least as vividly as they are remembered in any they have ever played. Surely, then, we are not likely to have a better opportunity to perceive just what Chekhov's intention was or to decide for ourselves what subtleties and what weaknesses are actually revealed in a work accepted as one of the finest of modern plays.

I shall certainly not attempt in three paragraphs to summarize completely my own opinion, but there are two or three things which may be said in even so small a space. One of them is that Chekhov's method is the result of carrying to a logical extreme something which was, at least until very recently, an almost universal modern tendency—the tendency, I mean, carefully to avoid any appearance of challenging comparison with the major virtues embodied in the classics of other ages and to take refuge in the indirect presentation of the minor moods. It is certainly not true, as is so often said, either that "The Three Sisters" has no plot or that nothing happens in it. A mere summary of the sensational revolutions in the lives of its characters would, I wager, require more space than a summary of similar events in "Othello." But the impression that nothing happens is deliberately created by Chekhov's inversion of the normal method of story-telling, as the result of which all major events either take place off stage or are hastily represented as though they were minor incidents, while the attention is kept focused upon the elaborately detailed representation of the trivialities of conversation or the monotonous routine of lives which seem to be stagnating but are actually plunging to tragedy.

One justification of this method is, of course, that it is in harmony with the character of the persons who are represented. They are drifters and dreamers who are far more vividly aware of their vague philosophizings, their self-consciously aesthetic sensations, and, above all, their boredom than they are of the major tragedies which come upon them when they are thinking of something else. And of course it is just Chekhov's criticism of them that all this is so. But he would not really have them otherwise, for he would not really understand them if they were.

In the hands of any but one kind of master the method would be intolerable and the characters too insignificant to be endured. In Chekhov's hands the whole takes on a certain fascination, and the abnormal emphasis enables him always to escape any of that effect of banality which cannot be avoided when the big scene is writ big by a man not himself really big enough to write it. But clever and charming and sad as the play may be and fine as the present production is, one may, I think, just as well confess that there is a real sense in which Chekhov, like most modern writers, is minor, and that however grateful we may be for his virtues we would gladly, if we could, exchange them for major ones. No one who cares for the modern theater should miss this production. Nevertheless, passion is better than wistful charm, strong people are more interesting than weak ones, and an author who has some kind of faith in human nature is better than one who, however regretfully, gives it up. Moreover, a writer who can successfully handle a story by the normal method is even more impressive than one who can escape bathos and banality only by inverting it. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

In spite of some distressing faults of structure and several unconvincing situations, "The Willow and I," by John Patrick (Windsor Theater), manages to be a moving and absorbing play. The plot is not original, and the author throws together such ingredients as melodrama, psychological analysis, Victorian sentiment, and comic effects in reckless disregard of consistency of tone. But the total effect is better than the elements that produce it. For this the actors deserve much credit—particularly Barbara O'Neil and Martha Scott, who play, respectively, the domineering, grasping younger sister and the older one whose retreat from reality and from the need of fighting for her emotional rights creates the situation around which the play is built. F. K.

ART

1942-43 ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN ART. At the Whitney Museum, until January 6.

ARTISTS FOR VICTORY. At the Metropolitan Museum of Art, until February 22.

For the tenth time the Whitney Annual gives us a chance to see how competently and yet how badly most of our accepted artists paint, draw, and carve. The Annual is aided this year in its nefarious purpose by a grandiose "Artists for Victory" show at the Metropolitan, with six times as many items. Competent, amazingly so, is most of the work shown at the two places. These second-hand Renoirs, Cézannes, Vlaminkes, Bakinses, Winslow Homers, Maillols, Rodins, these archaizers, these academicians and eclectics have ascertained quite well—up to a point—what made yesterday's art successful, and they rehearse the success with greater dexterity than its initiators. If you like art passionately enough and have the endurance, you can get pleasure from both exhibitions. Comparatively few single pictures or pieces of sculpture are as bad as is either show as a whole. (When enough similar things are added together a new quality is produced which was only latent in each before that; sometimes this new quality is a gain, sometimes, as in this case, a loss: indicating that the trouble with our accepted contemporary art is the lack of an invigorating common impulse.) But no matter how well these artists paint and model, they do not affect us enough.

Moving art in any age is that which wins new experience for human beings. Such conquest arouses the sensation of increased power we get from the work of Third Dynasty Egyptian and archaic Greek sculptors, from Giotto, Veronese, and Cézanne. They were the first to discover and possess certain kinds of experience through their mediums, and this sense of firstness keeps their art forever fresh. But the artists at the Whitney and the Metropolitan are satisfied to rework old areas, and are merely pleasing at their best, seldom moving. They try for the new only by means of startling subject matter or technical stunts—guaranteed to impress art juries made up of curators seeking to prove they are not academic.

The Metropolitan is more coy in its selection and hanging of "radical" art, and it has no four or five works as good as the best four or five at the Whitney, but it has staged a better show on the whole, if only because it gives the preponderance to landscapes and still lifes. For American painters, and to a less degree most painters since Modigliani, can no longer handle portraits and figures with true feeling. Society does not circulate an adequate notion of the human personality to which they can refer. They try to make up for this by over-expressing whatever half-baked or stereotyped conceptions they themselves happen to have, and without thinking about the problem very much. The result, which may be seen at the Whitney, is either fulsome or banal. Not to mention the horrors of the sculpture section. (The sculptors take refuge from the problem by going in for animals, melodrama, and academicism.) Nevertheless, there are some good things among the abstract paintings and sculpture at the Whitney—by Roszak, David Smith, Harari, Greene, Tomlin, Knaths; among the landscapes—by Heliker, Fortess; and among the water colors—still lifes and landscapes by Berlandina, Feininger, Marin, and Weber. But most of this work is still quite repetitive. The same can be said of the good items at the Metropolitan. The one exception there is a water color by Steve Wheeler which shows the successful digestion of Klee's influence and is the most striking piece of work in the exhibition, handicapped though it is by one of those whimsy titles that are the curse of Klee's legacy: "Man with Short Haircut." Two landscapists were discoveries to me: William Sommerfeld and Walter Stuemppig, Jr., whose work gives modest but very substantial pleasure. There is a fine "Mining Town" by Arnold Blanch, and if evidence is wanted for my contention as to the incapacity of contemporary painting to handle the human being, compare this picture with the same artist's "This Is a People's War," probably the worst painting in the place. Helen Rátka's flower piece also is worth noticing.

The awarding of the prizes which the Metropolitan made available is a scandal, at least in the oil paintings and the sculpture. The medal for the best painting in the whole exhibition was presented to a carefully manipulated piece of tripe, by Ivan Albright, which is a vertical canvas about eight feet high, showing a wormy lavender-dark door with a wreath in its center and a woman's hand on the jamb, everything iridescent with decay, everything concocted and concocted, everything the painter had in the way of time, diligence, and bad taste thrown in. The jury was seduced, I imagine, by size, by subject, and by the rhythmic mottlings and even patina that hold the picture together. The first money prize was given to a big wheezing machine of a landscape by Curry which will end up one day in a museum's cellar or a Roadside Rest. It has, however, its heavy charm. Of the prizes for oils, the only ones deserved were a fifth to Bohrod's aqueous, tricky "Reflections in a Shop Window," a third to Feininger's "A Church," and perhaps a sixth to a landscape by Evergood. The water-color section at the Metropolitan is quieter and stronger than any other—as a friend says, you can't do as much damage in water color, even if you try. The prints are not too awful either. Nor is the sculpture quite as bad as that at the Whitney gave reason to fear. A fourth prize to Frances Lamont's spiraling metal "Gallic Cock" was well earned, and so, I suppose, was Calder's fourth, though he has done better work. Peter Dalton's "Seated Figure" and Rhys Caparn's "Johannes Steel" should have got prizes, but they must have been too staid for the live-wire jury.

The important question is whether contemporary American art is as unenterprising as these two shows make it out to be. I think not.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

WE MAY regret not being able to hear some of the legendary musicians of the past; but right now we are able to hear musicians who will be legendary some day; and some of those musicians of the past might not be very impressive today. I did hear Ysaye, but when I was not old enough to know good and bad in performance; and about a year ago I happened to hear an old recording of an Ysaye performance which astonished me by its stylistic vulgarities. In my youth the great orchestra was the Boston Symphony conducted by Muck, which I heard twice in 1917; the great quartet was the Kneisel, which I merely heard about. Years later I heard recordings of the Boston Symphony under Muck which confirmed my recollection of its extraordinary sound and precision, and superb performances conducted by Muck in Europe; but on the other hand, after one of the Budapest Quartet's Beethoven concerts at the Y. M. H. A. a few years ago I asked someone who had heard the Kneisels about their playing, and he was silent a few moments before he said: "Don't ask me about them," and was silent again before he exploded: "Those wooden Indians!" The Flonzaleys, who followed the Kneisels, were anything but wooden Indians; but today we hear in a performance of the Budapest Quartet—in the beauty of the four strands of sound, their musical inflection, their integrated progression, their combined effect as a statement of the work—something that is phenomenal, unique in its province, like the dancing of Markova, an orchestral performance of Toscanini.

The recent occasions for marveling at the Budapest Quartet's performances have included the Sunday morning broadcasts of C. B. S., the first two concerts of the Y. M. H. A.'s annual series, and two concerts of the New Friends of Music. The New Friends series this year has offered several of Bach's sonatas and partitas for unaccompanied violin and cello, of which I have skipped the dull ones but heard the E major, the one with the superb Prelude, which Szigeti played magnificently, and the D minor, the one with the great Chaconne, which Huberman played well, though without the sustained intensity of Szigeti's wonderful performance at the Y. M. H. A. There have been other dull pieces of Bach that I have skipped; and at the last pre-Christmas concert, at which Klemperer was to have conducted two cantatas, he conducted instead sensitively modeled chamber-music-scale performances of the Brandenburg Concerto No. 6, the fine D minor Concerto for two violins, and the charming B minor Suite for flute and strings. There have been a few works of Schumann that I have also skipped; and a number of quartets by Haydn, a few played by the Budapest Quartet, others by the scratchy Gordon Quartet and dull Musical Art Quartet, and still others by the Coolidge Quartet. This group plays with good tone, precision, finish, spirit, taste; but catching the end of one of its Sunday morning C. B. S. broadcasts I was struck by the stiffness of its performance of the finale of Schubert's Quartet Op. 29, after the relaxed plasticity of the Budapest Quartet's recent performance at the Y. M. H. A.

We cannot hear the orchestral performances of Nikisch, of Mahler; but we can still hear those of Toscanini. After some of the comments on what I have written about him—for example, the accusation that I have fallen for the Toscanini ballyhoo—I think it well to mention that while my experience of his conducting begins as far back as a performance of "Madame Butterfly" in 1914, when I was better able to appreciate Farrar's looks than Toscanini's musicality, my present estimate of his work is a very recent one. I myself protested against the ballyhoo during his first years with the New York Philharmonic—not that I did not hear the beautiful sonorities, contours, and textures, but that I thought Mengelberg's shaping of the sound-time continuum produced more effective statements of Beethoven and Brahms; as late as 1933, when I had learned to dislike Mengelberg's over-emphatic plastic distortion, I wrote that Toscanini produced beautiful sounds but the same beautiful sounds for all music, whereas Koussevitzky gave the right character to the music of each composer—not merely of Tchaikovsky but of Beethoven and Brahms; and only in the years since then have I come to find Koussevitzky's over-emphatic distortion of Beethoven, Brahms, and Tchaikovsky impossible to listen to, and Toscanini's statements of these composers' works the most deeply satisfying. Looking back I can see what has happened is that I have learned to appreciate and to require plastic economy and subtlety in performance; and that I have learned by hearing them long enough—in other words, by my own experience. I have not, I might add, engaged in vast, cloudy conceptual constructions of the history of culture that have brought me to a conclusion about the relation of Toscanini's conducting to the Zeitgeist of this century; I have been concerned entirely with the works of music that have been important to me, and have reached a conclusion about the effectiveness of these works as Toscanini has stated them.

Listening to his recent broadcast of Brahms's Third Symphony and recalling his first performances of this symphony many years ago, I was aware that in some degree he too had changed since then—that his performances of Brahms and Beethoven have acquired the breadth and weight they did not have at first. On the other hand there is his performance of Mozart's G minor Symphony, which I had always found excessively impassioned, and in the case of the Victor performance even tumultuous and ferocious: listening to the work as he conducted it recently with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia and New York, I found the statement marvelous—powerful, impassioned, but without excess; going back to the Victor records and to records of the broadcast of the last Sunday afternoon concert with the New York Philharmonic in 1936, I was surprised to hear the same tempi and style, and to find the harshness of the Victor performance to be in its recorded sound. (The tempi of the first movement and the finale were the Allegro molto and Allegro assai which Mozart prescribes; the second movement was taken much faster than the prescribed Andante, but demonstrated that any pace that Toscanini adopts is one in which he can make the music effective.) Going after this to Beecham's recorded performance, which I had thought excellent, I found the first movement pallid, with the opening phrases made trivial by their jaunty staccato conclusions. B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

French Government Needed

Dear Sirs: In the heat of the controversy aroused by the "Darlan affair" the most urgent phase of the present French situation has been overlooked. It is the need for the speedy mobilization of French man-power and resources for the common struggle against the Axis.

The average Frenchman is a legalistic creature. He will not fight wholeheartedly in this war until a French government orders him to do so. In defeat he sticks desperately even to the shadow of a French state. More than Pétain's personal popularity, this state of mind was responsible for the comparative prestige that was enjoyed by the Vichy government.

The Allies have not made rational use of this psychology, and their present policies are particularly unfortunate. Instead of creating a single government which shall represent in the eyes of the average Frenchman the idea of French sovereignty, they split that sovereignty three ways—the Fighting French in London, Darlan in Algiers, Robert in Martinique.

Roosevelt's promise that "the future French government will be established . . . by the French people themselves after they have been set free by the victory of the United Nations" is not sufficient to arouse French enthusiasm for immediate participation in the war. It is interpreted as becoming valid only after the Nazis have been driven across the Rhine. Such an interpretation postpones the full participation of the French people in the war till the time when such participation will be hardly necessary.

The ideal way of setting up a French government now would be to call on French citizens in all the liberated territories to elect a provisional parliament in accordance with the election laws of the republic. If this solution is not practical under the circumstances, the best substitute would be to call on all members of the Chamber and Senate duly elected at the last general election to form a National Assembly in Algiers. Eventually this body could be strengthened by including the mayors of French cities freed from Nazi occupation or Vichy domination, the heads of larger native tribes, etc. With present means of communication, such an assembly, representing French territories throughout the world, could be called in less than a month.

In normal circumstances such a provisional parliament should be called by the Free French. To spare, however, the susceptibilities of certain French "leaders" and of their friends in Washington, this task could be intrusted to a High Commissioner of the United Nations, who would step down after the National Assembly was duly constituted. My candidate for this job would be Field Marshal Smuts of South Africa. In case he is not available, the second best choice would be some prominent member of one of the governments-in-exile who could not be suspected of imperialistic intentions.

The main tasks of the National Assembly would be: (1) to declare the armistice of June, 1940, legally void because of its repeated violation by the Nazis; (2) to proclaim French re-entrance into the war; (3) to reaffirm the French Republic, its constitution and laws, and to declare null and void all "laws" issued since June, 1940, without parliamentary sanction; (4) to form a French government for the conduct of the war and the administration of all freed territories.

A. REVUSKY

Yonkers, N. Y., December 16

That "Second Party"

Dear Sirs: Murray Gross, in The Nation of December 5, rediscovered a fact rather well known half a century ago: namely, that our so-called "two-party" system is in fact a one-party system with two branches, the "ins" and the "outs," and that "every major reform movement that has swept this country in the past had its origin in a third party." The Republican Party of 1856 was such a party, as were the People's ("Populist") Party of 1892 and the unofficial "New Deal" party of 1932.

I agree with Mr. Gross that "we need a party that will take the tenets of the New Deal and broaden them out and apply them," but the "Bull Moose" episode of 1912 was probably the last rapid assemblage of a third party that will be possible. Even then many of the states had laws governing the organization and continued life of new parties which made their creation difficult. And the trend of legislation is to make new parties practically impossible.

For example, here in Nebraska the proposed new party must hold a state convention of at least 1,000 electors who must sign a "roll" in the presence of a watcher from the Secretary of State's office; and it must poll 5 per cent of the total vote in order to remain an officially recognized party. Several such parties have been attempted and all have failed to retain a place on the ballot.

Provision is made, however, for the nomination of "independent" candidates by petition—the method by which Senator George W. Norris was elected in 1936, when he had the indorsement of the Democratic committees, and defeated in 1942, when indorsement was withheld, to the disgrace of Nebraska.

Some years ago the La Follettes were for a time busy with a Progressive Party, but outside of Wisconsin it does not seem to have made much progress. The fact is, a successful new party must have workers down at the "grass roots" in addition to eloquent and intelligent leaders; and finding and commissioning these "grass-roots" workers is no child's task.

CHARLES Q. DE FRANCE

Lincoln, Neb., December 17

Interpret or Amend?

Dear Sirs: In his review of my book "A New Constitution Now," Professor Corwin seems to accuse me of the "naive" belief that the Constitution ought not to be interpreted. This view would indeed be naive if I held it. I have merely suggested, however, that interpretation be confined within reasonable limits.

Mr. Corwin seems to me to be among those who would stretch the function of "interpretation" far beyond its reasonable scope. I recommend in my book that the Constitution should be amended so that treaties may be ratified by a majority vote of both House and Senate instead of, as the Constitution at present prescribes, by a two-thirds' vote of the Senate. Mr. Corwin, citing a joint resolution of June, 1934, and "certain recent decisions of the court," blandly suggests that we can make this change by "interpretation" rather than by amendment. I can only take this to mean that when Mr. Corwin speaks of "interpreting" the Constitution he really means changing it. I hope I shall not be regarded as too naive if I think such a process essentially dishonest. If, under the doctrine of interpretation, federal officials can say that a two-thirds' vote of the Senate means only a majority vote of the Senate, why cannot they just as easily start interpreting away the Bill of Rights? Under so loose a doctrine of "interpretation;" in short, what is the point in having a written constitution at all?

If we are going to change the Constitution, then we should know that that is what we are doing. We should change it in the direction in which the majority of the American people wish it to be changed, not in the direction in which merely some particular minority group wishes it to be changed. There is only one way to make sure that the American people wish or accept a change: that is to submit it to them frankly in the form of a proposed amendment. And it is because frank amendment has become so necessary that it is so important to make the method of amending the Constitution more democratic, and far less cumbersome and dilatory than it is today.

HENRY HAZLITT

New York, December 7

Dear Sirs: I read Mr. Hazlitt's letter with interest. I entirely agree that interpretation ought to be confined "within reasonable limits," but what are reasonable limits will necessarily vary with circumstances. Thus I think that the "interpretation" by which the recently imposed $25,000 salary limit purports to be derived from the Anti-Inflation Act of October 2 is absurd and dishonest. On the other hand, the practice of "executive agreements," whereby the Senate's participation in treaty-making has become today seriously undermined, is of long, slow development, having begun as far back as 1792. And would Mr. Hazlitt say that the suppression of freedom of choice on the part of Presidential Electors was accomplished dishonestly?

"If we are going to change the Constitution," says Mr. Hazlitt, "then we should know that that is what we are doing." I answer that it is even better to have some inkling as to what the practical effect of a suggested change is likely to be. Interpretation is a method of trial and error. Its cumulative effect in the case of a long-standing law like the Constitution can be great, but each step of it will have been more or less tested by practice. Amendment, on the contrary, is, or can be, a leap in the dark, a good part of which may have to be retraced by the aid of interpretation, or more precipitately by another amendment.

Besides, I do not like to see a man ordinarily as knowing as Mr. Hazlitt lend sanction to the question-begging argument that is embodied in his word "candid." The opponents of the New Deal systematically argued that way. "Why not be candid," they asked, "and admit that the New Deal is unconstitutional?" When that was the very point at issue. Subsequently the New Deal has been squared with the Constitution by interpretations of that document which have back of them at least as sound history and logic as the opposing interpretations had.

EDWARD S. CORWIN

Princeton, N. J., December 14

"What Goes On Here?"

Dear Sirs: I must commend your paper for its unmitigated denunciation of the Darlan affair. Certainly, no politically conscious person accepts the statement put out by the government, that is, that General Eisenhower alone was responsible. With Washington less than a second away by wireless, a political decision of such magnitude was never made by the General alone. Nor am I convinced that our State Department was solely responsible. It smells too much like the Non-Intervention Committee during the Spanish war.

England's Foreign Office has been behind every revival of reaction in Europe since 1918, from the Italian, Greek, and Portuguese instances to the German and Spanish. In the Spanish case, it used France as its cat's-paw; today it uses our too willing State Department. Just as Britain recognized the Loyalist regime in Spain and at the same time furthered Franco's aims, so it now accepts General de Gaulle while setting up Darlan. In both cases the common people would never have swallowed an open espousal of fascism, and it is the salutary reaction of these British masses, more than that of Americans, that may determine Darlan's fall. Yet, if we are not careful, his successor may be just as reactionary.

These past and present maneuverings force one to ask with the Christian Century (December 9), "What goes on here? First we pick a fascist collaborator with Germany to administer that part of France which we have 'liberated.' Now we give a Hapsburg pretender to a no longer extant Central European throne an approving pat on the back. Is the next step to be a Hohenzollern restoration in Germany?"

While we are berating Hitler's Quislings, we ourselves create them. And as Professor Salvemini said, "they may even be chosen as post-war dictators for their own countries."

Again I ask, "What goes on here?" Is this the Four Freedoms, is this a peoples' war?

S. E. GARNER

Baltimore, Md., December 11

No Work for Older Women

Dear Sirs: When I inquired about shipyard jobs at the employment office I was advised to try elsewhere. The many young girls working for Mr. Kaiser do not care to work with older women.

I find the mail-order houses and the department stores advertising for part-time helpers. But their personnel offices ask the business schools to send them only women under forty.

Employers limit the ages of help to the twenty-to-forty group in their classified help-wanted columns and their requests to the employment services. A few are willing to risk a woman of forty-five as a worker.

The Oregon Journal recently carried an editorial headed Jobs for Women of Sixty. It was occasioned by the plight of a widow of ability who could not find employment. Rural schools now accept former teachers. But libraries make no effort to place their own graduates over thirty.

I know a French teacher, a musician, a librarian, a social worker now living on slender savings. The curtailment of cultural activities and the closing of some schools sent them to the ranks of the unemployed. Apparently no imaginative planning has included the older women. Employment offices tend to think of them in terms of mothers' helpers.

Many older women would like to be a part of the common effort, but while a busy nation cries for labor they still find themselves considered waste material. In the enrolment of womanpower will such problems be considered? Women of ability hope so.

HELEN RUTH MONTAGUE

Portland, Ore., November 30

The Republican Swing

Dear Sirs: I think the anti-Administration newspapers that were elated at the Republican Party's success in the election are going to be disappointed if they think that added Republican representation will result in stronger prosecution of the war. I refer, of course, to those newspapers which really desire a stronger hand, not to the ones which are at heart appeasers and defeatists.

I think that the Republican success was really a reversion to a "pre-war mentality." The Republican Party is synonymous in the minds of millions with the "keep-us-out-of-war" movements and by the same token will be expected by the millions who recently voted for it to get us out of war by hook or crook. In other words, a great many voters would like again to open the entire war debate, Pearl Harbor notwithstanding.

I think that millions of people voted Republican as a way of showing their blind, pent-up anger because their sons or husbands were sent into the armed forces or will be inducted very soon. How else can you interpret the fact that the greatest Republican inroads were in those states which contributed the greatest number of soldiers and sailors? To my mind the huge Republican swing was purely a manifestation of the "continued blindness" of a great many of our people. I hope I am wrong.

EDWARD D. TODD

New York, November 13

Willkie a Liberal Leader

Dear Sirs: I worked for Roosevelt in his various campaigns and have always championed the New Deal. But I am now forced to admit that the liberal initiative has passed from Roosevelt to Willkie.

Willkie is our greatest liberal today, greatest because he sees things most clearly, has first-hand information of world conditions, and is big enough not to be afraid.

Roosevelt is so closely tied in with Churchill and the British Tories that he has lost his position as liberal leader of the world. He keeps strangely silent on the British Tory fumings that the Atlantic Charter does not apply to Asia or British possessions, while Willkie challenges these fumings.

ROLAND D. SAWYER

Ware, Mass., December 15

Pity the Washington Worker

Dear Sirs: Apropos the article Pity the Federal Worker in The Nation of December 12, which was very timely and interesting, I can add more ways in which he is to be pitied. The landlady-tenant situation in Washington is deplorable. Most of the low-paid employees ($1,440 per year) pay approximately one week's salary for their monthly rent. In return they have no privileges and can register no complaints. Woe to the roomer who lets one drop of water fall on the bathroom floor! The prices in restaurants are exorbitant, and the portions are so small that it will be necessary soon to invest additional money in a microscope in order to find the food on one's plate.

No wonder there is a great turnover in the government! Surely something can be done to improve these conditions before there is a mass exodus from Washington.

FLORENCE BROWN

Washington, D. C., December 12

An Ugly Situation

Dear Sirs: Joseph Julian's article Jim Crow Goes Abroad in your issue of December 5 reveals a situation which is both unwholesome and unholy, whether viewed as American military strategy or as a forecast of post-war race relations. It should do much to counteract recent attempts to gloss over this ugly spectacle.

HAROLD T. PINKETT

Washington, D. C., December 18

Arrest of Pablo Casals

Dear Sirs: I am taking the liberty of addressing you in behalf of one of the world's supreme artists, Pablo Casals, the great Spanish 'cellist.

Musical America has just informed its readers that according to an Associated Press dispatch from Mexico, dated November 18, Casals was recently arrested in German-dominated unoccupied France and turned over to the Spanish authorities. Mr. Casals had fled to France after the fall of the Spanish republic. Though apparently he never engaged in current political activities—at least in any such degree as would justify his being a political prisoner—he supported the legal Spanish government, and his liberal convictions led to his flight from Spain to France.

Every influence should be brought to bear in his behalf. He might be executed or sent to a concentration camp. It is known that he has been in poor health, and close confinement might cause his death. All the world recognizes his artistry. Kreisler once called him "the greatest master of the bow."

As chairman of the former Los Angeles branch of the Musicians' Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy, I urge you to try to secure his release.

LOUIS KAUFMAN

West Los Angeles, Cal., December 16

Four Freedoms Day

Dear Sirs: January 6 will mark the second anniversary of President Roosevelt's message to Congress in which he heralded the Four Freedoms: of speech, of worship, from want, from fear.

It is my conviction that January 6 should be permanently set aside as Four Freedoms Day, to be celebrated in time as a global holiday. The whole world has new hope because of the vision of the Four Freedoms. This vision must not perish; it must gain new vitality. A Four Freedoms Day could serve as excellent ideological propaganda for the cause of the democracies of the world and would be a guaranty of their determination to establish those freedoms.

FREDERICK KETTNER

New York, December 22

CONTRIBUTORS

PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN, now on leave from his congregation in Rochester, is executive director of the Committee on Army and Navy Religious Activities of the Jewish Welfare Board.

MANUEL SEOANE, former leader of the Aprista Party in the Peruvian parliament, is now in exile in Chile, where he is editing the magazine Ercilla.

RUTH BENEDICT is associate professor of anthropology at Columbia University.

SELDEN C. MENEFEY is a regular contributor to the Washington Post and the Christian Science Monitor.

GILBERT HIGHET was formerly professor of Greek and Latin at Columbia.

ALBERT GUERARD, professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University, is the author of "The France of Tomorrow."

G. A. BORGESE, professor of Italian literature at the University of Chicago, is the author of "Goliath: The March of Fascism."

RICHARD GRIFFITH, a sergeant in the United States army, was in civil life assistant to the curator of the Museum of Modern Art Film Library.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 9, 1943

NUMBER 2

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- No Unity with Fascists 39
- Investigate Dies! 40
- Mr. Babbitt Explains by Freda Kirchwey 41

ARTICLES

- Did Hull and Welles Tell the Truth? by I. F. Stone 42
- Slowdown in North Africa by Donald W. Mitchell 44
- Better than Rationing by Adolf F. Sturmthal 46
- The Jews of Europe. II. Seven Ways to Help Now by Philip S. Bernstein 48
- Violence in the Classroom by Agnes E. Benedict 51
- Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 53
- In the Wind 54

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- The Generals and Hitler by Hans Ernest Fried 55
- To the Czechs 57
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 58
- A Letter to Mr. Welles 59

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Alice James by Diana Trilling 60
- Cities in the Post-War World by Albert Guérard 62
- The Poet's Progress by Delmore Schwartz 63
- A Native of Civilization by Betsy Hutchison 64
- Ambassador Grew's Report by Donald W. Mitchell 65
- Marlowe, Definitive by George Barker 66
- In Brief 67
- Art by Clement Greenberg 68
- Music by B. H. Haggin 69

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

37

The Shape of Things

HITLER'S PROMISE THAT THE LESSONS learned last year would make it possible for the Nazi armies to withstand a second winter campaign in Russia at far less cost failed to allow for the fact that the Red Army had learned some lessons too. And up to date it has applied them far more profitably than its opponents. Moreover, the Russians seem better prepared than their foes to take advantage of the comparatively open weather this winter. They have found it possible to move more heavy equipment forward and are thus able to tackle the German "hedgehogs" with a heavier concentration of fire. Last winter only one of these strongly fortified points—Mozhaisk—was taken; this year the past week alone has seen the capture of Velikie Luki, Kotelnikov, Elista, Mozdok, and Chernishkovskaya, all important strategic and supply centers. The first of these towns was one of the main anchors of the German line on the north central front, and its fall has enabled the Red Army to cut the vital north-south railroad connecting Leningrad with Kiev and the Black Sea. An equally heavy blow was sustained by the Germans in the loss of Mozdok, which has ended their hope of seizing the Grozny oil fields.

★

THE STATE DEPARTMENT'S WHITE BOOK IS aptly named since it is obviously an attempt to whitewash the department's record and clear it of responsibility for the grave errors in American foreign policy in the decade between September 18, 1931, and December 7, 1941. The document itself will bear careful study, and we plan to comment on it in detail in a later issue. On the basis of advance news releases, it would seem to be largely taken up with a recital of known facts regarding the aggressive intentions of the Axis governments during this decade and our efforts to dissuade them from their avowed policies. In the case of Japan particularly it is clear that deceit was an integral part of the aggressor's strategy. But the State Department insists that it was never deceived for a moment. As early as 1934 Ambassador Grew warned Washington that in dealing with Japan we would be "reprehensibly somnolent" if we were to trust to the security of treaty restraints. About the same time Ambassador Long began to report on the aggressive intentions of Italy, though he was to take the lead in

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1943, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 866 National Press Building.

opposing sanctions against that country, and George Messersmith gave warning of the militaristic designs of Adolf Hitler. On January 27, 1941, Grew warned of a possible surprise attack on Pearl Harbor. Yet the White Book itself tells how we continued to supply Japan with oil. The theory was that if we suspended such shipments, Japan would attack the Dutch East Indies and take all the oil it wanted. Ultimately we did suspend trade and Japan did attack. But it was our own fleet and our own territory that bore the brunt of the first onslaught—and the destruction was wrought largely with the metal and oil with which we had for so long attempted to buy off the blackmailer.

✱

THE ENLARGED REPUBLICAN DELEGATION on Capitol Hill has let it be known through its journalistic mouthpieces that it hopes to use the Seventy-eighth Congress as a springboard to victory in 1944. There are also widespread reports that the G. O. P. leadership expects most of the dangerous in-fighting to be done for it by anti-New Deal Democratic commandos, who, according to a commentator in the Wall Street Journal, are in such a state of rage with the Administration that they are prepared to tear their party to pieces in order to "get" Roosevelt. "The next Congress," to quote this writer, "will be the first one since 1919-21 to contain a bi-partisan bloc devoted to the defeat of the President of the United States. . . . What do the 1943 irreconcilables want? Generally they want less of everything Mr. Roosevelt stands for. Their outstanding specific characteristic is that, compared with the Roosevelt Administration, they are inflationists." This bloc, which includes many Western Congressmen of both parties as well as some Southern Democrats, can be counted upon to fight bitterly against all measures of inflation control. Its success, however, will depend on how far it can gain support from the official Republican leadership and from the conservative Democrats of the Senator Byrd type. Will the party of McKinley desert its hard-money traditions to give encouragement to the new Bryanists? Will the Southern economizers, straining at the gnat of a few millions saved on civilian agencies, swallow the camel of billions added to war costs through inflation? The inconsistencies of a bi-partisan opposition, whose only common denominator is hatred of the President, would be amusing to watch under normal conditions. But with our eyes glued to the many distant fronts where we and our allies are fighting for our lives, we cannot anticipate with relish the ganging up of Congress reactionaries.

✱

LAST WEEK'S TESTIMONIAL DINNER TO Senator George W. Norris was unique. What started out as a well-deserved tribute to a great man spontaneously turned itself into a plea for leadership in American liberalism's coming test of strength. Tendered by this journal and the Union for Democratic Action, the affair attracted a potent array of speakers, ranging from the Mayor of New York to the head of the National Farmers Union, by way of Eleanor Roosevelt, the Supreme Court, Congress, and the leaders of organized labor. With few exceptions, they turned from honoring Norris to pleading with him to pick up the gauntlet hurled down by forces of reaction grown bold with their victories of last November. To all the speakers it was clear that the vote of 1944 may not only undo much of the work of the New Deal; it may rob the United Nations of the fruits of victory, just as Harding "normalcy" robbed the world in 1920. Safety, they understood, lies not in the Democratic Party or the Republican, but only in the strength of American liberalism so organized as to be readily available to progressive candidates of any party. Limited resources have hampered the Union for Democratic Action in precisely this kind of work, and it has persevered against the greatest odds. There is real hope now that its pioneering days are over, that backed by the might of farmers and industrial workers, the progressive force of the country is ready to assert itself at a moment when its potential strength is as sorely needed as it has ever been in our history.

✱

THE YUGOSLAV CABINET CRISIS OVER THE two linked problems of civil war and relations with the Soviet Union has been solved for the time being. The constitution of the new Yovanovich government in London, however, is by no means a guaranty that difficulties will be overcome. Ninich, the anti-Soviet reactionary, who last summer wilfully failed to come to an agreement with Molotov when the latter was in London, is out as Foreign Minister. His portfolio has been taken by the conservative Prime Minister. General Mihailovich continues as Minister of War. While at least five of the old opposition group have been included, several proved liberals have been dropped, notably those who had taken a balanced view of Soviet relations. Meanwhile the new Constituent Assembly, meeting on Yugoslav soil, has become a reality. A severe test of statesmanship therefore confronts the new Cabinet. Very clearly it must make contact with the popular movement at home. And that means that the partisans must be given full recognition and support.

✱

THE WITHDRAWAL OF THE CHINESE military mission in Washington has called attention once again to the shameful treatment accorded China since this country's entry into the war. Little or nothing has been done to remedy the grave situation reported by Mr. Willkie on his return from China some months ago. There are still but a few dozen American planes in the whole of China; virtually no modern war equipment of any description has been provided which would enable the Chinese to take the offensive against Japan. Doubtless our War and Navy officials have excellent excuses to offer as to why this aid has not been sent. But there can be no excuse for the way in which the Chinese military mission has been ignored in the planning of United Nations strategy at Washington. It may be argued that the Chinese are wrong in their insistence that the best way to defeat Japan is by means of an attack from the Asiatic mainland, but Washington's failure to listen to the pleas of our Far Eastern ally is indefensible. General Hsiung Shih-fei, head of the mission, has indicated that he may return to this country after he has reported to Chiang Kai-shek. It is to be hoped that by that time we shall have awakened to China's great potential contribution to the struggle against Japan.

✱

WITH THE CAPTURE OF BUNA MISSION THE United Nations have successfully completed the most difficult part of their first land offensive against the Japanese. Only the small force of Japanese pocketed on Sanananda Point remains on the Papuan peninsula of New Guinea. In assessing the Buna campaign it must be remembered that it was essentially defensive in character. It started several months ago as an effort to check a Japanese attack on Port Moresby and was pressed primarily as a means of removing all possible threat to that base. The vast amount of time and effort required to clear the Japanese out of Buna, Buna Mission, and Gona should be adequate proof of the folly of a drive northward, island by island, from Australia. But the clearing of the Solomons and New Guinea is important for safeguarding our supply route to Australia and India, and thus should facilitate an attack on Burma and Indo-China. A possible alternative line of attack was opened up by the devastating air raid on Wake Island made by American planes on Christmas Eve. Recapture of Wake, shown to be by no means an impossibility, might be the first step of a westward drive across the Pacific directed either against Japan or the Philippines.

✱

GREAT BRITAIN'S REBUKE TO ARGENTINA for attempting to play Britain against the United States has placed the Castillo government in an awkward position. In accordance with the suggestion of Axis propaganda broadcasts, the Argentine Foreign Information Bulletin reproduced on December 25 an article praising Argentina which had originally appeared in the South American Journal in London. This, of course, fitted nicely with the Axis thesis that Britain and the United States are at odds with respect to their Latin American policies. It also seemed to give moral sanction to Castillo's neutrality policy. Unfortunately for Castillo, the British seized upon the occasion to point out that the South American Journal article in no way reflected the official British attitude, and added that it deplored the policy of Argentina in continuing diplomatic relations with "the enemies of humanity." The British note is not likely to have any direct effect on the policies of the Castillo regime, but it should help bring home to the Argentine people the extent to which their government is consciously playing the game according to Axis rules.

✱

"UNCLE ROBERT'S" RADIO CAMPAIGN TO eliminate the word "kindergarten" from American use because it is German in origin is so silly that it is hardly worth mentioning—except that it is said to be winning nation-wide support from "newspapers and individuals in almost every field of endeavor." What's more, a prize for the best substitute is to be awarded at ceremonies to be held on the steps of the Subtreasury in New York. In support of his crusade, Uncle Robert tells the pathetic story of a child who embarrassed her teacher by asking why her brother was fighting the Germans while she had to go to a school named by Germans. Children of pre-school age do not ask such smug questions unless they are overstimulated by grown-up adolescents. So far we have been spared the anti-German hysteria which during the last war denied us the music of Beethoven. We doubt whether Uncle Robert will get very far with his ridiculous campaign, even with children of pre-school age; but at the drop of a hat we'd join a counter-campaign to provide a substitute for radio uncles.

No Unity with Fascists

THERE is no development The Nation would welcome more warmly than the achievement of real unity among Frenchmen, and we agree that all purely personal obstacles to such unity ought to be swept aside. We hope that reports of a forthcoming meeting between Generals de Gaulle and Giraud are well founded, for we cannot doubt that they see eye to eye on the main point—unflinching opposition to the Axis. On the other hand, if they are required to cooperate on the basis of continuance in power of the North African Vichyites, whom every Fighting Frenchman regards as traitors to France, it is difficult to see how any agreement can be reached.

Dangerous as existing divisions are, sham unity would hold even greater perils especially if it were enforced with a club. Yet that is the policy of the State Department if Arthur Krock interprets its mind as accurately as he has often done before. "It is believed by some officials here," Mr. Krock wrote in the New York Times of January 3 under a Washington date line, "that the United States and Great Britain may be obliged to warn the anti-Axis French leaders that, unless they can settle their differences over procedure and achieve unity in military effort, it may become necessary for the United Nations to break the chain of French sovereignty with a formal military occupation of North Africa and West Africa, thus stimulating a post-war native irredentist movement and clouding the legal claims of France to this vast area."

The theory underlying this threat is that Darlan derived his powers from a legitimate source of authority—the Vichy government—and that the Imperial Council has legally inherited them. So long as this properly constituted authority is maintained, no question of the rightfulness of French claims to its African territories can be raised. If, however, the argument runs, this authority lapses and the United States is forced to set up a military government in North and West Africa, then, under the terms of the Atlantic Charter, the native inhabitants would be in a position to raise the question of self-determination.

As Waverly Root pointed out in a broadcast over WINS on January 3, this method of prodding the French into "unity" is strangely similar in smell to that employed at Munich by Chamberlain and Daladier. Moreover, the legalistic line of approach in Mr. Krock's article raises the questions: (a) Was the Vichy government ever a legitimate one? (b) Even if it was, were its powers properly transferred to Darlan and the Imperial Council? With regard to the second of these questions, a dispatch from North Africa in the New York Times of December 31 reports that "as long ago as November 24 the three presidents of the Councils General of Constantine, Algiers, and Morocco . . . wrote to Admiral Darlan asserting that his government had no legal basis. They maintained that under the French Constitution of 1875 only a meeting of the three Councils General could provide the necessary legal authority. Admiral Darlan did not reply." Are we to have the same contempt for the laws of the democratic French Republic to whose restoration we are pledged?

If final decisions on the form the provisional civil government of North Africa should take are really being left to General Eisenhower, he is being loaded with a burden no commander in the field should be asked to assume. The solution that is found for the problem will have a significance for a far wider area—for all the French colonies and, indeed, for all other countries where Quislings may in future seek safety in American arms. Matters of this nature are the common concern of all the United Nations, and there ought to be an inter-allied council of the kind Mr. Willkie has advocated, to which they could be referred. Otherwise they will tend to be settled on terms of immediate military expediency, and while dividends may be earned on this basis in the short run, the end is likely to prove moral and political bankruptcy.

In a dispatch to the World-Telegram of January 4, Ernie Pyle, an excellent reporter who has never been given to taking a political line, suggests that even the short-term merits of our appeasement policy in North Africa are dubious.

We have left in office [he writes] most of the small fry officials put there by the Germans before we came. We are permitting fascist societies to continue to exist. Actual sniping has been stopped, but there is still sabotage. The loyal French see this and wonder what manner of people we are. They are used to force and expect us to use it against the common enemy, which includes the French fascists. Our enemies see it, laugh, and call us soft. . . . There are an astonishing number of Axis sympathizers among the French in North Africa. Not a majority of course but more than you would imagine. This in itself is a great puzzle to me.

What is an even greater puzzle to me is that anyone in our government should be willing to trust such people and should condemn General de Gaulle as stiff-necked because he is not equally willing to do so.

Investigate Dies!

A MODERN Rip Van Winkle would gather from the latest report of the Dies committee that we were allied with the Axis against the Soviet Union. Most of the committee's emphasis, as usual, is on the supposed menace to our institutions from the left. Fourteen and a half pages of the new report are devoted to "subversive" organizations and individuals. The division of space among them is significant. Eleven pages are given to alleged Communists and leftists, two pages to the Japanese, one page to "the Axis front," and a half-page to anti-Semitism. In the committee's weird scale of values, anti-Semitism, favorite Axis device for creating disunity, gets no more space than the Union for Democratic Action and a good deal less attention. All the committee can report on anti-Semitism is that it's dangerous—a conclusion reached at executive sessions held last January. The committee puts its finger on no anti-Semites, makes no recommendations. The membership lists and mailing lists of anti-Semitic organizations are not subpoenaed; no effort is made to purge them from government pay rolls. That treatment is reserved for anti-fascists of many varieties, all lumped together as "Communist."

The inability of the Dies committee to get up much enthusiasm about investigating fascists is made even clearer in the minority report of Representative Jerry Voorhis, the first to be filed since the committee was organized. Mr. Voorhis protests that the committee's chief function ought surely to be to help the American people identify the propaganda and propagandists of "enemy nations." Instead, the report has a single page of vague generalities and stale material dealing with the "Axis front." "It is true," Congressman Voorhis says, "that within the past couple of months considerable work has been done, at the request of the chairman, by myself and members of the committee staff on a report on organizations and individuals carrying on propaganda and other activities favorable to the Axis cause and the Axis philosophy of government. That report has not been approved by the committee, and there appears to be some doubt even that it will be approved." According to Voorhis, material on Axis activities in this country has been in the committee's files "for months, and such a report should have been issued long ago."

It is not strange to learn that Dies handles his own committee in dictatorial fashion. Congressman Voorhis complains that much of the material issued by the committee on alleged Communist affiliations "deals not with matters upon which there was any action whatsoever, but only individual action taken by the chairman." While Dies smears Attorney General Biddle, Voorhis points out that the 1,124 "Communists" supposedly on the government pay roll are merely persons found on the mailing lists of certain supposed "Communist-front" organizations, one of them a cooperative bookshop. Being on a mailing list does not constitute membership, and in some cases, according to Voorhis, people were on these mailing lists without their knowledge, let alone their permission.

Voorhis declares that he is not surprised that the Department of Justice found no evidence of "subversive" activity on the part of any but a very small fraction of the people listed. Some of these errors might have been avoided if there had been full discussion of the report by Dies with his committee members. But according to Voorhis no meeting of the committee was ever held to discuss the report. It was presented by Dies on a "take-it-or-leave-it" basis. Dies has no desire to avoid the slanderous "errors" that crop up constantly in his reports. He is out to discredit liberals, not to fight the Axis. How much longer are we going to allow his truly subversive activities to continue?

Mr. Babbitt Explains

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

AMERICANS aren't narrow-minded. In peace times you won't find anybody more ready to admit that foreigners are perfectly O.K. Why, Americans like foreigners in Europe and Mexico and such places. They don't talk our language and their money doesn't do you much good, but when you're in those countries you take it like you do the scenery—it's just something different. Americans maybe joke about Europe being full of foreigners, but they don't mean anything by it. We all had to come from somewhere, didn't we?

But what's getting a lot of Americans pretty sick and tired these days is the way foreigners want to mix in our war. Remember some guy said somewhere this was going to be the American Century? Sure it is. But that's not all. The way I figure it, if we're going to do the fighting and feed the whole world afterward, it's got to be an American war, too. That makes sense, doesn't it? Come to think about it, the President couldn't do much better for that name he was looking for: the American War. Anything wrong with that?

Well, to go back to the foreigners. More and more a lot of Americans are beginning to see that if this war is going to be fought right and won right and the American Century is going to get off on the right foot, we'll have to do it our way. Take North Africa. Fact is, we have taken it, haven't we? Or the better part of it. We made a deal with that Frenchman Darlan to let him help run things there in Africa in return for him telling the French soldiers to lay off our men; and we told General Giraud to go ahead and build up an army to fight alongside our army. We do all that and what happens? A lot of other Frenchmen start crabbing about this Darlan having sold out to Hitler and one thing and another. Well, so what? He sold out to us last, didn't he?

Next thing one of these other Frenchmen puts Darlan on the spot. Polishes him off. That shows you, doesn't it? Those foreigners don't know law and order when they see it. Not that it queers the game any. It would take more than a few feuding Frenchmen to stop our boys. But it shows you, anyhow.

The other day I was discussing this business with a fellow—some kind of crank, a red maybe. Darlan was a bag egg, he said, and got about what was coming to him. We shouldn't of ever made a deal with him in the first place, he said. I looked at him. Listen, I said, whose war is this, anyhow? Are we going to stop to look up a guy's references when it's a question of Americans fighting a war? And anyhow, who says he's a bad egg? Some other Frenchman like this De Gaulle that wants his job. The fellow argued with me. He said the English don't like Darlan either, and anyhow he was playing along with Hitler up till we landed, so all the French people in France think he's a traitor and wouldn't of liked to see us landing there in France with Darlan in charge under us. They'd think, he said, they might get a Vichy government out of it all, and what would be the use of fighting for that.

Listen, guy, I said, when he got finished, you must of been talking to some foreigner. You know what I think? I think these French people and parties better keep out of this. Are we supposed to ask permission of all the politicians in France and England every time we land a few troops some place? The best thing those boys can do is keep their mouths shut if they don't want to come along and help. The fellow wasn't convinced. He said, well it's French territory we're landing on. Don't forget that, he said. I couldn't help laughing. And who's doing the fighting? I asked him. Who's kicking the Nazis in the pants? The Russians, he said, and walked off.

Well, you know, the truth is all these foreigners put together can't do much harm right now. They've been stepped on and they're going to stay stepped on till we shove the Nazis out of their countries. They may get sore if we use one crowd or cold-shoulder another, but, as I always say, what can they do about it? What I sometimes get thinking about, though, is after the war, and I tell you that's the time these headaches will really come home to roost. There's a lot of talk around about restoring freedom and this and that, and I'm for it, naturally. Nobody wants Hitler parked all over Europe. This time we're going to finish the job and finish it good. But when they tell you these countries can run themselves after the war, you can know without arguing that there's nothing doing. And not only Germany. The way I see it they're all in this together. And when our army gets in there, it'll be up to us to establish law and order and some ideas of how to run the place or we'll only have the job to do over again. We tried to pull out last time, and you see what happened.

I got a Czech friend, at least he's American but he came from over there, and sometimes I think he doesn't know how happy he ought to be that he's out of that mess. Of course he's in the army and so he'll be in it again somewhere, I suppose, but at least he's a U.S. citizen wherever he is. But anyhow I said to him one time. Listen, buddy, some day you may be marching into your old country to help kick those so-and-sos out of there. That's what I live for, he said to me. And then, I said, you boys will stay in there and keep things quiet until we get a decent government set up and have the country running right. It will be something for those people to get a square meal again, hey? Czecho-Slovakia's got a government, my friend said. Sure, I said, right under Hitler's heel. No, he said, in London. And say, do you know, I'd clean forgotten about that. The Czech government-in-exile, he said, was our ally, and it might be that they could run their own country after they got the Nazis out. That's what he said.

But take it from me, if we're going to feed those babies over there and put them back on their feet, they'll have to swallow a little American law and order along with good American chow. They'll have it our way or not at all. I guess that's reasonable. We aren't chasing Hitler out just so a lot of home-town politicians can stir up trouble. If they don't like Darlan or any other one we pick to help us keep things quiet while we feed them and do the fighting, let them write to the papers about it. If there are any papers. But I guess they better just figure that politics and revolutions are out while our boys are doing their stuff.

These days there's just two kinds of foreigners: nuisances and foreigners that do what we tell them. As far as I can figure, this fellow Darlan was one of the second kind, so he looked O. K. to me. The other kind, the ones that kick or try to get us mixed up in their political fights, well I guess we'll know how to deal with them. So far our State Department hasn't let them get in its hair. They may even learn something about American law and order before we finish with them. We didn't ask for this war, but now we're in it we're going to run it our own way, and the quicker a lot of people get used to the idea the less trouble they'll get into.

Did Hull and Welles Tell the Truth?

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 4

THE State Department is on the defensive in the Bolivian affair. Two weeks ago The Nation's Washington letter reported that the American ambassador to Bolivia had sought to prevent the enactment of a new labor code in that country. This code guarantees to Bolivian workers rights as standard as collective bargaining and as elementary as regular payment of wages. Last week this report from Bolivia was twice denied by the State Department, once by Secretary Hull at a press conference and a second time by Under Secretary Welles in a letter publicly rebuking Ernesto Galarza, Mexican-born chief of the Division of Labor and Social Information of the Pan-American Union. It was Galarza who, in a letter to Welles printed for the first time in this week's issue of The Nation, called the attention of the State Department to the activities of our ambassador. For his courage in defending the workers of Bolivia, Galarza is slated to pay with his job unless American labor and progressives bring pressure to bear in his behalf at the White House and the Pan-American Union. Not the least important aspect of this affair is that it shows how hazardous is the attempt to inject New Deal ideas into the actual conduct of our diplomacy.

How much are the denials of Hull and Welles worth? Not much. I have obtained a detailed paraphrase of the five-page cable sent the State Department on November 30 by our ambassador, Pierre de Lagarde Boal, from La Paz. I also have the text of the pertinent paragraphs in the reply which Secretary Hull sent him on December 2. These fully support Galarza's charges. According to the statement Hull issued last week, Boal "did not engage in any acts or utterances which could be construed at all as an attempt to influence the labor plans and programs that were pending in Bolivia. . . ." Boal merely "made inquiry about the effect of the proposed labor code on production costs of the strategic materials that we were securing from Bolivia." But there was "nothing in the inquiry which was not in line with his duty to report all economic facts to his government."

Boal did not simply make an inquiry as to the effect of this code on production costs. He had a long discussion with the President of Bolivia in which he made it clear that the American government was disturbed about the enactment of the code and in which he presented and supported objections raised by the mine-owners. The Bolivian President's attitude, as reported by Boal, was apologetic. The President of Bolivia, according to Boal, expressed the opinion that he could not veto the code without provoking strikes and labor agitation. The President suggested, however, that the code was provisional and that he could suspend the application of clauses most likely—in the opinion of the mine-owners and the American Embassy—to have an adverse effect. It was suggested that the code be vetoed and some of its provisions made effective by decree, but the President pointed out that this would not meet labor's objections. Decrees have a lower status than laws, are more easily evaded, and can be nullified by the Supreme Court. "This labor code," Boal explained in his cable, "is similar to the existing labor decree, which has been broadly disregarded by the large and small miners because its status as a decree made this possible." It is easy to see why the decree is preferred by the mine-owners.

Boal had another suggestion to make. In its contracts for the purchase of materials, the Board of Economic Warfare provides for better wage and working conditions. In one form of contract, it pays the entire additional cost; in another, it pays half the cost. Boal proposed that the purposes of the code be achieved through these labor clauses and that they be used as an excuse either for vetoing the code or suspending some of its provisions. The advantage to the mine-owner of providing for better working conditions in this way is obvious. He is not obliged to maintain the same wages and conditions in all his work, or after the war is over. He can collect most, if not all, of his additional costs from the United States government, and if the United States government is not too strict in its inspection and enforcement of the labor clauses, the mine-owner might also pocket extra charges made presumably for better labor conditions. The paraphrase of the cable does not indicate what comment the President of Bolivia made on this suggestion.

Boal's cable represented some special pleading in Washington as well as La Paz. It reported that the mining operators had informed him that the enactment of the labor code would raise their expenses so much that they would have to ask increased prices from Metals Reserve, RFC subsidiary for stockpile purchases. Boal gave support to this view by saying that the Embassy had examined the code and found that it would increase administrative expenses. This plea for higher prices is interesting in the light of an item I discovered in Pan-American Labor Notes for last October. This Nelson Rockefeller publication revealed that Metals Reserve had already given the Bolivian mine-owners an increase in prices and that when the Bolivian Confederation of Labor heard of the increase "it presented data to the United States Embassy, and asked its help in persuading the mining firms to agree to the increase in the wages of Bolivian miners." The Boal cable of November 30 indicates that they picked a poor place for their appeal.

The Ambassador said in his cable, "Other articles [of the labor code] which appear to create important difficulties are Article 27, which requires operators to sign collective contracts, and Article 31, which prohibits utilizing the services of labor collectors and contractors." He pointed out the inconvenience of Article 53, which would require payment of wages every fifteen days. Boal said this would increase bookkeeping costs! (It would be cheaper to stop paying wages altogether.) He also objected that this article, if enforced, would encourage the miners to quit on pay day. "They are now paid tardily," he explained, "deliberately in order to maintain them on the job and to give them a stake in their next month's pay." A simpler, if less diplomatic, word for this is peonage. Boal ended by declaring it imperative that the United States government make its suggestions promptly, while there was still time, or "we will not be able in the future to protest the enforcement of the law." All this was the clearest kind of intervention in Bolivian affairs on behalf of the mine-owners.

What was the department's answer to this cable? Did it rebuke Boal? Welles said last week that on December 2 the department instructed the Ambassador "to avoid carefully any statements or actions which might be construed as an attempt to influence Bolivian legislation." That is a correct paraphrase of the first sentence of the telegram Hull sent Boal on that date. But the text of the telegram shows that this opening sentence was eyewash. For Hull went on to say:

Secretary Hull

It is, however, considered desirable that you discreetly express to the President or other appropriate authorities your government's hope and confidence that no steps will be taken which might result in the creation of situations which would inhibit the full performance of contracts made in good faith by both parties. You may refer to the fact that agencies of this government have entered into important contracts for the purchase of various strategic materials, particularly tin, tungsten, antimony, and rubber. It is, of course, patent that the uninterrupted flow of these items is essential to the optimum prosecution of the war. It is consequently hoped that no action will be taken which might jeopardize hemispheric security. Discreet reference can be made to Resolution IV of the Rio meeting on the production of strategic materials.

Resolution IV recommended that the countries of the hemisphere "eliminate or minimize administrative formalities and the regulations and restrictions which impede the production and free flow of basic and strategic materials." Hull was suggesting that Boal indicate that enactment of the labor code "might jeopardize hemispheric security." The text of Hull's telegram discredits the State Department's denials.

Rarely do we ordinary mortals get so full a look under the lid of our diplomacy, which remains as secret as the State Department can make it. More is involved in this affair than the welfare of Bolivia's miserably underpaid and tubercular miners: the output of badly needed tin, tungsten, and antimony; the sincerity of our Good Neighbor policy; the extent to which we let Nazi propaganda use the issue of Yanqui imperialism against us. The affair raises an even broader question. If we cannot keep our diplomats in this hemisphere from serving the forces of reaction and exploitation now, how can we hope to defeat the same combination of big business and bureaucracy and build a better world when the war is over?

Slowdown in North Africa

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

RECENT disappointment over the slowing down of the African campaign is as ill founded as was the early conclusion that complete success was a question of a few weeks. Inevitable delays in the establishment of new bases and lines of transportation have held up the offensives in both Tunisia and Libya.

The Germans responded quickly to the initial American landings in Morocco and Algeria by ferrying picked air and technical troops across from Sicily. The resistance offered by the French in Tunisia was nearly as weak as their opposition to the Americans farther west had been, and the invaders encountered no special difficulty in gaining a foothold. The First British Army and its attached American units, with very slight preparation, marched east in an effort to prevent the Germans from consolidating the area under their control. Unfortunately, the attempt was not made with sufficient force or speed to be entirely successful. It did succeed in confining the Germans to a small but strategically vital sector between Bizerte and Tunis and in establishing a loose control over most of the rest of Tunisia. Once the Germans, with their advantage of shorter lines of transport, had won the race to establish air bases in Tunisia, it was easy for them to give Anderson the rough handling reported in early December. Hampered by lack of close air support and by none too safe supply lines, the Allies could do little more than maintain their positions while both sides hurriedly rushed in reinforcements for the major battle ahead.

It is hazardous to make predictions when many important factors are unknown, but in the coming struggle most of the advantages rest with the United Nations. In bringing in fresh troops the Germans are bound to suffer heavier losses from British submarines and long-range bombers than they can inflict on troops approaching by land. And if they are therefore obliged to depend chiefly on air transport, their numbers are seriously cut down. Thus the advantage of their shorter communications is to some extent illusory. Their early air superiority will also be overcome as the Allies build more advanced bases. The Allies have a larger number of planes, and planes and pilots are of higher quality. The advantage of numbers on land is also on our side, and is likely to be emphasized as the Germans continue their retreat in Libya. Such intangibles as leadership, coordination of forces, and the fighting quality of troops cannot be measured accurately and do not obviously favor either side.

It is significant but not surprising that Hitler has abandoned for the time being all attempts to keep any large area in Africa and has concentrated on holding only the Straits of Sicily. His armies no longer threaten the British in the Middle East, but if they can hold their present positions, the Allies will be prevented from using the Mediterranean for transport and thus deprived of one of the main fruits of victory.

But whatever the outcome of the approaching major battle in Tunisia, the African campaign has netted the United Nations important gains. Though the warships at Dakar and Alexandria are not immediately usable, they are a more valuable addition to United Nations strength at sea than the scuttled French fleet at Toulon can be for Hitler. Hastily sunk vessels can often be raised and repaired, but it is a work of months and in Hitler's present situation is probably not worth undertaking. The active aid of at least 200,000 French and colonial troops would be a greater benefit to the Allies, but this is still only a possibility. Finally, the experience gained by the defeated Dunkirk veterans and the green American units has certainly augmented their value.

The counter-moves of Hitler have thus far been annoying but not decisive. After several very favorable months, sinkings in the Atlantic have increased as the convoy needs of the African campaign have deprived other shipping of needed protection. A blow through Spain cannot be ruled out, though Franco's recent expression of sympathy for fascism sounds more like an attempt to pay a political debt to the Axis without cost to himself than a declaration of belligerency. At the other end of the Mediterranean the strengthening of garrisons in Crete and Greece has been reported. If this is true, it is more likely to represent a bracing of southern defenses than a preparation for a new offensive. A German diversion in the eastern Mediterranean would encounter superior sea power and air power, rugged terrain, British land forces, and a comparatively strong Turkish army. Even if Hitler could spare enough troops from the Russian front and garrison duty in Europe for an offensive here, his shortage of air power would be likely to rule it out.

In Libya the British are continuing to show not only superior force but a definite comprehension of some of the war's more expensive lessons. To General Alexander's credit, he did not, after pursuing the Germans to El Agheila, repeat the mistake of the 1941 campaign and attack without a secure base either for retreat or for further advance in case of success. Instead, he waited for air bases and transportation lines to catch up with him. He was then able to carry out a swift flanking movement which was a brilliant repetition of the Blitzkrieg tactics used earlier by the Germans. This movement was conducted over terrain so difficult that, like the India-Burma frontier, it would have been considered militarily unusable had not the Germans and later the Japanese demonstrated that difficult terrain is not in itself impassable. Alexander may now require another delay to consolidate his gains and strengthen his greatly strained supply lines before he can launch his final drive for the rest of Libya. Rommel's supply problem is getting simpler as he retreats, but the repeated defeats and the pounding of his troops from the air may have destroyed their capacity to make a successful stand—always provided his opponents do not make mistakes.

With increasing frequency the question is being asked,

"After North Africa what next?" Assuming a United Nations triumph there—likely but by no means certain—a number of answers are possible. Victory would free for duty elsewhere between 300,000 and 500,000 troops, only a few of which would be needed to provide garrisons. The first step would be to establish clear air superiority over the central Mediterranean, reopening the entire sea to shipping and thus saving a large amount of merchant tonnage. A necessary prelude to further moves, and one now under way, would be the softening up of Italy from the air. As compared to Germany, Italy has few centers of production. These are concentrated in the north and, as recent attacks have shown, are very poorly defended. Because of his growing weakness in the air, Hitler can defend these cities only at the expense of sections of Europe closer to England; yet he cannot afford to neglect them and see much of Italy's war potential eliminated. He must also consider the possible collapse of Italian morale. In sum, Italy would provide an extremely favorable testing ground for the theories of air-power enthusiasts.

But air war is only a preliminary to invasion by ground forces. Sicily and Sardinia are the most obvious places for starting such an offensive; Sicily would be the more valuable as a bridgehead, but it is also the better defended of the two. Crete and, later, Greece, Yugoslavia, and continental Italy are other possible battle grounds. The next large offensive is not likely to be a genuine "second front" but rather, like the North African invasion, a campaign of limited objectives undertaken with the protection of superior sea and air power in a region far from the center of German strength.

Perhaps it is not too early to hazard a guess as to the outlines of the campaign which may finally win the war. Germany, operating on interior lines, can shift forces to meet an attack at any point with less difficulty than its foes can launch the attack. In the First World War it held a similar position with forces much weaker than the enemy's. Today it is hopelessly inferior at sea and slightly weaker in the air, but it still holds a clear-cut advantage on land. As Great Britain and the United States gain first equality and then superiority, their offensives can become bolder and more persistent until at last Germany will be compelled to defend itself in many sectors at once and unable to shift its forces quickly to a new threatened point on the European coast. Then not only a "second" but several fronts may be opened almost simultaneously, and the Germans will find themselves short of troops for new fronts just as they are now weak in planes.

We are as yet far from reaching this decisive stage of the war. But the African offensives have opened up a whole group of possible lines of action and forced a wide dispersal of German strength. They definitely place the initiative in the hands of the United Nations.

Better than Rationing

BY ADOLF F. STURMTHAL

A FEW weeks ago Randolph E. Paul, general counsel of the Treasury, estimated that the "inflationary gap" in 1943 would amount to not less than $40 billion. Total national income would rise to $125 billion, the highest figure in the history of the United States. Taxation for individuals would amount to $15 billion, and the total supply of civilian goods at current prices would be worth about $70 billion. Like America's war against the Axis, the fight against inflation has "just begun."

Mr. Randolph's estimate needs a slight revision, since it is obviously a gross figure. Individual and business savings and various other items may reduce the gap by more than $20 billion. But even so there will be an excess purchasing power of some $15 billion to $20 billion which, if left uncontrolled, will threaten the existing price ceilings.* The situation is even worse than this figure indicates. So far the defense of price stability has been greatly aided by accumulated stores and inventories, but in many lines we have now reached the bottom of the barrel. Civilian consumption will depend more and more upon current production alone. Moreover, the experience of the First World War tends to prove that inflation becomes manifest only after a considerable time lag. It takes some time for a consumer whose money income has suddenly increased to adjust to a new standard of living. He accumulates savings and repays debts incurred during the preceding lean years before he begins to have confidence in the permanence of his increased income. We are probably just now entering the stage in which large amounts of consumers' increased incomes will come into the market and press prices upward.

Little relief can be expected from the supply side. A further expansion of production beyond Mr. Paul's $125 billion is not impossible if additional women are used in production and we have better over-all planning of manpower. But the bulk of any additional effort will undoubtedly go into armaments production and therefore do little to alleviate the pressure on the prices of civilian goods. The simplest way out, it might seem, would be increased taxation; if it were sufficiently heavy to reduce consumers' purchasing power by some $15 billion to $20 billion, the inflationary gap would be closed. But it is improbable that Congress would dare to raise taxation by another 100 per cent, and moreover it is by no means certain that such action would achieve its object, since large parts of the population would draw upon savings and realize assets to avoid a drastic reduction in their standard of living. Without such a reduction, however, our entire policy of rationing and price ceilings is bound to fail.

So far as can be seen from the outside, Washington's present plans are for a combination of tax increases and extended rationing. But this policy, not too successful in the past, is unlikely to be more effective during the coming year. Whatever tax increases can be expected will absorb at the best a fraction of excess purchasing power, and rationing alone will be unable to prevent price increases as long as the consumer retains his excess spending power. Even severe punishment has proved ineffective against the lure of enormous profits to be made out of violation of rationing rules. If rationing alone is left to cope with excess funds in the pockets of consumers, black markets are inevitable, and the retailer will be compelled to set up his own, probably inequitable, schemes for distributing articles not yet rationed.

When technical factors create an extreme scarcity of particular commodities, their rationing is appropriate and will continue to be necessary. We are heading, however, for a period in which all or nearly all commodities will be scarce in relation to augmented consumers' demands. It is the general shortage of labor that is fast becoming the crucial factor of our economic policy. To handle this problem by rationing specific articles will lead to a most objectionable situation. Every new rationing measure will merely cause excess purchasing power to rush toward other not yet rationed items and make for scarcity of substitutes for substitutes. The more we ration, the farther we shall be compelled to extend rationing. The OPA will be engaged in a hopeless race with a torrent of purchasing power looking for new outlets.

Instead of doctoring the symptoms we must attack the evil itself by eliminating so far as possible the excess purchasing power of the consumer. When this is done, specific rationing will take care of the few remaining special shortages, and the administration of these will stay within manageable proportions. The consumer can be permitted to exert his free choice as long as his aggregate spending does not exceed the limits necessary to prevent inflation.

The basic principle of price stabilization is simple. Civilian demand must be curtailed to the point where it corresponds to available supplies at existing prices. The real difficulties begin when we try to implement this principle. Should existing prices be considered unchangeable? After all, we are not interested in preventing changes in relative prices, but only in seeing that the price average does not move upward. In other words, there is no objection to an increase in the price of certain articles, provided others become cheaper. Such relative price changes are, in a capitalist economy, the normal way of adjusting supply to changes in the relative demand for various articles. A policy of immutable price ceilings may develop into a hindrance to production and thus defeat itself.

* Somewhat different figures have been presented by Maxwell S. Stewart for the Public Affairs Committee, but these divergences do not affect the main argument of this article, as Mr. Stewart expects an even larger inflationary gap.

Price control, therefore, must be a subsidiary feature of an anti-inflationary policy; the main feature must be a direct attack upon excess purchasing power. The problem here is to select a mode of attack that will hit spending but not saving. To prevent the use of savings or assets for current consumption is one of the chief difficulties of anti-inflationary measures; the more drastic the measure the greater the difficulty. For political realists the question becomes how far to use taxation and how far to rely upon other methods. Plans that immobilize spending power rather than tax it away will probably meet with greater success than draconian tax laws.

Among the innumerable plans that have been advocated to eliminate excess purchasing power, three main ideas stand out—those of John Maynard Keynes, W. Allen Wallis, and M. Kalecki. The Keynes plan, the oldest of the three, consists of a system of "compulsory savings" or "deferred pay": a fraction of current incomes is retained and "frozen" for the duration, or perhaps somewhat beyond the end of hostilities. Compared with taxation designed to absorb excess purchasing power, this plan has considerable psychological advantages, for the citizen keeps his money although he cannot make use of a part of it. The main opposition to the Keynes plan has come from the trade unions, which have pointed out that the higher income groups, even if a larger proportion of their incomes were frozen, could defeat the purpose of the plan by reducing their normal voluntary savings and possibly spending previously accumulated sums to make up for compulsory savings. Their standard of living would therefore not decline to the degree necessary to avoid inflationary price increases. This is exactly the same danger that is involved in heavy taxation of higher income groups.

Professor Wallis of Stanford University has advocated a steeply progressive spending tax. Under this plan consumers are allocated a basic total-expenditure ration. Expenditures beyond this amount would be subject to a steeply progressive tax. The scheme could be administered in conjunction with the federal income tax, with the taxpayer filing two returns. For the spending tax, he would indicate his total income and his savings during the fiscal year, deduct from the rest the tax-free basic ration, and compute the tax on the balance. Considerable as the administrative difficulties may be, they appear minor compared with those of specific rationing of all commodities.

The Wallis plan should not be mistaken for the general sales tax so ardently advocated by high income groups this year. A general sales tax would tend to be regressive. It would bear most heavily on low income groups, which must spend a large part of their income on consumption goods. Under the Wallis plan the weight of the tax would fall upon that spending which goes beyond the tax-free minimum allocated to the consumer; it would hit the big spenders. Differences in standards of living would be somewhat reduced, though by no means completely leveled off. It is clear that the better the tax fulfils its purpose, which is to curb excess consumption, the smaller would be its yield. Thus it would not replace the income tax but would act as a flexible device to reduce consumption to the level compatible with available consumers' goods.

If this plan were adopted, the consumer would be free to distribute his purchases according to his own desires except in the few cases where absolute scarcity compels specific rationing. Relative price movements would take care of the remaining shortages. If too much meat were demanded, its prices would go up, thus discouraging further meat purchases. This price increase, however, would not represent an inflationary danger since other prices must have correspondingly decreased—the more money consumers spend on meat the less they have left for other articles. The Wallis plan is somewhat similar in this respect to the British meat-rationing system, under which the amount that each person can spend a week on meat is limited; he can spend it, according to his taste, on a small quantity of high-quality meat or on a larger quantity of lower-grade cuts. If too many people prefer quality, the price of first-grade cuts rises and that of inferior cuts drops. This movement of relative prices soon reestablishes a balance between consumption and available supplies.

The main problem of enforcement would be to prevent purchases by a low-tax consumer in behalf of a high-tax consumer, also to prevent barter. Another might be the difficulty of checking on dissaving. But since dissaving will most frequently consist in selling assets, it will usually mean someone else's spending and thus be subject to the tax. Dissaving is therefore less of a problem under the Wallis plan than under others.

The Wallis plan represents a modification of Jerome Weinstein's suggestions, a summary of which was printed in this magazine in the issue of July 11. Mr. Weinstein advocated a progressive tax on spending beyond a minimum. Every consumer would be given a number of coupons to be used in the purchase of certain articles for which demand was likely to exceed supply at existing prices. Further coupons beyond this minimum could be obtained by payment of a progressive tax. Mr. Weinstein's suggestions would be easier to enforce than the Wallis plan, provided the transfer of coupons from a low taxpayer to a high taxpayer could be prevented. If the Weinstein plan were extended to the purchase of all items in retail stores, it would come close to Mr. Kalecki's general-expenditure rationing.

This plan was presented early in 1941 in the Bulletin of the Oxford Institute of Statistics. It would apply to all items bought in retail stores. Services, entertainments, and education would thus be left unrationed—wisely, I believe, for there is hardly an inflationary danger if thirty-five students rather than twelve listen to their professor's lecture, or if half a million more people see a film. Mr. Kalecki suggests the issuance to all consumers of general coupons representing the total expenditure allowed by the government. With a social radicalism that reflects the state of mind of England in 1940, his plan provides for identical expenditure by everyone, thus eliminating all income differences for the duration. All purchases in retail stores except those for books, medicine, newspapers, and magazines would require payment in both money and coupons. Actually, these coupons would represent simply a second kind of money, and every article in a retail store would carry two prices, one in pounds sterling, the other in coupons.

It is more than probable that in this form the plan would be unacceptable in the United States. The protest against the $25,000 limit for salaries is sufficient evidence of this; and I wonder whether such leveling off of income differences could be carried out in England now. But it would be quite possible to combine the Kalecki plan with differentials in the allocation of general-expenditure coupons, differentials which would represent a steeply decreasing proportion of higher incomes. Again additional coupons might be allocated in proportion to the purchase of war bonds. In this form the Kalecki plan might be adjusted to the political and social conditions of this country. It leaves the consumer free to choose what he will buy with the spending power allotted to him and renders unnecessary a cumbersome system of specific rationing of hundreds of items, with all the attendant difficulties of enforcement.

The moment is fast approaching when we shall have to choose between a huge bureaucratic administration of universal shortages and some form of general limitation on expenditure. We should not hesitate to favor the latter. It is futile to ask the OPA to do the job of the Treasury. Rationing must remain an emergency measure to deal with extraordinary scarcities. It cannot replace taxation or restriction on spending.

The Jews of Europe

II. SEVEN WAYS TO HELP THEM NOW

BY PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN

AT THIS stage of the war the Jews face a frightful dilemma. If Hitler wins, all hope will be gone, for he will be in a position to execute his threat to destroy them. But if he is defeated, the outlook also is black, for with each setback the Nazis have perpetrated new pogroms. And with final defeat these ruthless men who know that they may expect no mercy from any people, not even the Germans, will let loose such a reign of terror as the world has never seen. "If the day should ever come," wrote Goebbels recently in his weekly Das Reich, "when we must go, if some day we are compelled to leave the scene of history, we will slam the door so hard that the universe will shake and mankind will stand back in stupefaction." They will, of course, seek to engulf all Jews in this last wave of elemental evil.

And yet there is not a Jew who, facing this horrible possibility, does not support prosecution of the war with all his heart. I have ministered to parents of sons killed in service and have yet to find one who regards the sacrifice as vain. Jews in the underground movements of Poland, France, Yugoslavia, and other countries daily subject themselves and their families to the risk of immediate execution—and resolutely carry on. There is a wisdom in this attitude which has an immediate relevance beyond the conviction that a Nazi victory would destroy both the life of the Jewish people and the values that make life worth living. The principal hope of saving the Jews in Hitler's clutches lies in swift, decisive victory.

Realistically viewed, this is the situation: Inside Germany tension and friction are increasing. Those elements which hope to survive a Nazi overthrow are daily growing in power. The middle classes, long cheated and disillusioned, are asserting their discontent. The Junker generals, who have always despised the Nazis and distrusted their war programs, are growing daily in relative strength and in the esteem of the people. These groups, which have shown no particular love for the Jews but have great affection for their own skins, are beginning to adopt attitudes which may win them some compassion from enemies with victory in sight. The fear of rapidly approaching reprisals may move them to try to exert some moderating influence on Nazi ruthlessness. It has done so already, we are informed. Similarly restive are the leftist workers' groups who believed that the Nazis were socialists and who now feel that they have been sold out. Further, the churches of Germany have emerged from this blood bath with renewed strength. The Nazis have not been able to silence them or to curb their independent leadership. Now that the day of judgment is swiftly nearing, they too can be expected to exercise a restraining influence on the German people. The nearer that day approaches the more outspoken and the more potent will be their influence. Always uncomfortable in the presence of Nazi anti-Semitism, they are now vigorously opposed to it. And the weakening of Nazi prestige through a succession of defeats strengthens their hands and those of other groups that have come to detest Hitler. Uncertain though it be, the best hope for saving the Jews in German territory is the quick overpowering of the Nazis.

It is equally the best hope for Jews in the satellite countries. The Italian people, despite official Fascist anti-Semitism and Nazi propaganda, have remained friendly to the Jews. A Nazi defeat will enable Jews to survive there, whereas victory will lead to their eventual extermination. In Hungary, where anti-Semitism has been directed only against the property and rights of Jews, not against their persons, and in Rumania, where the regime is cowardly and corrupt, the wise, forthright apportionment of rewards and punishment may achieve the desired results. Hungary can be promised a merciful peace if it behaves with humanity toward its minorities; Rumania can be threatened with devastating bombing if it does not cease its murder of innocent civilians. In each instance words will be effective only in the measure that they are supported by effective military action.

Such action is now a reality in French North Africa, which according to the census of 1936 has a Jewish population of 330,000. For the past two years the anti-Jewish laws of Vichy have been applied to these communities, and for the past six months they have lived in dread of Nazi violence. Now the successful invasion of North Africa by the United Nations has lifted that fear, and they are on the way to freedom. A chaplain accompanying these forces writes, "Well, here I am in North Africa. . . . The Jews have suffered the same restrictions as those imposed upon Jews in Vichy France. But of course, now that we are here, that will be done away with—thank God—as they are doing."

There is justified impatience with the slowness with which these restrictions are being lifted, though it appears that the complexities of the situation make a certain amount of delay inevitable. Admiral Darlan's personal attitude on the subject is demonstrated by a letter which it is my privilege to make public for the first time (a copy is in the possession of the World Jewish Congress). Addressed to the Delegate General of the French Government in the Occupied Territories it reveals an opposition to the extremes of Nazi repression combined with an anti-Semitism strong enough in its own right:

Re: Anti-Jewish measures

Reference: Note No. 678 of December 15, 1941, of the Commander-in-Chief of the Military Forces in France

I. In the note mentioned in the reference the Commander-in-Chief of the Military Forces in France demands that a certain number of anti-Jewish measures be taken in the occupied zone, such as obligation to wear distinguishing signs, prohibition to visit public places, with the exception of some localities to be reserved for their particular use, and the establishment of a rigorous curfew.

II. I have the honor to inform you that I do not agree with the suggestions made.

I believe that the various restrictive measures taken up to date against Jews are sufficient to obtain the desired aims, that is, their elimination from public service and leading positions in industrial and commercial activities of the country.

There is no doubt that going beyond this would profoundly shock French public opinion, which would consider these measures a nuisance without actual effect either for the future of the country or the security of the occupying forces. The very excess of these decisions would certainly be detrimental to the desired end and would risk provoking a movement in favor of the Jews considered as martyrs.

(Signed) F. DARLAN

President Roosevelt's declaration of November 17 concerning the arrangements made by General Dwight Eisenhower was unequivocal: "I have asked for the abrogation of all laws and decrees inspired by Nazi governments or Nazi ideologists." In his press conference the President stated specifically that this order referred to anti-Jewish legislation. Shortly afterward General Eisenhower received a delegation of Algerian Jews who requested the abrogation of the anti-Jewish laws. He assured them this would be done. Jews have already been readmitted into the French army, and the numerus clausus has been abolished at the University of Algiers and in lower schools.

There is another level on which the United Nations can help to sustain Jews. Men can survive oppression so long as they can hope. But when hope goes, the will to live goes too. On the level of morale the record of the United Nations has not been good. One of the most effective devices of Nazi propaganda has been the exploitation of the fact that the United Nations are unwilling to accept any substantial number of the Jews whom the Nazis wish to expel. The emptiness of protests against anti-Semitism is made plain when the protesters themselves are unwilling to grant refuge to the victims. The sinking of the Struma with 769 Jewish refugees denied entrance to Palestine and the spectacle of the St. Louis with its load of harried German Jews pleading in vain for admittance to many ports revealed a callousness on the part of Christian peoples which has done irreparable damage to the morale of Jews. That the State Department should have felt obliged in the past to take into account the objections of some Americans even to admitting a number of German Jewish children, and that prominent members of Congress should seize the present occasion, when Jews are at the lowest depths, to announce their opposition to immigration—these are facts that rob Jews of the last straws to which they have been clinging. Where is the humanity of men who cannot even wait until the Nazis are defeated to inform their victims that they may not hope to come here? Where is the Christianity of the men and women—and some of the most articulate opponents of the admission of children were women—who out of prejudice or narrow selfishness obstruct the escape of little boys and girls from the Nazi hell? Do the words of Jesus mean nothing to those professing Christians: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me"? Little Switzerland has put the great nations to shame. Living under the shadow of German might, the Swiss people have been magnificent in their outspoken opposition to anti-Semitism, in their refusal to expel illegal immigrants who have found refuge within their borders, and in accepting nearly 10,000 refugees in the past six months.

The United Nations also can show their genuine concern, and can nourish the hopes of Jews on the edge of the abyss, by the following acts:

1. Announce immediately that the Jews, ■ Jews, will have ■ hearing in the councils of the United Nations. It is the Jewish people that the Nazis have set out to destroy, and it is as ■ people that the Jews should take their place with other peoples on the commissions now being established to prepare for the peace.

2. Grant to Palestinian and stateless Jews the right to fight ■ Jews against the Nazis. Let Jewish regiments be formed in Palestine to join the armies of the Free French and the Free Poles and other peoples in the struggle against the Axis. Apart from its practical effects, this will have ■ therapeutic value in substituting for the present condition of humiliation and helplessness ■ consciousness of participation in the struggle for freedom.

3. Open the doors of Palestine at least to the legal immigration assured by the MacDonald White Paper of 1939. This document, despite Jewish protests, is still the law. It permits an immigration of 75,000 Jews in a five-year period. Thus far, only 38,000 of these certificates have been granted. Let all technical obstructions be removed forthwith ■ that another 37,000 Jews for whom a visa to Palestine is the difference between life and death may be saved without delay. It may well be pointed out in this connection that countries like Turkey, Switzerland, and Spain would be willing to accept large numbers of Jewish refugees on a temporary basis if they could see clearly an eventual outlet for them. But so long as Britain places obstacles in the way of admitting even such numbers to Palestine as the White Paper permits, why should these countries behave differently?

4. Frontiers should be open for transit purposes wherever possible; when necessary, they should be forced open. The plight of the 500 Polish Jewish children now in Teheran, most of them orphans of the war, is a case in point. These were among the 10,000 Polish refugees who made their way finally across Russia into Persia. Now, half-starved and unwanted, they are stranded in Teheran. Strong appeals to the Palestine government and guaranties of their support ultimately evoked 500 immigration visas for the children. But they must cross Iraq to get to Palestine, and Nuri Said Pasha, Prime Minister of Iraq, has refused thus far to grant permission. Here is an instance where a show of strength, not polite appeals, could quickly get results. The British certainly have demonstrated that they know how to get what they really want in Iraq. These desperate situations, where swift bold action alone can save many lives, call for daring imagination. It has been suggested to the British that they transport the children from Teheran to Palestine in bombers. The distance is only 1,050 miles and can be flown in five hours. Why not? The plan has been offered that neutral countries such as Sweden, Portugal, Spain, and Turkey should permit the entry, for ■ temporary stay, of a considerable number of refugees on the understanding that Jews already there be moved at once to the Americas to make room for the newcomers. Why not?

5. The New York Times announced on December 30 that the Mexican government had agreed to give temporary shelter to 5,000 Polish refugees, mostly the wives and children of soldiers now fighting the Nazis. They will be supported with funds supplied by the Polish government, which also guarantees their repatriation after the war. This is almost the identical proposal which Moshe Shertok, head of the political department of the Jewish Agency, has been making to the Allied governments, thus far without visible results. If these governments would guarantee to neutral countries the cost of maintaining escaped Jews during the war or until they could be permanently resettled elsewhere after the war, innumerable Jews would find their way to these lands. Even now, without any guaranties, many thousands of fleeing Jews have crossed the Pyrenees into Spain, the Danube into Hungary, the Dardanelles into Turkey, and the Baltic into Sweden. Their flight has been abetted by sympathetic Christians in Nazi-controlled countries. Their numbers have been limited largely by the unwillingness of other countries to accept escaping Jews. But with guaranties of maintenance and ultimate repatriation a number of countries might be willing to shelter substantial numbers. I do not speak at this point of the degradation of the Jews in this situation, apparently everywhere unwanted permanently. That will be the basis of my third article. Here I speak only of the elementary duty to save life.

6. If the prevention of needless suffering and death is our duty, has not the time come to reconsider the question of feeding starving populations in Europe? There is no evidence that the food sent to Greece has aided the Nazis. This war, it now appears, will be won by the decisive defeat of the Nazi armies, and not through a long process of attrition. If a safeguarded program of feeding, similar to that carried out in Greece, can be extended to millions of men, women, and children—of course not to Jews alone—and especially to those who will be the nucleus of the democratic forces with whom peace some day must be made, is it not worth the risk? If we should discover that this food is being confiscated by the Nazis, we could discontinue it immediately. For the time being, it appears that some direct help is possible. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee is still maintaining some soup kitchens, with the aid of local Jewish communities in Nazi-dominated territory. And Jews in America still receive word that packages of food sent to relatives in Poland in some instances reach their destination.

7. Save the children. Let every technical barrier be set aside, let all red tape be cut, so that these innocent, sorely hurt little boys and girls may be succored. Realism offers some hope here. For though the Nazis can use able-bodied men and women for slave labor, the children are simply so many more mouths to feed. Even the Nazis are reluctant to shoot children in cold blood, and the abhorrence of the civilian Christian population reinforces that reluctance. For the most part this problem resolves itself into utilizing the good offices of neutral powers, obtaining the consent of adjacent countries for transit purposes, providing means of transportation, and procuring immigration visas.

These are very difficult matters, but no stone should be left unturned. The fate of European Jewry in these coming months will be a test of the sincerity of the United Nations.

[This is the second of three articles on the position of European Jewry. The series will be concluded in an early issue with Dr. Bernstein's analysis of long-range solutions to the problem.]

Violence in the Classroom

BY AGNES E. BENEDICT

THE forces of war, combined with the forces of reaction, are placing our schools in imminent danger. Restlessness, turbulence, and emotional instability are increasing among the pupils, as I believe almost any teacher in the country would testify. Juvenile delinquency is rising—in some places alarmingly. And the blame for this situation is being slyly laid at the door of progressive education. Reactionaries are seizing the opportunity to try to root out the few promising experiments in progressive education that have gained a foothold in the American school system.

Liberals have for some time cherished the comfortable illusion that all is well with our schools, that throughout America the progressive movement is everywhere breaking the educational lockstep, that our schools are rapidly being transformed into miniature societies, that the credo of our teachers is becoming "learn by doing," and "learn through play," and "the only real discipline is self-discipline." Nothing is farther from the truth. The sad reality is that progressivism has hardly made a dent on the schools of this country. The illusion that it has is being deliberately fostered by its enemies, who have long waited for just such a chance as the war has brought.

In a recent issue of the New York Journal-American under the front-page banner headline "Links Pupil Rowdysm to Lenin Theory," the principal of a Brooklyn high school held the so-called "activity programs" in the New York elementary schools responsible for the widespread defiance of authority. These programs, he asserted, had originated in Russia but had been discontinued there because so many children took to roving the streets. At about the same time the New York Sun carried statements by the Teachers' Alliance that insubordination, fighting, and insults to teachers had been increasing in the schools for some years, and that they were the result of too lenient discipline. Greater severity in discipline and custodial care for juvenile offenders were recommended. Many teachers advocated a return to corporal punishment. In California the Hearst press has for months been viciously attacking progressive education. It has finally aroused so much hysteria that an outstanding course of study, developed over a period of years, has been thrown out.

The situation reached a climax not long ago in New York City. In November a former student in a New York high school shot and killed a teacher. In December a woman entered a classroom and attacked the teacher on the ground that she had kicked the woman's stepson. The Teachers' Guild of the American Federation of Labor joined with the reactionary Teachers' Alliance in demanding that the police commissioner send officers into the schools.

The emotional instability of our young people today is the direct result of war. The break-up of homes, the migration of families, the lack of proper parental supervision, with fathers and mothers both working, the responsibilities of adult life forced upon unready adolescents—all these have had their effect. But there are other long-time causes which must be considered. Widespread restlessness or rebellion among pupils in war time means that all has not been well with them in time of peace. The two incidents in New York represent an explosion of forces long generating. Behind the current war conditions stand the persistent defects of our social and economic system—low incomes, poor housing, lack of recreational and health facilities, racial inequality. Nor is our educational system entirely blameless. Methods of discipline and methods of teaching based on a wholly unsound educational philosophy have long prevailed.

I do not say that there are no progressive public schools in America. There are, in fact, many such schools. There are even entire school systems, in many parts of the country, which are progressive. Other systems contain some progressive elements, such as the New York activity programs. But the schools of this country as a whole are not progressive. In 1935 the regents of New York authorized an inquiry into the schools of that state. The twelve-volume report which appeared in 1938 and 1939 revealed an authoritarian approach, regimented pupils, a formal and bookish curriculum. While the secondary schools were selected for study, the recommendations made showed clearly that the curricula and teaching methods of the elementary schools had the same basic defects. The schools of New York State are certainly not markedly behind those of the country as a whole. Nor is it likely that they have radically changed since 1939. Can they have relaxed their disciplinary methods to such an extent that rebellion could be fostered by "coddling" and "spoiling"? The activity program which the Journal-American holds responsible for rowdiness was recommended, not formally adopted, in the New York schools for the year 1942-43. How much harm can it have done in that time?

If the turbulence of pupils today is to be attributed to our educational system, the old methods of formal education must take the blame, for they have been generally in force throughout the country. In our typical urban schools the children march in long, silent lines through the halls. They sit like ramrods at their desks and speak only when they have permission. In smaller communities there may be less formality, but the atmosphere is the same. The children are handled in the aggregate: all do the same things at the same time, advance at the same rate of speed, for the program is geared to that hypothetical "average," not to Mary, or Tom, or Elizabeth. They learn, for the most part, through memorizing and reciting facts from a textbook. They are viewed largely as so many minds—little account is taken of their bodies and emotions. In general our schools lack the guidance services—vocational counsel, recreation and health services—which make possible the early recognition and treatment of emotional disorders, the correlation of school and home life, the conservation of physical and mental health. The parents of the children are not welcome inside the schools. Lip-service is paid to the parents' rights through such measures as "visitors' days," but parents and teachers have little opportunity to become acquainted.

Corporal punishment has been generally abolished in our schools. But though you see no whips in the classroom, you hear voices that carry the sting of a whip. Teachers forbidden by law to strike a child can and do tell other children to strike him. They tell parents to do so. They paste adhesive tape across a child's mouth. They use terrifying threats. Only recently I heard of teachers who have been saying that if the children are good "the bombs won't come." I am not for a moment charging that these are regular practices in our formal schools. I know that many teachers using formal methods are sympathetic and understanding. But such disciplinary devices are far more prevalent than is supposed.

Unfortunately the effect of the war is to increase still further the tendency to formalism and regimentation in education. Already the shortage of teachers in America has been conservatively estimated at 30,000 by the National Education Association. Attendance at teachers' colleges has fallen off more than 20 per cent. The thinning ranks of teachers are being filled by persons of poor caliber ill-equipped for their jobs, and the issuance of temporary licenses is lowering further the standards of the profession. Where public income is reduced, there is a tendency to cut school budgets, since "necessary" services have to be bought at prevailing prices, but school personnel and equipment can be sacrificed. Thus the pressure for economy reinforces the tendency toward reaction. The Committee on Instructional Affairs appointed by the New York Board of Education recently to study conditions in "problem areas" states that "it is impossible to educate individual children in classes too large for individual attention, where predelinquency goes unrecognized and uncorrected." The committee pleads for the repair of older buildings, "in order that basic physical comforts [lavatories, lunch rooms, and the like] . . . be provided," and for a maximum class registration in the elementary schools of thirty-five, in the junior high schools of twenty-five. It also asks that teachers rated as "unsatisfactory" elsewhere shall not be transferred to problem areas and that no references be made to children's court records in class.

If anyone wishes honestly to judge the effects of progressive methods of discipline on public-school children, it is possible to do so. Public School 33 in New York City, one of the two "all-day neighborhood schools" conducted by a farsighted Board of Education with the advice and assistance of the Public Education Association, has been changing to progressive methods of teaching and discipline for six and a half years. It has introduced many of the so-called "frills." Its discipline is what the educational reactionaries describe as "coddling" and "spoiling." The children move about the halls independently and purposefully; they speak freely and naturally to one another.

The school, an old barracks-like building, is located on the lower West Side in New York, where incomes are barely adequate. Most of the children are of foreign-born parents living in furnished rooms or tenement flats. After five years of the new methods petty vandalism in the neighborhood has been greatly reduced, and only one-fourth of the offenders are attendants at the school. Unlawful entry of school buildings is always a problem in New York, but only two incidents of this kind have occurred since the project started, and both times entry was made by a child who had been referred for psychiatric treatment. The principal reports that the children show much greater responsibility, pride in the school, and interest in the neighborhood, and that the war has not developed the slightest need to return to the old formal methods of discipline.

Last year the Board of Education extended the plan to a second school, P. S. 194 in Harlem. With the percentage of juvenile delinquency five times as great among Negro as among white children, the Board of Education would hardly have chosen to introduce progressive methods into a school in this section of the city if it were not pretty sure what their effect would be. The president of the Board of Education recently recommended this plan for every school in New York.

It is in the example of such schools as these that our hope lies in this emergency. Yet at the very moment when the use of progressive methods should be extended, the movement has to fight for its very life. The situation of our schools would be sufficiently serious without these attacks by reactionary forces; education has always been a casualty of war. Had the last war continued one more year, the schools of the country would have been completely demoralized. Unless the liberals of the country rouse themselves from their comfortable dream and come to the support of our free schools, history will surely repeat itself, and with more serious consequences.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Power on the Farm

PERHAPS I am a congenital optimist, but I find it difficult to share fully the gloom which oozes from some of my friends as they listen to the fee-fi-fo-fumming of Republicans smacking their lips at the thought of 1944. I am ready enough to admit that present prospects for the election of another New Deal Administration are far from bright; I am only too well aware that the opportunities for mischief of a reactionary government are enormous. And I am perfectly willing to concede that the portrait gallery of prospective Republican champions is a depressing spectacle.

In spite of Shakespeare, however, the good that men do often does live after them, and I find some comfort in the historically established fact that, in a democracy, well-established reforms usually outlive their progenitors. The New Dealers may be thrust into the ash can for a time, but much of the New Deal is likely to prove too robust to be destroyed. Indeed, however fiercely the Republicans condemn the Roosevelt Administration as a whole, I am willing to place a modest bet that in time they will anxiously claim paternity of many of its parts. The reluctance of their new chairman, Herman Spangler, in his first press interview to progress from a broad indictment of the New Deal to a bill of particulars suggests an understandable hesitation to condemn measures which have brought concrete benefits to broad sections of the electorate.

One New Deal creation which seems certain to survive any Republican victory despite its unpopularity with many of the G. O. P.'s financial backers is the Rural Electrification Administration. By bringing light and power to the farm it has wrought a revolution that will not be easily undone, and in its six and a half years of operation it has put down organizational roots of an extremely tenacious kind. Its job has been to encourage, finance, and provide technical aid for the electrification of the countryside, and its method has been, essentially, the stimulation of mutual help. Some of its funds have gone to private companies and to public bodies, but the great bulk of its loans have been to cooperatives created by the would-be consumers of electricity.

These cooperatives operate on the sound Rochdale principle of one vote to each member and elect democratically their boards of trustees, who are responsible for management subject to certain controls by the REA so long as any loans are outstanding. Such loans are made on a twenty-five-year amortization plan which recognizes that a certain period must generally elapse before an electric utility attains operating stability. For the first thirty months, therefore, interest is allowed to accumulate, while from the thirty-first to the forty-eighth month interest on accumulated interest and principle is payable. Thereafter payments on a gradually rising scale leave the enterprise free of debt at the end of twenty-five years. How soundly the work has been financed and how faithfully the cooperatives have carried out their obligations is shown by the fact that on September 9 last delinquencies were less than 1 per cent of accounts due, while payments in advance were thirty-four times as great as payments in arrears.

The REA has succeeded in adding to national wealth and productive capacity in a field where private enterprise had conspicuously fallen down. Few power companies were willing to pioneer in rural electrification, and when they did, their demands for guaranties and their high rates discouraged farmers from making the maximum use of power. The REA has proceeded on the principle that low rates create their own market and rapidly cut costs by building up the load. When electricity comes to the farm, the farmer at first perhaps only uses it for lighting and a few simple appliances, but he soon learns the economies that can be achieved by putting power to work. His wife realizes even more quickly how much her back-breaking burdens can be lightened by such things as cookers and washing-machines.

There is an almost endless variety of uses for electricity around a farm; milking, pumping, silage chopping, wood sawing, refrigeration for dairy products are only a few of the more obvious. Electric brooders have proved very popular both because of their efficiency and because of their low operating costs and safety as compared with oil-burning types. Many small farmers make their own at very low cost on the basis of plans distributed through the REA cooperatives. And by making possible quantity sales, the spread of electricity into rural areas has brought down the prices of factory-made brooders, as well as those of many other kinds of apparatus.

Rural electrification is playing an important part in maintaining war production. The electrified farm is a labor-saving farm, and many farmers who, before the power-lines reached them, might have been forced to abandon or curtail operations because of inability to get hired help, can now carry on. An example of the way in which electric cooperatives are assisting the war effort comes from Portales County, Texas, where this year acreage in peanuts—of vital importance owing to the shortage of imported vegetable oils—has been more than tripled because power was made available to work the irrigation pumps.

Similar stories of the blessings of power might be drawn from any of the forty-six states and two territories in which the REA is now operating. For the time being, shortage of materials is slowing extensions, but a renewal of progress is certain after the war no matter what Administration rules in Washington. None of the votes gained by Republicans in the farm states in November were won by crabbing about the REA.

[With this issue Everybody's Business will be suspended for a time in order to free Mr. Hutchison for some special assignments, the first of which will be a series of articles on the Associated Press.]

In the Wind

YUGOSLAV GROUPS and trade unions in certain communities with heavy Slav populations threaten to demonstrate if "The Chetniks," a motion picture glorifying the career of General Draja Mihailovich, is released. . . . Communists threaten to demonstrate if "Tennessee Johnson," a picture sympathetic to the Reconstruction President, Andrew Johnson, is released. . . . Anti-Communists threaten to protest if the forthcoming picture "Mission to Moscow" casts Leon Trotsky as a Nazi agent.

THE FUEL SHORTAGE may be the means of creating more good-will among the nation's churches. In many communities churches are being closed and "union services" for Catholics, Protestants, and Jews are being held. Another method of conservation being used in several places is to close schools during January and February with the intention of keeping them open in July and August.

IN THE WEST INDIES, where oil is used not only as a direct source of light and heat but also to generate electricity, the shortage has forced the people back to a method of illumination not used since the early days of colonization. They are making tapers out of coconut meat.

THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, which recently withheld from the mails several issues of the Militant, a Trotskyist paper, has released for distribution two of the issues which had been barred.

FROM AN ARTICLE on the editorial page of the Sacramento (California) Bee: "The Chinese language has only about 15,000 words, but it is very difficult to master because none of them are in English."

INTERVIEWED on the occasion of his departure from the executive mansion, Eugene Talmadge, ex-governor of Georgia, was asked by an Atlanta Journal reporter whether his views on the Negro question had changed. "I firmly believe that racial discrimination is a divine thing," he said.

A CAMPAIGN to win support for the intricate plan for post-war organization devised by Ely Culbertson, the bridge expert, will begin early this year. Max Eastman, who has called the plan "next on the agenda after victory," will explain it in the March issue of Reader's Digest.

[The $5 prize for the best item received in December goes to P. McC. of Atlanta, Georgia, for his story about the petition to forbid public display of portraits of Abraham Lincoln in South Carolina, published December 5.]

The Generals and Hitler

BY HANS ERNEST FRIED

BECAUSE the First World War came to an end with the overthrow of the German Kaiser, there is an inclination on both sides in this war to relate the events of 1918 to the present situation. In 1918 Germany lost the war and the Allies "lost the peace." Therefore each side now thinks that to forestall a repetition of its own failure it must avoid "the mistakes of 1918."

For the German war party the fear of repeating the experience of 1918 has long been an obsession. Hitler and his aides have always been acutely aware of the possibility of revolution, and have devoted all their energy and ingenuity to making it impossible. They have gone to extremes of precaution which the Kaiser never thought of. Where the Kaiser curtailed, Hitler has abolished; where the Kaiser arrested, Hitler has killed. Hitlerism arose from the assumption that the Kaiser's militarism failed because it was not efficient enough. Consequently the driving idea of Hitler and his aides has always been that it is better to be ten thousand per cent too ruthless than one-half of one per cent too mild.

And yet the historical fact is that it was not a popular uprising which compelled the Kaiser to give up. Not only was there no technical preparation for revolution; there was among the workers a conscious disinclination to active resistance. For decades German labor had been taught by its books and lecturers and newspapers that only when socialism ceased to spin fantasies about the "future state" could it be said to have come of age. It is true that the country, under protracted strain, had given certain indications that it was approaching the limits of endurance. But in spite of much bitterness about the conduct of the war as well as its hardships, there was in no sense a temper of revolt. It was not revolution in the rear but the decision of the High Command that ended the war.

In the late summer of 1918 General Ludendorff, then virtual military dictator, simply walked out. Before the war was over, and long before the civilian population grasped what was going on, the military command decided to quit. The official records of the negotiations carried on behind closed doors between the High Command, the Kaiser, and the civilian Cabinet, are most revealing. Contrary to the legend carefully fostered by the German militarists after the war, it was the civilians who were flabbergasted at the idea of surrendering; and it was the extreme pan-German militarist wing of the war machine, led by Ludendorff and seconded by von Hindenburg, that wanted to end the war at once and that very bluntly forced the Kaiser and the civilian government to sue for an armistice.

Drawing by A. Hoffmeister

History has proved that from the point of view of their own interest this was the shrewdest move they could possibly have made. Everything turned out well for the military rulers of Germany, the secret plotters of the Second World War. In November, 1918, when they realized there was no longer a chance of winning the war militarily, they sacrificed the Kaiser and the monarchical form of government in order to win the war politically. The Kaiser gone, they marched home almost in triumph. The republic licked the boots of the generals, and the Allied Command dined with them even before the war was formally ended. Of the military restrictions imposed upon Germany, none prohibited the continued service of these men as leaders of the new German army.

We come, then, to the question whether a repetition of 1918 is possible, and if so who would benefit by it.

Hitler, of course, is well aware of what actually led to the Kaiser's abdication, and he does not intend to be put in the Kaiser's boots. To this end he has been careful from the start to keep his military leaders from becoming too popular. In the First World War, when William II gave the command to Ludendorff and Hindenburg, an unprecedented propaganda campaign presented them to the people. Their pictures, wreathed in oak leaves, were to be seen everywhere—far more than the likeness of the Kaiser himself. As a result, the power of the two generals came to exceed that of their nominal superior. For instance, the mere threat, in July, 1917, that they would resign if Bethmann-Hollweg were not removed, compelled the head of the German state to dismiss his Chancellor. So when Hitler shifts his generals and fields marshals at will, it is a sign of strength, not of weakness. When he removes officers who have enjoyed victory, it is evidence of his undisputed power.

But let us suppose the generals were to turn against Hitler. Would this mark them as anti-Nazi?

Now, as in 1918, the German generals want an all-powerful state; they want what Herbert Spencer, back in the 1880's, called a "militant community organized for constant war." In a little book entitled "The World's Fear of War," General Horst von Metzsch, a professor at the Berlin Hochschule für Politik, puts it this way: It is impossible in the long run to have side by side a civilian government and a strong authoritarian army; Hitler solved this by creating a "military leader state"; he made it possible for the army leaders to concentrate on external warfare because the party takes care of domestic opposition; all aspects of German life must be militarized; and, most important of all, neither the party alone nor the army alone can bring about "Germany's resurrection"—the fulfilment of the new task, the conquest of Europe.

The German generals know that it requires hundreds of thousands of overseers and tens of thousands of censors and propagandists and teachers and spies and secret agents, and scores of concentration camps, and "labor fronts" with millions of members to have a "militant community organized for constant war." They realize, in other words, that an old-fashioned conservative party would never have a chance of forcing the German people into the desired mold. Nor would such a party have any chance of recruiting mass support. Any post-Hitler regime would have to have the backing either of the anti-Nazis or of the well-organized Nazis. A conservative generals' regime—if there still exist conservative generals—would have neither. Anti-Nazis would not voluntarily support it, and the entrenched Nazis would never collaborate with it except under orders from Hitler or his recognized successor.

The fact is that an officers' regime would be compelled to rely on the support of the Nazis. It would not only need the Nazi personnel; it would also—and this is what means most to the rest of the world—be dependent on Nazi ideas and Nazi political techniques. The network, the organization to keep the masses in subjection, would have to be continued. And this mixture of terrorism, dynamism, and demagoguery, by any other name, is still National Socialism.

The attempt to oust Hitler might be made. The generals might try it if they had reason to believe that by so doing they could make peace with the United Nations and set themselves up as masters of post-war Germany. And as long as they believe that the Allied leaders consider this a war between generals—a war fought by honorable military men—they will continue in their arrogant conviction that the United Nations might at some strategic moment be induced to forget their "irregularities" and accept them as equals.

Even then it is doubtful whether the generals could get rid of Hitler without his being party to the conspiracy. But obviously a plot to eliminate Hitler in which Hitler connived would amount to no more than a Nazi plot to win a negotiated peace. It would be unmasked and rejected by the United Nations. On the other hand, should the German generals actually try to overthrow Hitler in the contest to see who would be first on the draw, the chances are overwhelming that they would be shot down by the Gestapo. The situation, then, is clear. Neither a conspiracy with Hitler nor a conspiracy against him seems to offer any hope of bringing the war to quicker end. As was the case from the beginning, there is only one way out: to fight Nazi Germany until the generals and Hitler go down together.

To the Czechs

[Voskovec and Werich, the most popular Czech comedians, are now broadcasting regularly to their native country under the auspices of the Office of War Information. We reproduce one of their five-minute skits and an excerpt from a longer script which invokes once more the Good Soldier Schweik in the service of a free Czechoslovakia. The cartoon, by A. Hoffmeister, the Czech artist already well known to Nation readers, is his Christmas card for 1942 to Voskovec and Werich, to whom he has been sending cartoon greetings since 1927. (Emanuel Moravec is a Czech Quisling.)]

Moravec and the St. Bernard

VOSKOVEC: Now look at that. I haven't even noticed that you have a dog. A cute little dog, too. Sort of very horizontal. It's a dachshund, isn't it?

WERICH: It's a Gestapo dog, a new breed.

V.: I see . . . a wicked little dog . . . a cute little monster. . . . What's his name?

W.: Himmler. A silly name, isn't it? But you can't forget it.

V.: Come here, you little rascal. Does he bite?

W.: He does. He's mad. A police dog.

V.: A police dog? This?

W.: A secret police dog, of course. You can't tell him from an ordinary dog. See the idea?

V.: Now tell me. I thought you had a greyhound, didn't you?

W.: Well—yes and no. He used to be a St. Bernard, but he lost weight.

V.: You don't have him any more?

W.: No. He's been sent to a concentration camp.

V.: Now what do you think of that? A dog in a concentration camp! What happened?

W.: Well, it's a long story. I live in the same house with Emanuel Moravec.

V.: Wait a minute. Moravec—that name sounds familiar to me.

W.: It sounds familiar to lots of people, and they're not likely to forget it, either.

V.: I know. Former colonel and democrat—now civilian and traitor. But how did your dog get into the concentration camp and what's Moravec got to do with it?

W.: Well, as I told you, Moravec and I live in the same house. And the dog, too.

V.: Well?

W.: Well, there are German guys coming to see Moravec all the time.

V.: Of course. They've got to bring him all those decrees about closing Czech schools and universities so he can sign them. And bring him money. I know about Moravec. But tell me about your dog.

W.: Well, the dog is out in the lobby. Moravec comes by. "Heil Hitler!" he says. The dog just stands there.

V.: Good for the dog! I like him.

W.: Moravec doesn't. He starts yelling. Everybody's got to salute the Führer, nobody can have any special privileges. To make a long story short, Moravec decides to teach my dog how to raise his right front leg.

V.: Did he succeed?

W.: He did. But one night Moravec comes home with some German guys. The dog's on the sidewalk. Moravec and the Germans raise their arms and shout "Heil Hitler!" The dog gets confused and instead of raising the right front leg he raises the left hind leg. Now he's in a concentration camp.

V.: How about Moravec? Did he get rusty?

W.: Not quite, but he's marked, anyway. Forever.

Schweik Serves the Germans

WERICH: Get this, Herr Goebbels, there are only two kinds of service in the Czech military tradition; and the enemy is scared of both. As long as a Czech soldier is fighting for what he believes in he's a patriot. But if he's forced to he turns into a Schweik; and then, Herr Goebbels, he is a very dangerous private. The Good Soldier Schweik wrecked the empire. You watch him. Even if he strips off his uniform, Schweik will remain Schweik. He doesn't sleep. Isn't that so, Schweik?

Schweik (Voskovec): By your leave, sir, I am always at my battle station, and I always try to do my best to satisfy the gentlemen from the Gestapo.

Werich: Does that mean, Mr. Schweik, you serve the Germans faithfully?

Schweik: By your leave, sir, absolutely. As that bugler from Pilsen used to say . . . when he started to sing Ave Maria at three in the morning to the tune of He Was Standing at the Cannon he kept arguing that he had a perfect ear. Orders is orders, sir. Like the other day in the labor camp, the officers explained to us that there is a shortage of iron in the Reich and that we must take very good care to protect all iron instruments from dampness, so they won't rust. I thought immediately of all those rails in the station yard. They are so very much exposed to the weather. They might get rusty, too. So we took all that synthetic fat out of the freight cars that were ready to go to the front and we spread the fat real thick over the rails. Well, the next day there was trouble, because the locomotives slipped on that stuff and they couldn't get going at all. And before it wore off two munition trains got delayed a day or so and the commander of the station, a certain Captain Schlaghammer from Dresden, had a fit of epileptics. But anyhow the main thing is that the rails didn't get rusty and the Führer's orders were carried out.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

DR. GOEBBELS is not rated so great a genius as he was some months ago. Success, it has been discovered, is not so much dependent on propaganda as propaganda is on success. It is easy to keep up morale when everything is going well, but words have little effect when things are going badly; propaganda cannot make headway against the contrary winds of fact. Goebbels, when he was so much feared and admired, was 90 per cent the appendage of the great Nazi upswing and only 10 per cent its creator. The supposedly unlimited power of pure propaganda is limited after all.

In one field, that of short-wave broadcasts directed to the world outside the Fortress of Europe, the propaganda office practically admits that any effort is useless under present circumstances. Apparently it does not even try to find a new line to fit the new situation. It goes on talking big just as formerly. With no regard for the facts, it asserts crudely, "The Russians are having no success whatever"; or, in spite of the rout of the Afrika Korps, "Rommel has a big surprise up his sleeve."

But internal propaganda is another matter. Evidently a fundamental change in the material given out for home consumption has been decided on. The complacency, the insolent pride, the announcements of glorious events just ahead have been given up. Instead, the public is urged to be patient, to persevere to the end. Of course it is always told that the war will ultimately be won by Germany. But favorable predictions for the immediate future are carefully avoided.

The kernel of truth in the news given out is wrapped round with many of the old trimmings. Emphasis is laid on the difficulties, dissensions, treacheries, and crimes of Germany's enemies. In England, Germans were told, there were no such extra allotments of food as they had for the Christmas season. The English had Darlan murdered because he was a tool of the Americans, with whom they are in bitter competition for colonies. The American soldiers rap the Moslem women for sport.

It was in connection with the Russian campaign that the change in domestic propaganda first became evident. As late as December 7, 1942, on a radio round-up of the three foreign ministers of the Axis, Ribbentrop declared that Russia had ceased to be a danger. Then, on December 13, the highbrow Frankfurter Zeitung suddenly offered a new version of events, suggesting rather tentatively that the war had become one of "attrition." The war against Russia, continued that paper—and this was indeed sensational—"will not be decided in a short time but will drag on for years."

On the next day General Dittmar, the chief military commentator, explained that the struggle against the Soviets was like the struggle of Heracles against the Hydra. "No sooner is one head chopped off than two appear." "The number of tanks the Russians still have," he said, "is simply inconceivable, and of course they have fabulous masses of men." He found the only favorable elements in the situation to be (1) the incomparably greater material losses suffered by the Russians, and (2) the resultant greater damage to their morale. Sometime, because Germany has the advantage in these respects, the contest is bound to be decided in its favor. "Every engagement," he went on, "is, according to Clausewitz, the bloody and destructive equalizing of opposing forces, both physical and moral. Whoever has the most physical and moral force left at the end is the victor. The great battle in the east will be fought out according to that law." And when will the end come? No answer.

Goebbels himself in his Christmas talk followed the new line. "Fate is subjecting us to a prolonged test to see whether we are called to lead." In his weekly article of the same date he wrote: "We are obliged to pay dearly for the sins and omissions of our fathers and grandfathers. Because they indulged in the luxury of an extremely individualistic national life, we face tasks almost beyond man's strength. We are spared nothing. History is without mercy, and the nation must make up for past shortcomings by hard work and sacrificial battles."

Such is the course forced on German propaganda by the unfavorable winds of defeat. In order not to be given the lie by the facts when they are inevitably revealed, it has to paint a somber picture of the future. Gloom about the war now is a necessity if the promise of a happy ending is to be believed.

A Letter to Mr. Welles

MR. SUMNER WELLES
UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Sir: The declaration of a state of siege in the Republic of Bolivia last week brings to a head a fundamental issue with regard to the policy of the State Department toward the people of Latin America which can no longer be ignored. I address this letter to you because the formulation and application of this policy has been mainly in your hands during the past eight years.

The state of siege declared in Bolivia, in my judgment, is the result of popular resentment against certain practices of corporations, especially in the mining industry, toward the workers. It is also the result of mass discontent amounting almost to despair because of rapidly increasing living costs and the scarcity of basic foods.

You are aware that for many years the Bolivian workers have sought relief from a condition which kept 90 per cent or more of the people of that country in a state of chronic misery and economic degradation by seeking the enactment of a labor code which would open legal avenues for the improvement of these conditions. The code, drafted three years ago, was being revised by the Bolivian Congress and was to have been enacted by December 31 of this year. The nature of this code is indicated by the fact that through its operation the Bolivian workers hoped to obtain the payment of wages on time, the right of collective bargaining, minimum wages, and the strengthening of mediation and arbitration.

I have received information to the effect that while the new labor code was under discussion, the American ambassador to Bolivia, Mr. Pierre Boal, communicated to the President of Bolivia, General Peñaranda, the views of the American embassy with regard to the legislation then pending before Congress.

In these conversations Ambassador Boal did not venture to give instructions to President Peñaranda, but it is clear that the Ambassador's observations were intended to diminish the prospects of passage of the labor code. The Ambassador clearly agreed with the position of the large mine operators that the new code would impose disagreeable administrative expenses on the companies; that it was desirable not to pay earned wages on time in order to compel the workers to remain on the job; that the enactment of the code would compel the companies to demand higher prices from the United States government for tin and other essential materials; that collective bargaining would be detrimental rather than helpful to production. . . .

I believe that democracy and production must go up or down together. The contrary is the thesis of totalitarianism. For this reason I am prepared to state that the attitude and point of view represented by Ambassador Boal will lead to a further decline of production in Bolivia and in other parts of Latin America as well. The physical reserves of the Latin American workers, especially in the vital industries, are already so low that the systematic opposition to better housing, higher wages, adequate medical attention, efficient training, collective bargaining, and proper representation before public administrative bodies will drive the workers to adopt every form of active and passive resistance. In my judgment, they will be justified in so doing.

The war-production program in Latin America involves fundamental questions of physical well-being, of morale, of effective use of all the human and technical resources of the Americas. I submit that the policy of Ambassador Boal has made it impossible to attack some of these questions through the use of agencies of the United States and through the use of means and methods in behalf of the common welfare which many Latin American governments have already tested and applied. It is also my deeply held conviction that as long as the present policy continues, the economic development of Latin America through industrialization wherever possible, the stabilization of Latin American economy through agricultural progress, and other measures which have been amply discussed in inter-American conferences will not be attained.

I feel impelled to dissent vigorously from the present policy of this government in Bolivia for another reason. Statements have been made in the press and on the radio in this country to the effect that the strikes in Bolivia are caused by Nazi agents. What is the result, if we allow this interpretation to gain currency among the American people? First, attention will be diverted from the real causes of unrest, namely, bad housing, lack of food, disease, and poverty. Second, it will be easier to label all dissenters and the genuine representatives of popular sentiment as "Nazis." I assert that the Nazi agents are not causing something which has its roots in basic economic maladjustment. The Nazis are merely taking clever advantage of something which they hope to use to discredit democracy.

This is attained by the simple process of contrasting the public statements of President Roosevelt and Vice-President Wallace with the everyday, practical, and immediate effects of American policy in the Latin American countries. There has been established in the minds of the Latin American workers an identity, a cause-and-effect relationship, between the suppression of the right of free speech, the negation of the right of collective bargaining, the dispossession of small farmers, the freezing of wages, the soaring cost of living and the courageous doctrine of the Four Freedoms enunciated by the President of the United States, reiterated by the Vice-President, and stressed by you in several important speeches in recent months. . . .

In consequence, . . . I, an American citizen of Mexican birth; one who is profoundly disturbed by the increasing dislocation of production of essential materials attributable directly to antiquated and narrow interests; one who believes that the Chief Executive of this government, the Congress of the United States, and the people of this country are entitled to decide whether continental solidarity must be bought at the price being currently paid by the workers of Bolivia—for these reasons I protest formally against the conduct of Ambassador Boal.

This protest is filed with you by me on my personal and individual responsibility. My position as chief of the Division of Labor and Social Information of the Pan-American Union does not in any way imply that my statement reflects any opinion except my own.

ERNESTO GALARZA

Washington, D. C., December 21, 1942

BOOKS and the ARTS

ALICE JAMES

BY DIANA TRILLING

THE novelist Henry James stood at the elbow of Henry James the brother as he wrote of Alice's Journal: "It puts before me what I was tremendously conscious of in her lifetime—that the extraordinary intensity of her will and personality really would have made the equal, the reciprocal life of a 'well' person—in the usual world—almost impossible for her—so that her disastrous, her tragic health was in a manner the only solution for her of the practical problem of life—as it suppressed the element of equality, reciprocity, etc."

It is 1894. After twenty-five years of invalidism, the last torturing seven of them spent in England, the sister of Henry James has died in 1892. Now Henry has received her diary—it is her only literary monument—and he is writing to William. He goes on: "Inevitably she simplified too much, shut up in her sickroom, exercised her wondrous vigor of judgment on too small a scrap of what really surrounded her." He is specifically referring to Alice's attacks upon England, which are likely to reinforce William's too ardent Americanism. And as always when Henry James addresses this older brother, his remarks have the curious trace of defensiveness that William James seemed to provoke in the rest of the family. But beyond defense either of England or of himself, these are the comments of the novelist whom William could chide for not calling a spade a spade but who dares to face the fullest implications of what the down-right William refers to only as the "over-vehemence" of their sister's Journal. Henry James expresses himself with his usual reticence, but there is no question that in a few sentences he has uncovered the root connection between Alice James's wonderful "free" intellect and the invalidism of which her Journal is the tragic record.

Of course any of the James family could bring an abundant personal experience to the understanding of nervous suffering. In the history of literature there never was a family of so much shared misery and talent as the Jameses; by what miracle of accident or strength the two oldest brothers were able to rescue themselves as they did still remains an investigation for psychiatry. The elder Henry James battled throughout his own life an abnormal depression of spirits that reproduced itself in all five of his children—perhaps most nakedly in poor Bob, victim of such unrelieved alternations of despair and exaltation, perhaps most poignantly in Alice, who even in disease had the sad creativity to add to the family pattern of melancholy a whole fierce range of private symptoms. It is interesting to conjecture why the family strain appears so variously in the five children, and a clue is suggested in the mere order of their birth. It was a tightly knit family and a family lavish with affection, but in autobiography and letter each of the children testifies to the hieratical struggle of early life—Henry trying to catch up with William; Wilky and Bob struggling against having both William and Henry ahead of them; Alice, the beloved baby sister, blinded by the whole shining galaxy of superior wisdom and experience. Alice, youngest of five, surrendered when she was only nineteen. She had been ailing before, but in young womanhood ill health took over completely, not to release her until she died at the age of forty-four.

The anxieties and frightening compulsions of childhood developed into hysteria. Through the years a body that was never very robust slowly capitulated to psychic stress. Shortly before Alice James's death, when a cancer was discovered—the "longed-for palpable disease"—the medical authority of the period (for what it is worth) could list the following appalling diagnosis: nervous hyperaesthesia, spinal neurosis (paralysis of the legs), and rheumatic gout of the stomach (psychic tension, one gathers, hitting unbearably at the pit of the stomach). She was prey, as well, to constant dizziness and fainting, and an acute form of migraine. In the correspondence of the Jameses, while the various anguishes of the four brothers sound like a motif of doom through the unfolding histories of their careers, Alice's ill health is the whole and only music of her existence.

But if invalidism was to be her career, Alice James could still illuminate it with her share of the family genius. Part of her heritage went into being an exemplary patient, but as time passed, and especially when Alice at last found herself largely bedridden, any hope of cure a deception she could not permit herself, it was no longer sufficient that only this aspect of her talent be recognized, or that her intellectual gifts be known only to the few people who visited her sickroom. Three years before her death, humbly and therapeutically, she began a Journal: "It may bring relief as an outlet to that geyser of emotions, sensations, speculations, and reflections which perpetually ferments within my poor old carcass for its sins."

But then slowly, unfailingly, in the way of such documents, the Journal comes to reveal that it has more than a therapeutic purpose. We begin to see that in this random record of suffering and of intellectual triumph over suffering the daughter of Henry James, Sr., and the sister of William and Henry is making her last desperate stand for her earned place in the family hierarchy of distinction. Alice's tongue is quite too elaborately in her cheek as she addresses the "unborn generations"; self-mockery is always her saving public face, and she is careful to laugh at herself first before the world can laugh at her—proof enough that it is the world and not "relief" with which she is primarily concerned. Or there is the day when she sees herself for the first time in print: it is a letter to the papers, and indeed a poor sample of her powers of observation and expression, but in the excitement of "publication" Alice writes in her Journal: "How fortunate for the male babes that I am physically so debile!" Obviously, she is being ironic; but she is also making a confession. Her debility is an escape, however complicated, from the need to rival brothers of unrivaled brilliance.

And no doubt this is what vaguely disturbs William, the psychologist brother, in the "over-vehement" of Alice's Journal. But Henry, the novelist brother, takes full in the face, as he himself would say, all the implications of Alice's intensity of statement, penetrating his sister's ruthless intelligence to discover the privilege of the invalid who does not have to live "the reciprocal life of the 'well' person." The Journal, record of a life from which the elements of equality and reciprocity have so long been absent, too often has the tone of a compendium of afterthoughts, reminding us of those wonderful retorts we can all think up after the occasion, its reflections too perfected, its answers—by just the distance between the world and the sickroom—too devastating.

In this connection it is interesting to compare Alice James's diary with the poetry of Emily Dickinson. Here was another woman who lived her life emotionally and physically apart from the world. She was a woman whom Alice very much admired, and, in fact, Alice's prose is sometimes reminiscent of Emily Dickinson's verse. For example, there is her description of a decayed gentlewoman: "She had the mental range of an ant—not a dear little burnished, definite ant who could tell you if he only would, with such precision, all the architectural tragedies of his career; but a blurred, vague ant, if such a thing is possible." But significantly, the only time Alice quotes Emily Dickinson in her Journal it is to repeat the lines, "How dreary to be somebody; How public, like a frog," a notation that is immediately followed by this entry: "Dr. Tuckey asked me the other day whether I had written for the press, I vehemently disclaimed the imputation. How sad it is that the purely innocuous should always be supposed to have the trail of the family serpent upon them." Both women, that is, protested the life of public recognition too violently, just as each of them inevitably demanded, in what she sent into the world, too much attention for herself; but it is a common failing among women of talent. The essential difference between them is that in Emily Dickinson the writer was transcendent over the woman, and her poetry was the distillation of her first and best private emotions, whereas Alice James spent her first and best energies in ill health.

Alice's method, then, was not the method of poetry, but neither was it the method of fiction, and with the widest latitude of sympathy we have only to compare the Journal with Henry James's Prefaces to see how little she shared with Henry what we can call the novelistic view of life. There is a common family store of perception, imagination, and, above all, gifts of style. Alice, too, can write that wonderful educated James prose with its incandescent accuracy and then its sudden flights of homeliness; and when she complains to her diary that "H. is always saying this, but it jumped at my eye from the first, and is therefore an original, if not unique, utterance," she has to add: "H., by the way, has embodied in his pages many jewels fallen from my lips, which he steals in the most unblushing way, saying, simply, that he knew they had been said by the family, so it did not matter." But unlike Henry, it is Alice James's critical rather than her creative faculties that are fed by her small scraps of experience. Humor she has aplenty, and a developed sense of anecdote. She is enormously interested in people—but for what they stand for, not for what they are. In fact, in her feeling that life is something to be ordered and coped with, rather than explored, Alice is closer to William James than she is to Henry, just as William is closer to their father than Henry is to either of them. William writes: "Every good experience ought to be interpreted in practice," and Alice writes: "Every hour I live, I become an intenser devotee to common sense!" Or in another passage she speaks of the "congenital faith . . . whose only ritual is daily conduct." This is of course in the paternal line, variously carried on by all the children of the elder James except Henry, who never seems to need these working principles. And of the five children, it is Alice who most faithfully preserves the family tradition.

The English years, the period in which Alice is writing her Journal, are the years of Henry's abortive attempts to be a playwright. He is very willing to act as his sister's emissary in the great world, but he is as busy as he is devoted; and he always has a way of saving himself from too much family entanglement. Alice is necessarily limited to books and newspapers for a large part of her intellectual stimulus, and it is only natural for her to dip back into memory for the shaping instruments of judgment. She recalls a childhood in which the most ordinary meal-time conversation scaled the brilliant heights, and she can be forgiven her bitterness at being reduced, in the end, to the company of a nurse. The Journal is remarkably free of simple reminiscence, but more clearly than anything in the writing of either William or Henry it echoes the formative years.

The Journal is therefore much concerned with politics, and after her death Henry, in the same letter to William from which I have already quoted, will comment on the career his sister might have had as a "feminine 'political force,'" if her health had permitted. And her political tone is the tone of the old Newport-Cambridge-Concord days when Henry James, Sr., finally found around Boston the group with whom his own moral fervor could find community. The pages of Alice James's Journal ring with sharp comment on the English political scene: the diary might be subtitled the Journal of a Passionate Democrat and might have been written back in the Civil War days, when Wilky and Bob had gone off to fight and at home their family sought comfort from anxiety in its passion for freedom and equality. Not that the Journal is "old-fashioned," read even today. Alice's politics have the note of modern formulation; or rather, they have the note of the formulation, say, of the 1930's, before social and political thinking in the democracies bowed to the exigencies of the present war. Henry James speaks of his sister's radicalism as "her most distinguishing feature almost—which, in her, was absolutely direct and original." Direct it certainly was; and it was surely original in at least this sense: that she was not likely to be learning her opinions from the few people who called on her during this period in which she was keeping her Journal. But for the rest, so was all the thinking of Henry James, Sr., whether on politics or religion (another subject on which his daughter equals him in passion), absolutely direct and original. And if, for insight into the emotion of radicalism, the Journal can hardly stand comparison with Henry James's own "proletarian" novel, "The Princess Casamassima,"

Henry is still right in proclaiming the force and accuracy with which his sister both drew and applied her political conclusions.

She writes of May Day, for example: "Could anything exhibit more beautifully the solidarity of the race than that, by combining to walk through the streets on the same day, these starvelings should make emperors, kings, presidents, and millionaires tremble the world over?" The thought, on another day, of the workmen of London gathering in all their strength to protest the eight-hours question gives her "an illogical feminine satisfaction that all my seven per cents and six per cents . . . have melted into fours; I don't feel as if four per cent is quite so base!" The bedridden invalid for whom the returns in a local election can bring on a terrible nervous attack still can wish to have seen "a few of the faces of these masters of the world in whose hands our material future lies, who can say how immediately."

The comparisons between England and America are all to the credit of America—and how this must have troubled Henry and pleased William!—but it is not because Alice James is chauvinistic about the country of her birth. America is simply a good touchstone, just as Ireland, country of her grandparents' birth, is an even better one. "She was really an Irishwoman," Henry will comment, "transplanted, transfigured—yet none the less fundamentally national." On the subject of Home Rule her emotions are violent, and she finds "the behavior of the Unionist and Tory is simply the bête carried to its supreme expression." She is appalled by the "all-pervasive sense of pharisaism in the British constitution of things," and sums up the British picture in a memorable page of invective:

A boneless church, broadening itself out, up to date, . . . the docility with which the classes enslave themselves to respectability or non-respectability, as the 'good form' of the present may be; the 'sense of their betters' in the masses; the passivity with which the workman allows himself to be patted and legislated out of all independence; then the profound irreconcilable in the bone and sinew conviction that outlying regions are their preserves, for they alone of the human races massacre savages out of pure virtue.

But none of the Jameses is anything if not fair, and she appends to this last: "It would ill become Americans to reflect upon the treatment of aboriginal races; but I never heard it suggested that our hideous dealing with the Indians was brotherly love masquerading under the disguise of pure 'cussedness.'"

At least on the political scene one can be glad for a person like Alice James that she lived when she did, not fifty years later. But on the medical scene she lived too soon—although long enough to know that she had lived too soon. And perhaps nothing is more heart-breaking than the moment so close to the end of her life when Alice James learns that there is a new psychotherapy, hypnosis, and writes in her Journal: "And now the vast field of therapeutic possibilities is opened up to me, just at the moment when I have passed far beyond the workings of their beneficent laws, . . . this retarded discovery made the more complete and 'this-worldly' by the agent taking to itself the form and direction which, from experience, I learned twenty-four years ago was the some-day-to-be-revealed secret—of suspending for the time from his duties the individual watchdog, worn out with his ceaseless vigil to maintain the sanity of the modern complicated mechanism." Not only has she learned, that is, that there is hypnosis, but the scientific sanction of hypnosis permits her to voice her own twenty-four-year-old intuition of the still unknown therapy of psychoanalysis. By this time, however, she has a cancer and is dying; soon enough the watchdog will cease his vigil over her sanity, and Alice James, trained never to admit defeat in her lifetime, will be very glad that at last the struggle is over.

For indeed, like a dark thread, her anticipation of this final release has always woven itself through even the brightest pages of her Journal, and it is only when we recall the attitude of the entire James family to death, or, for that matter, the attitude toward death of so many of her father's old Concord group, that Alice appears less personally morbid. We remember, for instance, the strange letters of congratulation that each of the Jameses wrote to whatever member of the family was currently approaching his end, and the strange parallels to these letters in the Emerson family correspondence. Or we recall old Miss Emerson riding around Concord dressed in her shroud, so that if death should meet her suddenly, she herself would meet death properly attired. Alice had learned well, from her New England childhood, the lessons of political, social, and religious freedom, but she had also learned well the lesson of living life in anticipation of its final solution. And surely she can be understood for wanting her own life, that had been so burdensome, to be finally done with.

Cities in the Post-War World

CAN OUR CITIES SURVIVE? AN ABC OF URBAN PROBLEMS, THEIR ANALYSIS, THEIR SOLUTIONS. By José Luis Sert. Harvard University Press. $5.

THIS consolidated report of the C. I. A. M. (International Congress of Modern Architecture) was not inspired by the present crisis. But events are giving it a unique urgency. The reconstruction of cities will be one of our essential tasks tomorrow. First of all we shall have to repair destruction on a scale which staggers belief. Then the awakened social sense will not, we trust, tolerate very long either the slum or the hideousness of the "model tenement." Finally, in the perilous shifting from a war to a peace economy, rehousing may provide a cushion, a much-needed directed activity.

Directed it must be: we know the results of anarchic building booms, like the catastrophic suburban developments in Paris after the last war. We need technical preparations, actual blueprints; we need most of all psychological preparation, the will to rebuild intelligently. San Francisco is afflicted with a preposterous plan: straight streets scaling steep hills with no regard for contours. The central part of the city was destroyed in 1906. But ignoring Burnham's indications, dynamic, hard-headed business men, with the perfect business blend of hustle and shortsightedness, started rebuilding San Francisco at once, on the old lines; and they are still crowding over it. Such a disaster must not happen again.

January 9, 1943

This book, with its lavish illustrations, provides the needed knowledge and the needed incentive. It exposes existing evils, and, for new developments at any rate, it propounds guiding principles which are hardly controvertible. I hope, for instance, that Le Corbusier will have his way with Nemours, the little Algerian port which has been picked out as the outlet of eastern Morocco. He starts with, practically, a clean slate; and his conception is lucid and bold.

The weakness of the work, and of the whole radical school which dominates the C. I. A. M., lies in the treatment of historical centers. They solve the difficulty by denying it. And it will not be denied.

Be sure that I am not defending pastiche architecture. I am all for "functionalism," provided that, if you define a church as "a prayer factory," you fully understand the "function" you are attempting to serve. Be sure also that I am not advocating the "urbanism" that seeks first of all the grandiose or the picturesque. The first aim of the city is to provide healthy living conditions, not magnificent façades or quaint vistas. But historical aesthetic values do exist. I spent my childhood in dull rooms, in a dull street, but within a quarter-mile of the Louvre, and I was better off than if I had been brought up in a faultless garden city. I do not excuse the dullness; but it could be corrected without changing the character of the urban scene. Light and air we must have at all cost; it may be a little more wasteful to secure them with a six-story limit than with a twelve-story limit. But in most European cities the "waste" would be justified. The Voisin Plan, which proposed to raze the whole of central Paris and erect on the site a series of 700-foot towers, only proved that its author wore heavy and very close-fitting blinkers.

More important still in the transformation of old cities is the social-economic problem. The book points in the right direction: it does not point insistently enough. Our large cities—and this is true of America as well as of Europe—cannot be made fit to live in on the basis of the individual profit motive. Garden suburbs can be created by intelligent capitalists, and pay their way. Occasionally the large-scale reclamation of a blighted area may prove self-liquidating. But, as a rule, so many private interests are so strongly entrenched that reconstruction on an adequate scale is impossible.

Paris, for instance, was planning at last to destroy a certain number of îlots insalubres, or unsanitary areas, including the infamous rue la Huchette. Although it was the merest palliative, the cost was appalling. Paris could not afford to turn its old fortifications into a park belt (M. Sert, by the way, gives a wholly inaccurate account of that operation). It had to adopt the compromise Dausset plan—selling for building lots the site of the fortification proper, and with the proceeds transforming the wider "Military Zone" into gardens. Le Corbusier is right, and central Paris ought to be demolished, not a block but a whole quartier at a time; but under the present system such an enterprise is unthinkable. Reduced to one-tenth it would still bankrupt the city.

This is the real question raised by the title: Can our cities survive? Nothing short of a revolution will avail. We are waging war without examining whether it is "financially sound"; we know well enough that it is not. We must do the right thing by the cities before we measure the cost. Can we afford it? We can, if we have men and materials for the work: the tokens used for bookkeeping purposes are of minor importance. Be assured the operation will be self-liquidating. If our bookkeepers are adaptable enough, we shall liquidate the accounts; if not, we shall liquidate the accountants. If you are not ready to face these consequences, it means squarely that you place the profit motive above the life and happiness of your fellow-men. In a country which claims to be democratic and Christian, this alternative can hardly be considered.

ALBERT GUÉARD

The Poet's Progress

PERSON, PLACE, AND THING. By Karl Jay Shapiro.
Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.

KARL JAY SHAPIRO is a poet of remarkable and original gifts. Yet it is possible that the topicality of his poetry—one of its strongest virtues—and the fact that the poet is now a soldier in Australia may distract attention from the literary feat performed in this book. The feat is that of taking the style of Auden and transforming it with an American subject matter, by writing of drugstores, lunch wagons, a conscription camp, a midnight show, a Buick, and many other things equally indigenous.

Most poets begin by taking fire from other poets, and most poets end, sadly enough, in self-imitation. But between the time when the poet is an echoing novice and the time when he is a self-infatuated and tired master, there occurs, if the poet has genuine gifts, a period during which the borrowed or imitated style is gradually altered into something new and strange—as the glove is shaped by the hand, day by day—through the constant pressure of the poet's own and unique subject matter, his own experience. Even in the best poets this wonderful process tends to be broken and uneven. But it proceeds powerfully and serenely in Mr. Shapiro's verse, and the interesting thing is that one can see so clearly several stages of it in this book.

The manner, and especially the diction of Shapiro's writing, is all from Auden. Words such as luck, love, the hostile parents, wound, failure and usages like the personification of places and things occur throughout the book. A stanza such as this one:

What do you care, dear total stranger,
For the successful failure of my safest danger,
My pig in the poke or dog in the manger?
The dead cry life and stagger up the hill;

* * *

But is there still the incorrigible city where
The well enjoy their poverty and the young
Worship the gutter? Is Wednesday still alive
And Tuesday wanting terribly to sin?

or, for a briefer example, a line like "It baffles the foreigner like an idiom" is purely Audenesque in style. And yet the matter is wholly Shapiro's, and the latter line is the beginning of a fine poem about a drugstore, in which Shapiro manages to make baseball scores, coca-cola bottles, lipstick, and lending-library books relevant and operative parts of the poem. In most of the other young American poets who have been subjected to Auden's strong influence, Auden's perceptions as well as his words are echoed; in the course of a poem we can sometimes even see Auden's perceptions displacing those native to the poet. In Shapiro, on the contrary, the borrowed style is an aid and not an obstacle; the result is a growing originality.

The source of this originality is undoubtedly Shapiro's inexhaustible power of observation. He can see a great deal, he has taken a long, cunning, and intelligent look at the important objects of modern life, and he has serious and important feelings about what he sees. Yet this strength has, like most virtues, its danger and its weakness. There is not only a sameness of tone and feeling in a good many of these poems but also a tendency to rely too much on dramatic observation, organized merely as a succession of items, to solve all problems and provide the insight which the subject requires.

Observation is not insight, although there is little insight without observation. And this makes one thing of the title of Shapiro's book, which I take to be the declaration of a worthy and humble joy in observation, and of Shapiro's prose Note on Poetry in last year's "Five Young American Poets," where the title was first used and where Shapiro expressed a strange hatred of "the dictatorship of criticism" and of general ideas. The statement reached its peak in the extraordinary phrase, "America, the word that is the chief enemy of modern poetry." This is not only in direct contradiction to the excellent use of abstractions, like America and Europe, in Shapiro's verse, but it suggests a serious immaturity in Shapiro's attitude as a poet. The poet can no more afford to hate abstractions or general ideas than he can afford to hate the concrete and the particular. He needs them both, and he needs them at the same time if his verse is to be both vivid and significant. Perhaps Shapiro hates abstractions like America for the same reason that the hero of "A Farewell to Arms" hated words like Democracy, Justice, Liberty, Self-Sacrifice, and Courage; they have been used by politicians and by bad poets. But Democracy, Justice, Self-Sacrifice, Courage, Europe, and America are the abstract and often abused terms for the deep-seated values which inspire Shapiro, at his best, both to rage and to sympathy.

Other abstractions, often capitalized by Shapiro, are necessary parts of Shapiro's best poems. But more than that, it is the abstraction, America, and another concrete abstraction—if the reader will forgive me this true paradox—Europe, which are just as responsible for Shapiro's being in Australia as the troopship which took him there.

The chief enemy of modern poetry is not a word, certainly not a word like America, or a use of abstract terms. Two of the many enemies of all poetry are the inability to see things clearly and exactly, a defect from which Shapiro will never suffer, and, on the other hand, the inability to generalize and make universal one's experience by means of abstractions. The poet has to keep many activities going, but one activity as necessary as any other is to keep thinking all the time. It is not easy, but it is necessary. Fortunately Mr. Shapiro's practice is far superior to his theory, so that what we have here is a book which everyone interested in modern poetry ought to read.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ

A Native of Civilization

THE TURNING POINT. By Klaus Mann. L. B. Fischer. $3.

TO TELL the story of a German who wanted to be a European, of a European who wanted to be a citizen of the world," thus in part Klaus Mann defines his purpose in writing his autobiography. He has succeeded admirably, and has also told the story of a man who could be civilized without becoming decadent.

If he had known from his birth in 1906 that he had only about twenty-five years to participate in European culture before its eclipse, he could hardly have made better use of his time. He had a good start, to be sure; in his first eighteen years, spent in the home of Thomas Mann in Munich, he imbibed more of that culture than most men get in twice that number. But Klaus's distinguished paternity was a heavy cross for him to bear, and Thomas Mann's patriarchal tolerance must have been infuriating to a member of that younger generation for whom rebellion was a religion. At eighteen the son fled the paternal roof to make a literary career for himself in Berlin, using an assumed name as his declaration of independence. Sometimes his sister Erika shared his adventures, notably on a madcap trip to America, which somehow expanded into a trip around the world. Her field was the theater and his was literature, but now and then they trespassed upon each other's provinces.

Mann started his career in Berlin, but before long Europe was his home and Paris its hearth. The middle portion of his book is really an essay on the intellectual life of his time, with the events of his personal life noted briefly here and there among great chunks of loosely knit but stimulating discourse. He talks about the ideas which were taking shape in his books or in those of his friends, who included half the distinguished young writers of France, Germany, England, and Austria, and some older men, notably André Gide, whom Mann considered the foremost living writer in Europe. He gives a whole chapter to the gods of his intellectual Olympus: Plato, Nietzsche, Whitman, and Novalis are the four titans, surrounded by concentric circles of lesser gods. Of political events and social currents he takes little note in this period (up to 1930); they were simply not part of his world. This era of happy isolation ends approximately two-thirds of the way through the book, when he quotes from his own writing (1931): "I don't want to understand this kind of radicalism [National Socialism]: I disapprove of it." Such blindness seems truly shocking in this seasoned writer, this much-traveled man of the world, at home in the cultured circles of half a dozen capitals; here the reader must remind himself again that the Klaus Mann who wrote these lofty words was not yet twenty-five!

Mann has a rare faculty for conveying atmosphere, and he uses it most effectively in describing the sense of impending doom which spread over Central Europe just before its civilization finally succumbed. The Mann tribe, now fully alive to the peril, raised their voices in protest against the rising tide of Nazi popularity. It seems to me that Klaus Mann might well have termed this period the turning-point in his life, when he began to forsake his chosen role of critic and interpreter for that of man of action. He places it ten years later, when he went to a United States army recruiting station and asked to be put into uniform. This act was indeed the outward and visible sign of his inner conversion; it was the burning of his boats, and to him the significance is enormous. Yet such a mighty metamorphosis, such a response to a titanic convulsion in the affairs of men, does not take place, of course, at a single point, but in a great half-circle.

That half-circle is the road which Mann has traveled in the last dozen years, always with an amazing power to adjust himself to each new catastrophe and to harness his exuberant powers to new purposes. The last lap of the road, told in the staccato passages of his diary, is perhaps the most remarkable portion of a remarkable life. An exile in America, he made himself master of the English tongue because he knew that it was the idiom of the one audience left to him, and therefore the only medium in which he could find expression. His conquest over our language, now greater than that of many native writers, is symbolic of his conquest over circumstances which have tossed other human beings about like the splinters of a vanished shipwreck. Yet in one sense he is not an exile; he is a native of civilization itself, and as long as it endures anywhere he will not be stateless.

BETSY HUTCHISON

Ambassador Grew's Report

REPORT FROM TOKYO. By Joseph C. Grew. Simon and Schuster. $1.50.

REPORT FROM TOKYO" is a collection of speeches made by Former Ambassador Grew after his return to the United States and arranged with certain supplementary material in book form.

The moral of most of Mr. Grew's speeches is expressed in one extraordinary sentence in the first chapter, "... we are up against a people whose morale will not and cannot be broken even by successive defeats, who will certainly not be broken by economic hardships . . . and who can be brought to earth only by physical defeat, by being ejected physically from the areas which they have temporarily conquered or by a progressive attrition of their naval power and merchant marine which will finally result in cutting off their homeland from all connection with and access to those outlying areas—by complete defeat in battle."

In later chapters the author discusses some of the sources of enemy strength, many of which are to be found in the social and cultural uniformity, the sacrificial fanaticism based on a sense of divine mission, and the totalitarianism which was a feature of Japanese life long before the word was in use elsewhere. He also provides a condensed account of our earlier relations with Japan and our Chinese ally, of Japanese weaknesses, of the period of aggression and broken promises which followed the Shidehara era. Our past trade he defends on the realistic ground that a breaking off of commercial relations before 1941 would have meant war—a circumstance few of the would-be boycotters were then prepared to face.

The close student of world affairs will find little new in "Report from Tokyo," but it affords an excellent antidote for the decade of muddled and wishful thinking which preceded Pearl Harbor.

DONALD W. MITCHELL

AMUSEMENTS

"The most effective and the most satisfactory play about the war yet in reach our stage."

—Joseph Wood Krutch, Walling

THE PLAYWRIGHTS' COMPANY Presents

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A new play by Maxwell ANDERSON Cost of 25, incl. Aline MacMAHON
CORT
48th St. E. of B'WAY. Evs. 8:40, $1.10 to $3.30. 281 seats $1.10
Mat. Wed. & Sat. 2:40, $1.10-$2.75. Seats selling for next 3 weeks.
MAIL ORDERS PROMPTLY FILLED

Don't Miss It!

THE PROGRESSIVE'S

Brilliant New Series

"The TVA in War And Peace"

by TVA Experts

The Exciting Story Of TVA's Role In The War And Post-War America

★ ★ ★

Also, Sparkling Behind-The-Scenes
Articles By A Brilliant Staff:

- | | |
|-------------------|-----------------------|
| ★ Bob La Follette | ★ W. H. Chamberlin |
| ★ Stuart Chase | ★ Ernest L. Meyer |
| ★ Oscar Ameringer | ★ McAlister Coleman |
| ★ Milton Mayer | ★ Isabel La Follette |
| ★ Frank Hanighen | ★ Oswald G. Villard |
| ★ H. P. Howard | ★ Hugh Russell Fraser |

Special Trial Offer

30 Weekly Issues For Only $1

Act Now — Mail $1 to

The Progressive

Dept. C — Madison, Wisconsin

Or Ask for a Free Sample Copy

"The Best Reading On America For America"

You Help Someone You Know

When You Give to the U S O

Marlowe, Definitive

THE TRAGICALL HISTORY OF CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE. By John Bakeless. The Harvard University Press. Two Volumes. $7.50.

I HAVE an idea that Christopher Marlowe can be considered responsible for something more than six hyperbolic plays and a couple of marvelous poems: I suspect that he is also more than a little responsible for the popular conception of what I am reduced to terming "the poet." Certainly the majority of necessary characteristics happen to be present, including the ethical irresponsibility, the slightly too beautiful name, the impecuniousness, the death at an early age, the masterpieces turned out with an air of inspired accident, and the rumors of emotional immorality. So that when I contemplate the private life of Christopher Marlowe through the positively microscopic examination of his latest biographer, what principally surprises me is not how little but how much I seem to know about him. This affects me as remarkable for the simple reason that no one, including John Bakeless, knows very much. Here, for instance, are two large volumes written about a poet who spent twenty-nine years engaged largely in doing things that his biographers cannot ascertain. The facts of life, so far as Christopher Marlowe is concerned, seem to consist simply of his birth, his education, his six plays, his practice of espionage, and his assassination. From this handful of data the scrupulous and patient biographer can construct a kind of cardboard poet who is capable of going through the formal gestures of being alive, composing poems, and dying; but even the biographer, when the facts are so few, has necessarily to admit that the result looks a little theatrical. The ambiguity of biographical uncertainties invites a multiplicity of prejudiced interpretations. It is perfectly possible to present the reader with a Marlowe who looks like a patriotic hero with a gift of the gab, or a Machiavellian cad who eventually throttled himself with his own machinations, or a dramatic poet who lived a melodramatic life.

To the study of Marlowe Dr. John Bakeless has devoted twenty-one years and conducted researches that extended from Bulgaria to Japan. This biography with the rather playful title represents, in fact, more a memorial to the perseverance of the author than a monument to the subject who remains so mysteriously absent from it. I should correct myself: it is not so much that the body of Marlowe is not present as that, if it is present, it has been pretty thoroughly interred beneath the laborious whimsicality of such euphemisms as "the rising young dramatist" (Marlowe); "the young university wit" (Marlowe); "the great business man of Stratford" (Shakespeare); "the redoubtable playwright" (Marlowe); "the weed" (tobacco); "Queen Bess's subjects" (Elizabethans). Personally I prefer Kyd's judgment on Christopher Marlowe: "One so irreligious, intemperate, and cruel of heart."

I also observe Dr. Bakeless to be capable occasionally of an intellectual lack of sophistication which could, I feel, militate against a perfect understanding of Christopher Marlowe. On the subject of what Dr. Bakeless refers to as "his unhealthy interest in unnatural vice," I do not think the following remarks astute:

In "Dido Queen of Carthage" Nashe may be equally responsible with Marlowe. In "Edward II" history and in "Dido" mythology both give authority for the material used. As for the charges [of immorality] against Marlowe by Kyd and Baines, both seem to have been persons likely to be easily shocked, and one strongly suspects Marlowe, perhaps after a little too much wine, of having deliberately set out to shock them.

I would point out to Dr. Bakeless that an author is at liberty to choose his own subjects, that the author of "The Spanish Tragedy" does not seem to me "likely to be easily shocked," and that the proverb in vino veritas could apply even to a hypothetical vintage imbibed on a hypothetical occasion.

Nor do I wholly understand the intellectual attitude of a biographer who can bring himself to remark on the matter of Marlowe's acknowledged atheism: "The attacks on Marlowe's religion are far less serious in modern eyes than the charges against his morals." With the incontestable evidence of the Baines documents providing certified proof that Marlowe held the strongest atheistic opinions, it would seem to me that the sentence above should properly refer to "attacks on Marlowe's irreligion," and I cannot think that in "modern eyes" such attacks would be considered "less serious" than charges of moral turpitude. For I understand that the principal privilege of contemporary society is that we are all perfectly free to be both libertines and unbelievers.

It would, however, constitute a serious omission if Dr. Bakeless were not congratulated for including the following clauses from the Baines report on Marlowe's "monstrous and heretical opinions":

That Moses was but a Jugler & that one Heriots being Sir W Raleighs man Can do more than he.

That the first beginning of Religion was only to keep men in awe.

That if there be any god or good religion, then it is the Papistes because the service of god is performed with more ceremonies, as Elevation of the Mass, Shaven crowns, &c. That all Protestants are hypocritical asses.

That all the new testament is filthily written.

To remark of such a documentation of the heretical convictions of a great Elizabethan poet, "[they] read like the wild conversation of a radical young man who took an intense pleasure in making his hearer's flesh creep," affects me, finally, as frivolous. Just as, in a critical sense, it affects me as frivolous that Dr. Bakeless should seek to mitigate Marlowe's vitiations of historical fact in "Tamburlaine" by citing instances of similar manipulation by John Drinkwater in "Abraham Lincoln" and by Sacha Guitry in "Pasteur."

Nevertheless, I feel sure that in spite of such minor quixotries as those enumerated above, and in spite of such stylistic aberrations as the sentence that closes Chapter IV ("At least, however, we know that the clouds were lowering about Marlowe when Ingram Frizier's dagger thrust stilled that restless and unhappy heart forever"), and in spite of the absence of any attempt at a critical evaluation of the subject as poet, I am, nevertheless, sure that this must be one of the most informative books yet written on Christopher Marlowe. Indeed, I hope that the publishers have guessed right, and that this becomes "the definitive life of the dramatist." The biographical needs the apocryphal almost as much as vice versa.

GEORGE BARKER

IN BRIEF

THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY BACKGROUND. By Basil Willey. Columbia University Press. $3.75.

The Columbia University Press has imported a small shipment of Basil Willey's "The Seventeenth Century Background," the book to which his "The Eighteenth Century Background," published here last year, is the sequel. The volume on the seventeenth century is probably the better and more important of these two excellent works, not because it exhibits to greater advantage Mr. Willey's powers of lucid exposition but because the material of the seventeenth century is more originaive and interesting than that of the following period. The theme of the book is the problem of appearance and reality, the search for the truth of things as they "really are" and the effect which this dominant concern of science and philosophy had upon religion and poetry. Mr. Willey carries his exposition from Bacon to Locke, dealing admirably with Sir Thomas Browne, Descartes, Hobbes, and the rational theologians. His chapter on Milton is a fine investigation of the influence of the new thought upon heroic poetry, and his postscript on Wordsworth is one of the best available discussions of the romantic attempt to animate the discouraging universe which had been Locke's legacy to the eighteenth century.

THE PRE-RAPHAELITE TRAGEDY.

By William Gaunt. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

No one admires Pre-Raphaelite art any more, but after reading Mr. Gaunt's book it is impossible not to admire the Pre-Raphaelites themselves. Sometimes silly—though not in the greenery-yallery way of "Patience"—and often mad, they were nevertheless tough, persistent, and more than a little touched with heroism. If in nothing else, they were justified in William Morris, who is probably the most impressive of the many personalities with which this book deals. Morris was of the second generation of the Pre-Raphaelites—it is one of Mr. Gaunt's virtues that he so carefully distinguishes the generations—and he eventually moved beyond their early tenets, first to industrial design, then to socialism; yet in seeming to deny their ideas he affirmed them, and his socialism was but the generalization of Rossetti's belief that everyone should be an artist. "Art," said Morris, "is the expression of pleasure in labor," and if it is not a good definition of art, it is an admirable definition of a socialist ideal. But although Morris is for us the most satisfying figure of the movement, we cannot miss the impressiveness of Rossetti himself or fail to find something wryly fine in Holman Hunt's mulish devotion to his strange, self-torturing ideas. Nor is there less charm in such of the Pre-Raphaelites as managed to do themselves well in a post-Raphaelite world—in Millais, who made a huge fortune out of his art, who painted the famous Pear's Soap advertisement "Bubbles," whose elaborate establishment brought forth from Carlyle the remark, "Has paint done all this, Mr. Millais? It only shows how many fools there are in the world," and who had so much happiness, for a time, that one almost rejoices in the vulgarity of the art that gave it to him; or in the sweet-tempered Burne-Jones, who so prettified the brotherhood's mannerisms, who was so bad an artist but so pleasant a person. Mr. Gaunt's book begins in a vein of rather ironic superiority, but as it proceeds it takes on gravity from some quality in the Pre-Raphaelites themselves—the quality, perhaps, that justifies Mr. Gaunt in calling their story a tragedy.

FREEDOM FOR ITALY. By Gaspare and Franco Nicotri. With a Foreword by Carlo Sforza. Italian American Press. $1.25.

Gaspare Nicotri, a veteran of many a struggle, writes with his son a series of sketches about the century-old Italian battle for freedom. From the Sicilian Vespers in the thirteenth century up to the "Saga of the Thousands" in the Risorgimento, and forward to the Garibaldi Battalion which fought for Greek liberty in 1897 (in its ranks was Nicotri, Sr., himself), the main landmarks are portrayed with vivid casualness. It is a popular book, whose timeliness should not be overlooked by Italian-Americans in search of the "real Italy." All the chapters burn with a filial love for the "land of prodigies" and with expectation of a last battle to come: since, as Count Sforza reminds us in his foreword, "what has been might be again."

THE CHINESE ROOM. By Vivian Connell. The Dial Press. $2.50.

A young Irish playwright writes a curious hodge-podge of a novel, part psychological thriller, part passionate indictment of modern English life, and large part sheer nonsense. A statement of Mr. Connell's theme indicates the germ of a possibly interesting idea: a rich young banker undertakes to experiment on his mind by writing anonymous letters to himself, but before he can get started on this dim project he begins to receive anonymous letters from someone else; in the meantime his unhappy wife, always unsatisfied in her marriage and increasingly estranged from her husband in this period of his exacerbated self-interest, takes a series of lovers and discovers the therapy of a healthy sexual life. But the novel Mr. Connell has written is inept and absurd, and even his main thesis—his serious conviction that most of the ills of modern life could be solved by the release of our sexual inhibitions—is irretrievably lost in the welter of his combined mystery story and amateur psychiatry. If only because of the prudence of its sexual detail, a novel that might have been in the line of, say, D. H. Lawrence's "Lady Chatterley's Lover" turns out to be in the line of adolescent reverie.

TACEY CROMWELL. By Conrad Richter. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

Mr. Richter's Wild West prostitute has the usual warm heart we have learned about from Marlene Dietrich; there is even the familiar contrast between the prostitute's stern moral convictions and the weakness of the respectable religious lady against whom she is pitted. The best parts of Mr. Richter's book—and they are quite good—are those that deal with Arizona life in the old territorial days. Successful local color, however, cannot compensate for a novel so cinematically conceived, so without realization of its characters or development of its theme.

O. HENRY MEMORIAL AWARD PRIZE STORIES OF 1942. Edited by Herschel Brickell. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Rather better than the O'Brien volume of short stories, the O. Henry collection, taken more than one or two stories at a time, still makes unsatisfying reading. The stories are technically competent but essentially bare of the flesh of fiction; in the contemporary manner, they are too naked a statement of the single perception or observation that inspired their writing—as if a composer were to offer us the whole of a musical composition the undeveloped statement of his themes. This year Mr. Brickell and his judges have awarded first prize to Eudora Welty for The Wide Net (Harper's), second prize to Wallace Stegner for Two Rivers (the Atlantic Monthly), and third prize to Wilbur Schramm for Windwagon Smith (the Atlantic Monthly). From the Atlantic Monthly, too, comes the story that wins an award for the best first-published story, A Long Way to Go by Jeanne E. Wylie. The table of contents further includes such writers as Kay Boyle, William Faulkner, Carson McCullers, Jerome Weidman, and John Steinbeck, assuring the public that it is being given what it has itself been calling the best.

THE SOUND OF AN AMERICAN.

By David Ormsbee. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

The vulgarity of Mr. Ormsbee's novel and its pretentiousness are matched only by the claims its publishers make for this shabby performance. The hero is an American music critic named Abner Coe—a phony if ever there was one—who gets caught up by the French army and witnesses the fall of France; the story's two main themes are Coe's almost undying love for a young pianist and his ever-increasing passion for the U. S. A. When love deserts him, Coe joins the American army. It is a book full of emotions and attitudes, not to mention appetites, synthesized out of Wolfe, Hemingway, Elliot Paul, and James Cain, paraded as original energy and used to pass off as strong feeling what is no more than sentimental street-corner patriotism.

MAN'S MOST DANGEROUS MYTH:

THE FALLACY OF RACE. By M. F. Ashley Montagu. With a Foreword by Aldous Huxley. Columbia University Press. $2.25.

A distinguished anthropologist here attacks the anthropological as well as the popular conception of "race," which he shows to be meaningless in any scientific sense. It is a fiction developed as a rationalization of the desire to act aggressively. Its relations to culture, war, and democracy are intelligently and suggestively summarized, and the moral is pointed.

THE NAZI CONQUEST OF DANZIG.

By Hans L. Leonhardt. The University of Chicago Press. $3.50. This true story of the Free City of Danzig begins in the first century of the Christian period, but it becomes most interesting at what might be called the city's second birth, under Articles 100 to 109 of the Treaty of Versailles. The book's greatest value lies in the light it throws on problems of post-war reconstruction. It could serve almost as a textbook for mistakes which should not be repeated, for splendid ideas not carried out, for the ineffectiveness of mere good-will. It is brimful of facts and explanation, carefully selected and precisely put together. The reader is able to see not only how it happened but how it could happen again. "The first responsibility for Danzig's total loss of freedom lies with Hitlerite Germany . . .," but the "principal villains of the play" are Herr Förster, Herr Greiser, M. Beck, Mr. Eden, and Mr. Burckhardt—in short, Poland, the League of Nations, the whole outside world with its attitude: "Why die for Danzig?" The example of Danzig stands as a great indictment of reconstruction without understanding. Everyone concerned with the next peace conference should read this book.

PROLOGUE TO APPEASEMENT. A STUDY IN FRENCH FOREIGN POLICY.

By Elizabeth R. Cameron. American Council on Public Affairs. $3.50.

This careful factual study approaches the problem—in the words of one of the chapter headings—with the nexus of domestic and foreign policy in mind. Fully annotated and with a bibliography of source material, it will be valuable as a starting-point for students. The conclusion is the now obvious one: "In the course of the first years of the Nazi regime, even before the German remilitarization of the Rhine, certain forces in French policy had already set the pattern which led to collapse under the military onslaught of 1940."

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

Pacific Charter: Our Destiny in Asia. By Hallett Abend. Doubleday, Doran. $2.50.

The Pocket Book of Dog Stories. Edited by Harold Berman. Pocket Books. 25 cents.

The Lady Means Business: How to Reach the Top in the Business World—the Career Woman's Own Machiavelli. By Aimee Buchanan. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

Development of Collective Enterprise: Dynamics of an Emergent Economy. By Seba Eldridge and Associates. Kansas. $4.50.

Plans for World Peace Through Six Centuries. By Sylvester John Hemleben. Chicago. $2.50.

Art and Freedom. By Horace M. Kallen. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. 2 vols. $6.50.

English Usage: A Study in Policy and Procedure. By Arthur G. Kennedy. Appleton-Century. $1.25.

Slaves Need No Leaders: An Answer to the Fascist Challenge to Education. By Walter M. Kotschnig. Oxford. $2.75.

The Discovery of Freedom: Man's Struggle Against Authority. By Rose Wilder Lane. John Day. $2.50.

Siberia. By Emil Lengyel. Random House. $3.75.

Above Suspicion. By Helen MacInnes. Pocket Books. 25 cents.

Listen, Germany! Twenty-five Radio Messages to the German People Over B. B. C. By Thomas Mann. Knopf. $1.50.

The Standard of Living in 1860: American Consumption Levels on the Eve of the Civil War. By Edgar W. Martin. Chicago. $4.50.

Italy from Within. By Richard G. Massock. Macmillan. $3.

Easy Malay Words and Phrases. By Marius A. Mendlesen. John Day. $1.

Experiencing American Pictures. By Ralph M. Pearson. Harper. $3.75.

A Latin American Speaks. By Luis Quintanilla. Macmillan. $2.50.

Syrian Yankee. By Salom Rizk. Doubleday, Doran. $2.75.

I Saw the Fall of the Philippines. By Colonel Carlos P. Romulo. Doubleday, Doran. $3.

John Paradise and Lucy Ludwell of London and Williamsburg. By Archibald Bolling Shepperson. Dietz Press. $4.

Make This the Last War: The Future of the United Nations. By Michael Straight. Harcourt, Brace. $3.

The Russians: The Land, the People, and Why They Fight. By Albert Rhys Williams. Harcourt, Brace. $2.

ART

HANANIAH HARARI: Oils. At the Pinacotheca, until January 16.

HARARI, just thirty, is one of the most promising abstract painters in the country. There is the strength and originality of his color, or rather of its tonality; there is his liveliness. But in order to attain virtues, and precisely as a manifestation of his vitality, Harari has to dare to sin—graviously. He fools around with Harnett's style of trompe l'oeil, with Stalinoid "class consciousness" and other nonsense. He plays with all sorts of rash notions, mixing together formal elements such as no artist living or dead could organize, and the combination of which simply violates the laws of pleasurable vision. Some of Harari's paintings are frightful. One, dealing with fascism, sinks to a comic strip; another, called "Rococo," shows what—I am told—is the degeneration of capitalism by means of arabesques, scroll work, floral curlicues, and the half-tones and sickly-dark colors of Victorian wallpaper. It may be a joke, but it is too expensive.

Harari exposes himself turn by turn to the influences of Picasso, Miró, Klee, and others. He is ready to be anything—apparently on a moment's notice. But this dashing about, the facing in many directions at once, is a sign among other things of a tremendous energy. Harari is vulgar but seldom banal. Underneath is a talent sensuous and powerful, able in certain pictures to order things to its own unique purposes. At his best Harari continues in the line of post-cubism, is two-dimensional and abstract. In "Figurations" and "Green and Pink" flat patterns of tan, pink, and cream—which with brown are the artist's most successful colors—are used to make paintings as rich as any done by an American lately. "Autumn Tonality" and one or two others are more original but not quite as finished. In these Harari tries to relieve the flatness of the two-dimensional by tonal harmonies. He has something new to say in this vein, and it is probably his most sincere and important one. The work marked by Klee's influence is also successful within the limits of the derivative.

Harari has many strings to his bow and plucks them one after another with an erratic abruptness that is the effect either of indecision or of Picasso's misunderstood example. It is to be hoped that he will settle down and proceed consecutively in the direction which, as he himself ought to realize by now, is his most serious one—the flat abstraction. It will contain all his emotion and his desires for variety, let him have no fear about that. Meanwhile, he has had his fun.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

TWO women have written me that their husbands, in camp in Louisiana and Kentucky, suffer keenly from their complete inability to hear the serious music they were accustomed to hear in their leisure time in the concert hall or from their radios and phonographs. There are minorities of such men in most of the places where training is going on; and one thing they can do is to try to obtain for their camp one of the record-libraries that have been assembled and sent out by Armed Forces Master Records, Inc., Room 215, 9 Rockefeller Plaza, New York. This organization will send the library only when it is informed that the special service officer of the camp is willing to accept it and to provide a room with a phonograph where those who are interested will be able to hear Beethoven without conflict with those who want to hear Glen Miller. The first step, then, is to speak to the special service officer.

That is about as much as the men in the camps can do for themselves. In addition, people in towns near camps can help by making their records available—either by lending them to the camp, or by playing them for the men in their homes or in larger auditoriums. Here too, and indeed in all instances, the co-operation of the special service officer must be secured. Regular concerts of recorded music are best arranged by a group of people who pool their records for the purpose; and such a group can raise funds for the purchase of records that will be played at the concerts or be given to the camp.

Moreover, since Armed Forces Master Records will not for a long time be able to take care of all the camps, hospitals, and other military centers here and abroad, there is room for additional organizations to supplement its work and incidentally to improve on it. For example, instead of sending an entire library an organization might send out a succession of two-hour programs; and it might try to work out the machinery for the circulation of these programs among a number of camps in one region. And it might make a better selection of music. The work, after all, is not being done for the majority who are amply provided with the music they like; it is being done, supposedly, for the minority who are not getting the Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Brahms, Strauss, Debussy, Stravinsky, and Prokofiev they used to hear in Carnegie Hall or Symphony Hall or the Academy of Music—the music they used to hear and want desperately to hear now because it means a great deal to them. Yet when an organization like Armed Forces Master Records gets down to making its list for these men who are hungry for Beethoven, it almost inevitably is deflected by a concern about the men who may not be interested in Beethoven, and puts in things which will lure these men to the phonograph (but will drive the men interested in Beethoven away); when it makes a list for the minority it includes things which are "in demand," presumably by large numbers. And the result is a library which includes both Beethoven and things like Kern's "Showboat" Synthesis, Victor Herbert, Ferde Grofe, Sarasate's

"Zigeunerweisen," Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre" and "Bacchanale," Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite and Piano Concerto, Sibelius' "Finlandia," Ravel's "Bolero," Tchaikovsky's Overture "1812" and "Marche Slave," Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," Viextemp's and Wieniawski's Violin Concertos, Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" instead of his Violin Concerto No. 1 or "Classical Symphony," etc. The library does include Beethoven and others like him, and I am glad that Armed Forces Master Records is doing what it is doing; but there is room for other organizations, which I hope will concern themselves solely with the men who would like to hear a program consisting of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4, Schubert's Trio Op. 99, and Prokofiev's Violin Concerto No. 1, or Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, Schumann's "Dichterliebe" song-cycle, Mozart's "Hunt" Quartet, and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," and which will give this music to these men.

AFMR itself wants other groups to do this work, and offers to help them by placing at their disposal the experience it has acquired in selecting, buying, and shipping records, in dealing with special service officers, and so on. If any such groups prefer to follow my ideas about a record-library or a series of programs I will be glad to help with specific suggestions; also, any records that may be difficult to obtain in Louisiana or Kentucky nowadays I will be glad to try to obtain in New York.

Individuals who want to help the work of getting records to the men in service can do so by contributing good records or money to AFMR; and The Nation is willing to receive money for other groups that make themselves known to it.

B. H. HAGGIN

UDA presents . . .

ELY CULBERTSON

Who Will Submit
HIS NEW TESTAMENT FOR A POST-WAR WORLD
TO

This Distinguished Board of Experts:
Prof. Hans Aufrecht Keith Hurchison
Prof. Oscar Janowsky Dr. William Boha
Prof. Adolph Lowe Dr. Belle Zeller

at LABOR STAGE
106 West 39th Street

Tues. Eve. January 12, 1943

AT 8:15 P. M.

Send check for tickets or call
UNION FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION
(Educational Fund, Inc.)

9 East 46th Street Plaza 8-0703
Admission: 50c

Letters to the Editors

Escape to Switzerland

[The following letter arrived here recently from Switzerland. The writer is a Dutch Jew who had been living in France with his family since 1934. When the wholesale persecution of Jews in southern France began in the fall of 1942, he and his wife and daughter and seven-year-old son were arrested and sent to a concentration camp to await deportation. Through the efforts of refugee organizations, which stressed the fact that the family was of Dutch nationality and therefore not subject to deportation, they were temporarily released. Thereupon they decided to escape to Switzerland. They are at present proteges of the International Rescue and Relief Committee.]

... After our dramatic arrest there was no more peace for us, especially since we knew that ours was only a provisional release, and that next time the Dutch would get the same treatment as others—you probably know that in most cases parents and children are torn apart with little hope of ever finding each other again. ... With the aid of false passports which enabled us to travel in France, we reached a little frontier town where some people who had been recommended to us as friends guided us through the mountains to the Swiss border. Loaded down with heavy packs we climbed for five hours and then took leave of our friends. We followed the route which they had pointed out to us but soon were hopelessly lost in mountains 6,000 feet high. Sliding, tumbling, our clothes torn and our skins bruised, we continued in the direction of the valley we hoped to reach. R— [the writer's wife] suffers from vertigo on a second-story balcony, and V— [their seven-year-old son] had to be helped along; so you can imagine we made slow progress. After several hours of hard climbing we found ourselves on a tiny plateau overlooking a 2,300-meter drop straight down, a veritable cul-de-sac offering no way of going on or going back. Far below us we could see a group of small chalets, and we began to call for help and signal with our handkerchiefs and shirts. By this time it was seven in the evening. After a long time we were seen, and the villagers shouted that they would come to help us.

We set about making ourselves as comfortable as was possible on this small shelf, but it was too slanting for all of us to go to sleep; we had to hold V—, wrapped up in his cape, on our knees. Toward 9 p. m. a little avalanche of stones heralded the arrival of a rescue party, which had reached a point a few score meters above us. Seeing that the party included two women and a child, they realized at once that we were stuck for the night on our precarious perch, for they had no lights and we had no proper mountain equipment for scaling the cliff that separated them from us. Even though a glimpse of them was enough to revive our courage, I find it hard to describe the hours that followed. It was bitterly cold; we had no blankets, no more matches, nothing to eat or drink. Sleep was impossible, for there was always the possibility of sliding off into the abyss.

Toward 7:30 in the morning the rescue party reappeared, armed with ropes. Now began the ghastly climb back. Exhausted and cramped, we had to retrace our steps to the point where our friends had originally left us and then take off again in a totally different direction toward the valley. We arrived at the first house about 1:30 that afternoon. Our rescuers had coffee, bread, butter, meat—a splendid repast—awaiting us, but we were so worn out that we could scarcely manage to swallow any food. Only after several hours of sleep were we in shape to begin tending our multiple scratches and repairing our torn clothes. (I shall always keep the trousers I wore as a souvenir of the trip. The seat of them looks exactly like a strainer!) At five that afternoon we set out again, for we had two and a half hours of traveling before us to reach the first small city. ...

When we finally arrived at Geneva we were met by Madame R—, who took us to the Dutch consulate. The police were informed at once and arrived an hour later to take us to an internment camp. There we spent the night and after a brief but friendly interrogation were set at liberty. The R's have found a pretty little pension for us. We are not permitted to move without authorization from the military police, but we may travel within the Geneva canton. The Dutch consulate is paying our expenses. ...

Unifying Africa

Dear Sirs: As the day of the complete liberation of Africa draws near, we in this country should begin to consider now the problems of reconstruction, the aspects of the new world we expect to build on the ruins of that narrow-minded and intolerant nationalism which has always obstructed the peaceful cooperation of nations. Let us view the first dim outlines of a unified Africa.

The whole African continent, except two large and some smaller Portuguese and Spanish colonies, Egypt, and Liberia, consists of units which are members of the United Nations. It is a vast territory of little-developed economic resources, a continent bearing no scars of boundaries or battlefields such as mark the nations of old Europe and Asia. The motley of colors on our maps of Africa was mixed and printed by imperialistic artists in European diplomatic offices and does not derive from African geography or the distribution of its population. The only dividing element is the wide range of civilization, culture, and language from the Egyptians to the pigmies of the Congo and from the South Africans to the Arabs in the north.

Africa should be the first and ideal testing-ground for the aims of the Atlantic Charter, which promises all nations "access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity." Why could Africa not be the first step toward "the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field with the object of securing, for all, improved labor standards, economic adjustment, and social security"? Should the experiment be successful it might be followed by the unification of the globe, which has shrunk to five continents from an agglomeration of a hundred nations.

Why can we not undertake the task now while we are united in the great effort to subdue the evil which would have turned back history a thousand years? And why not try to do it in a business-like way? Let economy and common sense go first for once and politics come later. Let us consider the United Nations as a corporation which has purchased the majority of shares of the nine different "companies" interested in African production and trade. Each company had different ways and means of carrying on the same type of business; all were in competition and could not get together for large transactions by which they would have all profited. What does our corporation do? If it cannot force a merger, it will institute a holding company with a directive council which will go about methodically to iron out the differences, unify the business methods, eliminate competition, and undertake the greater projects under its own auspices with the cooperation of all.

Following this pattern, the "shareholders in Africa" should form an Economic Council in which all nations having colonies in Africa and the self-governed states of the Union of South Africa, Egypt, Ethiopia, and Liberia would be represented in proportion to their economic importance. This importance could be measured by the value of their foreign trade in the last decade. The Economic Council would function much as the League of Nations did but would not require unanimous decisions. Its first task would be to eliminate all economic boundaries by instituting a common currency—possibly the English pound—and abolishing all tariffs and embargoes. The Council might levy a federal tax on corporations and port facilities for the purpose of building up communications, such as roads, railroads, shipping, air lines, and harbors. The federal police power would rest with the United Nations.

All these undertakings would infringe but little on the political constitution of the continent. South Africa would retain its dominion status and other countries their independence. Certainly all countries of Africa would be glad to sacrifice a small margin of their economic independence to secure the advantages of economic unity on a territory many times that of the United States. The abolition of tariffs would speed the development of Africa as a whole, and differences between "have nots" and colonial powers would come to an end. The future constitution of the United Nations would determine whether the economic unity should be followed by a pooling of colonies on a political basis. Questions of local importance would be handled somewhat as they are in the United States.

We should not underestimate the effect such a proof of the sincerity of our war aims would have on the Axis. After World War I the Germans considered themselves deceived when the United States disavowed its own child—the League and the Fourteen Points. The Atlantic Charter will now impress them only if they can see that it extends to them the hope of becoming a member of the great Union of Mankind. Such realization would ease the way for ultimate acceptance of peace as we understand it.

PAUL STRASSER

Winnetka, Ill., December 28

John C. Wiley

Dear Sirs: An article entitled Fighting the Fighting French, by your Washington correspondent, I. F. Stone, in The Nation of November 28 contained the following reference:

The Office of Strategic Services, which seems to do much of the army's political thinking, is as mixed in its composition as its chief, William J. Donovan, is in his thinking. There are many good things, from the progressive point of view, to be said about both the OSS and Donovan, but there is also much that is disturbing. The OSS has acquired some of our most moth-eaten diplomats.

Among those diplomats Mr. Stone mentions "John Wiley, who was Bullitt's First Secretary in Moscow. These men inspire only misgivings in the European underground."

I have been a reader of The Nation, as well as a friend of Mr. Wiley, for a long time. When I read the above I therefore could not help remembering an earlier comment on him which appeared after the Anschluss, in The Nation of May 7, 1938, from the pen of Oswald Garrison Villard. Mr. Villard wrote:

In the horror of what has happened in Austria there is one bright spot, and that is the admirable conduct of our American diplomatic officials there. Every American has a right to be proud of the courage and humanity displayed by all of them, notably by the chargé d'affaires, John C. Wiley. It is reported that the minister of another great democracy promptly bolted when the Germans marched in and left his legation to his subordinates. As we had a minister in Vienna at the time, the whole burden fell upon Mr. Wiley.

One of the most experienced of our younger diplomats, he refused to be bound by red tape or purely nationalistic restrictions, and as a result he did an enormous amount of good, saved many unfortunates, I am sure, and ameliorated the lot of many others. He was not overawed by the Nazis or afraid of them, and that is just the right attitude to take toward these brutal bluffers. He and his small staff have been simply overwhelmed by the thousands of poor Jews, and Gentiles too, who have sought to get visas to come to the

The ATLANTIC VICTORY PRIZE for 1943 $5000.00

Is offered by the Atlantic Monthly Press in association with Little, Brown and Company for the most interesting non-fiction book-length manuscript having to do with the war or the peace that will follow it. Closing date, April 15, 1943.

FOR CIRCULAR GIVING EUM.
WRITE DETAILS, ADDRESS

ATLANTIC VICTORY
CONTEST FOR 1943

8 Arlington St., Boston, Mass., U.S.A.

BEVERIDGE'S REPORT

Social insurance and allied services.

The complete text, 300 pages.

Send $1 for a copy mailed direct to you.

(U. S. A.)

BEVERIDGE BOOK BAZAAR, 212 B'way, N. Y. C.

WINTER TIME IS READING TIME

Let BOOKS
PUT WARMTH INTO THOSE LONG, COLD EVENINGS

Red flannels, of course—but for that real glow of warmth and relaxation, count on a supply of good books. Let your bookseller help you select your winter reading today.

AMERICAN BOOKSELLERS ASSN.

Members Everywhere

United States. I wish there were some way of giving men who do work of this type a distinguished-service medal. Mr. Wiley has certainly earned it.

If Mr. Wiley deserved a medal in 1938, can he have become "moth-eaten" by 1942?

One is tempted to inquire just what constitutes "the European underground" in which Mr. Wiley "can inspire only misgivings." He certainly inspires none among Americans who know of his career at first hand.

HENRY SUYDAM

South Orange, N. J., December 26

The Negro in the Army

Dear Sirs: Joseph Julian's Jim Crow Goes Abroad (The Nation of December 5) is valuable as evidence of the treatment of Negroes during the war, but as a discussion of the problem of the Negro in the armed services it is naive.

"Some kind of educational program designed to eradicate the color bias by driving home to white soldiers how silly it is to talk about fighting for democracy when they don't mix with colored troops in their own ranks," as Mr. Julian proposes, would be a futile effort indeed and would do more harm than good.

There are a tremendous number of men in the army, particularly from the South, upon whom all the talk in the world about the color bias would make no impression. These men have grown up in the well-rooted culture of the South. That their prejudices against the Negro is extreme is a natural consequence of the historical background of their section. This fact cannot possibly be ignored in any effort to deal with the problem.

Mr. Julian objects to what appears to him to be the official policy of the army: "Keep them apart—as far apart as possible." The army has before it a large part of the task of winning the war. It has been the experience of the army that trouble—often in the form of violence—results when Negro soldiers are allowed or encouraged to mix with white. Such trouble can seriously impair the efforts of military personnel to train the men. Actual riots, and they have occurred, have a demoralizing effect upon all the men. Segregation, therefore, is an expedient resorted to in the face of necessity. This necessity cannot be obliterated by the stardust of crusading idealism.

It is, of course, disheartening to the Negro soldier to be segregated while being forced to fight for the white man's freedom. In the face of this he has been magnificent. He is so much more capable of a philosophical attitude than the whites that the whites are discredited by the evidence of it. Any effort in the direction urged by Mr. Julian can only hurt him.

ELLIOTT M. MILLER

Great Falls, Montana, December 30

Congratulations to Mr. Taper

Dear Sirs: When I read Bernard Taper's article, Life with Kaiser, in the December 12 issue of The Nation, I took my hat off to him. You see, I too worked in a defense plant, a shop in which thousands of airplane bombs are produced daily, the A. O. Smith Corporation in Milwaukee. I was a newspaperman whose paper, the Milwaukee Post, folded, and I decided to go to work at anything that would help us defeat the enemy. I was given a job, made good in a fashion, but found after three months I just could not take it. The result was I spent five weeks in a veterans' hospital. I suspect Mr. Taper is younger than I, and therefore better equipped physically and mentally to stand up against the noise, heat, steam, gas, and monotony of manual labor.

From my experience, I know there are thousands of other newspapermen, dentists, barbers, and lawyers working on production lines or acting as inspectors in a factory. I was not surprised to read in Mr. Taper's articles that former ballet dancers were working as riggers. But the fact remains that they are for the most part working under a great strain and are perhaps contributing more than their share to victory. With the white-collar worker willing to go into a factory and do his bit the hard way, I am confident the United Nations will win.

In conclusion, once more congratulations to Mr. Taper, who was able to do arduous labor and at the same time observe keenly and write an interesting, informative article about his work.

ARTHUR P. WIESNER

Milwaukee, Wis., December 30

A Mysterious Influence

Dear Sirs: Why the State Department's tender solicitude for Franco during the Spanish civil war? Why are we continuing our help to Franco? Why the invitation to Otto of Hapsburg to head an army for the United Nations cause?

The Catholic church was naturally determined that Franco should win the Spanish civil war, and it is equally determined that the status quo in Spain be maintained. Is this the mysterious influence at work in our State Department? Is Myron Taylor serving our interests at the Vatican, or is he, a layman, consciously or otherwise, carrying out the wishes of the spiritual head of his church? The church is naturally and rightfully interested in its own preservation and cannot be blamed for guarding its own interests. However, where these interests run counter to the best interests of democracy and national policy, the church's influence must be exposed and curbed.

DOLPH SWENSON

Berkeley, Cal., December 29

CONTRIBUTORS

ADOLF F. STURMTHAL is director of the Institute for Economic Education of Bard College, Columbia University.

PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN, now on leave from his congregation in Rochester, is executive director of the Committee on Army and Navy Religious Activities of the Jewish Welfare Board.

AGNES E. BENEDICT is the author of "Progress to Freedom: The Story of American Education."

HANS ERNEST FRIED, author of "The Guilt of the German Army," is in the Department of Government of the College of the City of New York.

DIANA TRILLING reviews fiction regularly for The Nation.

ALBERT GUERARD, author of "The France of Tomorrow," published in 1927 "The Future of Paris: A Book on City Planning."

DELMORE SCHWARTZ is the author of "In Dreams Begin Responsibilities," "Shenandoah," and other books of verse.

BETSY HUTCHISON visited Germany frequently during the period of the Weimar Republic.

GEORGE BARKER is an English poet and critic now living in New York. A volume of his "Selected Poems" was published here last year.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 65 FIFTH AVE., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 16, 1943

NUMBER 3

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

The President's Messages	76
Good Neighbor Daydreams	77
Transit Workers' Rights	77
Russia's Great Offensive by Freda Kirchwey	78

ARTICLES

F. D. R. and Production by I. F. Stone	80
Russia and the West by Reinhold Niebuhr	82
Britain Is Not Amused by Tom Wintringham	84
Harlem at War by Charles Williams	86
"Suffer Little Children" by Herta Pauli	88
In the Wind	90

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

Wanted: A Political Strategy for Asia by Lin Yutang	91
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	94
File and Remember	95

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Mr. Straight Faces the Future by Louis Fischer	96
Deep Waters by Joseph Wood Krutch	97
Russia at War by John Scott	98
The Poet, the Poem, the Reader by H. P. Lazarus	98
When Giants Meet by Ralph Bates	101
Steig's Gallery by Clement Greenberg	102
In Brief	103
Drama: Russian Melodrama by Joseph Wood Krutch	103
Music by B. H. Haggin	104

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

73

The Shape of Things

CARLO TRESCA ALWAYS SAID HE WOULD BE killed by an assassin, and indeed he had survived uncounted threats and several actual attempts on his life. His enemies finally got him, and one more stout-hearted anti-fascist leader is gone. In this dimout murder committed not three blocks from The Nation office are to be found both omens and warnings. Tresca's death may well serve as a sign that the struggle between reaction and the battalions of freedom has reached that final stage when violence in the field of combat is paralleled by violence in the street and the assassin's bullet. For long years Tresca's valiant fight against the fascist agents of Mussolini was part of a minority struggle in which he found himself ranged against the authorities in this country as well. For Tresca recognized fascism as the enemy of civilization more than twenty years before the government of the United States did, and he spent almost a year of his life in federal prison on a trumped-up charge brought in 1923 at the instigation of Mussolini's ambassador at Washington. Now that his fight has become part of the great conflict to which our country is committed, Tresca's enemies could no longer count on the backing of the government they hated. Tresca was no longer a minority voice. He spoke for the will of America. It is against that will that the assassin struck. The authorities of New York and of the nation may be sure that this attentat will not be the last one.

★

SOME OF THE MEN NOW HEAVING PAVING blocks at Edward J. Flynn live in dangerously exposed glass houses, but that does not make his appointment as Minister to Australia and personal representative of the President with ambassadorial rank any less of a blunder. The chief count against Flynn is not his alleged dealings in the small change of political bossism, though suspicion has survived the hearings which technically cleared him. It is rather that he has no qualifications for a diplomatic mission of exceptional delicacy. His claims for preference are based solely on his command of an important segment of votes in New York State and his personal loyalty to the President. Even the most high-minded of Presidents cannot be oblivious to political debts, but this appointment shows not merely a failure in statesman-

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1943, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 65 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 866 National Press Building.

ship but an error in political tactics. Mr. Roosevelt is going to have trouble enough during the present session holding the New Deal front line; he cannot afford to waste ammunition defending the indefensible.

*

THE FIRST FINE RAPTURES OVER THE NORTH African adventure have passed, in painful stages, through restiveness to open dissatisfaction. Joseph S. Evans, Jr., reporting to the New York Herald Tribune from London, writes: "Not only does the tribune make itself evident in virtually every discussion on the progress of the war and in editorials and special articles in the daily press, but today's issues of all the London weeklies carry leading articles expressing that worry in no uncertain terms." No doubt the military slowdown is primarily responsible for the fading of enthusiasm. There is as yet no reason to feel alarmed about the stalemate before Tunis, but with the successful landing operation hopes were pitched high, and the impression was general that the Axis would shortly be expelled from the southern shores of the Mediterranean. The official explanation that the Allied troops are ahead of schedule and forced to wait for the weather to catch up with them is probably sound, but psychologically it is not satisfying. And even from a military standpoint it is obvious that every day General Eisenhower's forces remain bogged down in the mud, the Germans strengthen their hold on the area around Tunis itself. Should Rommel's retreating army effect a juncture with Colonel General von Arnim's forces in Tunisia, the Allied armies will have their work cut out for them to break the enemy's grip on the primary objective of the whole African campaign.

*

EVEN SO THERE WOULD PROBABLY BE NO real uneasiness if the picture were not complicated by devious politics and if both military and political news were not clouded by a fantastically inept censorship. The British press, from right to left, is withering in its comments on this aspect of North African affairs, which says the New Statesman and Nation, "threatens, unless there be plain speaking and better understanding, to poison Anglo-American relations." Behind this bitterness are the deep-seated suspicions generated by the deal with Darlan and undissipated by his elimination. The assassin's identity is still a rumor-breeding mystery, and so is the round-up of high Algiers police officials vaguely accused of conspiracy against General Giraud, Robert Murphy, and other figures prominent in the present North African arrangement. If these arrested officials were anti-Vichy, perhaps there were many others. Jacques Lemaigre-Dubreuil, chief civil adviser to General Giraud, thinks there were. What is more, he told a press conference while in this country with the French military mission, "All those who in metropolitan or African France have directly or indirectly collaborated with the Germans are literally hated by the population." That does not sound like the contention of our diplomats that we had to use Darlan because of his hold on the people of North Africa. On the other hand, it does reflect what appears to be a growing antipathy on Giraud's part toward the Imperial Council of ex-collaborationists with whom he is saddled. A spokesman for the General bluntly told the press this week that the combined forces of Giraud and De Gaulle would "throw out all the Vichyites and go after the Germans." Some support for this bright prospect may be read in Giraud's tour of inspection to Tunisia, Morocco, and West Africa, where discussions are reliably reported to have been held with Free French representatives as well as with native rulers. The conversion of this hope into a reality will be worth as much to the United Nations as the eventual capture of Tunis.

*

THE WAR HAS COME HOME TO CONSUMERS with a vengeance this past week, and consumers have come through the acid test, by and large, with flying colors. The prohibition of pleasure motoring in the seventeen Eastern states drastically affected the established habits of life of thousands of persons, particularly in the larger cities. And the OPA order cutting the value of home fuel-oil coupons by 10 per cent may cause real discomfort in thousands of American homes. To make matters worse, there were alarming indications that the supply of coal and cooking gas might be seriously depleted before many days in the New York metropolitan area. The local meat and butter shortages continued, and there were reports that despite rationing the supply of coffee might soon be exhausted. The existence of a coffee shortage was promptly denied by Price Administrator Henderson, but the scarcity of the other commodities is very real. These privations and restrictions have, however, been received with a minimum of grumbling. This has been particularly true of the ban on non-essential driving. The severe nature of the action shocked the public, as nothing else has, into a realization of the grim struggle in which we are all involved. Instead of resisting rationing, as many were doing a few weeks ago, most Americans now seem convinced that the OPA has moved too slowly in applying its rationing program. This change in sentiment should greatly facilitate Prentiss Brown's task when he takes over responsibility for rationing and price control from Leon Henderson.

*

IF THIS NEW CONGRESS, AS PRESIDENT Roosevelt said, may be the one to make the peace, the Republicans are preparing to make it in the old diarch isolationist way. Two of the leading candidates for the Republican Presidential nomination in 1944, Wilkie and Stassen, have tried to open broader vistas for their party, but they seem to have had no effect on its leaders. The test of the G. O. P. Senate caucus was whether it would elect Austin of Vermont, an interventionist, or "Puddler Jim" Davis of Pennsylvania to the vacancy on the Foreign Relations Committee. The caucus chose Davis, an isolationist, reactionary, and high-tariff Republican. Roosevelt, like Wilson, may find the Senate Foreign Relations Committee the nucleus of Congressional opposition to American cooperation in maintaining the peace. The Democratic majority on that committee includes enough isolationists to make the President's hold on it precarious. One of the Democrats is Reynolds of North Carolina. That the publisher of the Vindicator should be a member of the Foreign Relations Committee must seem another of democracy's pleasant and profitable idiocies to certain gentlemen we need not name.

✱

LACK OF SPECTACULAR NEWS FROM INDIA has led many Americans to assume that the political crisis arising from the failure of the Cripps mission and the arrest of Gandhi has been dissipated. But such reports as are available indicate the contrary. Rioting and demonstrations against British rule seem to have subsided; but these overt protests have given way to a sullen bitterness and disillusionment which offer little hope for a constructive settlement. The jails are reported to be fuller today than at the height of the civil-disobedience campaign last fall. Discontent over the political situation has been greatly aggravated by a serious and growing shortage of food. There are inadequate supplies of India's three staples—wheat, rice, and millet. The shortage is most serious in such urban centers as Bombay, New Delhi, and Calcutta. The situation is of increased concern to the United States because of the presence of large numbers of American troops in India. This may have been one consideration, but only one, in the recent appointment by President Roosevelt of William Phillips to be his personal representative in New Delhi. Certainly we need an observer in India, but we can't help wondering why Mr. Roosevelt selected, for this important post, an old-line diplomat who will seem to the Indian leaders to bear a strong family resemblance to the British officials they have known so long.

✱

DR. FRANK BUCHMAN, FOUNDER OF MORAL Rearmament, once said that "God is a millionaire." During his great revivals at fashionable Stockbridge a few years ago he numbered among his converts a good many mundane millionaires or their wives, whom he described as "key people." As late as 1936 he thanked heaven "for a man like Adolf Hitler, who built a front line of defense against the anti-Christ of communism." He is a revivalist of the prurient-pious type who told prospective converts that they had a "film of sin" over their eyes and who, for a time at least, carried on his work at house parties devoted to confessions. He would solve all social problems by what he calls "life-changing" and "getting in touch with God." In practice this consists of the discovery, especially by the low-paid, that spiritual wealth is the sole wealth worth sharing. No wonder David Lawrence once suggested that Buchman's group should "mobilize" the country against class warfare. We haven't heard much recently of Dr. Buchman and his efforts to preserve the status quo by offering pie in the sky; but he is apparently still enlisting "key people," this time in an attempt to have his followers deferred from military service on the ground that they are doing essential work in building morale among war-production workers. Various Senators and Representatives have intervened in their behalf, but at least Draft Board No. 4 in New York is not impressed, and one Buchmanite has been ordered to appear for induction. As Charles H. Tuttle, chairman of the board, pointed out, no other religious organization has made such claims or exercised such pressure. He also noted that similar efforts by the Moral Rearmiers in England had "met stern rebuke by the British Cabinet and the House of Commons." We imagine war production will do very nicely without the ministrations of Dr. Buchman's Moral Dodgers.

✱

WE HATE TO THINK OF WHAT WESTBROOK Pegler went through when he heard that Mrs. Roosevelt had picked up a Private First Class, also M. P., at the Union Station in Washington, walked him familiarly to the White House, and invited him in to take pot luck with the family. To Westbrook it must have seemed just one more move in that nefarious Communist plot which took Mrs. Roosevelt to London and is keeping Pegler awake nights. We can hardly wait to see what he makes of Mrs. Roosevelt's attempt to draw the military into her camp. As for ourselves, in spite of having read the "Eighteenth Brumaire," Trotsky's "History of the Russian Revolution," and a good many instalments of Fair Enough, we're still so naive that we really believe it was the spontaneous and charming action of a woman who can't help being natural even though she's the First Lady. We admit, however, that Private First Class Harold R. Crisman would probably vote for Mrs. Roosevelt if he ever got a chance.

✱

"BORN OF SLAVE PARENTS ON A FARM NEAR Diamond Grove, Mo. . . ; in infancy lost his father and was stolen and carried into Arkansas with mother, who was never heard of again; was bought from captors for a race horse valued at $300 and returned to former home in Missouri." So "Who's Who" describes the birth and infancy of Dr. George Washington Carver, one of the outstanding scientists in agricultural research, who died the other day at Tuskegee Institute. Though he did not learn to read and write until he was twenty, Dr. Carver, earning his own way, managed to graduate at the age of thirty from the Iowa State College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts (he had been refused admission to another college because of his race). He went to Tuskegee in 1896 and founded there a school of agriculture devoted to the practical problems of farming, particularly in the South. In the course of almost half a century he developed hundreds of new products from the peanut and the sweet potato and cotton; from the clay soil of nineteen acres of "the worst land in Alabama," which he took over to show what could be done with it, he developed paints, pigments, stains, and face powders. He made paving blocks from cotton, synthetic marble from wood shavings, and paint from soy beans. He also made the fat cotton bolls of short-stalk cotton grow on tall stalks to prevent their being splashed with sand and ruined when it rained. He painted pictures and played the piano. He was deeply religious. He never took money for his discoveries, and much of what he earned at Tuskegee he gave to needy students. His life and work, as the funeral orators say, must be an inspiration. They should also provide, for white and black Americans alike, fresh and thrilling vindication of the principle of racial equality so often honored in the breach.

The President's Messages

POLITICS" in a democracy is a sublimation of the struggle for power which takes the form of a ceaseless competition for the favors of the people. It is rather futile, therefore, to demand that, for the duration of the war, the President should confine himself in a political vacuum while his opponents take vows of political chastity. All we can hope for is that the voters will discourage the jeopardizing of national interests for the sake of party advantage by keeping score carefully and noting for punishment any resort to foul play such as the attempt to smear Harry Hopkins with fictitious emeralds.

The President's message on the state of the Union to the Seventy-eighth Congress was clearly a political act, although one with which, to their great discomfort, his foes could find little fault. He properly assumed that the nation is essentially unified in its determination to win the war and the peace, that however much we may quarrel over means we are agreed as to ends. And he was able to report that in the past year we had made appreciable progress toward our goal and could look forward with confidence to the future. Nineteen forty-two had been a critical year, but its end found our side in a stronger position than at the beginning, while our enemies had weakened. These achievements the President rightly credited to the skill and courage of our services and of our fighting allies, but he also spoke warmly of the cooperation on the home front of workers, industrialists, and farmers. For his Administration he refrained from making any claims, admitted that it had sometimes blundered, indicated he was prepared to have it judged by results.

The one section of this part of the speech open to criticism was that dealing with production; this, I. F. Stone suggests on another page, presented an over-rosy picture. Yet even if production has fallen a good deal short of potential capacity, it has achieved a magnitude that is bound to impress the Axis very disagreeably. And in this connection we have to congratulate the President for abandoning meaningless percentages and quoting definite figures. We doubt if by so doing he has given the enemy any information endangering our interests, and we are certain that he has strengthened our means of political warfare. The frantic efforts of the Axis radio commentators to belittle and explain away these details of American production are sufficient proof of that.

When the President turned from the present to the future he neither proclaimed a retreat nor exposed his flanks to the Congressional guerrillas. As if anxious to fall in with opposition proposals that Congress should insist on more legislative responsibility, he put forward no definite proposals but offered instead some unassailable objectives. In particular, he insisted that men and women on the fighting fronts and the domestic front expected their demands for economic security would be met, and, in effect, he challenged Congress to provide a solution for this problem.

The fact that Mr. Roosevelt is not evacuating any important positions became clearer on the publication of his budget message. He has renewed the demand he made last year for the removal of special tax privileges—tax-exempt bonds, special depletion allowances for certain mineral producers, separate tax returns for married couples. He has also, undaunted by the barrage of criticism both inside and outside Congress, proposed once again that all incomes should be limited during the war period to $25,000 net after allowing for payment of insurance premiums and other fixed charges.

In support of this proposal he pointed out that, after provision for our war needs, there would be about $500 worth of goods and services per capita available to civilians, and while many people will spend more than this, it will be because still greater numbers are forced to spend much less. We are now in a siege economy, but if the limited amount of goods on the market is fairly distributed everyone can be reasonably well clothed and fed. In times of scarcity, however, the gravitational pull of long prices becomes a large factor in breaking down price ceilings and promoting black markets.

Again, Mr. Roosevelt called for greatly increased taxation so that nearly half of the $108 billion war budget can be financed out of current revenue—a course which the avoidance of inflation makes imperative. If Congress follows his lead it will mean an additional $16 billion in taxes—an amount which cannot possibly be raised without a very steep increase in rates starting at the lowest brackets. It will hardly prove feasible to place such burdens on receivers of small incomes, burdens which mean the sacrifice not merely of luxuries but of very modest comforts and even necessities, while leaving a small group of rich people in possession of incomes exceeding $25,000. If Congress will put its ear to the ground instead of keeping its eye on the editorial pages, we think it will find that the President has an issue here on which he could rally very wide popular support.

Good Neighbor Daydream

WE DON'T suppose it will happen. Our diplomacy has moved too far away from vigor and common sense. But it would electrify Latin America if the President brushed aside the cobwebs of protocol, recalled Ambassador Boal from Bolivia, and asked the Pan-American Union to reinstate Ernesto Galarza as chief of its Labor and Social Information Division. By these actions—to continue our daydream—the President would demonstrate to the masses of Latin America not merely that he was sincere in the Good Neighbor policy (few doubt his sincerity) but that he was strong and determined enough to force our State Department and diplomatic service to act upon the principles he has laid down. It is true that by such a move Mr. Roosevelt would upset some groups in Latin America—notably much of our foreign service, Franco's and Hitler's agents, and the Bolivian tin magnates. There would be compensation in the increased trust of the masses.

So far, as we go to press, there have been no such pleasant consequences of the publication in our last week's issue of Secretary Hull's discreet instructions to Boal to throw his influence against the new labor code in Bolivia. There has been a frantic effort to uncover the source from which The Nation obtained the text of the Hull telegram and a digest of Boal's previous report to the Secretary of State on the arguments he had used with the President of Bolivia against the code. But there has been no denial, diplomatic or otherwise, or any attempt to disprove the story by publishing the official texts of the Boal cable and the Hull reply. State Department officials are also indignant, again privately, with the Washington Merry-Go-Round for publishing references to later cables in which Boal expressed his displeasure over the Bolivian government's failure to act more vigorously in smashing the recent tin strike there.

We think it the duty of the American labor movement to make its voice heard in behalf of its brothers in Bolivia. We commend James G. Patton of the Farmers'

Union for his public statement protesting against the treatment of Bolivian labor, and we hope that similar protests will be forthcoming from William Green of the American Federation of Labor and Philip Murray of the C. I. O., both of whom, we understand, have shown their concern by making private inquiries.

Transit Workers' Rights

THE Transport Workers' Union has decided not to call a strike on the New York City transit lines because of the effect such action would have on war production. But in surrendering the right to strike during the emergency, the union has asked that its demands be settled as promptly as possible by arbitration. This request has been flatly rejected by Mayor LaGuardia and the Board of Transportation on the ground that the board, as a public body, cannot be bound by an arbitration award. The money to pay increased wages, the Mayor declares, could come only from an increase in fares or from greater taxation, and "no board of arbitration or no outside source has the power to increase or find the money from these two sources." Previously the Mayor had refused to recognize the right of the T. W. U. to bargain collectively with the city for much the same reason, and had held that the workers, as civil-service employees, did not have the right to strike to enforce their demands. Earlier still he had insisted that the War Labor Board had no jurisdiction over wage disputes between municipalities and their employees.

It is obvious that the position taken by New York's chief executive raises fundamental questions as to the basic rights of municipal employees, particularly where such employees are engaged in work comparable to and competitive with private employment. Do such employees, because they come under civil service, automatically lose their rights as citizens to bring pressure for increased wages and better conditions of employment? This is apparently the case if we are to accept Mayor LaGuardia's interpretation of the law.

The practical results of this interpretation are highly disquieting. Two and a half years have passed since the City of New York took over the B. M. T. and I. R. T. subways in a move to effect unification of the city's transit facilities under municipal control. During this period living costs have risen between 15 and 20 per cent, but in contrast with wages for most types of work there has been no general increase in the wages of the transit workers. Nor has there been any settlement of the basic issue of union security. It is true that a labor grievance committee was set up in the fall of 1941, but its powers have been carefully circumscribed and many of its recommendations have been ignored by the Board of Transportation. As a result, considerable bitterness has developed between the workers and the city—a condition that cannot fail to be detrimental to the cause of public ownership generally.

If, as LaGuardia maintains, the law prohibits collective labor agreements, arbitration, and other basic labor rights to city employees, we can have no fault to find with the Mayor or the Board of Transportation. Their task is not to make the law but to enforce it. Actually, the legal situation is not so simple or so clear-cut as we are asked to believe. It is true that an arbitrator cannot increase fares or taxes, but neither could he increase the income of a privately owned transit company. There are several precedents for collective bargaining by a public agency. Labor contracts already exist between the TVA and its employees and between the City of Seattle and its street-railway employees. In Michigan a court recently ruled that "it is well within the police power of a state to attempt to prevent disputes between employees and employers not only in manufacturing concerns but also in public utilities, whether privately or publicly owned." So far the New York courts have refused to grant the Board of Transportation's contention that it has no authority to enter into any kind of a contract with its employees.

The absence of any clear legal directive makes it possible for city authorities to approach the admittedly delicate problem of working out satisfactory wages and working conditions with unionized city employees with tact and good-will. Mayor LaGuardia has taken his first step in this direction by appointing a five-man committee to "study labor relations in the city's transit system." We hope that this committee will see its task as something more than the settling of a dispute in one city, and consider it in terms of the basic rights of the growing number of American citizens who happen to be employed by public rather than by private enterprise.

Russia's Great Offensive

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE steady advances of the Red Army and its recapture of important strong points in the Nazi defense system have gone far to distract people's minds from the stalemate in North Africa. Too far, perhaps. For the two campaigns are closely related, both in political and military terms, and any major difficulty on one front is sure to be reflected on the other end in the over-all strategy which links them.

Undoubtedly the North African campaign helped Stalin. The defeat of Rommel in Egypt and Libya and his forced retreat to Tripolitania drew a part of the German air power to the Mediterranean even before the landings in the west. The American invasion drew off still more. Stalin warmly acknowledged the value of these operations even though he did not accept them as a full-fledged second front. The tide in Russia turned definitely about two weeks after the American landing. It is still flowing strongly, and Hitler has acknowledged the power of the Soviet offensive by shifting his whole strategy to one of holding as many key points as possible and seeking to intrench his position inside Fortress Europe. How long he can succeed in this final defensive aim depends on the capacity of the Allies to attack in Tunisia as well as on Russia's ability to hold the offensive. A prolonged stalemate in North Africa will provide both time and opportunity for the reinforcement and supply of the key defense points which command the narrow Mediterranean passage. Bizerte and Tunis may well become the most important southern bastion of Hitler's Europe.

But meanwhile the "second front" has bogged down in mud and inactivity, and Russia is again carrying the entire burden of the offensive. No final victory in the east will be likely unless the British and Americans, with what help they can get from the French, succeed in driving the Nazis out of North Africa.

It is important, in the light of these facts, to consider the position of the Russians and their prospect of holding the offensive until something happens on the African front. Cautious observers, in England as well as here, doubt whether the present momentum of the Red Armies can be maintained. The Russians themselves say little. As Hanson W. Baldwin pointed out last Sunday, the Soviet campaign is still the "unknown war." Both sides exercise a censorship equaled in severity only by our own in North Africa. But Mr. Baldwin also refers to the comment of Sergei N. Kournakov, in Soviet Russia Today, that the Red Army should not be expected to "recapture territory by the scores of miles indefinitely."

Perhaps the best key to Russia's position is a comparison of this year's and last year's counter-offensive. In the summer and fall of 1941 Hitler's armies overran some 527,000 square miles of Russian territory. In the winter of 1941-42 the Russians regained somewhere between 50,000 and 100,000 square miles. Last summer the Nazis, shifting the direction of their drive to the south, took about 105,000 square miles—far more than they had lost during last winter and more valuable both in strong points and resources. This winter the new Soviet offensive has so far—and the Russian winter is still young—regained 50,000 or 60,000 of the miles lost. But again the success of the fighting must be measured in terms of strategy as well as territory. The Russians have taken several so-called "hedgehogs"—key points in the Nazi defense system. They claim the capture of Velikie Luki on the central front, though the German command has not acknowledged its loss. This important center may prove the key to a number of other "hedgehogs" which, taken together, form the present German defensive position on this front.

The drive in the south is largely a struggle for lines of communication. The Germans are fighting desperately to hold the main stations and junction points on the Stalingrad-Rostov line. Indeed, the fact that they are still entrenched in and around Stalingrad, though cut off from supplies and reinforcements, has prevented the Russians from using freely the lines that radiate from that key center. Once the lines are cleared, the German defeat in this area will be a certainty. The Russians, pushing down the Don valley toward Rostov, have also captured several German bases of attack, particularly Chernishkovskaya and Morozorsk. If they succeed in reaching Rostov, they will not only have regained a valuable strong point but will have cut off the German forces in the Caucasus, leaving them no land route either for reinforcement or for retreat. If they attempt to pull out, it will mean crossing the Strait of Kerch into the Crimea. In the Caucasus itself the Red Army is steadily pressing the Nazi troops north and west toward the Russian forces moving down the Don.

The Russian offensive is no mere advance into territory voluntarily evacuated. It is the real thing. And the rest of the world has good reason to feel optimistic as it watches the courageous Red Army drive back and trap and demolish huge sections of Hitler's best forces. But at the same time it is well to check one's hopes of early victory by a look at the map. Of all the vast territory overrun by the Nazi armies—somewhere between 500,000 and 600,000 square miles—about 50,000 square miles have been retrieved. The Russians have a long way to go: they have lost a vast part of their best agricultural land and their industrial plants; they have lost millions of soldiers and millions of civilians, killed and captured. And Hitler holds Europe.

The outcome of the Battle of Russia does not depend on Russian courage or Russian strength alone. It depends on the concerted efforts of the Red Army, the armies of the Allies, and the peoples of Europe. The last of these forces is as important for the final defeat of Hitler as both of the others, and Russia, at least, knows it. Britain and the United States know it, too, or pretend they do. But the fierce political war in North Africa, precipitated by our blundering arrangements with the dissident Vichy leaders, shows how little we reckoned on either the dangers or the value of the political front against Hitler. The progress of the Allied military campaign itself may be decided by the speed with which we are able to undo the blunders of our invading generals and diplomats.

WHAT AMERICAN WEAPONS COST

$120,000	$56,000	$50,000	$25,000

60-TON TANK	MEDIUM TANK	155mm GUN	LIGHT TANK
$5,000	$2,000	$1,000	$500

SCOUT CAR	2 1/2-TON TRUCK	RECONNAISSANCE CAR	66mm MORTAR

F. D. R. and Production

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 10

THE President on Production. In his message to Congress Mr. Roosevelt called our production record a miracle. It could more accurately be described as a monstrosity. It is huge but misshapen. Sheer bulk renders it formidable in appearance, but there are two dozen vulnerable spots in its hide. It's a dinosaur, not a war horse, and like the dinosaur its most conspicuous feature is its lack of directing brains.

Looking at the Record. Mr. Roosevelt has consistently painted the production picture in rosy hues. In August of 1940 Senator Byrd pointed out that in the hundred days following the President's speech calling for 50,000 planes, the army and navy combined had placed contracts for only 343 fighting planes. Mr. Roosevelt replied that "Senator Byrd's figures are correct, but his implications dead wrong." The implication was that we were confusing paper programs with planes in production. The results of this confusion were visible eighteen months later in Far Eastern skies, where Japan dominated the air. A year later Senator Byrd again called attention to the alarming lag between talk and reality, and the President had as poor a reply.

Good News Preferred. There is some reason to believe that the President prefers pleasant news, and the men around the President tell him what they think he would like to hear. This may be part of the explanation for some curious statements on production which have come from the White House. There was the famous statement made in February, 1941, when the President branded talk of a steel shortage as "a deliberate lie." Months later, testimony by Under Secretary of War Patterson and Rear Admiral Vickery of the Maritime Commission showed that we were already suffering from a steel shortage at that time. On last April 24 Mr. Roosevelt said the arms program was going so well, except in shipbuilding, that we would soon be able to raise our sights. The WPB's reports at that time showed production behind schedule, and as it happened shipbuilding was the only major item in which the President's "victory-program" goals were reached or surpassed. When the Truman committee on last May 26, months ahead of the Baruch report, called attention to the seriousness of our rubber problem, Mr. Roosevelt told the press next day that he did not think there was anything in the situation to cause excitement. "President Predicts Substitute to Meet Lack of Natural Rubber," said the headlines.

Plenty of Aluminum. Last fall the President told the press that there was no shortage of aluminum in airplane plants. Several weeks later the WPB in an official press release said plane production was hampered by shortages of aluminum and steel alloys. At the press conference on October 1 at which the President told of his tour through the nation's war plants, he reported that the war effort was being harmed by Congressional investigation of problems that Congressmen, as laymen, could not understand. These laymen, judging from the President's further remarks, seemed better observers than the experts advising Mr. Roosevelt. He said the war-production effort was accomplishing about 94 to 95 per cent of his January objectives and that quotas for 1943 might be raised in the next few months. Quotas for 1942 and 1943 were even then in the process of being reduced.

What of the Victory Program? We exceeded the program in shipbuilding but fell below it in the other three major items—planes, tanks, and anti-aircraft guns. The output of anti-aircraft guns was 15 per cent and of planes 20 per cent below the President's original goals. Tank production probably fell about 45 per cent below. Mr. Roosevelt had called for 45,000 tanks. The OWI hid the extent of the drop in tank production by lumping tanks with self-propelled artillery. It gave 32,000 as the number of tanks and self-propelled artillery produced last year. Mr. Roosevelt went one step farther and said, "In 1942 we produced 56,000 combat vehicles, such as tanks and self-propelled artillery." This total of 56,000 was reached by lumping scout cars and other combat vehicles with tanks and self-propelled artillery. This sort of thing is more likely to deceive our own people than the Axis. It is my guess that we did not produce more than 25,000 tanks last year.

Why Was Tank Output Cut? Earlier in the fall we were told that tank production was being cut to enable us to increase the output of planes. This explanation was puzzling since tanks are made of steel and planes largely of aluminum. Later it was said that we did not have enough ships to send so many tanks abroad; and again that we did not have enough steel to make so many tanks. The best figures I can obtain are that even the original 1943 goal of 75,000 tanks would have taken only 2 per cent of our output of carbon steel and 15 per cent of our output of alloy steel. Mr. Roosevelt has another explanation. "In tank production," he told Congress, "we revised our schedule—and for good and sufficient reasons. As a result of hard experience in battle, we have diverted a portion of our tank-producing capacity to a stepped-up production of new deadly field weapons, especially self-propelled artillery."

Other Possible Factors. Another reason for cutting the tank schedule may be the fact that the widely publicized tank arsenals of Detroit were not delivering the goods. The only figures I have are on Ford. He was supposed to reach peak schedule in production of tanks and self-propelled artillery last month. In September Ford output of tanks and self-propelled artillery was a little less than 15 per cent of peak schedule. My information is that the cut in tank schedules affected lend-lease only. It seems hard to believe that with the terrific mortality of tanks on the eastern front, the Russians could not use more tanks if they could get them.

Why Did We Fall Short? We fell short of the President's goals last year because the War Production Board under Donald M. Nelson was dilatory in curtailing civilian industry. Civilian radios were still being made six months after Pearl Harbor; production of stainless-steel knick-knacks for the luxury trade went on until September. Control of materials and inventories was slack, and to a large degree remains so. Little real effort was made to force subcontracting to idle facilities in smaller business and thus reduce the need for building new factories and making new machine tools. There was no attempt to plan or organize the conversion of industry. Three-fourths of the war contracts were handed to 100 large corporations, and they were left to do the job pretty much as it suited their convenience.

Critical Point. Having cut our production goals to fit our supply of materials, the danger now is that we shall cut plans to expand materials on the ground that these are no longer needed. This would be a great victory for the basic material-producing industries, which have opposed expansion from the start of the defense program. The expansion of production facilities has followed a pattern which is illogical from the standpoint of national defense but logical from the standpoint of big-business interest. The logical way from the national standpoint was first to expand production of basic materials and then of the facilities to turn these materials into weapons. The actual figures as disclosed last month to the Senate Small Business Committee showed that expansion programs were farthest advanced in facilities for making items which do not compete with normal business, like guns and shells, while the greatest lag was in facilities for producing basic materials. As of September 30 last only 2 per cent of the program for non-ferrous metals including aluminum had been 100 per cent completed, compared with 12 per cent of all expansion and 24 per cent of the programs for making guns and ammunition. Others which showed a low percentage of completion were: non-manufacturing (power lines, etc.), 2 per cent; chemicals, including synthetic rubber, 3 per cent; iron and steel products, 4 per cent; petroleum and coal products, 7 per cent. As of September 30, too, the greatest proportion of projects deferred was in the production of basic materials. Of $354,000,000 in deferred projects, $130,000,000 was in iron and steel; $113,000,000 in chemicals; $102,000,000 in non-ferrous metals.

Weaknesses. We are not getting maximum potential output of materials, and the pressure for expanded materials output has lessened, if anything, in the past few months, with the cut in production goals. On the production front, from what I could see and learn in the Middle West recently, there is great waste of manpower and machinery. Morale is poor because workers feel that much big-business management doesn't have its heart in the war effort. "Thousands of usable tools in America are but fractionally employed. They can produce satisfactory work. They must be put to work to speed the job by filling the gap for which many new tools have been ordered." The quotation is from a directive issued to prime contractors as recently as December 15, 1942, by Under Secretaries Patterson and Forrestal and Chairman Nelson of the WPB. Unfortunately this is another of those directives that place too great a strain on human nature. It asks prime contractors to cut down their own backlogs by assigning "an aggressive open-minded official" to reexamine their contracts and "comb out every part that warrants subcontracting consideration (reserving the tough ones for your own manufacture)." Since the tough ones are the ones on which the contractor is most likely to lose money, this is asking a good deal. How long will it take us to learn that our army of machines, like our army of men, cannot be efficiently organized on a purely voluntary basis?

Not a Total Effort. "We cannot afford the luxury of self-congratulation on the production record of 1942," says the final report of the Tolan committee.

It represents substantial gains, to be sure, over the low levels of 1941, but it is the product of America's unorganized might and far short of our organized productive capacity, to say nothing of the stated goals. Not only have our allies suffered severely for lack of the lend-lease supplies we have been unable to deliver, but even the equipment of our own forces is very uneven.

And Congressman Bender of Cleveland adds in a separate opinion of his own:

As long as the bulk of small productive capacity in the country remains unused . . . as long as 80 per cent of all contracts remain in the hands of the 100 major corporations . . . without centralized direction, scheduling, or proper subcontracting, we cannot expect that the peace will be any different from the character of our own war effort to date.

Mr. Roosevelt owes it to us to pay some attention to this pattern instead of merely boasting to Congress that we produced 10,250,000 rounds of small-arms ammunition last year, "five times greater than our 1941 production."

Russia and the West

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

I N A memorable address delivered on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Bolshevik revolution Joseph Stalin expressed confidence in the "progressive rapprochement of the U. S. S. R., Great Britain, and America" and reported that Churchill's visit to Russia had "established complete mutual understanding between the leaders of the two countries." He admitted that there were some persons—whether in Russia or the West he did not say—who had no confidence in this coalition because it contained "conflicting ideologies and heterogeneous elements." But in refutation he pointed to the indubitable fact of the coalition and insisted that "a common threat imperatively imposes the necessity of common action." He brought his survey of the relations of Russia with the United Nations to a conclusion with the succinct observation that "the logic of facts is stronger than any other logic."

Western liberalism might well regard this statement as an admission by the Communist leader that the logic of history had not conformed to Communist logic. The complexities of history have perhaps overwhelmed the blueprints of the Communist "dialectic of history." According to these blueprints, capitalist and Communist societies were arrayed in irreconcilable enmity toward each other. In reality they found themselves collaborating against a common foe whom both regarded as more sinister than either had once thought the other.

It would not be fair, however, to interpret Stalin's words as an admission of the failure of history to conform to Communist blueprints without recognizing that many Western observers, both on the right and the left, were as certain as the Communists of the irreconcilable contradiction between the Communist and the democratic world. This feeling was strong enough on both sides to have made collaboration impossible if the stronger "logic of facts" had not intervened; that is, if Hitler had not attacked Russia, and Japan had not subsequently attacked the United States.

If there are those in the Western world who still bear resentment against Stalin for his pact with Germany, without which the war could not have started, they should remember that the same Stalin had actually capitulated to the logic of history before history used facts as a bludgeon. When Russia joined the League of Nations and sought a scheme of "collective security," Stalin practically announced that he no longer followed the Communist blueprint, that he made distinctions between various "capitalist" powers which had no validity in orthodox Communist thought, and that he was ready to cooperate with some of these powers in order to stop a type of international politics which neither Communist nor liberal interpretations of history had envisaged. He resorted to the pact with Germany only after the other policy met no response from the West. His alliance with Germany proved abortive, even in the short run; but it was hardly more abortive than the capitalist powers' sacrifice of Czecho-Slovakia or their guaranty of Poland's territorial integrity without a previous understanding with Russia.

With respect to past failures the score is fairly even. It is obvious today that the war against Germany can be won only by collaboration between the Western world and Russia based on fairly intimate mutual understanding. But the more important aspect of the situation is that, despite the testimony of both clerical and economic reactionaries to the contrary, this intimate mutual understanding must be continued after the war if a durable peace is to be established. How this is to be achieved in the face of the still existing ideological differences between the Western world and Russia is the question. If we want to give Russia the advantage, we define the difference as one between communism and capitalism. If we feel self-righteous, we define it as one between dictatorship and democracy. The very fact that the difference can be stated in such contradictory terms illumines the serious character of the ideological conflict. If the Western world were not uneasy about its unsolved economic problems it would not approach the Communist answer to those problems so emotionally. On the other hand, there is no reason for an uncritical acceptance of the Russian solution. We ought to be grateful that the logic of history has refuted some of the Communist answers to our problems, for we might not have had the wit to refute them as effectively. We know that the democratic world has not yet found a way to achieve basic security and justice in a technical society. But we also know that actually Communist equalitarianism concentrates economic and political power in a small oligarchy, that such an oligarchic rule is destructive of fundamental liberties, and that the Communist hope that the dictatorship, together with the state itself, will wither away is the most pathetic of utopian illusions.

We shall be successful in ironing out our ideological differences only if we assume that neither side has the complete answer to the vexatious problem of social and political justice. We should certainly look with suspicion upon the testimony of those who affect to be shocked by the Communist solution of our unsolved problems, but would in reality be shocked by any solution that threatened their privileges.

It will be important also to appreciate what we have in common with Russia and to recognize the distinction between the Russian and the Nazi dictatorship. In his anniversary address Stalin defined our common ideals as the "equality of nations," "the liberation of enslaved nations," and "the restoration of democratic liberties." If we can hardly hide an ironic smile at his mention of the third point, we must allow him the same privilege when we concur in the first. The fact is that though communism uses dictatorship brutally, it does not exalt it as an end in itself. Nor does it worship either race or war. Its moral cynicism is only provisional, and it is never morally nihilistic, as the Nazis are. It is, in fact, ultimately utopian in morals, just as is the liberal-democratic world. The Communists believe in the possibility of banishing force from social life by one final rigorous application of it in the class struggle. The liberal world, until the "logic of facts" dissuaded it, believed that history was gradually eliminating force from social and political life. It would be difficult to decide which of these two illusions contributed more to the emergence of a political cynicism which glorifies force without regard to justice. But at any rate we should recognize that communism believes in universal standards of justice. If the means by which it has sought to attain them have sometimes led to their destruction, that is not altogether a new phenomenon in history. Consider, for instance, the consequences of laissez-faire economics.

Ideally, collaboration between the Communist and the democratic world might lead to a wholesome exchange of political experience. The Communists are already admitting that the capitalist world is not so devoid of justice or so completely untrustworthy as their dogma had led them to assume. We might possibly arrive at similar conclusions. We have, on the whole, more liberty and less equality than Russia has. Russia has less liberty and more equality. Whether democracy should be defined primarily in terms of liberty or of equality is a source of unending debate. But history proves fairly conclusively that if we subordinate one too much to the other, we shall end by losing both.

A fruitful interchange between Russia and the democracies must not be expected to achieve a common culture in which all differences will be effaced. That a world order depends upon a common culture is a favorite thesis of utopians, who imagine the achievement of universal standards to be simpler than it is. Modern democracies have had to learn how to maintain domestic tranquillity under conditions of cultural pluralism; and it is hardly likely that the world scene will be less complex or more amenable than a single nation. There must be agreement upon minimum standards of equity in a world political order. Above all there must be a strong coincidence between the self-interest of the various national units and the requirements of peace in the international structure. But in matters of culture and of economic organization mutual forbearance will be more important than uniformity.

The relations between the Communist and the democratic world after the war will be somewhat analogous to the relations between Catholicism and Protestantism after the Thirty Years' War. That war, it will be remembered, proved that neither of these divisions of Christendom could establish its supremacy over Europe. The Peace of Westphalia solved the problem by a whole series of compromises which conformed to the "logic of facts" but not to any other logic. The analogy is not complete because democracy and communism have not been at war with each other but have collaborated in defeating a common foe; it is, nevertheless, a valid one. The conflict between Catholicism and Protestantism was, on the economic side, a conflict between the older feudal-agrarian order and the rising middle classes. The conflict between liberal democracy and communism is one between the middle classes and the workers. In a sense the liberal-democratic world is a secularized version of Protestantism, while communism is a secularized version of Catholicism, which may be one reason why the Church hates the Kremlin with an almost pathological hatred. Each side is inclined to feel that the truth of its doctrine is so irrefutable that history must give it the victory, but history is never so clear-cut in its decisions as human logic. Americans who imagine that they can establish a world order upon the basis of American conceptions of "free enterprise" will be as certainly frustrated by the complexities of history as Communists, because of those same complexities, will be disappointed in their hope of a world revolution.

The possibility of achieving a stable world order, with Russia as one of the dominant nations of that order, is enhanced by the fact that Russia and the Western nations have a common interest in its establishment. The primary obstacle to achieving it is found in the relationship between Russia and the remnants of the worldwide Communist Party. Russia, as a nation, is not aggressive. All its natural inclinations will be for the maintenance of peace and the status quo after the war. But the Communist Party is the symbol and the instrument of Russia's spiritual imperialism, or rather of the worldwide ambitions of a political movement which has Russia for a base and which ostensibly still desires a world revolution. Stalin has proved again and again that the instincts and responsibilities of a Russian statesman dominate his thought and lead to a subordination of the purer Communist faith, of which Leon Trotsky was in a sense the symbol.

Joseph Stalin

How are the requirements of Russian statesmanship related to the maintenance of this revolutionary threat against the nations with which Russia must collaborate? Is Soviet support of the Communist Party merely a remnant of the faith of another day, or does it increase the power of Russia in its relations with the Western world? If it adds to Russian power, does it give an advantage which the other nations cannot tolerate? Perhaps there is another analogy here between our post-war world and the world after the Thirty Years' War. It will be remembered that the Peace of Westphalia outlawed the Jesuit order, which was the political and international instrument of the Counter-Reformation. Part of the price which Catholicism had to pay for peace was the disavowal of its instruments of international power. Is there any guidance for us in this analogy? Or should we perhaps be warned by the futility of the attempt to suppress the Jesuits?

[Dr. Niebuhr will address himself to these questions in the second half of this article, which will appear in the next issue.]

Britain Is Not Amused

BY TOM WINTRINGHAM

[Mr. Wintringham's article was written before the assassination of Admiral Darlan. We are nevertheless glad to print the greater part of it for the light it throws on the reaction of the British people to the arrangement with Darlan and on the extent to which they have been kept in the dark concerning the popular attitude in this country.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

London, December 16

QUEEN VICTORIA, when some jest at her table touched on the things sacred to Victorianism, produced the crushing comeback: "We are not amused." The British people are no longer Victorian; it would not be possible today to name the things they hold sacred or to say definitely that there are any such things. Yet we are still capable of being shocked. When the full meaning of Admiral Darlan's appointment, and the consequences likely to occur in Italy and the rest of Europe, became clear to the British people, they were—to use the old Victorian word—flabbergasted. Patients suffering from shock do not react at once; they gasp. And very little in the way of visible reaction to this appointment has become obvious. There has not been the immediate fury of protest that greeted, seven years ago, the Hoare-Laval pact surrendering most of Abyssinia to Mussolini.

Even if such a fury of protest were felt, it would find few avenues of expression in the political blackout. The newspapers are under more severe pressure than ever before; the Parliament that was elected in 1935 on issues that no one remembers is not allowed to debate the matter openly. A debate on Darlan has taken place in secret session; this means that M. P.'s are gagged and cannot refer again to the matter for fear of revealing or appearing to reveal whatever secrets were then placed before them. Neither censorship nor closed sessions of Parliament are defended any longer on the ground that secrecy is necessary to prevent our enemies learning things useful to them; the excuse is that our allies must not hear things which would displease them. As our allies now include Admiral Darlan, public debate on his appointment becomes difficult. Perhaps it would be simpler to acknowledge the real reason for secrecy, which is clearly that certain things ought to be concealed, not for fear that our enemies or our allies will learn of them, but for fear that the British people will.

In 1941 and 1942 North Africa served as the main prison camp for that government in which Admiral Darlan was at all material times either the second or the third man. Mr. Churchill, giving a message of encouragement to the French people during this period, promised them that they should be free again "in spite of the infamies of Laval and Darlan." The French penal settlement at Devil's Island was a long way off and inaccessible. So Laval and Darlan made, for those who opposed fascism and "infamy," new devil's islands in the hell of the Sahara. To the famine and misery of these prisons were sent Jews by the thousands, French anti-fascists, French patriots, Spaniards who had fought against General Franco, refugees from Hitler, and nearly a thousand men from the International Brigades. They are there still. So far as we can find out, most of them are likely to stay there. President Roosevelt has made a request, and Admiral Darlan has answered it by announcing a grudging "amnesty." But the officials instructed to carry out this amnesty are those handpicked in the past by Darlan for their loyalty to fascism and their eagerness to collaborate in setting up Hitler's New Order.

These men may of course find it difficult to resist the natural generosity of their natures. Or they may, like other French officials in similar circumstances, point out that the amnesty cannot be implemented until all cases have been inquired into; it would be contrary to the great principle of equality to take one case before another and contrary to good bureaucratic procedure to allow release until all forms have been filled out. The fact that many of these forms are not yet printed is not their responsibility.

Even the best intelligence services have strange gaps in them: by some such curious omission the British government was never informed, four or five years ago, about the thousands of Germans and Italians fighting on General Franco's side in Spain. In the same way it is apparently impossible for the British government to discover whether any anti-fascists have been released in North Africa. It begins to appear odd to the British public that the correspondents of our newspapers, accredited to our forces there, never manage to say a word about these prisoners.

Most curious of all is the fact, well known to the whole of Fleet Street, that if the British government really desired to find out about these prisoners it need only lift a telephone and call the headquarters of Fighting France. There it could hear not only about 10,000 Frenchmen and 15,000 foreigners in the camps, but also about men who were on our side at Dakar long ago, men who welcomed and helped the American landing in November, but who have been not only jailed but subjected to certain ingenious tortures to make them reveal their "accomplices."

One argument about Darlan particularly puzzles the British: that this is just an American job. When they see the British Admiral Cunningham standing beside Admiral Darlan to take the salute of British forces in North Africa—a photograph widely reproduced here—they feel less certain that this can be true. When they read of a young sergeant in a French tank unit who surrendered to American troops and asked to join them, but who was sent home and then chased and shot at by Darlan's police as a deserter, they are astonished also to read that this man was smuggled out of North Africa by an American official. And those who read their newspapers with any care find it extraordinary that we are not allowed to know what American newspapers and public men are saying about Darlan. People here begin to suspect a neat operation: that in Britain the Americans are blamed, while when protests rise in America someone else is blamed—perhaps the British. Neither people is allowed to know what the other is saying and feeling.

Only in one solitary British newspaper have I come across the sort of protest that we all expected to hear from America. The booming voice of Mr. Willkie got through to a London evening newspaper. Our evening papers, unlike our morning ones, do not cover the whole country. What Mr. Willkie says is news; yet what he said with great clearness in that article did not reappear in any of the morning papers that I saw; and I see too many.

Therefore while it is true that a few of the more simple-minded among the English are glad to say, "Of course it's the Americans' fault," the bulk of the population is more or less conscious that America is divided on the subject, and that the plan for using a Quisling victory to frustrate a European revolution is not likely to be popular with the American people.

The purely military argument advanced by General Catroux against the Darlan policy appeals to something rather fundamental in the British character. We like fighting from a secure base. The base does not have to be big; in 1940 it was not much bigger than these little islands. But it has to be "well found." It is a nasty feeling even for the man in the street to realize that while the British First Army with its American comrades-in-arms is pushing into Tunisia, its communications and radio stations and police, the power to move troops and the power to grant exit or entry permits to "tourists" are in the hands of a man the Germans found useful and accommodating when they were robbing and ruining France.

What is going to be done about it? In this country as I write people are recovering a little from being flabbergasted. Sometimes, after a bad bombing, the surgeons find that the effect of shock is not noticeable until the next day. That next day is coming here; a delayed reaction is setting in. Christmas and the New Year mean that Parliament is on holiday; but it is still a custom here to make good resolutions on New Year's Eve. The British people were told that Darlan's position was only temporary; they may easily make the good resolution that "temporary" does not mean 1943. How successful they will be in putting this resolution into practice probably depends largely on the possibility of linking together British and American efforts against Darlanism. If this link is not made, we shall get only a very slight change—from Darlan to Giraud or the like. But if the link is made, the American and British peoples may cease to fight an imperial war for the reestablishment of empires, and may begin to wage the people's war for which Europe is hungrily waiting.

Harlem at War

BY CHARLES WILLIAMS

IN HARLEM, the country's largest Negro community, the war doesn't seem to matter much. The people there have asked the question, "What will the war bring us?" The answer, as most of them see it, is "Nothing." They still want the United Nations to win, but only casually. They are for the United Nations as a matter of form, but their hearts aren't in it.

Harlem's people hoped for a while that the inequalities which "stung and dishonored" them would be swept away in the war. It was, after all, a war for the Four Freedoms. At the very least, they thought, race barriers in industry would go down under the pressure of war needs. They know better now. "It is true that some jobs have been opened to us," they say, "that economically we are better off. But most Harlem people can still find work only as domestics, chauffeurs, or common laborers. In other ways discrimination has not lessened; it has become more blatant and cruel." At a time when its soldier sons are dying, Harlem is conscious of this with an intensity that few white people realize. As a community, it feels oppressed and cheated.

You find this mood expressed in Harlem's newspapers, from its pulpits, on its street corners, among intellectuals and cleaning women—everywhere. One day last fall, for example, a typical cartoon in the Amsterdam Star-News showed a dead Negro soldier at the feet of a hard-faced military policeman with a smoking gun; the caption was, "Thanksgiving, U. S. A." A young Negro, refusing to report for induction into the army, wrote, "I cannot fight fascists in an army where I am treated as an inferior citizen." An editorial in the People's Voice said, "The tax on being black is still being levied." An educated and talented Negro with whom the writer was going to lunch paused before a restaurant and said quietly, "I can't go in there, you know." A letter from a Negro soldier in a Southern camp, quoted in the People's Voice, said, "Just yesterday they hanged a soldier only three miles from camp for no reason at all. . . . I am scared to leave camp."

The mistreatment of Negroes in the services is a continuing cause of Harlem's cynicism about the war. Murders may be infrequent, but Harlem runs over with accounts of "clubbings, insults, and abuse." "Morale builders," one person called them sardonically. One hears of Negro soldiers beaten by white civilians in Florence, South Carolina; of the jailing and beating of a Negro nurse attached to the Tuskegee Army Air Corps; of army nurses compelled to go without food for eighteen hours while en route through Texas; of soldiers, back on furlough from the Solomons, treated well aboard ship but made to sleep on the floor of their train across the continent. It is difficult to determine the truth of these stories; the significant fact is that they circulate and are believed and resented.

Harlem is proud of its soldiers. It thinks that they are probably among the best in the country. But this does not affect its attitude toward the army's segregation policy and the navy's restrictions on Negro personnel. Some people in Harlem express disapproval of Joe Louis for donating the proceeds of one fight to Navy Relief.

The experiences of its boys in Southern army camps have given Harlem a new and keen interest in the problems of Southern Negroes. This was evident during the recent poll-tax debate. Though Harlem, of course, is not affected by the poll tax, the defeat of the bill to repeal it was taken hard, at least among the more intelligent elements of the community. Newspapers pointedly noted that reports of the bill's defeat were not permitted to reach Negro soldiers outside the country. A delegation of prominent New York Negroes, among them five ministers, went to Washington to observe the Senate debate on the bill. They were at first refused admittance to the Senate gallery, and were finally herded out of a Senate corridor at the point of guns. It was noticed with disillusion in Harlem that Vice-President Wallace, who had spoken so ringingly of the Century of the Common Man, failed to acknowledge a report of the incident sent to him. In a passionately angry editorial the Reverend Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., editor of the People's Voice, wrote that the affair revealed that Washington "stinks with jimcrow, discrimination, prejudice, and hatred. . . . Now the stench and decay have reached into the Capitol itself."

Harlem, of course, is itself the creation of Jim Crowism, which is only less onerous in New York than in the South. For all New York's vaunted liberalism, Negroes can seldom obtain apartments outside of Harlem and a few other strictly Negro sections. Nor are they permitted to eat in many of the city's restaurants. Some Negroes like to speculate on why New York liberals, who become so furiously concerned at the least injustice to people in Burma or India, do so little about similar injustices in their own city. Though Harlem contains New York's worst slums, rents are higher there than elsewhere in the city—this, you are told, is part of the "tax on being black." Food prices are higher, too, though Harlem housewives complain that only the poorest grades of food are sold there. School and hospital facilities are miserable. I walked up Lenox Avenue, in the heart of Harlem, with a Negro lawyer. "Here it is in all its glory," he said, pointing to rows of run-down, vermin-infested tenements in the side streets; "Harlem, the outhouse of New York, the thing for which we are expected to die joyously in the jungles of New Guinea or the deserts of Africa."

Harlem's "better elements" chafe under the impression, created by newspapers, that their community is overrun with crime. They admit that Harlem's crime rate is high but maintain that it is "no higher than in some other sections of New York, and certainly lower than newspaper accounts would indicate." Many stories of Negroes assaulting policemen are trumped up, they say, to conceal unjustifiable police assaults on Negroes. The People's Voice listed last month three instances of Negroes shot without provocation by policemen. But New York newspapers headed their account of at least one of these, "Detective Shoots Mugger." If the police want to clean up Harlem, its people ask you, why don't they curb prostitution and marijuana peddling? Why isn't something done to relieve its dreadful poverty?

It would be misleading to imply that Harlem has fallen into a kind of static despair, that it is waiting without much hope for something to be done for it. As a community Harlem is thoroughly tired of "Uncle Tomism." It is convinced that Negroes must organize and fight for what they want. The least popular Negro leaders in Harlem are those who advise forgetting about grievances for the duration. The Communists tried this for a while and lost followers in droves. A. Philip Randolph, chairman of the March on Washington movement, which compelled President Roosevelt to set up the Fair Employment Practices Committee, expressed Harlem's feeling at a meeting early this fall. "Negroes made the blunder of closing ranks and forgetting their grievances in the last war," he said. "We are resolved that we will not make that blunder again. Some of our appeasers say that if Negroes persist in fighting for their rights now, they are going to have trouble. Well, Negroes are already having trouble, and a little more trouble won't hurt." At one time the better-situated Negroes, the professionals and the intellectuals, thought they could rise to equality as individuals, by virtue of education and accomplishment. That notion has been quite thoroughly killed. "It doesn't matter who you are or think you are when you run up against the forces of reaction," Mr. Powell observed after his experience in the Senate, "a Negro is a Negro." As a result, some of the most able and gifted Negroes, who had more or less deserted Harlem, now are back in the fight.

Harlem is aware, of course, that it has made and is making gains. It is proud that most of these, like the formation of the Fair Employment Practices Committee, are the result of the Negro's own efforts. It is encouraged by the new job opportunities that the Fair Employment Practices Committee has created. It is elated, though not in any servile manner, by every sign of fraternization between whites and Negroes. To realize how much this means to people who know that they deserve equality, one has only to look at their newspapers. They print with poignant eagerness pictures of Negro and white merchant-marine sailors swinging down a street together. The news that a single Negro girl had been given employment in the office of A. S. Beck was run under a two-column headline. The fact that no segregation exists at Fort Sill is jubilantly cited as proof that whites and blacks can get on together. Unfortunately, these signs of sanity in race relations, in comparison with what is happening in the country as a whole, are few and widely scattered.

It is a tribute to Harlem's basic loyalty to America that fascist propaganda has made no substantial inroads. Leonard Robert Jordan, the "Black Hitler" jailed by the FBI, had but a sparse following. Japanese propagandists, with customary thoroughness, invaded Harlem years before the outbreak of war, urging the solidarity of color, and Christian Front propagandists tried to exploit Harlem's resentment against some Jewish landlords. Apparently their combined efforts had only negligible results. Some of Harlem's people were surreptitiously pleased by the early "brown" men's successes against "white" Americans and English, and now, out of hurt-born malice rather than disloyalty, some talk of what Africans "will do to Americans if they get smart." Anti-white sentiment of a kind shows itself in other ways. A Negro soldier, asked to name a great member of his race, replied, "Joe Louis, because I don't think there's another Negro who doesn't go out of his way for the white man." But this is only race consciousness, which the country by every device of wrongheadedness has brought to a new pitch; it is not sedition.

Harlem's heightened race consciousness has taken a turn that is constructive and immensely interesting. Partly as a result of the insistent hammering of its newspapers and many of its leaders, Harlem is acquiring a sense of oneness with India, China, the West Indies, and, of course, Africa. A recent cartoon in the People's Voice showed an American Negro soldier holding a placard reading, "War Aims: Freedom Not Only for the People of Ravished Europe but Also for the Millions of Oppressed Colored People in Africa." Father Divine, who remains perhaps the most influential single person in Harlem, still preaches peace and tells his followers that only the freeing of all colored peoples everywhere can end war.

A few persons, such as Frank Crosswaith, chairman of the Negro Labor Committee, and A. Philip Randolph, have at various times tried to imbue Harlem with some enthusiasm for the war. They have emphasized how much worse off Negroes would be under Hitler. It is, one person observed, "the kind of argument you can take into your head but not into your heart." The Communists are about the only important group in Harlem earnestly for the war. The best indication of how hard pressed Negro leaders are to justify active support of the war to their followers was provided by Mr. Powell several weeks ago. "My faith is really blind now," he confessed. "If it were not for that blind faith, this present society would not offer much to the Negro people."

What Harlem's leaders want most, however, is to direct the community's discontent into constructive channels. They are urging their people to study and improve themselves. More important, they are exhorting them to fight for their rights as a group. A meeting several months ago was told that "every Negro, big and little, preacher and craps shooter, Ph.D. and jitterbug, social worker and whist fan, lawyer and longshoreman, must be made to realize that he must join with other Negroes to win our democratic rights now." The war is still regarded as a great, though swiftly fading, opportunity to accomplish something big. There is a feeling that should this war-time opportunity pass, the Negro will face a bleak eternity of fighting for piecemeal concessions which somehow will never add up to the one thing he really wants—equality. Harlem's leaders are saying, "If we don't fight for our rights during this war, while the government needs us, it will be too late after the war."

Whether Harlem, the country's largest Negro community, will rise to these exhortations—they are being heard in many other Negro communities, too—it is difficult to say. But while it debates whether or not to fight its own war, it isn't going to get very excited about the World War—not unless in some tangible way we demonstrate that both wars are the same.

"Suffer Little Children"

BY HERTA PAULI

WHEN I get to Lisbon," I told my little friend Marinka in Marseilles, "I'll send you fruits and chocolate." She shook her head earnestly: "Ca n'existe plus." If Marinka still lives, she is a big girl now—all of ten years old. I left Europe two years ago, but I still see her blue eyes and hear her sad grown-up voice. She never went to school, but at eight she spoke five languages, picked up in flight from one country to another. Her father was a Czech engineer; her ancestors were peasants settled in Bohemia for hundreds of years. Marinka was one of some 8,000 refugee children being cared for in France by various agencies before Hitler took over the whole country. Their present fate is unknown. It is often assumed that most refugees are Jews, but these were the children of the persecuted of all lands—of Spanish Loyalists interned in France, of Polish, Dutch, Belgian, or French fugitives driven from their homes by the Blitzkrieg, of patriots and anti-fascists and other sinners against Hitler's New Order.

Countless other homeless children, Jews and non-Jews, are scattered throughout Nazi Europe and the Near East. Last year the Joint Distribution Committee, the Jewish welfare agency known as "Joint" to a million people for whom it is the last hope, got 270 out of Rumania and Hungary with the aid of the International Red Cross. At present 800 are in Iran awaiting passage through Iraq; they came from Siberia but are Polish, their parents having fled into Soviet territory when Poland was overrun. A month ago the J. D. C.'s representative in Lisbon cabled, "Succeeded after great effort in effecting release approximately eighty women and children from Gerona and Figueras prisons." This number represented about one-tenth of the total held in Spanish camps and city jails.

Until last November, however, there were more child victims of Hitler in France than anywhere else, for the simple reason that the Third Republic had been the only country in Europe to grant asylum without asking for money or bail. The first group crossed the Rhine in 1936. Almost wholly Jewish, most of them orphans of concentration-camp "suicides," they were cared for by a Jewish social agency known as the O. S. E., which housed them in a model home in Paris. In 1938, the year of Anschluss and "peace in our time," there was an influx from Austria and Czecho-Slovakia, as well as Germany, and the O. S. E. branched out, founding homes in the provinces of France and boarding children with French families. In the first year of war its activities could still be called normal social work. The deluge came with the Nazi drive to the west, when hordes of fugitives from Holland, Belgium, and northern France filled the roads leading south.

After the armistice and the emergence of Vichy from the ashes of the French Republic, the Line of Demarcation seemed the frontier between hell and heaven.

Throughout 1940 children of all ages often reached it alone; desperate parents had simply told them to walk "south and keep walking. Many knew only one name to ask for—"O. S. E." But the line was at best the border between hell and purgatory, for it became Vichy practice to inform the O. S. E. that children who had crossed it would be sent back unless taken into its homes at once. When this condition was fulfilled, French police often raided the hostels to "remove refugees over sixteen." Some children thus kidnapped for deportation were actually no more than twelve.

The O. S. E. homes—eventually there were twelve in the "free" zone, one in Paris, and one in Bordeaux—were constantly filled to overflowing. Troops of little éclaireurs—French Jewish boy scouts—came marching in close order to seek their sanctuary. When the Jews were expelled from Alsace-Lorraine and 2,000 more children were made homeless, the O. S. E. set up children's centers and an orphanage in the three departments into which the fugitives were herded. Its patronages (welfare centers with day nurseries and canteens) served thousands. Other relief agencies helped: the American Unitarian, Quaker, and Y. M. C. A. missions distributed food and clothing, and the Swiss Aid took full charge of many orphans, though its work was on a smaller scale than that of the O. S. E. The American Red Cross decided that aid to children was not within its province, but a French clergyman, the Abbé Glassberg, founded a special organization, the Amitié Chrétienne, to extend Christian charity to these innocent victims of Nazi wrath. Nevertheless, distress continued to grow at a pace which no efforts to alleviate it could match.

It had been evident since 1939 that permanent rehabilitation of the children could only be accomplished by removing them overseas. The J. D. C. in this country succeeded in enlisting the aid of the United States Committee for the Care of European Children, headed by Marshall Field, and of Mrs. Roosevelt. The time, however, was unfavorable. The English children fleeing from the blitz absorbed the country's attention. Besides, some relaxation of immigration rules was a prerequisite, and this, just before election, could hardly be proposed. No action was obtained in 1940, but the O. S. E. in France, to prepare for a favorable decision, selected from among its charges 1,000 who were "suitable for emigration by state of health, self-reliance, and physical and mental development."

Self-reliant they were, indeed. Manfred, for instance, had fled alone from his native Berlin when his father was deported to Poland in the 1938 pogrom, wandered through Holland and Belgium, and reached France just ahead of the Panzer columns. There he had been arrested as a "spy," acquitted, and interned, and finally he had almost died of typhoid in a camp in southern France.

All he wanted, he wrote, was to "begin life over in America." Manfred was thirteen.

Early in 1941 the United States State Department finally granted 500 special "children's rescue visas." The children were waiting; passage, funds, American homes were arranged. But now a new problem arose—that of escorts. Months of consideration were necessary before thirty-five qualified ladies could be hired. The first transports arrived here in the summer of 1941. One little boy just off the ship was asked, "What do you want to be when you grow up?" "When I grow up," he said, "I want to be the man who gives the visas."

After 200 children had been brought over, their transportation ceased. There was fear of torpedoings; and besides, the Portuguese lines, whose vessels were the only ones available, had not always complied with immigration rulings.

Last summer the Nazis began to bear down on Jews and other refugees in the occupied countries of Western Europe. Mass deportations to the east were ordered. The victims were rounded up and herded together for transport like cattle in a stockyard; in Paris the stockyard was the famous bicycle racetrack, the Vélodrome d'Hiver. In the third week of July, 1942, and again in August the Vélodrome was more like hell than anything else the human mind can imagine. There was one lavatory in the place, and the seats were too high for small children; if they relieved themselves elsewhere the guards beat them. The children could not be washed; measles and scarlet fever broke out, but the German army doctors who were called in termed the cases "unclear" and refused to order segregation. When the trains were made up, adults and children were sent separately. A French eyewitness wrote, "Il fallait brutaliser les mères pour les faire ouvrir les bras."

For weeks after the roundups children of from two to five years were found in and near Paris in the streets, in cellars, in abandoned rooms. There was no way of identifying them. They were deported—"destination unknown."

A number of children managed to escape from these horrors to unoccupied France. Many were caught and returned, but others swelled the small army cared for by the O. S. E. and the Swiss and American relief organizations. At the same time, as a result of French revulsion at the pogroms and intervention by Catholic prelates, chiefly the Archbishop of Lyons, the Vichy authorities were releasing small groups of children from the internment camps, mainly from Gurs and Rivesaltes. The latter also housed the Spanish Loyalists' children, interned since 1938. There were not many children at Gurs, the O. S. E. reported, "since the greater part of them had been transferred to Rivesaltes, a number had died, and about 100 had been released."

One consequence of the Paris atrocities was the resumption of rescue sailings to America, 300 of the special visas being still available. Representatives of the Marshall Field committee selected fifty-five children to sail on the Portuguese liner Serpa Pinto in May, 1942. Of the fifty who left eventually for Lisbon, twenty-seven were Jewish refugees and twenty-three Spaniards. Social workers in France called them the "camp group" because all the children had been in concentration camps for longer or shorter periods. A special stop was arranged for their train at a station near Gurs, and the O. S. E. considered itself happy to obtain permission for fourteen mothers, interned there, to come and bid their children farewell, under guard. One of the escorts on the train described the meeting:

The children that morning knew that they were going to see their parents. Having been in camps themselves, they also knew how meager the food rations were. They did not eat their breakfast. Instead, they wrapped up bread, rolls, and bits of sugar, and when they met their parents, handed the food to them. The case of one little girl was particularly touching. She had been separated from her mother for more than a year, and had forgotten her native German because she had been learning English and French. When she met her mother, possibly for the last time, she could not converse with her. The package containing her breakfast which she handed over was her only way of showing how she felt—that, and the tears which streamed down her face.

The Serpa Pinto reached New York last June 25; the total number of children brought out of France was raised to 250. In August the unused 250 "special rescue visas" expired. On November 11 Hitler occupied the rest of France, sealing all roads of escape. And on November 15 the State Department granted 1,000 new children's visas.

Today some of the rescued children play in Central Park. The game is "prisoners and guards," with the guards beating the prisoners. But these children, the lucky 250, will probably forget.

Ever since November 11 offers to take refugee children have poured in on the various American organizations. Argentina, Chile, Mexico, Turkey, and other countries have agreed to open borders that previously were closed. In Washington, where 250 visas expired unused, 1,000 others lie unusable. American social agencies have had no word from their workers in France since the total occupation—they may have been arrested or shot. As to the children's fate, the worst must be feared. Only a few weeks ago the Polish government reported the execution of 250 children near Warsaw.

The children lie on the rack, undergo the trial. But we, the men and women who could have helped—governments, organizations, individuals—we are the accused. What we have done in the past was too little. What we are eager to do now—must it be too late?

In the Wind

THERE IS a measure of irony in the news that Republicans in Congress want to investigate "the public and private activities" of Harry Hopkins. Hopkins was one of the few among the President's advisers who believed that it did not matter if the Republicans won last year's elections. He urged the Administration against expending much effort on the campaign.

THE EMPLOYEES of a chemical firm in Nashville recently won an NLRB election and began negotiations for a contract. Since 98 per cent of the workers were Negroes, they thought it fitting to ask that Emancipation Day be included among their holidays. This was the only request at which the management balked. After long discussions it held firm but offered the union New Year's Day instead. The workers accepted, and only after the contract was signed did they remind the employers that Emancipation Day is January 1.

ACCORDING TO the London New Statesman and Nation, a shop in Shrewsbury recently started selling inexpensive busts of famous people. The first three in stock were Churchill, Lenin, and C. E. M. Joad, the liberal philosopher. Of the three, Joad, whose appearances on the Brains Trust radio program have earned him a reputation as a sort of British John Kieran, was the runaway best-seller.

KAISER SHIPYARD workers in Richmond, California, are staging a revue called "Hullzapoppin'."

SOME NAZI INDUSTRIALISTS apparently assumed that a German victory would be assured early in 1943. The contract for renewal of relations between American Bosch and Robert Bosch of Germany, the magneto manufacturers, reads: "... all agreements are suspended until March 31, 1943, or until the date of the termination of the war—whichever date is the later."

POLITICALLY SPEAKING, the time of day can often be read by noting what bait the Daily Worker is using to lure subscribers. At present it is offering a small American flag and a cast of the American eagle. "Show your pride in America," it says, "by draping Old Glory in a corner of your home or office!"

THE NEWSPAPERS said nothing about the marked differences in the volume of applause accorded our several allies when the President mentioned them in his message to Congress. China drew twice the ovation accorded to either the British or the Russians, and mention of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek brought down the house.

THE EIREAN PUBLISHING COMPANY of New York is offering a book which, it is claimed, proves that the Bible was written by Irishmen and that Hebrew is only a dialect of Gaelic.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Wanted: A Political Strategy for Asia

BY LIN YUTANG

I AM a believer in the Hindu idea of Karma, the doctrine of actions accompanied by their natural necessary consequences. In religion, it means retribution or divine justice. But in secular terms it means simply that we reap what we sow, that our present actions are determined by our previous actions and habits of thought, and they in turn produce certain reactions both on ourselves and others that we shall not be able to escape from in the future. Karma is no more than the law of cause and inescapable effect in the human realm of moral action. Buddha himself put this very well in clear psychological terms in the very first sentence of the "Dhammapadam": All that we are is the result of what we have thought: it is founded upon our thoughts, it is made up of our thoughts. Our political strategy today is based upon our past concepts of Asia, from which we cannot escape; and by our very actions today we are producing long-term political effects, real though invisible, from which our sons and grandsons shall benefit or suffer. It is my profound conviction that the course of Asia in the next decades is being determined here and now.

At present, no one but the Germans and the Japanese has a well-thought-out philosophy of war regarding Asia. It is remarkable that Haushofer himself has made "Monsoon Asia" and the Pacific the dynamic point of his geopolitical thought, that he has in concrete terms advocated a Eurasian transcontinental bloc as the ultimate aim of German power politics, and that he has seen the political value of allying the forces of Central Europe with the Asian independence movement ("Asia for the Asiatics") as a means of destroying the Anglo-American hegemony. It may be a godless philosophy, showing the last spasms of a dying deterministic and materialistic Weltanschauung; but it is a philosophy. We have not a philosophy of war or of peace anywhere to match it in its concrete global conceptions. What Germany is today is the result of what German Nazi leaders have thought; what we are doing to Asia today, as embodied in our political actions, is the result of what we have failed to think about Asia.

I cannot believe that the determining concepts of Asia in the brains of our democratic leaders, in contrast with the Germans, have ever gone beyond the Aladdin stage. Asia is no more than an Aladdin, and any specter conjured up of "an aroused Asia" can be received with no more than a half-amused and half-tolerant credulity. So far as our political strategy with regard to Asia hitherto is concerned, we have gone ahead planning our war and our peace whether Asiatics like it or not.

Two test cases make this apparent, India and China in this war. The impression is inescapable that we take the attitude that what the Indians think and feel does not matter, that we have sufficient force to quell the Indian rebellion, that the Congress leaders are safely in jail and out of harm's way, and, that being the case, that the situation is perfectly satisfactory. All we need to do is to defend India for the Indians out of a sort of noblesse oblige; in fact, we are stationing English troops in India for the very altruistic purpose of saving her from bloodshed and chaos. As if the denial of the Atlantic Charter to the Indians was not enough, and "lest there be any doubt in any quarters about it," Churchill declared the British war aims very classically in six words, "We mean to hold our own."

This point of view would be perfectly satisfactory for me if it were a private war between England and Germany. As the war happens to be not only a private war between Germany and Britain, but involves Americans, Russians, and Chinese, such a declaration produces a confusion among all the Allies and serves only to demonstrate that politically the Allies are marching out of step. There is no unified political strategy for Asia. So far as Asia's participation in this war is concerned, no greater damage could be done to the Allied cause than the six brief homely words with which Churchill expressed, I hope incorrectly, the war aims of the English people. What U S. saw and the Japanese saw, Churchill simply did not see. And if I interpret Churchill's words correctly, Britain is fighting a twentieth-century war in order to take off its boots after the war and climb into a nineteenth-century bed comfortably mattressed in India, Burma, Singapore, and Hongkong. There must be thousands of English people who think differently; if these liberals fail to speak out for the true England, they are doing a great disservice to their country and to the Allies. Since Churchill is too good a man to retract what he says, it will take not a few but a hundred English voices of the true England to counteract the harm he has done to the cause of the Allies. Unless indeed what Asia thinks does not matter.

The case of China throws into even greater relief the confusion arising from an inadequate political strategy for Asia. The complexity of the problem of India is matched by that of the political motives controlling Anglo-American policy toward China. The Atlantic Report in the Atlantic Monthly for January, which gives the best analysis of policy and consequences in Asia so far published, underscores the complexity of these motives. It says, "There is every reason to believe that the China front has been neglected for political rather than purely military reasons." It emphasizes that "this division of political attitudes toward Asia would be less alarming if it were not reflected in strategy." "Suspensions of China arise from ignorance of the Far East and from fear that a strong China and a strong Russia might develop aggressive tendencies. Hence the reluctance to crush Japan. Hence the argument that the course of wisdom consists in maintaining a strong Japan in order to block the ambitions of our present allies." We are still victims of power politics which frustrate our will to get together and fight and dream together for a better world to live in. Professors of geopolitics are lecturing at the army camps and injecting this godless Germanic poison into the minds of American boys.

On the surface, it would appear to be a sort of mystery that the China front, which by every sound conception of military and air strategy should be the primary front against Japan, should become the forgotten front; that China should receive 2 per cent of the lend-lease aid which is 12 per cent of the total American war production; that China should be asked to wait patiently under conditions of fantastic inflation and isolation from supplies for another three or four years until Europe's trouble is resolved, and that Japan be allowed the same number of years to consolidate her Greater Asia man-power and resources. It is also fantastic to believe China's offer of help in military strategy against Japan is not wanted, or that a unified strategy against Japan with China has not been formed a year after Pearl Harbor, or that the present Burma campaign is being planned without the knowledge of, or consultation with, available Chinese officers sitting in Washington. It would be like planning the restoration of the Atlantic sea lanes for England after their loss without consulting England.

No single factor can account for this anomaly, for which American boys will have to pay dearly with their lives when the time comes for crushing Japan. It would be entirely incorrect to infer that it is not America's determination to crush Japan when the preparations are ready. Part of the cause is to be found in ordinary bungling, and in the necessity for time in clarifying our ideas about a complex subject, and part of it is just Karma,

Drawing by H. Felix Kraus

SALUTE ON THE EASTERN FRONT

the accumulated mental inertia in the underestimation of Asia. But we must not assume that our political leaders are just "dumb" political blockheads.

The fact is, when there is no unified and clarified political strategy toward the role of the Asian world in our post-war visions, the result is not absence of political strategy but a confusion of lame and halting strategies. It is inevitable that there should be divisions among any allies, and it is natural that each nation should think first of its own interests. Obviously, Hitler is a greater danger to England than Japan, while Japan is a greater danger to China than Hitler. Obviously also, American revulsion against Hitler is more against his ideology and more intellectual, while revulsion against Japan is more instinctive and based on the realities of the future of the Pacific area. It would be true to say that a small percentage of Americans hate Germans as Germans while a large percentage hate the Japs as Japs. But we must also think for England. It is obviously to England's disadvantage to crush Japan before she finishes with Hitler. If Japan should be crushed now while England has her hands full with Hitler, what would happen to Singapore and Hongkong and the whole Pacific area when Japan evacuates? Clearly American influence would predominate. On the other hand, supposing England wishes to crush Japan completely, she would wish to have her own soldiers on the spot in sufficient strength when Hongkong and Singapore and the whole Pacific area are being reoccupied. That can be only when Hitler is liquidated, and the entire R. A. F. can move to Asia.

Problems immediately arise when a conquered area is recovered. I have far too much respect for England's political sense to believe that she wishes her own disadvantage by defeating Japan too early. And when Russia's shadow looms too large, power politics, or what they call political "realism," requires a strong Japan to check a strong Russia. That is where the danger lies, the very seed for a terrible war hereafter, and that is why we liberals cannot go on with the innocent assumption that our diplomats are just unthinking blockheads. Following again the doctrine of Karma, I believe our political thinking today is sowing seeds whose fruit we shall reap only a few years from now. Nothing less than a reeducation of our power politicians or their removal from positions of power can save the world for a common peace. I refuse to believe that the power politicians who were associated with the London Non-Intervention Committee or with the Munich era are capable of getting out of the ruts of their thinking at this time of their life and devising for us anything other than an illusory peace of power politics.

Whatever the motives for ignoring both India's and China's part in planning the grand strategy of this anti-Axis war, the fact stands out that a condition of deplorable confusion in Allied political strategy toward Asia

HOW TO BE A GOOD SPANIARD

In spite of the continued overtures of Britain and the United States, General Franco's anti-appeasement policy goes on unchecked. The latest expression of fascist Spain's feeling for Britain is contained in a leaflet published by the Phalanx, of which Franco himself is now the leader. The leaflet sets forth "Ten Commandments for a Good Spaniard." One commandment runs: "Do not spread false rumors and slanders, for they are invented in criminal fashion by the British Secret Service." Another is: "Do not forget that Great Britain is responsible for everything evil which your country is compelled to suffer." A third is: "Think daily of Gibraltar and swear to regain it." A fourth is: "Hate England and pity the English."

exists. This confusion and the division of mind are making a sane and sound, logical plan for defeating Japan with the minimum cost impossible; on the other hand, they are causing a dangerous gamble with a consolidated and well-intrenched Japan and an isolated and disgruntled China. This confusion regarding Asia is closely related to the confusion regarding Russia. This confusion also paralyzes any willingness to create an Allied Supreme War Council, at least with the participation of Russia and China as equal partners, and results in the exclusive domination by Britain and America of war conduct and strategy. It is now clearly established that Anglo-American domination of the war existed in 1942, with no pretense of equality for the other United Nations. It is further clearly established that the strategy born of this Anglo-American domination is not entirely free of the suspicion of placing certain national interests above the common interests of all allies, and that even American and British aims in Asia and the Pacific are not the same. If, for instance, the broad policy of "defeating Hitler first" had been fairly discussed and decided upon in an Allied Supreme War Council with China's proper representation, instead of being arrived at arbitrarily by America and England, China would have less ground to complain, since this decision really involves and practically decrees at least three years of prolonged and intense suffering on China's part. Is this type of Allied leadership merely the continuation of the old big-power leadership at the League of Nations?

It is impossible not to draw the inference that Anglo-American domination of the war means Anglo-American domination of the peace and the post-war world. It is also unconvincing to tell the United Nations that there will be equality among the nations in the peace when there is not even a pretense of equality among the United Nations, or even the nations actually fighting, during the war.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

ON NEW YEAR'S DAY the Führer told his people two things about the enemy. In one place in his speech he said the Allies had hypocritically promised a heaven on earth to Germany; a few sentences farther on he said they were preparing a veritable hell for it. In the earlier passage he asserted that the enemy was "seeking to befog the German people with empty words . . . to undermine their morale with lying hypocritical phrases"; and then later, "the enemy has proclaimed his intention to tear German children from their parents, to butcher millions of young men, to split up the Reich and exploit it when it is helpless."

The truth is that Allied propaganda is so on its guard against making any commitments that it promises Germany absolutely nothing; it is often criticized for just this by persons who advocate dangling alluring peace terms before the German people. But neither has it ever played with the idea of revenge; the subject has never been mentioned by official spokesmen and very seldom by private individuals. In any case most Germans would think it improbable that the enemy would simultaneously use two methods that nullified each other. This was the mixture, however, out of which the Nazi leaders concocted their holiday meditations—not only Hitler but Goebbels and a host of lesser figures.

One ingredient of the mixture, the threatened hell on earth, needs no elaboration here. The horrible fate Germans must expect if they are defeated has often been cited to stimulate their will to win. It is the propaganda bureau's ace of trumps. On the other hand, the frequency and violence of the polemics against the siren song of a future heaven on earth are new. Evidently fresh cracks have appeared in the home front, and it is feared that the people may be taken in by the enemy's seductive promises. Of course their lowered morale is really due to the war's turn for the worse, but the Nazi leaders are trying to instill the notion that it stems from the enemy's lying insinuations. If the people can be convinced that the cause of their depression is a falsehood, they will struggle against it with a better heart.

The most interesting feature of the new "propaganda against propaganda" is that England and America are always singled out as the deceivers and never Russia. Russia is a threat to life and limb, but only the Anglo-Saxons are attacking Germany's virtue. Russia is simply a murderous foe, while the Western Allies are craftily trying to ensnare the German soul. This counter-propaganda has been gathering volume in recent weeks, but never once, so far as the present writer can discover, has it dwelt on Russian trickery. Repeated warnings are issued against listening to the broadcasts from London, but none against those from Moscow.

The Nazis have been building up a defense against Anglo-American propaganda ever since Hitler drew his distorted picture of Germany's betrayal in 1918. Actually, of course, Germany's capitulation was brought about almost exclusively by the military situation, not by a psychological breakdown. But if there were any contributing psychological factors, the most important was undoubtedly the influence of the Russian Revolution. For Hitler, however, British propaganda, or rather Woodrow Wilson, was to blame for everything. It was Wilson who "with his Fourteen Points managed to bring about the spiritual disintegration of the unconquered German people and thus their destruction."

Now as then, according to the Nazi spokesmen, the American President seeks to make a dupe of Germany—of course in vain. "Wilson rendered the German nation forever immune to any second attempt. Since his time the word of an American President has counted for nothing. . . . Had the Germans in 1918, instead of putting their faith in Wilson's phrases, continued the fight with iron determination, the hostile forces encircling us would have collapsed." Today Germany is well aware that it must resist the siren song of the "English and American Jews."

The gentlemen in Berlin must have noticed that the German Stimmung was being infected by foreign bacilli, and that these bacilli were of western, not eastern, origin. They must have become convinced that the democracies, not the Soviets, exert an attraction on German minds. There is no other explanation for the fact that their propaganda against propaganda is directed solely against the American-English output.

Double Play in Hungary

ACCORDING to a dispatch from the Stockholm correspondent of the New York Times, Hungary wishes to recall its five divisions from the Voronezh sector in Russia "for a rest," and also requests the return of some 30,000 farm workers, who, it submits, might be used as hostages.

On the same day the Paris radio, as reported by the Associated Press, quoted a statement to Parliament by the Hungarian Minister of War. "Hungary will not content herself with fighting Bolshevism on the eastern plains," he said, "but will also fight it in Western Europe."

To anyone not familiar with the dual policy of the Horthy gang it might seem that Premier Kallay and his Minister of War were in open disagreement. Actually the Minister was speaking for Nazi consumption, while the official propagandist, from whom the first statement emanated, had in mind the recent successes of the United Nations. Perhaps if the latter prove responsive, Horthy will be permitted to resign in favor of Otto, and Hungary—as an "innocent victim of Nazi aggression"—will retain its share of the loot snatched from its three neighbors—Rumania, Yugoslavia, and Slovakia.

File and Remember

[Each week on this page we shall print items, short and long, taken from the British press and, less frequently, from the press of other Allied or neutral countries. This week we have clipped comments on the Beveridge plan.]

Will the Tories Swallow It?

IN GENERAL there is not the smallest doubt that the Beveridge plan is worth backing through thick and thin. It would be easy to pick holes in it . . . but what fundamentally matters is that it lays the right foundations. . . . Yet, as Sir William himself reminds us, social security . . . is by no means everything. . . . It was not within Sir William's reference to deal with the wages men are to receive when they are at work. . . . But clearly his plans will break down unless wages are raised in the worse-paid occupations; and an all-round minimum wage law is a necessary complement to it. No less clearly will it break down unless the state follows in general economic policy a program of "full employment," so as to reduce within manageable limits the numbers of the unemployed, and to make earning, and not living on social-security benefits, the normal way of life for all able-bodied persons.

The great question for the immediate future is: Will the Tories swallow the scheme? The likeliest guess would seem to be that, in the main, they will, but that they will try to whittle it down. . . . The Tories will probably try to preserve the vested interest of industrial assurance, and the approved societies with it, if they dare. But Sir William's case is so overwhelming that they may not dare if the Labor Party and untied publicists are sufficiently vocal and determined on the other side.—The New Statesman and Nation (London).

A Guilty National Conscience

In a general sense the decision to allow a report on social conditions to appear at this time was the work of a guilty national conscience. No return to the conditions of the past was thought possible. The left was demanding the pledge of a new world. The right—in the days of military inactivity—realized the perils of withstanding concession. No doubt they believed that a goodly array of burnished platitudes would stay the avalanche of public opinion until they were stronger for the fight and until their conscience had relapsed into its old accustomed inertia. Nothing else can explain the political lunacy, from their own point of view, of Mr. Churchill and his friends, which has tolerated the publication of Sir William's findings. For the mouse has been in labor and has brought forth a mountain. . . .

The issue will have to be fought on the political battlefield. For the men who brought Britain back to the gold standard at the behest of the financiers in 1925, the men who employed every weapon in their armory against the general strike, the men who reduced unemployment pay in 1931, the men who tolerated the distressed areas, are still alive, and as the prospect of military defeat begins to fade are starting to kick.

It will still be a battle, but we must thank Sir William for a weapon. And if he asked how it happens that a reformer so sedate has been able to fashion a weapon so sharp, and how a government so timid should have presented materials for its fashioning, we must answer in the famous words of Karl Marx that "war is the locomotive of history."
—The Tribune (London).

No New Principle

The implications of its proposals, viewed as a whole, reach far. Yet they involve no new departure in principle from the policies and methods which have characterized the development of the British social services during the last half-century. The prescription is for "a British revolution," in which the experience of the past and its tested institutions and the creative insight of adventurous minds both have their full shares. . . . The value of the report is greatly enhanced by the fact that it does not confine itself to the recommendation of an expansionist policy for the social services. It comes to grips with the task of bringing order and consistency, convenience and efficiency into the confused situation which has resulted from forty years of uncoordinated social legislation. . . . The government has been presented with an opportunity for marking this decisive epoch with a great social measure which would go far toward restoring the faith of ordinary men and women throughout the world in the power of democracy to answer the imperious needs of a new age.—The Times (London).

Freedom from Want

The Beveridge "Plan for Social Security" will stir up more controversy—and raise more hopes—than any project for social change since Mr. Lloyd George's National Health Insurance Bill of 1911. . . . Those who resist change should also reflect that this is a very different England from that of thirty years ago. It is an England that cannot be frightened by the bogey of state action. . . . If [the Beveridge plan] is carried through by the government, as in all its essentials it surely must be, it will be the redemption, on a large section of the home front, of the promises of the Atlantic Charter. It will go far toward securing for the British people "freedom from want," and, completed by a really national health service and by determined attempts to prevent cyclical mass unemployment, it will greatly strengthen our democracy by raising the happiness and well-being of "the common man."
—Manchester Guardian.

The Communist Position

Sir William Beveridge . . . is at pains to point out that the recurrence of mass unemployment would destroy the financial basis of his proposals. Although the security that the people seek can only be finally gained in a Socialist society, the adoption of the report would safeguard the population from sheer physical want. It would establish new and valuable standards and strengthen the determination of the people to maintain and raise them.—Daily Worker (London).

BOOKS and the ARTS

Mr. Straight Faces the Future

MAKE THIS THE LAST WAR: THE FUTURE OF THE UNITED NATIONS. By Michael Straight. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

THIS is a good book about the most important thing in our lives—the war and the peace. Persons who buy Mr. Straight's passionate volume should send it on to friends in the armed services to read when they are through with the funnies.

Soviets in Russia—Cooperative Councils in China—Communal Councils in India—Neighborhood Councils in Britain—town meetings in America—revolutionary democratic cells underground in occupied Europe. Surely this in itself is a thrilling signal that we are on the right track at last. . . . Blindly, haltingly, the world is feeling its way toward one common end.

Here is an example of naive immaturity. There are more numerous examples of brilliance and fine intuition. The book is obviously the result of hard work, solid thinking, and courage. It probes the problems of peace more profoundly than any other book recently published in America.

Mr. Straight deals with the advantages that flow from United Nations collaboration, and cites some piquant facts on the lessons which the several armed services have learned from the combat experience of their allies. He also dissects the shortcomings of United Nations agencies. Here Mr. Straight's observations in Washington offer a one-sided yet valuable background.

It is in the treatment of peace problems, however, that Mr. Straight makes his biggest contribution. Despite the unreality which sometimes accompanies an emotional approach, Mr. Straight is actually a realist, because instead of starting at the roof or façade and splitting hairs about whether the future world structure should be a pentagon or a hexagon, instead of first tackling the question of what to do about the defeated countries, he feels that peace begins at home. The next peace cannot be better than the governments which make it. Nations create peace treaties in their own image. We ourselves must change if we expect to change the world so that the world can keep the peace. Advancing his scheme for the development of the Eastern Hemisphere, Straight says: "But again all these plans are meaningless in the absence of great social changes in Britain and America. . . . Only if we reach a new level of democracy can democracy be realized in Asia and Africa with our aid." The first question to be answered is not whether India is ready for freedom but whether we are ready for the freedom of India. If England remains the old England it cannot relinquish its empire. The prime requisite of a solid peace is the emergence during the war of a new England and a new America as part of a new world.

Straight wants a federated Europe, pivot of a federated world, but holds that "unless there is a fundamental change in the social structure of Europe there will be no basis for European federation." His outline of this social change is sweeping and concrete. Generally speaking, he is a 145 per cent New Dealer who would retain war-time emergency measures long after the war ends. He apparently is not afraid of the bad effect which omnipotent, omnipresent governments usually exercise on human rights and individual freedom.

The stress of this book is on world organization. Peace, economic well-being, and social progress demand world organization, Straight contends. Colonial empires must cease, he feels, and be replaced "by the democratic development of former colonial territories by a world authority. In no other way can social progress everywhere in the world continue." Straight's detailed analysis of the relationship between imperialism and the world's future contains much that would give a longer view to myopic Americans. He does not imagine, as some innocents abroad do, that the British Empire or any empire will disappear by the process of voluntary self-liquidation. He quotes a recent speech by J. M. Keynes to the effect that after the war Britain must increase the volume of its exports "by at least 50 per cent compared with 1938." "There can be no if's about it," Keynes emphasizes. "Without it our hopes for the future are sunk." Unless a reorganization of the world's economy gives those exports to England it will not surrender its empire. And who could blame it? The problem of imperialism, which, as Straight demonstrates, is the key to peace and prosperity, cannot be solved by one nation's renunciation. It can only be solved through world organization.

One of the shortcomings of this provocative book is the absence of any adequate treatment of the possible role of Russia in the peace. Straight assumes that England, America, Russia, and China will have the same general interests in forging the peace. I wonder. He believes that "when this war ends we shall hold power of life and death over Europe and Asia. We shall be able to influence Soviet policy through the use of relief supplies." I doubt this very much. He does not know Moscow's resentment of foreign pressure. Even after the terrible 1921 Volga famine, with Russia and bolshevism weak, the Hoover American Relief Administration could not budge Soviet policy. But there is much in this book to compensate for its deficiency in respect to Russia.

I must take issue with Straight's thesis that "it is the new world or defeat." In other words, if we do not change during the war we shall not win the war. I wish that the fear, or hope, that this is true could serve as an added incentive to establish that new society which alone can guarantee a better life. But suppose we win with the old world. The fact is that our victories so far have tended to reinforce the old world against the new. Vice-President Wallace says fine things, but the moment the United Nations won in Egypt and landed in North Africa, Churchill demoted the progressive Cripps and announced that he would not liquidate the British Empire. Our offensive in North Africa was the occasion for a flowering of Darlanism. It may therefore not be true that we can win only if we first build a new world. We may win with the old world and thus lend it greater resistance to change. That is why the joy of many Americans over our military successes has been mingled with sadness over the political setbacks that accompany those successes.

LOUIS FISCHER

Deep Waters

WILLARD GIBBS. By Muriel Rukeyser. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

LIKE the vast majority of my fellow-citizens, I must take the greatness of Willard Gibbs on faith. Miss Rukeyser calls in various witnesses to testify that he was one of the greatest mathematical physicists of all time, and I see no reason for doubting their opinion. We may also, I assume, take for granted the claim that his theoretical investigations paved the way for the most spectacular of modern chemical achievements; but even so I am still not certain either that he deserves a popular biography or that, if he does, Miss Rukeyser was the person to write it. If there really is anything non-mathematical worth saying about a man who, to an almost unparalleled degree, had no life outside his equations, it would appear that it could safely be said only by someone who began by knowing very thoroughly and precisely what those equations mean—which Miss Rukeyser does not pretend to know. It is obvious that she has worked earnestly and hard to equip herself for her task. She talks as well, perhaps, as any layman could about entropy and the laws governing the energy of a system. But it is hardly well enough to create any assurance that she is competent to speak, as she does at great length, concerning the ultimate philosophic significance of Gibbs's work; and at the risk of being thought an incompetent reader I am bound to confess, not only that I found her book very exceptionally hard going, but also that after I had finished I did not feel that I knew much more than I did before.

Perhaps less than a third of the more than four hundred pages is taken up with an attempt to explain precisely what Gibbs's work consisted of. The remainder is devoted in approximately equal portions to what struck me as irrelevance and rhapsody; the irrelevances consisting of facts about Gibbs's contemporaries, and the rhapsody of often breathless and Orphic generalities about the universe. Granted that there are insuperable difficulties in the way of writing a picturesque life story of a man who spent all his time thinking and who tended to be extremely reticent even about his thoughts, it still seems a bit absurd when one discovers that in a chapter called New Haven Childhood the subject of the biography is barely mentioned while the chapter is devoted to brief sketches of various people who lived in New Haven when Gibbs did. Nor can more be said for the various sketches of bits of American political, industrial, and social history, presented almost in the fashion of Mr. Dos Passos's "newsreels" and dubiously related to the subject by some remark either to the effect that "Gibbs was part of all this" or, much more frequently, "Gibbs had nothing to do with all this." Nor did I, for one, find anything much more satisfying in the rhapsodical parts. The book begins: "Whatever has happened, whatever is going to happen in the world, it is the living moment that contains the sum of the excitement, this moment in which we touch life and all the energy of the past and future. Here is all the greatness of the dream of the world, the pure flash of momentary imagination, the vision of life lived outside of triumph and defeat, in continual triumph and defeat, in the present, alive." And the reader who can take that in his stride had better be warned that there are pages and pages just like it.

Miss Rukeyser has a number of notions—most of them I suspect quite a priori and also antecedent to her investigation of Gibbs—by means of which she hopes to unify the fragments of biography, social history, popularized science, and mystical rhetoric. I am afraid that one of these notions is that "only Euclid looked, etc." Another seems to be that the most significant fact about nineteenth-century America was a conflict between the superficially dominant struggle for the material or the useful and an underlying current of thought which aspired toward the absolute. Still another is that those philosophers who seek inclusive truth, those poets who lose themselves in mysticism, and those scientists who formulate more inclusive laws governing natural phenomena, are all looking for the same thing even though they do not understand one another; or, to put it more specifically, that when Gibbs tries to represent the behavior of chemical energy and heat by means of the same formulas he is really only using a special language to discuss the problem which is also that of the mystic. Now all these notions may at least adumbrate a truth, but it does not seem to me that Miss Rukeyser does much to clarify them. The task of relating to his times a man who had no direct relations with those times isn't an easy one, and neither is the task of explaining the significance of a work which one can only dimly understand. It is pretty enough to say that Gibbs "cut through a forest of axioms" and then to add, "He was, in this, working in the deepest American traditions. From the beginnings, from the European discovery of this continent, we have broken the fastest bonds," etc., etc. But other bold and abstract thinkers have been bold and abstract without an American background, and if, say, Spinoza and Newton were forever voyaging through strange seas of thought alone, what reason is there for doubting that Gibbs might have done so also even if he had happened to be born, as they were, on the other side of the ocean? A climax of absurdity seems to me to be reached in the fifth chapter from the last, which is entitled Three Masters: Melville, Whitman, Gibbs, and in which, by implication at least, we seem to be asked to see the relation between the second law of thermodynamics and the White Whale.

For all I know, the thesis or theses may be good ones. But if a good case could be made out for them it would be, I suspect, by someone who began with a thorough competence in Gibbs's own field and worked outward from an understanding of the core of his thought toward the periphery, where it merged with the thought of others: not, as seems here to have been the case, by someone who began with an O Altitude! and worked inward toward such comprehension as she could achieve of Gibbs's own immediate concerns and achievements.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Russia at War

THE RUSSIANS: THE LAND, THE PEOPLE AND WHY THEY FIGHT. By Albert Rhys Williams. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

ALBERT RHYS WILLIAMS has been in Russia off and on for the past twenty-five years, and has written of his experiences with deep sincerity and genuine human understanding. "The Russians" has the same warmth of feeling as his other books, but in many respects lacks their originality and thoroughness. He has drawn heavily on his past work, and in almost every case he seeks to explain the Russia-at-war of today in terms of the revolutionary Soviet Union which he saw being born in 1917 and watched developing during the years that followed.

Williams's explanation of why the Russians fight is clear and simple—indeed, it is often too simple. For example, a chart of How the U. S. S. R. Is Ruled opposite page 90 pictures the political bureau of the Communist Party as being elected by the Central Committee, the People's Commissars as being elected by the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet. Actually these men, like most important functionaries in the party and the government, are invariably appointed by higher organs rather than elected by lower ones. The Magnitogorsk city secretary of the party was always appointed by higher bodies in Moscow and not elected by the party members of Magnitogorsk. Williams's description leads the reader to believe that the Soviet Union is a functioning democracy in which the people actually choose leaders and policies. Actually it is a well-organized and highly centralized party state in which Stalin and the people around him act "in the interests of the toilers" with virtually no interference from below. The explanation of why the Russians fight is not to be found in the democracy of their state or party apparatus.

Williams's discussion of religion in Russia is interesting. He sums it up in the words of another American: "While we profess a faith, the Russians possess one." Young Russians today are inspired by national heroes rather than patron saints, by revolutionary theory rather than hymns and liturgies, says Williams, and goes on to describe very convincingly the Communist religion which has replaced the old Russian church in the moral fiber of the country.

Russia's role after Germany's collapse is one of the liveliest questions involved in post-war planning, and Williams makes a number of good points. "As America rejoices to see any country go republican, so Soviet Russia would rejoice to see any country go socialist." In Germany, he writes, the Russians would like to see a regime which would guarantee them against another attack like that of June 22, 1941, and would therefore wish to see Germany move to the left and become a full-fledged socialist state. This point of view is sound, and is not understood by many who call themselves friends of the Soviet Union. For the present Stalinist Soviet government, social revolution in Europe is significant principally in terms of security for the Soviet Union. Williams develops the point by showing the legitimacy of Russia's desire for strategic frontiers. The author is cautious, however, and does not locate specifically the frontiers which Russia should legitimately receive.

Williams oversimplifies very noticeably in his remarks on Soviet-American relations. The Russians, he states categorically, are giving us the benefit of their battle experience. Many American army officers are today losing sleep because American observers, owing to the irksome secretiveness of the Soviet military and government authorities on all questions, military and economic, are not permitted to watch even American lend-lease equipment in action in Russia.

Williams's basic thesis is summed up on the last page of his book: "In their defense of Moscow and Leningrad, the Russians are fighting in defense of New York and Washington." His book gives the Russians the benefit of every doubt, and cuts many corners in their favor in considering this basic proposition. Objectivity tends to suffer, but by and large the book is fair, and it is of course well written.

JOHN SCOTT

The Poet, the Poem, the Reader

RUINS AND VISIONS: POEMS 1934-1942. By Stephen Spender. Random House. $2.

TOO little has been said in behalf of those readers who find much of modern poetry unintelligible. Although they like and need poetry they do not find the relationship they have learned to expect between themselves and the poem. They know that somehow the lines of communication are down. They feel uncomfortable, bewildered, and the humblest among them conclude that it must be their fault. It is not their fault; most modern poetry is unintelligible.

The fault in serious modern poetry, especially American poetry, that accounts in large part for its unintelligibility is caused by a blocking of the basic process of communication, which demands that a thing must be both felt and understood before it is intelligible and capable of being communicated. When the poet writes only at the level of his feelings, the poem displays merely his own emotion. He has made a beginning, but he has not understood his emotion. He has not communicated what the reader is equally capable of feeling but cannot express. The poet has simply relieved himself of his personal need for creation and selfishly pre-empted all pleasure. This type of poetry, although superficial, may have considerable merit—as the poetry of Conrad Aiken, for example; it is at any rate readable, since it is generally written in the poetic tradition, from which it derives a kind of unearned increment of meaning. But another and far more fraudulent type of modern poetry is produced when the poet tries to understand his experience before it has been digested by his feelings. Then the poem displays in sterile abstractions (disiecta membra) what the poet has neither fully felt nor understood. He has not even made a beginning. The natural emotion he started with but did not completely experience betrays him; the melodic line is fouled by fragments of thoughts, and language and syntax are distorted. He has judged what he does not know. Any of the modern "intellectual" poets will serve as an example. They endeavor to interpret the world and all its accidents when the fact is that the very sense of their own personality escapes them. Possessing nothing, they can offer nothing to the reader save their own confusion, and for all their poetical careerism they remain anonymous.

In both cases the poet in his self-indulgence cuts himself off from the reader, who perhaps better than the poet knows the insufficiency of sensual satisfaction and mental involution. The writing of poetry is difficult in proportion as the need for poetry is unsatisfied, for the substitutes that always come in answer to an unfulfilled need obscure the need itself. The urgent need for poetry is not dispelled by substitutes or by the kind of poetry which is itself a substitute: the journalistic stimulants that pass for poetry, the current poetic sedatives, or the aphrodisiacs that merely jazz up the senses, and the sexes. And in the meantime both poet and reader suffer equally under the accumulation of what has not been communicated.

A poem achieves its purpose when it reconciles the multiplicity of life with the unattainable unity in which the self is liberated. The reconciliation is an act of faith as the metaphor is the reasoning of faith; consequently a poem cannot be proved. Poets have always been concerned with justifying the ways of God to man. Their subject has always been the eternal split between the will and the act. But in an unsettled world where the distance between the individual and society has widened and individualism itself is no longer a virtue, there seems to be a double split. In order to know his own nature the poet is forced to burrow deeper and deeper inside himself. The continual burrowing-within makes it increasingly difficult for him to reach outside himself. And while the split widens, the ever-retreating self, as if in imitation of the larger world, uncovers its own chasms of uncertainty and separation. It is not until the poet, with complete integrity, reaches outside himself that the poem can be communicated. Then it includes and transcends both poet and reader and still preserves the personal nature of the poet.

Spender's poetry bristles with all the important points in the strange and curious relationship between the poem and the poet. He lives so close to his experience that it is pertinent to consider his personality in relation to his poetry. Just as his poems are battles of opposing forces, and just as the best of his poems revolve around the idea of separation, so the personal counterparts of the conflicting forces fight within him for union. Spender struggles for a personal unity he does not and cannot possess. He is driven by a longing to accept himself as he is, down to his last labeled weakness, but refuses to do so because to accept himself would mean escaping full knowledge, and therefore full judgment, of his weakness and would consequently violate his essentially personal test for truth. In the exhausting struggle that ensues between judgment and justification, strength and weakness fight each other, everything turns to its opposite, and he is always betraying and being betrayed. "The iron arc of the avoiding journey/Curves back upon my weakness at the end."

To Spender it would seem that even the realization of anything but a continual progression means death, a way of life that is a continual escape—not death, but psychological murder to the sound of constant violence. The fact that his struggle in part willed is reflected in his unsuccessful poems and may perhaps account for the superficial similarity of his best and his worst work. But the virtue must be measured by the propelling need, and for Spender it is to fight through to an intelligible explanation of what is happening to his world in terms of what is happening to himself. He Geopolitics!

Is it a science—or only nonsense?

LINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Lingame, Calif.

Did it start with Haushofer?
Does it offer anything, besides a threat, to America?

GEOPOLITICS cannot now be dismissed as fantastic. The theory behind German aggression—the underpinnings of the Nazi plan for world mastery—must be understood if we are to win. Furthermore, as Col. Beukema of the U. S. Military Academy says, "geopolitics can give us a long first step toward the realism needed if peace is to be something more than another Versailles." These three books are the first comprehensive attempt to describe for American readers the background, methods, and personalities of Geopolitics—to find its "core of truth" which can make it a blueprint for peace as well as for war.

GERMAN STRATEGY OF WORLD CONQUEST

By DERWENT WHITTLESEY This study shows conclusively that theories of geopolitics, "racism," the ambitions of Hitler, and the entire Nazi doctrine are parts of a gigantic, carefully designed scheme of world conquest worked out with ruthless precision, and that its roots find their sources deep in Germany's past.

293 + xiii pages, bibliography, maps, and index, $2.50

THE WORLD OF GENERAL HAUSHOFER

By ANDREAS DORFALÉN "An extremely valuable contribution to the study of the relationship between space and power need no longer be left to a handful of army officers." —Col. Beukema. Covers the entire field of geopolitics in relation to world politics, economic policy, and population, with voluminous extracts from the writings of Haushofer, Mackinder, Ratzel, Kjellen, and others.

337 + xxi pages, index, $2.50

THE NAZI STATE

By WILLIAM EBENSTEIN What the Nazi ideologues have produced in their own country. An incredible—but true!—picture of a people who reject self-government, yet want to govern the rest of the world!

203 + iii pages, index, $2.75

FARRAR & RINEHART

232 Madison Avenue

New York

SLAVES NEED NO LEADERS

An Answer to the Fascist Challenge to Education

By Walter M. Kotschnig

Dr. Kotschnig who served for eight years as general secretary of the International Student Service here presents a study of the impact of Fascist rule and occupation upon the various countries of Europe. He analyzes brilliantly the German mind and suggests what may be done after the war to change their war-keyed psychological pattern. He also forecasts the effect of the War on post-war education in America.

$2.75

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Ave. ■ New York

"The most effective and the most satisfactory play about the war yet to reach our stage."

—Joseph Wood Krutch, Nation.

THE PLAYWRIGHTS' COMPANY Presents

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A new play by Maxwell Anderson Cost of 25, incl. Aline MacMahon

CORT 48th St. E. at B'WAY. Eve. 8:40, $1.10 to $2.30. 251 seats $1.10.

Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40, $1.10-$2.75. Seats selling for mat. 2 weeks.

MAIL ORDERS PROMPTLY FILLED

IS SOCIALISM STILL VALID?

Friday, January 22, 8 P. M.

How does socialist theory stand up in the light of recent developments?

Saturday, January 23, 2 P. M.

Is collectivism compatible with democracy?

RAND SCHOOL 7 EAST 15th STREET

ALGONQUIN 4-3094

BERTRAND RUSSELL

MAX EASTMAN

SIDNEY HOOK

JOHN CHAMBERLAIN

ALGERNON LEE

GEORGE S. COUNTS

ROBERT ABRAMOWITZ

$1.00 For Both Sessions

IS MAJORITY RULE A SOUND PRINCIPLE OF GOVERNMENT?

Wm. Crocker

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Readers' Service Division

The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

writes in the excitement in which he lives and tries to connect what he irreducibly is with what continually acts upon him. When he connects, the conflict is resolved, the poem is communicated, and his uncompromising honesty, his understanding and pity really function. When he does not connect, the conflict comes to no end or ends in a false truce, the poem is not communicated, and his virtues are discredited by his fears.

In a more settled period there would be a more economical expenditure of creative energy. There would be no need for Spender to create his own life and justify each stick and stone. The outside world would provide a frame for his personality, and he would be content to develop his poetry within its limits. He would not have to live his poems in order not to betray them.

Most of the sixty-seven poems in this collection will not be remembered; some of them, the greater part of the more recent ones, cannot even be read with pleasure. The best poems are in Part Four of The Still Center and in Part One: A Separation of "Ruins and Visions." They are wonderful. One closes the book with the feeling that the mere reading is only a beginning—that the poems will quicken into new life as they become part of experience and their total meaning is rediscovered. Through some such metempsychosis the excitement of a poem turns into working knowledge. (So few modern poems can wait long enough to be understood.) The Double Shame, Darkness and Light, The Separation, The Human Situation, Variations on My Life, A Wild Race—these are among the poems that will rise to Spender's name. The material is so completely mastered and under control that it is transformed into a simple outpouring of emotion. Moving tranquilly, with increasing lucidity, the poems proceed from the individually restricted confusion and despair to the general tragedy of understanding. In the last stanza of The Double Shame, for instance, there is a sudden breathtaking release, as if a wilderness of struggling and ungovernable matter has been dominated. When that happens, there is a rush of music, a "fall down shafts of love/Into the abyss of something human." The poem is over; it has really ended. There are other poems besides these six where Spender is "vital metaphorical," to use a phrase of Shelley's, a poet whom Spender recalls in many ways. This is the fourth stanza of Two Armies:

Finally, they cease to hate: for although hate
Bursts from the air and whips the earth like hail
Or pours it up in fountains to marvel at,
And although hundreds fall, who can connect
The inexhaustible anger of the guns
With the dumb patience of these tormented animals?

Spender's unsuccessful poems reveal the effects of the original danger to which he is exposed by his inability to separate himself from his experience. He is so terribly intent on discovering the meaning of his experience that it is difficult for him to see his poems objectively. He is certainly aware of the serious technical shortcomings they display, since he sometimes revises a poem to the point where it bears little resemblance to the first published version; yet excellent as his revisions are, they never turn a mediocre poem into a good one. His excessive use of a series of run-on lines in a long periodic curve becomes monotonous and facile; he over-cultivates his favorite poetic plots into mannered and vacant formalism; his sound becomes turgid; his metaphors forced, and he writes like a sentimental schoolboy or, at times, like a corpse. ("I am glad to set down/The first and ultimate you,/Your inescapable soul"; or "For, as your face grew older, there hung a lag/Like a double chin in your mind.") Spender has enough affinity to Rilke to make all talk of influence unimportant. The influence of Rilke is certainly present, but being a natural influence, it is on the whole well assimilated. However, the Rilkean private world-meanings Spender gives to such words as glass and snow do not always come off. The very nature of Spender's poetry demands that his meaning be newly minted; when he draws on his old experience, on what he has already settled and exhausted, his emotion does not flow freely but becomes caked. Considering that he has no principle of order in himself, and that he refuses order by making the "still center" the quest for an absolute ideal, the perfection of his best poems is a curious and altogether overwhelming triumph, the tragic quid pro quo of a personal chaos.

H. P. LAZARUS

When Giants Meet

THE GREAT OFFENSIVE: THE STRATEGY OF COALITION WARFARE. By Max Werner. The Viking Press. $3.

MR. WERNER grows in strength with every book he writes. Beginning in "The Military Strength of the Powers" as something in the nature of a statistical advocate of collective security, he proved in his last book, "Battle for the World," that he was quite adequate to the task of describing a war system in motion. In the present work there is so much that is not merely good but positively brilliant that it is useless to seize upon more than the central excellence from which all its other good qualities derive. It is Mr. Werner's grasp of the fundamental war plans of the two giants of Europe, the Reich and the Soviet Union, that gives symmetry and power to his argument. He has warm enthusiasm and deep convictions (and the former sometimes seems to color his estimate of the individual actions); he commands an abundance of facts. What gives his writing its sweep, however, is his orderly root-and-branch conception of the nature of war and of this war in particular.

This reviewer does not accept certain unessentials in the author's exposition. Mr. Werner, for instance, makes an incorrect use of Von Loeb's masterly article on defense, and he does not realize to quite what extent the conception of the so-called Archangel-Astrakhan line was fundamental to the original German war plan. But if Mr. Werner is correct in his main points, and I am certain he is, Hitler's intention, lucidly described in Alvarez del Vayo's article in The Nation, Fortress Europe, has already been frustrated.

In a comparison of the campaigns of 1941 with those of 1942 lies an understanding of the disaster that, still in its latent rather than in its catastrophic form, has befallen Hitler in Russia. The battles of attempted annihilation are over; designs for purely territorial conquest and economic acquisition have taken their place. In these finality is not to be sought.

Free Churchill Pamphlet

The new Archbishop of Canterbury was appointed by Prime Minister Winston Churchill against the wishes of Tory reactionaries in Britain. A huge audience in the Albert Hall, London, heard the Archbishop declare for transference of taxes from production equipment to ground values. (See Christian Century, October 7, 1942.) Churchill himself, in a volume recently issued in New York, says: "Who could have thought that it would be easier to produce by toll and kill all the most necessary or desirable commodities than it is to find consumers for them? It is certain that the economic problem with which we are now confronted is not adequately solved, indeed is not solved at all, by the teachings of the textbooks, however grand may be their logic, however illustrious may be their authors." Churchill is also for the taxation of ground rental values.

Send of mine for free copy of Churchill pamphlet, edited by Louis Wallis.

THE HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
30 East 29th Street New York City, N. Y.

Alaska—from Gold to Guns!

ALASKA is now linked to Canada and the United States by the great Alcan highway! And "Seward's Folly" is thus transformed from a $7,200,000 blunder to a vital asset to the United States and the United Nations, with its great natural wealth and strategic position on the globe. To know Alaska is it today read this 64-page booklet, just issued by the Institute of Pacific Relations. It is crammed full of facts about Alaska's history, geography, strategic military factors, harbors, cities, climates, and its peculiar political problems. It will be sent to you with your trial subscription to the

FREE

FAR EASTERN SURVEY

(A FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW)

MID-JANUARY issue includes exclusive report on the recent international conference at Mont Tremblant, Quebec, on post-war problems in the Far East vitally affecting America and your future, by FREDERICK V. FIELD—Colonel Carlson's Guerrilla Raiders in the Solomons—Return to Chungking of the Chinese Military Mission—Book reviews by PEARL BUCK and others.

SPECIAL OFFER

10 ISSUES (20 WEEKS) FOR

$1

(Regular price without booklet, $2.50; with booklet, $2.65.)

AMERICAN COUNCIL,
INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS
Dept. N, 129 East 52nd Street, N. Y. C.

For the enclosed $1 enter my subscription for the next 10 issues of the FAR EASTERN SURVEY, beginning with the January issue, giving the full report on the recent War-time I. P. R. Conference. Also include, FREE, the booklet "ALASKA COMES OF AGE" by J. G. Edolstein.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY & STATE.....

If it be objected that Mr. Werner's central conception is not in accord with Stalin's November speech, then the answer is that the Russian leader was speaking to the Germans as well as to the Russians. It is difficult, that is, to accept Stalin's assertion that the German drives in the south were an attempt to carry out a vast outflanking move against the whole of the central Russian front. They were not. They were precisely what Hitler said they were, an attempt to stabilize the Russo-German front and get rid of the ruinous fighting there. And as such they were a confession of failure; the famous war plan had been scrapped for another, for an effort designed to reach a negotiated peace. The Soviet war plan, on the other hand, has never needed alteration. The multiple, limited Russian offensives correspond to a carefully worked-out plan. They grow stronger as the war continues.

It is natural that the author's handling of the Russo-German campaigns should be richer than his treatment of the other fields within the global war. That is not to say that his conceptions are incapable of development. As good and balanced a case for what used to be called a second front, but which is now to be called a western front, is contained in the later chapters. One reads it without the hostility which other presentations have aroused, because Mr. Werner does not convey the impression that the Soviet Union is the only country he cares about. He has a global view of a global war, not a Russian, British, or American view. There are other valuable things in this book, the merits of which are so great that one hopes Mr. Werner will hasten to fulfil the promise implicit in its last chapters.

RALPH BATES

Steig's Gallery

THE LONELY ONES. By William Steig. Foreword by Wolcott Gibbs, Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $1.

WE ARE all lonely. Marx predicted us almost one hundred years ago: alienating society with its alienated members. But we still have some sort of culture in common, and with attitudes popularized by reading and elevated conversation each dramatizes and justifies his loneliness. The titles of Steig's drawings—Who Are All Those Others? I Can't Express It, I Recreated Myself, I Do Not Believe in Misleading People, Why Pick on Me?—are not, as Wolcott Gibbs claims in the foreword, simply clichés expressing the private obsessions by which odd types set themselves off from everybody else. They are the means of self-defense and self-assertion that we all resort to in the various times of our various humors. For just who are the other boys and girls whose humors, according to Mr. Gibbs, are not quite like these? If the "rest of the world" really exists and is not just a class distinction, then Steig's drawings do not mean so much as they seem to. But I think Steig has got us all down, the whole well-informed class of us who read the liberal magazines, the New Yorker, and Modern Library books, whose hearts are in the right things.

Never in all history has there been so lonely a mass of people. The peculiar social form this loneliness takes is the convention of unburling the heart. Tell all, disarm others, and assert yourself. It must be realized that before the eighteenth century there was hardly such a thing. Confession was the furthest one could do. To unburl the heart is to use confession as a weapon, as personality insurance, and not for relief. The gift-bearing Greeks in Steig's gallery are self-assertive even when in postures of surrender.

Aside from the humor, the specific virtue of Steig's drawing is the directness with which he communicates his ideas to paper and our eyes. There is little pause between the impulse and its expression. But just because the shorthand is so quick and so efficient, it is not quite art. What makes cartoons usually something less than art is their dependence upon closed systems of representational signs in which little is ever improvised and reinvented. Line in cartooning is not felt for its own sake but used for conveying concepts. A face is made like this, an arm like that, surprise has exclamation marks, raised eyebrows and popping eyes, put in with a prescribed number of lines curving and meeting in a prescribed way. Steig tries to fight free of the cartoonist's habit and succeeds now and then, as in Why Pretend? People Are No Damn Good, and Meditation Will Reveal All Secrets. These cartoons are so intensely cartoons that they become something more, pure expressions of ideas. (Klee, coming from a different direction, did things similar if on a much higher level.)

But why ask the artist to do something he did not intend; why not take him for what he is? For what he is, Steig is certainly very good, but I am not sure that he is satisfied to be taken just for what he is. He is after a new genre in these psychographs, a new combination of literature and picture, and he does well enough to be judged by severe standards.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine

- ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Introductory Offer: 13 Weeks $1
☐ Remittance is inclosed

Canada $1 a year extra
 Foreign $1 a year extra
 Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

IN BRIEF

THE COMPLETE ROMAN DRAMA.

Edited by G. E. Duckworth. Random House. 2 vols. $6.

This is one of the few books that really do "fill a long-felt need." Outside the Loeb Classical Library there had been no means of making the Latinless reader fully acquainted with Plautus, Terence, and Seneca, to whom the European drama was indebted, for better or worse, far longer and more deeply than to their Greek predecessors. The translations in this edition are better chosen and more readable than most of those in its companion, the Random House "Complete Greek Drama." Most of the Plautus and Terence is done in prose, and all the Seneca in verse that does the old bore ample justice. The editor supplies useful notes and introductions to each play, conscientiously explaining the obscure jokes. His general introduction, also excellent, makes one of those "cases" for Seneca that beg the fatal question: Would anyone bother with him if the Elizabethans hadn't?

THE ROAD TO VICHY, 1918-1938.

By Yves R. Simon. Translated by James A. Corbett and George J. Mc Morrow. Sheed and Ward. $2.25.

In modern war, propaganda plays the role of artillery preparation, says Professor Simon. He shows how Hitler took advantage of French dissensions to soften up the country, using persons who were thought to be, and perhaps thought themselves, nationalists, but who were really traitors to the best interests of France. This short book is a Catholic warning to the complacent, if any remain, to study the case of France.

THE REVOLUTIONISTS. By Selden Rodman. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.

This verse play, say the publishers, is "conceived as the second of a cycle of three long poems on the destination of modern man." About the slaves' revolt in Haiti in 1791, it centers on those two endlessly fascinating figures, Toussaint l'Ouverture and Henry Christophe. The action is rapid and the speech incisively fiery, but the characters are two-dimensional: they exist only as figures in political history, and as symbols of "the destination of modern man." In a word, Rodman's Toussaint is a natural for Paul Muni as Juarez. In structure, too, the work has defects of inexperience: it is really two plays, one about Toussaint, the other about Christophe; the only connecting link is the Cause, which is exploited for twentieth-century significance at every possible moment, and some impossible ones. But the play is certainly stageworthy as an illustrated lecture on politics. It is to be performed in Haiti; one would like to see it nearer home. At least Rodman knows more about dramatic verse, and is less sentimental, than Maxwell Anderson.

DRAMA

Russian Melodrama

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE" is a melodrama written by one Konstantin Simonov and presented at the Guild Theater in an "American acting version" credited to Clifford Odets. It is a bustling busy affair thickly populated with heroes and villains, and it is perhaps the best play yet sent us from wartime Europe.

To say that is obviously not to say a very great deal, and I choose my words with care. The piece has considerable topical interest, and there is a certain amount of more or less convincing local color. It is also rather unusually well acted in broad theatrical fashion, even though Mr Odets does not seem to have been any too successful in concealing the wooden ring of the dialogue. But beyond that there is little to say except that the whole thing is conceived in disarmingly simple terms.

Even before the present war Russian playwrights seem to have taken naturally to melodrama, and they wrote it with a kind of unself-conscious directness. The result is that the present play, like those written twenty years ago to celebrate the Russian Revolution, seems more sincere and less factitious than those recent English war plays in which one feels the condescension of an author deliberately assuming a dramatic unsophistication neither natural to him nor native in the theater for which he is writing. But though all of these things tend to make melodrama acceptable, they do not transform its character. "The Russian People" is still only a melodrama in which stock characters and stock situations are labeled anew and the spectator is asked to forget that they have served many times before to represent other heroes and other causes.

The scene of the action is sometimes an occupied town, sometimes the headquarters of an isolated company holding out across the river. The play ends when the advancing Russians relieve the isolated company and retake the town. Before this event takes place, one has met all the people one would expect to meet and seen happen to them all the things one has expected to happen. There is a heroic commander and of course a heroic young girl with whom he is in love. There is also a veteran of the revolution who is still hale and hearty, an intellectual proud to discover that he can fight, and a cynic who goes with a gallant smile to his certain death. For good measure there are, still further, the sadistic German officer, the cowardly traitor who collaborates with the Germans, and the sniveling traitor who acts as spy. Comic relief is introduced at the appropriate moments, and once the commander pauses long enough to tell how, when he heard Joseph Stalin over the radio urging everyone to "hold fast," it seemed, curiously, as though Stalin were speaking personally to him. The traitors get shot, the sadistic officer is poisoned, the minor heroes also meet their deaths; but the commander survives, and after the war is over he will marry the girl, who, fortunately, was rescued just before she was raped by a German soldier and will probably recover from a minor bullet wound.

Now I have no doubt that every one of these separate incidents has actually happened. Neither, for that matter, do I doubt that each of the sentiments has been felt. When life imitates art it is quite as likely to imitate melodrama or farce as it is to imitate tragedy or comedy. But the fact remains that the author of "The Russian People" very seldom succeeds in convincing us that he is copying life instead of copying plays, and when we are moved by what takes place on the stage we are moved more by what we know than by what he is telling us. If we know enough or feel enough about the present war and Russia's part in it, then his play may seem stirring and terrible. Taken out of its context, it would seem merely violent and stagy. Perhaps it serves a present purpose. But it would mean little to anyone who did not know that it was to some extent actual, and it will mean nothing to a reader ten or twenty years hence who may go to it in the hope of finding out just what the heroism of 1942 was like.

"The Doughgirls" (Lyceum Theater) is a frenetic farce ostensibly about Washington in war time. The intention is obviously to create something in the manner of George Abbott, and perhaps the most important thing to be said is that audiences seem to find it irresistibly hilarious. I doubt whether the author himself could give a very clear idea of the plot, in and out of which pompous rubber administrators, girl snipers from Russia, and lascivious admirals wander irresponsibly, and it seems to be taken for granted that any reference to lend-lease is screamingly funny. I should like to go on record, however, as stating that to me "The Doughgirls" goes through all the motions of being funny without very often actually being anything of the sort; the audiences seem to laugh principally because it is so confidently assumed that they will. Most of the dialogue is composed of bits cast into the form of jokes, but the joke, if really present, nearly always eluded me. Take as illustration a single but typical example. When three young ladies discover that each is living in sin, one of them asks, "Is anybody in Washington really married?" And another replies, "Yes [pause], Mr. and Mrs. Roosevelt!" Now I am well aware that on the vaudeville stage it used to be assumed that any reference to cheese or dill pickles was per se funny. But unless the same is now assumed to be true of the Roosevelts, I defy anyone to discover even the skimmed milk of a jest in the passage just quoted.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

THE book "Symphony Themes," compiled by Raymond Burrows and Bessie Carroll Redmond (Simon and Schuster, $2.50), is offered not only for reference but for educational—or rather for self-educational—purposes. Three years ago Simon and Schuster were baiting "Men of Music" with the statement that the way to understanding of music was a book "which treats music in the terms of the men who created it." Today they are baiting their compilation of "1,193 principal themes from a hundred of the world's great symphonies" with Deems Taylor's statement (yes, Mr. Taylor is on hand again to do his usual dust-in-the-eyes-throwing job) that those themes are "just what the listener wants to know, and all that he, lay or expert, needs to know: the stuff of which symphonies are made." The authors themselves write, with the same deceptive plausibility: "The simple fact is . . . that the best way to understand what music is talking about is to have a simple statement of the subject itself. Most symphonic movements have two or more subjects which can be very quickly stated."

But this isn't simple, it is oversimple: it over-simplifies the symphonic movement in a way that will, if anything, make listening more difficult for the reader. That is, it omits not only the formal design of the movement, which the reader will merely not be aware of, but all the contextual material in which the themes and their developments occur—for example, the material with which a theme or its development may continue before another theme or its development enters or reenters. Not only is the reader unprepared for this contextual material, not only will he ignore it in his preoccupation with themes and developments, but even though he ignores it the space and time it occupies will make it difficult for him to catch the themes and developments that he is intent on. He will find that in the first movement of the "Eroica" the subjects don't occur in the quick succession in which they are stated in the book, and that this makes the business of spotting them—in particular, of spotting the one designated as (6), which he is not told occurs late in the development section—less simple than he has been led to think.

But the book doesn't even do what it undertakes to do—doesn't, that is, give all the themes out of which the symphonies are made. "I can quote you," says Mr. Taylor, speaking of the first movement of Beethoven's "Eroica," "the charming passage where the clarinet, oboe, and flute build a little climax . . . but meanwhile I have forgotten two other phrases that, short as they may be, are undeniably themes." One of these phrases, possibly, is the one beginning at measure 23, with the cross-rhythm that not only is built up right away but is used later, from measure 248, to build up the shatteringly dissonant climax of the development; another may be the figure heard in measure 65, which also is developed immediately and put to further important use in the development, beginning at measure 186; and if they are Mr. Taylor won't find them in the book. Nor will he find the phrase beginning at measure 134, it he means that one; nor the theme in the second movement, beginning at measure 56, which provides the conclusion for the first section; nor the theme with which the coda of this movement begins at measure 209. And while the subject of the fugal passage in this movement is given, the subject of the fugal passage in the second movement of Beethoven's Seventh is not; just as variations 4, 8, 12, 14, and 28 of the concluding passacaglia of Brahms's Fourth are given, but not the other variations. These are only a few of the examples that I found wherever I looked.

There are also questionable omissions, along with even stranger inclusions, in the hundred symphonies—questionable and strange on the basis of the authors' own statement that the group includes "all symphonies that are frequently performed or readily available on records, and many of those which occasionally find their way into concert programs," together with "some of the recent works by native composers, even though their frequency of performance does not yet rank with that of European masterpieces." The book offers, then, all the symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Sibelius; it offers the Unfinished and C major of Schubert, but also the early and inconsequential Nos. 4 and 5; it offers the last three of Tchaikovsky, but also No. 3; it offers the last group of K. 543, K. 550, and K. 551 of Mozart, and his K. 504, K. 425, and K. 385, but omits the fine earlier K. 338, K. 297, K. 200, and K. 201, which are performed in concerts and are available on records, and includes instead K. 16, K. 110, and K. 444, which I didn't know existed even on paper; it offers a number of Haydn's best but omits the superb No. 92, which is available on records, and No. 88, which is possibly the most frequently performed of all; it offers Shostakovich's No. 1, but not his Nos. 5 and 6; it omits Mahler's First, Eighth, and Ninth, but includes Glazunov's No. 5, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Vaughan Williams's F minor; it includes Strauss's "Aus Italien" which is never played, and his "Alpen-symphonie" which is almost never played, but omits his "Symphonia Domestica" which is played occasionally (and one must question the rigid adherence to the category of symphony that causes such works of Strauss to be included and his tone-poems to be omitted). Rightly it includes works by Roy Harris, Aaron Copland; but when is anyone likely to need the theme of Edward Burlingame Hill's Symphonies Nos. 2 and 3, Edwin Stringham's No. 1, Daniel Gregory Mason's No. 3 ("Lincoln"), Henry Hadley's No. 4 ("North, East, South, West"), Robert Russell Bennett's "Abraham Lincoln" Symphony, or even Howard Hanson's "Nordic" and "Romantic" and No. 3?

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Leaders in Exile

[A debate on the problem of political leadership among the German emigration was launched in an anonymous article in the Political War section on December 3 and continued with a group of letters from prominent refugees in the issue of January 2. We publish below a further comment on the same subject by Paul Hagen, author of "Will Germany Crack?" and research director of the American Friends of German Freedom.]

Dear Sirs: Some time during the fifth winter of war, the winter of 1943-44 or later, the Nazi regime will reach its final crisis. The military time-table hardly allows for an earlier date. At least one more year of gigantic losses, destruction from the air, wearing out of machinery, man-power, and productive power will intensify the multiple crises existing in Germany today. There will be an economic breakdown unprecedented in history, accompanied by complete political paralysis. Whatever the last-ditch fight of the Nazi black hundreds may be, the end will be a terrific explosion. Unlike the breakdown of 1918, there will be no Hindenburg to lead an army back, there will be no functioning administration, no organized opposition at home to take over, no unions or other national democratic organizations. The German left, especially labor, will be able to recover faster than any other element in Germany. But even it will emerge from the turmoil in an amorphous state, able at best to set up labor councils and similar organs of local authority; it will not possess nation-wide representation and authority or experienced leadership. There will be radical movements of the starving and desperate masses of people. There will be mass unemployment and millions of war prisoners and imported foreign workers struggling to get out of the country and at the same time millions of German soldiers fighting their way home to escape the fury of the liberated peoples of the formerly occupied nations.

Such is the probable outlook for the coming German revolution. The breakdown of the colossus of the German military and economic machine now ruling Europe will leave a kind of vacuum into which will rush a tornado of upheavals and disoriented movements.

The smoking remnants of the Nazi state will furthermore be compressed into a small territory, something less than that provided by the former boundaries of the Weimar Republic, and open to invasion from everywhere. No matter where the eastern front line may have been established at the time of the defeat, Russian military and political influence will be overwhelming.

These are, briefly, the conditions which will exist when Nazi Germany breaks, and they must be kept in mind when your correspondents' questions* are considered. There is consensus of opinion in the answers so far published that certain German privileged groups and castes, which have been ideological servants of the Nazi conquest, and which might well reproduce the Nazi evil even after the Nazis are gone, should disappear too. There is little chance that these privileged groups of an old world which has gone down in blood and fire will find much support when the war is over. Quislings and Lavalis and clerico-fascists are in for a hard time. What an anachronistic idea it is to base the principle of future "legitimacy" on them or to plan for collaboration with them, as some people do!

To answer the second and third questions correctly is therefore of considerable importance. In a people's peace, able to set up lasting conditions of European security and reconstruction, the disarming of Axis fascism should be followed by disarmament of all the surviving reactionary forces of Europe. The job is to set free the delayed forces of the democratic revolutions in Central and Eastern Europe, and in Western and Northern Europe to continue the democratic regimes of the pre-Hitler time on a reformed base. I do not think this is a job for "top sergeants," as one of your correspondents suggested, not

* These questions were:

1. What forces in Germany—besides the Nazi Party—do you consider a menace to the peace of the world and to the freedom of the German people? How would you propose to deal with these forces?

2. Are you for a unilateral disarming of Germany and the policing and reeducating of the German people from outside?

3. Are the German people responsible for the material damage caused by Hitler's armies in the occupied countries? Are they under moral obligation to make restitution?

4. What kind of relations do you advocate between post-Hitler Germany and the Soviet Union?

even for nice American top sergeants. The mere idea smacks of the Teutonic. After the facts are known, after prisons and archives are opened, the judgment of the world about the passive responsibility of the German and Italian people may also change. It will be hard enough to disentangle the economic and political mess the Nazis have left; any blind, vindictive, and punitive action might destroy the basis of reconstruction for a long time and help no one.

Just ■ fascism was not ■ specific German sickness, so no simple "German solution" will be possible after this war. Several of your correspondents pointed out that the most adequate form of international, democratic, and peaceful relations after the war, in fact, the only guaranty of collective security, will be ■ European federation, participating in ■ world council of the great victorious powers. For defeated Germany there can be no other choice than to maintain peaceful relations with everybody in the decades to come. The problem of the others then will be not to keep it down but to keep it going, as it was in the case of France after Napoleon's defeat. I think history will show that in Europe Germany will get full understanding and real help only from progressive democratic forces, above all from the European labor forces.

I agree with Mr. Schwarzschild only when he says that the "scepter has passed" to others. However, to regard the German emigration simply as a agency for the victorious powers is to misunderstand its function completely. Today it is in a mess as every other emigration is and always has been. Tomorrow the many fine and highly qualified persons it has in its ranks will still have a chance to place their manifold experience at the service of the new militant German democracy which is bound to come, whatever may be the conditions imposed on a defeated Germany. Germany will need devoted helpers. Not looking for a Messiah, as is the fashion today, and not hoping, like the men of Coblenz, to be brought back and restored by foreign power, the emigration will fulfil its tasks of service best where its roots are: in the revived democratic movements of its own nation.

PAUL HAGEN

PAUL HAGEN

New York, January 8

The Discussion Is Opened

Dear Sirs: Our forefathers settled the problem of religious freedom by insisting that every human being had a right to choose his own faith. The next great problem which presented itself had to do with political freedom, and the Revolutionary War established the principle that men collectively have a right to choose their own form of government. Still later a great discussion arose over the problem of education, and we concluded that if we believed in religious and political freedom, we could ill afford not to educate all our youngsters.

Since then, a new problem has been pushing itself to the front—the problem of economic freedom, which didn't worry our forefathers because they never conceived of a corporate structure such as we now have. When I discuss this problem with educators and friends, nearly all of them agree that it is one which we must settle after the war, and which we should have had to settle anyway, even if war had not come.

Obviously, if that is the job we have on our hands, somebody has to do some clean-cut thinking on the subject. What I should like to see your journal do is to begin to consider the planks that must go into the platform of economic freedom, one by one, and to throw your columns open to a national debate on each plank. I should like to start the ball rolling by submitting the first plank, and here it is:

The most fundamental of all concepts is our concept of man. In a democracy he must be esteemed an independent personality, an inviolable soul, equal to all other free men in inborn rights, though unequal in physical and intellectual talents. He must be considered the central and most important product of society. Institutions are created for his benefit and not man for the benefit of the institution.

C. T. HABEGGER

Berne, Ind., December 23

Murder and Reprisal

Dear Sirs: Whatever practical effect your editorial Murder of a People in the December 19 Nation might have had was largely nullified by your veto of the proposal "that our air force systematically raze German villages in reprisal"—the only proposal that, if adopted, might stay the hand of the ruthless murderer.

You say that you are against such reprisals because German villagers have "nothing" to do with the massacres in Poland, because the destruction of such villages would scarcely raise a shudder in Berlin, and, lastly, because vengeance raids in the name of the Jews would implant a long-lasting anti-Semitism among the survivors of such raids and their neighbors in surrounding towns.

Now as to the villagers' complete innocence, it is hard to see how in this total war civilians anywhere could be fully excused and separated from the doings of their armies. And as to Berlin scarcely shuddering at the extermination of German villages, should that be a fact, a few raids on Berlin itself could be added to the curriculum, these raids to be graded in duration and intensity according to the number of hostages then being executed by the Germans.

Finally, don't worry much about the new and longer-lasting German anti-Semitism. Aside from the fact that the Jew is somewhat fed up with the tolerance and good-will he has received in different qualities and quantities in foreign lands, and expects "on the day of liberation" to be permitted to rebuild Palestine on a larger scale, making it the biggest protector of the Jews and possibly of the persecuted non-Jew—aside from all that, there is no reason why the German people should not blame the reprisal raids on the savagery of their compatriots, as it is expected and meant they should do.

No one doubts that there must be some Germans who are against Hitler and all he stands for. Why not therefore believe these Germans also capable of declaring: "The death of these innocents is the price we must pay for" the scourge our compatriots helped to inflict on a confused and unguarded world?"

AVRA PILZER

New York, January 6

Debating Renewal

Dear Sirs: The Nation has long been one of my favorite periodicals, but for some time lately I have debated renewing my subscription. This debate followed an editorial that impressed me adversely.

I have regarded The Nation as a sound liberal, one that generally represented my sentiments. I have depended on it for the truth which our conservative and reactionary press withholds or ignores. Its exposé of the Dies committee was a contribution that deserved the commendation of all true patriots.

The editorial in question dealt with the rider attached by Senator Lee to the teen-age draft bill. I have observed so much debauchery of our youths by liquor around the camps that I cannot understand your attitude. To say conditions under prohibition were worse is the verdict, as I see it, of those who do not know the facts.

I am tolerant of differences of opinion. But when one who poses as a liberal expresses his opinion in a way to indict the integrity of honest convictions it shakes my confidence in the sincerity of his liberalism.

W. E. HALBROOK

Little Rock, Ark., January 2

Services Not Wanted

Dear Sirs: Please make your editorial writers stop writing about the "knowledge and experience of the men and women who have risked their lives fighting Hitler within Europe," because that does not mean anything in this country. Make them reread the article of Alvarez del Vayo in the issue of December 5 in which he admits that nobody cares "to avail himself" of that knowledge and experience. People in office, he says, are "collaborating with all the half-fascists while ignoring or discarding altogether proved anti-fascists."

The writer of this letter is only a very unknown and probably unworthy European refugee. But there are plenty of once famous professors working as bus boys, noted editors doing errands, lawyers running elevators, and many others who feel as I do.

Do not get me wrong: I like to go the hard way; it is the more honest way in a world in which the really decent men find themselves in concentration camps or on the battle fronts. But don't speak any more about the valuable services we are able to render. We have read too many such articles.

WALTHER VICTOR

New York, December 24

Unjust Discrimination

Dear Sirs: Many local draft boards in various parts of the country are inducting into military service Chinese citizens whose dependent wives and children reside outside the United States solely by reason of the Chinese exclusion laws and not through choice. Other citizens with like dependents are deferred. This inequality of treatment constitutes an unjust discrimination against a group that is rendering loyal and unstinted aid to the cause of the United States and of the United Nations.

An undue hardship is further im-

Introduce "The Nation" to Your Friends!

Let Us Send Them
this "Nation" Book absolutely free!

THE NATION YEAR BOOK 1942

LETTER TO THE LIVING

A STORY OF CAPTIVE FRANCE

By Walter Van Tilburg Clark

And

Jews After the War	By Reinhold Niebuhr
U.S.A. 1950	By Walter Millis
The Decision Is Simple	By Brooks Atkinson
To a Liberal in Office	By John Dos Passos
The Pope's Neutrality	By G. A. Borgese
Revolution by Consent	By Harold J. Laski
World War III	By J. Alvarez del Vayo
Are Critics Important?	By Joseph Wood Krutch
Luce Thinking	By Freda Kirchwey
Cordell Hull—The Great Anachronism	By Robert Bendiner
One Morning the World Woke Up	By Oscar Williams
Return of a Native	By John T. Whitaker
Paris in the Morning—A Story	By Ida Treat
Politics of Attack	By Norman Angell
The Hour of Elation	By Jonathan Daniels
Cartoons	By Low

★

With an Introduction by The Editor

A Collection of Enduring Contributions

As a regular reader of The Nation, you are presumably in sympathy with its point of view. If so, you are as eager to spread that point of view as we are. The Nation's Year Book, a collection of enduring articles published over the past twelve months, is a convincing ambassador for our side. Why not let us send a copy of this 104-page volume to those of your friends who are not yet acquainted with The Nation's progressive approach to world events? We have arranged for the free distribution of a limited number of copies to friends of Nation readers. All you need do is to write the name and address of some of your friends on the coupon below and send it to us. We will at once mail them a free postpaid copy of this book.

And if you, as a regular Nation reader, haven't yet received your own copy, just indicate it on the attached coupon and we will at once mail you your own free copy.

Fill in and Mail this Coupon Today

THE NATION

FIFTY-FIVE FIFTH AVENUE

NEW YORK, N. Y.

1-16-48

Please send a free copy of The Nation's Year Book to the persons as indicated below. ☐ Send me my own free copy.

NAME..... ADDRESS.....

NAME..... ADDRESS.....

NAME..... ADDRESS.....

NAME..... ADDRESS.....

NAME..... ADDRESS.....

NAME..... ADDRESS.....

Requested by: NAME..... ADDRESS.....

LECTURE

MAX WARMBRAND, Ph.T.

Noted health authority presents new viewpoints in an extraordinary lecture

ON

"NATURAL APPROACH
TO WOMEN'S PROBLEMS"

at the

Empire Hotel, 63rd St. & B'way

This Wed. JAN. 20, 8:15 P. M.

Admission, Twenty-five Cents

Auspices: League for Health Education

40% OFF

In place of its regular yearly subscription rate of $5, The Nation offers a special 40 per cent reduced rate of $3 a year to all men now in the armed forces who have a service address in the United States or United States possessions.

TO THE MEN in the Armed Forces

Send all you can spare ★ Ask your bookseller how posed upon the dependent wives and children of drafted Chinese by reason of the fact that the United States government cannot at this time transmit to China any soldier's allotment to his dependent family in that country. This inequitable arrangement terminates any assistance that these Chinese in America, as civilians, have managed to transmit through private channels to their dependent families in China, and thus increases the burden upon our Chinese ally and causes great suffering.

It is therefore important that fair-minded citizens urge Selective Service authorities to eliminate this unequal treatment of Chinese family men.

LIM A. HEAUM, Acting President,
Chinese American Citizens
Alliance, Pittsburgh Branch

Pittsburgh, Pa., January 5

Union Work Is War Work

Dear Sirs: The Highlander Folk School has recently received urgent requests from unions for educational and research workers. The Southern director of a C. I. O. union has asked for someone to do such jobs as classifying wage rates, running a lending library, and teaching parliamentary law. The school has been asked to supply educational directors for New Orleans, Birmingham, Atlanta, Memphis, Knoxville, Louisville, and Cincinnati. There is also a demand for secretaries familiar with labor problems and for persons capable of preparing material for presentation to government agencies.

Our ten years' experience at Highlander has acquainted us with labor problems, and the success of our method of dealing with these problems is attested to by the demands referred to above. Many young people, realizing that union work is war work, are anxious to make their contribution but lack practical knowledge and contacts. A three months' residence seminar has been planned to bridge the gap.

The seminar will open on February 1. Basic material and methods will be learned from directed reading, discussion, practical work at the school and in the community, and conferences with labor and government officials. Afterward, there will be provided opportunities for first-hand experience in the field under the supervision of staff members, former students in official positions, and other key labor people who are cooperating with the school.

Students will be selected for the seminar on the basis of their background and interest in full-time work with unions. The total cost for room, board, and tuition is $25. Four hours' assigned work is required daily in the office, library, house, or on the farm. Highlander, located on a 200-acre mountain farm, is run cooperatively. Staff and students share in the work, and learn, sing, hike, square dance, and play volley ball together.

Men and women desiring to attend the seminar should enrol at once. Applications should include a statement of union or other group-work experience and additional qualifications.

MYLES HORTON, Chairman
Monteagle, Tenn., January 1

CONTRIBUTORS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of Applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary, is the author of "The Nature and Destiny of Man" and a contributing editor of The Nation.

TOM WINTRINGHAM, who commanded the British battalion of the International Brigade in Spain, played an important part in organizing and training the British Home Guard. He is the author of "New Ways of War."

HERTA PAULI, author of "Alfred Nobel: Dynamite King—Architect of Peace," is a Viennese refugee now living in the United States.

LIN YUTANG, author of "The Importance of Living" and many other books, recently edited "The Wisdom of China and India."

LOUIS FISCHER, for many years The Nation's Moscow correspondent, is the author of "Men and Politics." His most recent book is "A Week with Gandhi."

JOHN SCOTT worked as a welder in Magnitogorsk for several years. He is the author of "Behind the Urals: An American Worker in Russia's City of Steel" and "Duel for Europe: Stalin versus Hitler."

H. P. LAZARUS contributes occasional reviews to The Nation.

CLEMENT GREENBERG is an editor of the Partisan Review.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 23, 1943

NUMBER 4

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- | | |
|---|-----|
| What Next in Africa? by Freda Kirchwey | 111 |
| Monopoly Bottleneck | 113 |
| Supplies for China | 114 |
| The Hard-Coal Strike | 114 |

ARTICLES

- | | |
|---|-----|
| Capital Notes by I. F. Stone | 115 |
| Talk on Guadalcanal by Ira Wolfert | 117 |
| White Book on Blackmail by Robert Bendiner | 119 |
| Pigeonhole for Negro Equality by James A. Wechsler | 121 |
| Carlo Tresca by John Dos Passos | 123 |
| Russia and the West: II. By Reinhold Niebuhr | 124 |
| Red Army Hits Its Stride by Donald W. Mitchell | 126 |
| In the Wind | 127 |

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- | | |
|---|-----|
| As Simple as That by J. Alvarez del Vayo | 128 |
| Anti-Semitism: Norway by Haakon Lie | 130 |
| Behind the Enemy Line by Argus | 130 |
| File and Remember | 132 |

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- | | |
|--|-----|
| A Modern Socrates by Mary Agnes Hamilton | 133 |
| Artists in a Society by Morton Dauwen Zabel | 133 |
| The Mussolini Myth by Gaetano Salvemini | 134 |
| Jefferson, Citizen by Jacques Barzun | 135 |
| The Army of the Soviets by Ralph Bates | 135 |
| Shakespeare Today by William Phillips | 136 |
| Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling | 137 |
| Sassoon's War by George Barker | 138 |
| Films by James Agee | 139 |
| Art by Clement Greenberg | 140 |
| Music by B. H. Haggin | 141 |

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor

RICHARD H. ROVERB

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

BY LIFTING THE SIEGE OF LENINGRAD AND clearing the Moscow-Rostov railroad to the banks of the Don, the Red Army has laid the foundation for new strategic movements which threaten to snap the enemy's "elastic" defense at several points. Up to now the military experts have been understandably cautious in assessing the potentialities of the second winter offensive. Last year's campaign, important as was its contribution to the attrition of the Reichswehr, proved that the recapture of thousands of square miles of Russia's vast terrain is not strategically significant so long as the invaders remain firmly intrenched in "hedgehogs" commanding vital communications. This year, however, the Russians have demonstrated their ability to crack the most strongly fortified positions. In order to relieve Leningrad they had to break through a ring of iron and concrete defenses which the Nazis had constructed with their usual thoroughness during the seventeen months' siege. The Red Army commanders found the necessary key in their formidable artillery, which, thanks to better weather, they have been able to deploy on a far greater scale than last winter. The same weapon seems also to have played a leading role in the capture of Rossosh, Millerovo, and Kamensk, the three strongly held railroad centers which barred the northern route to Rostov. These victories, north and south, present Hitler with a problem calculated to strain his "intuition" severely. Not the least disagreeable surprise sprung on him by the Russians is their ability to hit hard on several fronts simultaneously.

✱

GERMAN COMMUNIQUE FROM THE EASTERN front have been both meager and vague recently. But writers in the press and radio commentators have adopted a tone which suggests that the German people are being prepared for bad news. A call has gone forth from Goebbels's office for total mobilization of man-power. Germans who know that more than a quarter of the labor force of the Reich is now composed of foreigners must wonder how much more juice can be squeezed out of a dry lemon. And if their minds are not completely befuddled, they must wonder, also, whether the Russians have discovered how to resurrect the dead, for official sources, which only a few months ago were claiming the "annihilalation" of the last Soviet reserves, now stress the Red Army's superiority in numbers. Lieutenant General Dietmar, speaking as a military expert over the Frankfort radio, has attempted to explain this discrepancy by alleging that "the Russians are far ahead of us in exhaustion of the strength of their people." This is shown, he said, by the presence in the front lines of very old and very young men. On the other hand, the Börsen Zeitung, a leading Berlin newspaper, ascribes Russian successes to the use of "élite troops" hitherto held in reserve. More impressive than such Nazi statements of "fact" is Dietmar's admission that the task of holding and organizing German conquests has deprived the fighting front of valuable forces. The frantic new efforts of the Germans to build defensive lines all round the vast periphery of Fortress Europe are likely to prove a further drain on both military and industrial man-power.

✱

THESE IS A DIRECT CONNECTION BETWEEN the Russian successes, the German man-power crisis, and growing unrest in the Balkans. Since the beginning of the year reports have been received of attempted uprisings in Rumania and Bulgaria. The root cause in both cases is Nazi pressure for more soldiers, more workers, more supplies. Rumanian armies have participated in the assaults on Odessa, Sevastopol, and Stalingrad, and in all three battles their losses have been huge. Now Hitler asks for further blood offerings, and discontent is expressed by an Iron Guard plot to overthrow the puppet Antonescu. The Bulgarian government has long proved its willingness to accommodate its Axis bosses except in regard to one point: it has always refused to declare war on Russia or to send troops there. In this policy it has been guided by a well-considered respect for the boiling-point of the Bulgarians, who, however ready to accept German favors at the expense of Yugoslavia and Greece, are unalterably opposed to becoming embroiled with their old friends, the Russians, in a German quarrel. Latest reports suggest that the Nazis have once again acknowledged failure in this matter but are demanding as compensation that Bulgaria supply more workers for German factories and more troops for "police" duties in Greece and Yugoslavia. These duties may become increasingly onerous if reports from Ankara, to the effect that the Russian radio has advised the Croat and Serb partisans to link up with Mihailovich, are verified. Nothing could do more to magnify Hitler's Balkan headache than an end to this unhappy schism in the anti-Axis ranks.

✱

BOMBS ON BERLIN ARE A REMINDER TO THE Nazis to take seriously the President's prophecies in his recent message to Congress—a speech which they tried desperately to minimize. Mr. Roosevelt on that occasion reminded Hitler and Mussolini that their boasted superiority in air power, which enabled them to strike with impunity at Warsaw and Rotterdam, had gone forever. "Yes," he said, "we believe that the Nazis and Fascists have asked for it, and they are going to get it." Nine raids on the Ruhr during the first half of this month followed by two successive attacks on Berlin have heavily underscored his words. Nor are these the only places where the enemy has felt the weight of ever-increasing Anglo-American air power. In the west there have been constant daylight sweeps over France and two night raids on the submarine pens at Lorient; in North Africa American and British fliers have cooperated in a constant assault on Axis installations and supply lines. These operations have played an important part in forcing Rommel's renewed retreat toward Tripoli. In Tunisia the air forces are keeping alive the offensive, which on land has been stalled by bad weather and communication problems, and we have air superiority to thank for the fact that the enemy has not been able to take greater advantage of the failure of our first dash toward Tunis.

✱

FOR A TIME DURING LAST SUMMER AND fall it seemed as if real progress was being made in dealing with the submarine menace. It now appears, however, that the decline in sinkings was due largely to seasonal conditions and that the advent of winter and spring mists may bring a serious crisis in transport. As proof that the submarine is, as Admiral Stark recently declared, "our first enemy," it is reported that the United Nations are losing at least two ships a day in the North Atlantic and six a day throughout the world. Although new construction in the United States has reached an unprecedented level of four ships a day, it is evident that United Nations ship construction is barely replacing losses; and the destruction of U-boats by the American and British navies, though large, has not kept pace with U-boat construction. The new U-boats are reported to be superior to those used a year or so ago, and Nazi submarine tactics are constantly improving. Meanwhile the production of American anti-submarine weapons has bogged down. The source of the trouble appears to be the fact that the navy is having great difficulty in obtaining priority rights for equipment to be used in the anti-submarine campaign. Unless the U-boats can be curbed we may find ourselves, as one observer put it, "marvelously equipped to fight a war in the Mississippi."

✱

WILLIAM M. JEFFERS, THE RUBBER CZAR, IS charged by army and navy critics with holding up anti-submarine weapons by seeking to have critical materials diverted to the synthetic-rubber program. Without question the rubber program is lagging. But the armed services insist that they can cut down their rubber requirements much more easily than they can sacrifice either anti-U-boat equipment or the production of aviation gasoline. Since the military needs for rubber for 1943 can presumably be met from the present stockpile, Ceylon's output, and such synthetic production as now seems assured, Jeffers's drive for top priority has taken on a purely political aspect. Hundreds of thousands of motorists, especially salesmen, have been looking to Jeffers to produce rubber for new tires when their present ones wear out. While the rubber chief probably knows perfectly well that there can be no rubber for new civilian tires this year, or probably next, he has not been above issuing the kind of publicity that is calculated to win him motorist, and hence Congressional, support in his struggle with the armed services. The priority issue has been referred to James F. Byrnes, Director of the Office of Economic Stabilization, for settlement, and it is to be hoped that the decision will be reached solely on the basis of military considerations.

*

WENDELL L. WILLKIE, A SELF-APPOINTED trouble shooter in a troubled world, has issued a timely warning against sacrificing "the tradition of the liberal arts" for the sake of war-time efficiency. Whether or not the danger is as great as he paints it, the trend is clearly in favor of extracting the maximum present usefulness from our colleges whatever the ultimate cost in cultural values. Should the war be over in a year, perhaps the net results will not be serious, but in the event of a drawn-out conflict control of the country will one day pass into the hands of a generation unschooled in the "humanities," a generation of cold and narrow technicians. "It would be a tragic paradox," as President Hopkins of Dartmouth comments, "if as a result of the war we were to allow our system of higher education to be transformed into the type of education which has made it so easy for a crowd of governmental gangsters like Hitler's outfit to commandeer a whole population." Mr. Willkie's concrete proposal, however, leaves us in doubt. He asks that a "nucleus" be left in the colleges "of men whose aptitudes qualify them as definitely for our long-range needs as other men are obviously qualified for, let us say, medicine." It is hard to say which would be the more difficult to find, draft-board officials capable of selecting this cultural élite, or students willing enough and brave enough to accept a war-time designation as "preservers of our cultural heritage." All the same, the country should be grateful to Mr. Willkie for focusing attention on a supremely important problem.

*

WHEN CARLTON J. H. HAYES WAS SENT TO Madrid as Ambassador, The Nation gave him the benefit of some rather grave doubts. We set off his long record as a democrat and liberal Catholic against his open defense of Franco in the Spanish War, and suggested that judgment be withheld until Hayes had shown what he could do. But the speech delivered in Madrid on January 15 has demolished our most charitable hopes. In the midst of a vigorous statement of the American position in the war, Mr. Hayes, according to the Associated Press, "hit hard at Axis-inspired rumors that an Allied victory would mean the overturn of the present government in Spain." And then he made the promise, directly quoted on another page of this issue, that any future change that might occur in Spain would come from inside and not be the work "of the United States or of Spanish émigrés." Presumably Mr. Hayes is authorized to speak for the United States. Perhaps in the hour of victory over the Axis we shall leave in power the lesser dictators and Quislings to threaten the future peace of Europe. Perhaps—but if so, this war is being fought for strange and uncertain ends. When Mr. Hayes pledges the United States to defend fascist Spain against the Republicans who were driven out when Franco came to power, he raises even more serious questions. The freedom-loving Spaniards now locked up in prison camps in Africa or in exile in Britain and this hemisphere are not likely to be impressed by Mr. Hayes's promises. The moment the Axis falls, they will join their anti-fascist brothers in Spain in throwing out of power the dictator whom Hitler and Mussolini put there—unless Mr. Hayes plans to use the American army to prevent a democratic revolution in Spain.

What Next in Africa?

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

NORTH AFRICA this week looks like a Jack Horner pie filled with carelessly wrapped bits of high explosives mixed in with a few favors of questionable value. You pull your ribbon and hope for the best.

At least it can be said that a change of some sort is likely. And in the absence of real information it's a safe bet that any change will be an improvement. Whether the President and Mr. Churchill are conferring or are about to confer, whether Generals de Gaulle and Giraud are even now patching up an agreement, a new deal in North Africa seems to be in the making. That the present political set-up can't be allowed to continue is agreed on all sides: first, because public feeling, especially in England, won't tolerate it; second, because the turmoil behind our lines is a constant hindrance to a successful fight against Hitler's forces in Tunisia.

The only way to talk about what is going to happen is to guess. And the only way to guess is to pull the pie to pieces, and unwrap as many of the contents as we're allowed to.

Let's look at the few facts first. Perhaps the most encouraging fact is the presence of Harold MacMillan ■■ British Minister at Allied Headquarters. Mr. MacMillan represents the British government's determination to intervene in the mess—politely and in full cooperation with General Eisenhower and Mr. Murphy, but firmly. In this role, every word Mr. MacMillan speaks for publication carries the weight of the government that sent him to Africa. So his words are to be examined with great care. What the Minister said can be summed up in the following propositions: (1) The abuses carried on under the present French provisional government will not be tolerated by "the British and American people": specifically, the anti-Jewish laws will have to be repealed and the political prisoners freed as rapidly as possible. (2) Generals Giraud and De Gaulle will surely get together very soon, and their agreement will make possible necessary changes in the political set-up. (3) In spite of fascist and monarchist maneuvers, 90 per cent of the French in North Africa are for the Republic. (4) Allied activities in North Africa are watched throughout Europe as a demonstration of what the other occupied countries may expect when Allied armies land.

The efforts of Mr. MacMillan are certain to be in support of a change from Darlanism to republicanism; so his arrival must be greeted as an omen of better days.

Fact number two is of related and subsidiary importance. It is Brendan Bracken's statement which appeared on the same day as MacMillan's interview. Brendan Bracken, British Minister of Information, said that the British government solidly backs General Eisenhower and that no differences exist between it and the United States on policy in North Africa. Hailed by the New York Times as an answer to American "jitterers" and "snipers," this statement was, of course, a complete acknowledgment of the deep disturbance in British-American relations.

The British government is not sentimental about democratic procedures in the empire or anywhere else. But when a political blunder raises a political storm of the dimensions that blew up in England over the Darlan deal, then the authorities take notice. The British government wants no new Hoare-Laval rumpus on its hands. But even less does it want trouble with the United States. Having opposed our stubborn Vichy policy from the start, having backed De Gaulle and recognized his authority as the head of organized French resistance, Britain could hardly contemplate with approval the American maneuvers that produced Darlan and the mess that ensued. But it loyally kept its mouth shut, did its best to prevent news and criticism from reaching the public, and acted only when public indignation had risen to the boiling-point. It proposed a settlement, the terms of which have only been hinted at, sent MacMillan to Africa, and then issued a statement saying that everything was fine in this best of all possible alliances.

Fact three is a puzzler. Ugly and explosive, but not easily explicable. Fact three is the summoning of M. Peyrouton from his post as Vichy Ambassador in Argentina to North Africa to act, presumably, as head of the civil government there. Peyrouton is the very model of a Vichy collaboratorist. His relations with the Nazis were close; his own record is unsavory. In The Men Behind Darlan, in The Nation for December 26, he is described as Flandin's associate in arranging financial deals with the Germans. As Vichy Minister of the Interior he carried out a savage policy of repression against his fellow-countrymen who opposed Vichy and collaboration. His earlier position as Resident-General of Tunisia undoubtedly recommended him to the present authorities, and it is said that Admiral Leahy, during his stay at Vichy, developed a strong liking and respect for Peyrouton. If Darlanism is to continue to rule in North Africa, the summoning of this friend of reaction and ally of Hitler is easy to explain. If Darlanism is to be supplanted with any administration acceptable to anti-fascists, then Peyrouton's arrival seems ill-timed, to say the least. Was it, perhaps, a last card played by the sinister Nogues? Or is Peyrouton merely a delayed reaction, a relic of a policy about to be ended? One must hope that this last possibility is the correct one. But if the story is true that Eisenhower himself approved the importation of Peyrouton, then neither of the other facts I have set down makes any sort of sense.

I prefer to contemplate the fourth package in the pie—this one a blatant rumor. The rumor is that Eisenhower is fed up with Murphy and all his works. The story has a good foundation in logic, but that doesn't, alas, prove its accuracy. The sequence runs as follows: An ably planned and brilliantly executed American military expedition landed in North Africa expecting to be welcomed with comradely enthusiasm by authorities who had presumably been won to our support by the diplomatic efforts of Mr. Murphy. Instead it was met with gunfire and other evidences of hostility on the part of the French command as well as the civil administration. The efforts of Mr. Murphy and his young assistants had failed to subvert a single key man. Persons who were genuinely pro-Ally, De Gaullists and others, were clapped into jail. Eisenhower made a forced decision which netted him immediate military advantages. With no time to maneuver and little political experience, he soon found himself saddled with a full-fledged French fascist administration thoroughly uninterested in installing any one of the four freedoms in North Africa. The further efforts of Mr. Murphy have neither solved the political problems nor lessened Eisenhower's responsibilities. The power and unreliability of Nogues, who is known to be in constant and direct touch with Vichy, worry the American command—and with good reason. Eisenhower is said to be ready for a new deal all round.

The next few weeks will clear a confused situation which has been doubly confounded by the thick crust of censorship that lies over the whole scene. The best hope rests in the plan supposedly put forward by the British: to establish a temporary government in North Africa made up of men acceptable to both Giraud and De Gaulle who would take over civilian functions and move as rapidly as possible toward an administration based on the laws of the Third Republic. If such a scheme is actually cooking behind the scenes, our first adventure in occupation politics may still be rescued from total disaster.

Monopoly Bottleneck

THE testimony given by Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes before the Senate Small Business Committee dramatizes and illuminates the basic issue in war production. It is whether we shall fight this war with a maximum of comfort for monopoly, paying for the privilege in lives and extra years of struggle, or whether we shall make a truly total effort and thereby increase the volume of supplies and the means of offensive action at the disposal of our own men and the forces of our allies. Two personalities in present-day Washington are the symbols and leaders of these two opposing points of view. Representing the first is Ferdinand Eberstadt, corporation lawyer and Wall Street banker, now vice-chairman in charge of materials at the War Production Board and the most powerful single figure among the civilians in the production picture. The other is Secretary Ickes. Eberstadt brings to the problems of steel, aluminum, copper, and tin the complacent point of view of a man who has spent his life in the service of those who maintain monopoly and scarcity in materials; his actual knowledge of the problem of producing materials has been gleaned from the contract and the counting house. Ickes has spent much of his public life fighting monopoly, and he heads that department of the government which is intrusted with the guardianship of our basic resources and which is best equipped to hasten their development for war. Unfortunately, while Eberstadt is in control of materials, Ickes is on the periphery of power, forced to fight a kind of continuous guerrilla warfare for new sources of the metals and minerals which mean planes and tanks and guns.

In the picture drawn by Secretary Ickes for the Senate Small Business Committee one can see the purposes a war-production program controlled by monopoly serves in the strategy of big business. Control of both the military and civilian arms of the production program has given the big concerns most of the war business. In 1939, as Secretary Ickes points out, 170,000 small plants turned out 70 per cent of our productive goods; the 100 big ones, "the blue-chip corporations," accounted for the remaining 30 per cent. Today this situation has been reversed. The 100 big concerns turn out 70 per cent of the productive business, mostly war work; 20 per cent of productive output has been eliminated by war-time diversions; the survivors of the 170,000 are trying to get along on the balance of 10 per cent. This is immediately important because it represents a pool of idle war-production capacity. Its ultimate importance is that it is speeding up a concentration of control in American industry that will make the maintenance of free government more difficult. Can anything be done about it?

The principal excuse for the idleness of productive facilities in small business as in large—for much of big business is carrying on its war work in special plants rather than with its normal facilities—is the lack of materials. But this lack of materials, as Secretary Ickes showed, is not due to any dearth of resources. It is due to the wasteful way in which monopoly has developed these resources, skimming the rich surface and leaving vast potentialities untouched. It is due to the hostility of monopoly to new methods for making and extracting basic materials. And it is due to the unwillingness of men drawn from the great monopolies into army procurement and the WPB to grant the loans and facilities required to obtain the vast additional amount of materials which could be drawn from the smaller mines and mills. Some of these mineral resources are "low-grade," but as Secretary Ickes explained, they are "low-grade," in the lexicon of a country so rich that it could afford in the past to ignore all but its most profitable sources of metal. Germany, Sweden, and Norway, Ickes said, have developed great industries from ores of a kind complacently dismissed in this country as of no commercial value—and still so dismissed, as may be seen from the record of the indifferent treatment the WPB has accorded the various programs put forward by the Bureau of Mines for expanding production of manganese, aluminum, copper, zinc, chromium, and other metals. Not the least important aspect of these programs is that they would release much shipping still being used to bring these materials from Russia, India, and Africa.

These possibilities for expansion of the production on which victory depends will never be realized so long as metals and materials are in present hands at the WPB. The steps necessary to tap all possible sources would cripple the whole strategy of monopoly. In the field of fabrication more materials would keep alive the small competitors of big business. In the field of extraction a vigorous program to increase output would save from bankruptcy the small competitors of our big mining corporations. The process sponsored by the Bureau of Mines for obtaining aluminum from low-grade clay would destroy the aluminum monopoly.

It is our duty toward our men and our allies on the fighting fronts of the world to let nothing stand in the way of maximum output of weapons. The Nation hopes that Senator Murray and his colleagues of the Small Business Committee will fight at this session for a Metals and Minerals Administration to be set up in the Interior Department under an Ickes rather than an Eberstadt.

Supplies for China

TWO weeks have elapsed since the President assured Congress and the American people that "we are flying as much lend-lease material into China as ever transversed the Burma road, flying it over mountains 17,000 feet high, flying blind through sleet and snow." This was a fine, dramatic statement, one of the high points of the President's speech. But on the face of it, the statement just could not be true, and many of the President's hearers must have known that it could not be true. We have refrained from commenting on the statement until now in the hope that some correction or explanation would come from the White House or other source. So far none has. The Chinese have hidden their embarrassment with their usual suavity. T. V. Soong, Minister of Foreign Affairs, begged off when asked to comment. Chinese officials here have remained silent.

The exact amount of supplies being sent into China by air remains a military secret. But it is a small fraction of the 20,000 or more tons that were carried over the Burma road monthly when the traffic on the road was at its heaviest. This is not surprising. During the period of peak operations well over a thousand trucks were in use, each carrying four or five tons of supplies. In addition, a certain amount of material was flown in by air. Recent reports indicate that there are still only a few dozen transport planes on the India-China route. These planes have very limited cargo space; because of the distance about half of the available carrying capacity must be used for gasoline; and breakdowns and essential repairs must be allowed for. Even if a large proportion of the transport planes now in service in the United States should be diverted to this service, the Burma road capacity, limited though it was, could hardly be equalled.

It is not the President's business to check the figures that are handed to him, but someone whose business it is should have gone over them to make sure of their accuracy. It has been suggested that the reference in the statement to lend-lease material for China was deliberate—a good part of the supplies that went over the Burma road were not, strictly speaking, lend-lease material, but had been purchased by the Chinese government with loans advanced by the United States. We cannot believe, however, that the Administration would resort to any such quibble. We prefer to think that it was a simple, though astounding, error. Its unfortunate effects can best be wiped out by a simple correction.

The Hard-Coal Strike

THE action of the anthracite miners in refusing to dig coal rather than accept an increase of 50 cents a month in union dues cannot be condoned either by the public or the government; but the public should recognize that the strike is not an attempt on the part of "unpatriotic" miners to hinder the war effort but a revolt against John L. Lewis and his dictatorial leadership of the United Mine Workers. Moreover, the miners would hardly have resorted to so unpopular a move if they had felt they had any recourse within the union.

The U. M. W. treasury already contains some $6,000,000. What the anthracite miner wants to know is why the union executive felt it necessary to take another $3,000,000 a year from the membership. The answer is not obscure. Lewis wants more money to build and control a labor movement with which to fight Roosevelt and secure a dominating role in American life, especially after the war. And that concerns us all.

To be sure, the increase in dues was voted at a convention of the United Mine Workers which included delegates from the anthracite locals; they voted against it but were completely outnumbered by delegates from the bituminous fields. The check-off is written into the union's contracts, though the striking miners say that while they have agreed individually in writing to the deduction of $1 a month for union dues they have never given similar permission to have the extra 50 cents withheld.

Lewis seems to hold all the cards. He has outlawed the strike, though he is promising the miners a rise in wages in April despite the Little Steel formula. Meanwhile he is accusing the War Labor Board of trying to interfere in internal union affairs. It is significant, however, that he did not go in person to the region of discontent—which has been a center of anti-Lewis feeling—and make at least an attempt to conciliate the miners and prevent the strike. Moreover, he insists that the demand for an immediate increase of $2 a day in wages is the central issue. As for the question of dues, which obviously provoked the revolt, Lewis meets it with the bland statement that it is not an issue because the increase was approved at a union convention.

The impression is inescapable that Lewis is not really upset over a situation in which a recalcitrant rank and file—"the younger generation" as one union official put it—is exposing itself to public wrath by an ill-advised "wildcat" strike and which provides him with an opportunity to sneer at the War Labor Board and the Administration. If the President takes over the mines, Lewis will have even more to say about government dictatorship. But apparently he has no intention of entertaining so much as a discussion of the 50-cent increase in dues and thereby opening the way for a settlement.

Capital Notes

BY. I. F. STONE

Washington, January 17

F. D. R. at Mason and Dixon's Line: If the President's message to Congress is reread carefully, it will be seen that its most important statements point to the need for a renewed attack on the "peculiar institutions" which oppress common men, white and black, below the Mason and Dixon line. In his message Mr. Roosevelt said he had been advised that this was a poor time to speak of building a new world. From what source did this advice come? From Rayburn of Texas. For whom did Rayburn speak? For the oligarchy of Southern planters and Northern capitalists which rules the South. What keeps that oligarchy in power? Poll taxes, racial discrimination, the share-cropper system.

Mr. Roosevelt has been executing a series of strategic retreats. The message to Congress showed that he is confident that he can turn and fight successfully on the line of social security, full employment, freedom from want. The choice itself was pretty obvious; whatever the pendular swings of politics, people are unlikely to vote away their old-age pensions. More significant than the decision made by the President is the fact that he had to defy his own party leadership to make it. "I am told," Mr. Roosevelt said, "that it is a grave error on my part. I dissent." The dissent was a challenge to those Democratic Congressional leaders whose power rests on poll taxes, racial discrimination, the share-cropper system.

"Hitlerism, like any other form of crime or disease," Mr. Roosevelt said, "can grow from the evil seeds of economic as well as military feudalism." He took his stand with those who are not content merely to get rid of Hitler. Where in America can one find economic feudalism? In the South of poll taxes, racial discrimination, the share-cropper system. Mr. Roosevelt gave expression to his own basic faith, the secret of his hold on the masses, despite many compromises on his part and disappointments on theirs. "The issue of this war," he said, "is . . . between those who believe in mankind and those who do not. . . . There have always been those who did not believe in the people, who attempted to block their forward movement across history, to force them back to servility and suffering and silence." Where in our own country are "servility and suffering and silence" most apparent? In the South of poll taxes, racial discrimination, the share-cropper system.

Politics and Logic. Logic says that Mr. Roosevelt, in order to defeat his party opponents, must destroy the conditions on which their power is based. This can be done by abolishing the poll tax, intensifying the fight against racial discrimination, and enlarging the activities of the Farm Security Administration in order to turn more share-croppers, tenants, and farm laborers into independent farmers. Unfortunately, politics is not so simple as logic. In politics the straight line is rarely the shortest possible distance between two points. The President is hoping at one and the same time to defy the Southern oligarchy and to placate it.

Mr. Roosevelt is going ahead with social security despite the advice of the Southern oligarchs. At the same time he is hoping to irritate them as little as possible on other fronts. The White House has passed the word along to soft-pedal the fight against the poll tax. The Fair Employment Practices Committee and the fight against racial discrimination are being elbowed to one side. Changes in the Department of Agriculture have weakened the forces in favor of a vigorous Farm Security program. The inconsistency is not so bewildering as it looks on paper. Mr. Roosevelt feels strong enough to defeat the Southern oligarchy on social security, but not strong enough to make a successful frontal attack on the sources of that oligarchy's power. "Cotton Ed" Smith can hardly denounce old-age pensions and get away with it, but he can get up and rasp, "How'd you like your sister to marry a Negro?"

Appeaser? Thus during coming months the President will be carrying on a brave fight on one front and retreating on others. The answer is not to denounce Mr. Roosevelt as a domestic appeaser but to recognize that this is another of those cases in which progressives must lead the President if he is unwilling or unable to lead them. Mr. Roosevelt is a shrewd judge of political possibilities. No one can doubt where his sympathies lie, but obviously he feels this is a fight he cannot lead, though it is one in which he must ultimately join. The job of labor and the progressives is to build up enough understanding of these issues and enough public feeling on them to give the President the support he needs before he can act against the most powerful bloc in his party.

Dilemmas. The President's task is complicated by several dilemmas. One is that many Congressional progressives, particularly from the Middle West, are isolationist, while the Southern bloc is internationalist. Mr. Roosevelt needs these Southern votes if he is to help build any kind of world order after the war is over. This is not so paradoxical as it may seem, for internationalism and progressivism do not always go hand in hand. The outlook of the Southern ruling class has been as broad as the world markets on which it depended for the sale of cotton and tobacco. It has been for a low tariff, and the low tariff implies a friendlier attitude toward the world outside. At home this point of view has tended to be "liberal" in the mid-Victorian and National Association of Manufacturers sense, that is, opposed to restrictions on the freedom of capital to exploit labor and resources. Secretary Hull's outlook is typical of this class. Though the aid of these Southerners may be necessary from the point of view of practical Congressional politics, an alliance with them looking toward some kind of world order is hazardous. For about all they really want is a world made secure for trade and capitalist exploitation.

Squeeze Play. Mr. Roosevelt's task is further complicated by Republican strategy, which is to split the Democratic Party. From all indications, the Republicans will press the poll-tax issue, making it difficult for the President to refuse his support to the fight against the poll tax and even more difficult for him to maintain his hold on Southern Democratic leaders. If the President remains the prisoner of the Southern Bourbons while the Republicans abolish the poll tax, his understandable attempt to "navigate" this difficult situation may end in failure. He may find that he has lost the support of both sides. In Mr. Roosevelt's favor is the fact that the Republicans have neither sufficient sincerity nor sufficient freedom—from the great industrial interests which operate North and South—to press the issue too hard. They will seek to press it just hard enough to put the President on the spot. They may end by pressing it hard enough and helping to stir up public opinion enough to make it politically possible for Mr. Roosevelt to step in and complete the job and take the credit. He always has been nimble.

Hara-Kiri. The big danger here is not so much what Congress may do to the New Deal but what the New Deal is doing to itself in fear of this new Congress. All down the line New Deal agencies are quietly beginning to commit hara-kiri as progressive instruments of government. Just as the President substituted a Brown for a Henderson, so New Dealers lower down are bringing in conservatives and getting rid of progressives in their own agencies in order to shelter themselves against Congressional inquiry, denunciation, or budget curtailment. Sometimes no actual changes in personnel are made, but one observes a subtle but unmistakable shift of power within the agencies from progressive subordinates to those that are middle-of-the-road or reactionary. The biggest danger spot is the OPA, where Brown has promised to keep staffs intact but is under pressure to replace New Dealers with political appointees susceptible to political pressure. This is the sure path to a disastrous inflation.

The Democratic National Committee would like to take over the OPA and the lush patronage a purge would offer. The conservative Washington Star, in an inspired story looking toward a purge of the OPA, says "the Democratic Committee is prepared to pass along to Mr. Brown any recommendations which members of Congress may make." This bodes ill for price control. The Star makes an admission which throws an interesting light on the attacks made upon the OPA: "It will be extremely difficult," it says, "for the new price administrator to move too fast in firing and hiring. The men now handling the rationing and price jobs are almost the only people in the country who have had any experience at such tasks." Why, then, replace them with the inexperienced? And why not be a little more patient with the difficulties which are inevitably encountered in doing a new job?

Wickard and Dollar-a-Year Men. Don't be taken in by Secretary of Agriculture Wickard's bar against dollar-a-year men in his Food Administration. It is a good smoke screen to throw around the resignations of Donald E. Montgomery, consumers' counsel and Herbert W. Parisius as head of the Food Production Division of the Department of Agriculture. For many years the milk trust and the packers and the big processing interests have been dominant at the Department of Agriculture, and the prospects are that they will be a good deal stronger under Wickard as the present trend continues. The issue in agriculture is essentially the same as in industry: shall the war program be used to further the wiping out of small holdings, the conversion of small farmers into farm laborers? In agriculture as in industry maximum output is only obtainable by bringing the small operator fully into the war program, but that means providing him with capital and extra facilities. The Farm Security Administration is the proper mechanism for this job, and the FSA has been weakened by the resignation of Parisius. The FSA may be operated in the future as a means of moving the small farmer off the land. As the Secretary of Agriculture says in his annual report, the FSA can "help some small farmers find other employment and . . . regroup the released resources for better operation." That is the monopoly recipe in the field of food production. I have the deepest respect for the Vice-President's gentle humanity and wisdom, but I ask, What's the good of speeches about the century of the common man if we are to run the war program in a way that will deprive more and more common men of their independence?

Censorship. José Caudros, a Bolivian journalist who came to the United States recently at the invitation of the New York Times, was stopped at Miami on his way home. Clippings of articles in the Washington Merry-Go-Round, PM, the New York Times, and The Nation about the Bolivian affair were taken from him. I have been unable to find out whether this was done by censorship or customs officials.

Talk on Guadalcanal

BY IRA WOLFERT

WHEN an American puts on a uniform, he doesn't seem to change his politics. If the ballots had arrived in time, the men and boys doing the fighting on Guadalcanal would have voted just about as they would have back home. Their ideas on war aims were no clearer than the ideas of people here. The most sharply defined, most immediately stimulating war aims on Guadalcanal were those a man could level on through his gunsights.

War as we fight it is not, apparently, a political education. Nevertheless, our men are getting something out of it that could prove valuable in so political a matter as winning the peace. Whether it will actually prove valuable we shan't know for some time. But meanwhile we have an opportunity.

When I was on Guadalcanal in October and November, the fighting was rough, and it went deep into everybody who took part in it. The naval battles, too, were heavier and more costly, usually to the Japs, than any others in the history of the world, including Jutland. Standing up to it all was a cross-section of the able-bodied American male population—in the navy, the marines, and the army. They stood shoulder to shoulder, and over their heads, in battle. They fought with passion, quite often with almost lunatic passion or they would not have won. We are a rich country in all the materials of war, but we were not rich on Guadalcanal in October and November.

Nobody who came out of that fighting could be immediately the same again. In the majority of cases the change was an improvement. I have thought all my life that no good ever comes to a man from war, but I was wrong. I, for example, came out of the battles I saw feeling surer of myself and with a special kind of self-respect. That seemed to be true of practically all the men once the disorganizing impact was over and thoughts began to flow normally again. Each seemed to see his qualities as a member of the human race in a new light. Even the minds least capable of generalizing were startled into an awareness of what a remarkable thing a human being is and what powers he has for bearing up under the unbearable and doing the work he has to do.

When a man has this special kind of self-respect, it is a very real power in him. I can illustrate this by two conversations on the same subject, the first with men who had not yet been in battle, the second with men who were recovering from the exhaustion that hits men when the battle is over.

The subject was strikes among workers in war factories. The first time it came up was on a South Sea island near the one on which Eddie Rickenbacker convalesced from his ordeal on the raft. When Rickenbacker came out of that atmosphere, he delivered some stinging criticism of the workers back here. He would probably have felt the same way about the workers at home even if he had never been down there, but the atmosphere there made him want to blast away. The fellows on the island, none whom had had the shaking experience of battle, were working desperately for $50 or so a month, and they were sore at the money the civilian workers were getting and especially sore at all strikes because they felt that anything that put off production of the weapons to win the war put off the time when they could get away from their various Devil's Islands and go home.

These fellows asked me aggressively why, in a total war which is supposed to involve the whole population, such strikes were allowed. I told them, and they didn't like my answer. I told them it was just because this was a total war. The military phase was only a part of it, just something to deploy us into position to win its last battle, the battle for a peace that will give the workingman a square shake. The fellows back home, the ones they were sore at, the ones who were unwilling to give up the rights they had won, were joining in both battles at once. They were helping to win the war by their production of war materials and helping to win the peace by trying to make a world into which the soldier would want to fit when he went home and took off his uniform.

These island garrisons of ours were getting their news of strikes and of the reactions of workmen to the war from the radio and occasional newspapers and magazines, and that Life article on Detroit had burned into them. I told them that, as $50-a-month guys who were going to be out of work when the war was over, they ought to be for anything that would give the workingman a say in the running of a business. But they didn't take to that at all. In fact, they said, the hell with that; they were against anything that was going to keep them in uniform a minute longer than it would take to lick the Japs.

Then, two months later, the same subject came up on Guadalcanal, among the same kind of $50-a-month guys who were going to be out of work when the war was over. This was a day or so after the greatest of the naval engagements, the one that spread out from November 11 to November 15. We had all had a really rugged time, and our nerves were not yet altogether unbuttoned. A pipe-smoking colonel, a very nice, decent, and reasonable man who votes the Republican ticket for reasons which I don't think are exactly clear to himself, but who got out into the foxholes with his men and shot off a tommy gun with them and crawled on his belly with them to deliver hand grenades—well, he wondered out loud whether the defense workers would have insisted on a forty-hour week if they had been on Guadalcanal during the last four days and nights. There was an appreciative stir among the men around him, about a hundred of them, all of them his.

The colonel's remarks moved me to quite an oration. I told those fellows what I had seen in the Bethlehem plant in Hoboken shortly after the war broke out—big, gripping posters saying "Remember Pearl Harbor" and pencil writing under them saying "Remember Pearl White." And I told them why that was, that while the plant was using high-pressure advertising to steam the men up it was unable to give them more than three days' work a week. And I told them what I had told the other fellows—that the workers back home had the chance to fight both fights at once, the military fight and the fight for the peace, and the earnest ones were not backing down from either one.

The colonel took the pipe out of his mouth to argue with me. The men didn't argue. They listened. They listened to me much more intently than they did to the colonel. I seemed to be saying something they had known all along was true but had not found the words for, while the colonel seemed to be saying something that was in their past, that they had given lip service to but had never really believed.

"If everyone is well off," said one marine, while the whole crowd listened respectfully, "and sees a chance for himself in his life ahead, then he's not going to fight to grab something, but just to protect what he's got. And the big shots ain't gonna be able to sell a bill of goods. If they try, they'll have to fight their own wars." Somebody said something about a soapbox, but most of the fellows nodded in agreement. Even the colonel said yes, but then he added, "Everybody goes for that, but if there was a U. S. O. on Guadalcanal we'd all go for that too, wouldn't we?" With this emphasis on the unattainable, the sudden lift of the crowd disappeared and gave way to a vague restlessness.

It is a fact that the majority of men on the winning side of a battle come out of it better able not only to think through to what they want but to insist against their own fears on getting what they want. Our men know what they want—the four freedoms. If they were told in a way they could accept how these four freedoms could be obtained, they'd help. They'd become an active force in the war's decisive battle, the battle for the peace. But the time is now. The time for our war aims is right now when this feeling of self-respect is strong in the men. It is a feeling that seems to dissipate rapidly in the world in which we live. Our men came out of the trenches with it in 1918, but by the time the boats got around to bringing them home they were ready for the American Legion.

There is a ferment of ideas in the world and in the army, too, but little to show for it in the army. An exception is the procedure of Colonel E. F. Carlson of the marines, who runs his battalion of raiders like a man convinced of the value and efficiency of the democratic process. He prepares his raiders for each action by telling them not only their assignments but all the reasons for them, why this has to be done first and that second, why the enemy mortars have to be hit and put out of action at 14:20 o'clock and the enemy machine-guns at 14:25. The men are not only allowed but encouraged to discuss and criticize the whole plan, their own assignments and the assignments of others. Carlson's raiders have been decorated as a battalion. They are considered one of the best battalions in our armed services. But their commander's methods have not spread. Perhaps Lieutenant-Colonel James Roosevelt, who has won considerable distinction as an officer and fighting man with Carlson's raiders and is now to form his own raider battalion, will spread the notion an inch farther.

But in any large view the opportunity to get soldiers to make the democratic process effective as a way of life is being wasted. The men on Guadalcanal have about the same political opinions as when they left home. Some of the fellows have been influenced by the intellectual and emotional attitudes of their officers, most of whom are typical of middle-class America, but in general they are just where they were when they left off reading the newspapers and going to the movies and getting their opinions from them. There was just as much potentially fascist thinking being expressed on Guadalcanal as anywhere in the United States. For a while there seemed to me to be more, but finally I realized my estimate had been influenced by emotion. Each instance of it had the shock for me of a hundred when I heard it on our side of the barricades, where we were fighting for the democratic idea.

When the men are in battle they ask themselves, "What the hell am I doing here?" It's a question a man can't help asking when he is sitting out somewhere 9,000 miles away from home with shells and bullets hunting for him. I didn't meet a man on Guadalcanal who hadn't asked himself that question at least once. It's a question, too, that a man ought to be able to answer, and in a way he can accept heartily. I heard many strange answers and some informed and intelligent ones. But the marines and the navy were the only ones who came up with an answer that met immediate acceptance from everybody. Those fellows hadn't been drafted.

And what they told themselves was, "I asked for it and I'm getting it."

This is not the men's fault, nor is it the fault of the war. The war is a good one. If it succeeds in establishing the democratic process as the world's way of life, it will not have to be fought over again. It is our fault that the men don't know what the shooting is all about, the fault of everybody—teachers, journalists, politicians—who tries to put the emotions that shape men's lives into forms they can understand and accept.

For the right emotions are there. Those fellows of ours are fighting. They are not running out or giving up. Our green troops fight better than Spain's green troops fought against Franco. I saw our green troops—army men who had never been under fire before—step off their ships on to Guadalcanal and find themselves the target for the most terrible bombardment Americans have yet faced in this war. Somewhere between 50,000 and 100,000 shells weighing up to one ton apiece were exploding among them. Veterans of the fighting in France in the last war told me the bombardment exceeded in intensity anything the Germans had poured on them. But our green troops did not run. They began to fight at once as doggedly as the Spaniards did when they finally settled down at Madrid. I think it happened that way because they are solidier, better-integrated men and have been made so by the democratic process—what there has been of it in their lives. Every green man there—unable, as green troops are, to suspend the imagination, stop looking for the shell with his number on it and wait to see if it will find him—had to fall back on something inside himself to keep him at his job. He found it, waiting inside him to be used.

If somebody will show him now, while the emotion is still there near the surface, how to use it to help win the peace, then he'll help win it. But as it is, nobody shows him anything in a way that he can accept, and he goes on thinking only that he is fighting for his life against exploding steel. He hates fascism in much the way he hates to get up in the morning and loves democracy as if it were something he had been told at home he ought to love.

White Book on Blackmail

BY ROBERT BENDINER

IN MAKING public its own version of how war came, the American State Department has performed a valuable service. Cautious laymen need no longer withhold judgment on the ground that those responsible for our diplomacy know things that we can't know and that pending their revelations they must be given the benefit of the doubt. In a field as crucial as foreign policy is today that blind trust has already been carried dangerously far, considering the issues at stake. With the publication of "Peace and War," eventually to be issued as a "White Book," the official story has been told. It is for the country to decide whether or not the characters in that story have acted wisely and whether they are equal to the job that lies ahead.

Perhaps the most striking aspect of "Peace and War" is that it adds nothing important to what was already known. There is a sprinkling of new items, such as the endeavor of the Japanese a few months before Pearl Harbor to induce President Roosevelt to meet with Prime Minister Konoye aboard a Japanese warship, but by and large the report is a recitation of the facts as we have known them, supplemented by carefully selected bits of diplomatic dispatches and appropriate quotations from speeches and conversations. Disappointment awaits those who expected that when the State Department finally lifted the veil of secrecy we should really know why Spain was sacrificed to fascism, why General de Gaulle has been the "untouchable" of American diplomacy, or why we felt called upon to give Italy the oil it needed to crush the Ethiopians. The omissions in "Peace and War" are painfully obtrusive. Here is a book carrying the subtitle "United States Foreign Policy, 1931-1941." In the entire document, running to 50,000 words, the Spanish Civil War receives three unilluminating paragraphs. The Free French fare even worse with a single paragraph to the effect that they existed, established a delegation in Washington, and received a certain amount of lend-lease aid. The affair of St. Pierre and Miquelon is completely ignored.

More important than the omissions are what appears to be the double purpose of the report and the contradictions which this duality imposes. The State Department attempts in its apologia to answer two opposing types of criticism: one which is isolationist and holds the Administration guilty of a will toward war; and another which is interventionist and holds the department responsible for inexcusable delay, inertia, and a will toward appeasement. The result of trying to meet attack from both directions is a curious exercise in ambiguity which faithfully reflects the formless policy we have been pursuing. Equally a reflection of the State Department's nature is the fact that a vastly greater effort is made in this document to placate the isolationists than to satisfy the interventionists.

It is not too much to say, in fact, that "Peace and War" is the department's earnest attempt to convince American isolationists that it was their policy which was tried. This seems to me both accurate and worth having in the record. What is more, the evidence as amassed by the department is impressive.

The most ardent isolationist must be convinced after studying the document that, far from dragging the country into war, the Roosevelt Administration held with incredible persistence to the hope that by placating the aggressors, by rejecting every attempt at collective action or economic sanctions, war could be prevented. In response to public pressure for the adoption of a collective-security policy, Secretary Hull, according to the report, declared in the fall of 1936 "that we could not accept that responsibility, which carried with it direct participation in the political relations with the whole world." One year later, in connection with contemplated action by the League of Nations to curb Japanese aggression in China, "the Secretary said that the United States had been approached on several occasions by other governments with suggestions for joint action; that while the United States believed in and wished to practice cooperation it was not prepared to take part in joint action, though it would consider the possibility of taking parallel action." Similarly when Mussolini attacked Ethiopia in 1935, Hull sent word to our representatives in Geneva that "he considered it advisable for the League to understand that definite measures had already been taken by the United States in accordance with our own limitations and policies . . . and that we desired to follow our course independently." Our course did not include invoking the vital oil sanctions against Italy any more than our "parallel action" in the case of Japan involved an embargo until much too late in the day.

In the spring of 1939, after the Nazis had seized Prague as a culminating gesture of contempt for the democracies, Secretary Hull could still say that "the United States hoped for a fair negotiated peace before rather than after the 'senseless arbitrament of war'; that the United States was prepared to make its contribution to world peace" via the conference table with Adolf Hitler.

No, in all fairness to the State Department, it cannot be said with a shred of honesty that this country was pushed into war by way of "entangling alliances."

But what answer does the department make to its interventionist critics? It says merely that it was not deceived, that it knew the ambitions of the Axis states from the very start. As early as 1935 George S. Messersmith, our Minister to Austria, reported "that the Nazis had their eyes on Memel, Alsace-Lorraine, and the eastern frontier; that they nourished just as strongly the hope to get the Ukraine . . . that Austria was a definite objective; and that absorption or hegemony over the whole of Southeastern Europe was a definite policy." Messers-smith and Dodd warned the department, says the document, "that what the Nazis were after was 'unlimited territorial expansion' and that there was probably in existence a German-Japanese understanding, if not an alliance." Similarly, Breckinridge Long is credited with having warned from Rome that "any estimate of future possibilities must be based on one of two alternatives: first, that sufficient force would be applied to stop Italy's adventure [in Ethiopia] . . . or second, that Italy would be successful in attaining its objectives," in which case "there would be nothing but trouble in the future." And Ambassador Grew is said to have sent a dispatch from Tokyo as early as 1934 advising our policy makers that "things were being constantly said and written in Japan to the effect that Japan's destiny was to subjugate and rule the world. He said that the aim of certain elements in the army and navy, the patriotic societies, and the intense nationalists throughout the country was 'to obtain trade control and eventually predominant political influence in China, the Philippines, the Straits Settlements, Siam and the Dutch East Indies, the Maritime Provinces and Vladivostok.' . . . We would be 'reprehensibly somnolent,' Ambassador Grew warned, if we were to trust to the security of treaty restraints or international comity to safeguard our own interests."

Despite all this advance notice, the department fairly boasts, we refrained from taking action, either economic or political, that might have served to weaken the Axis powers or in any way check their advance. We did not use the "force" suggested by Long, nor did we take any steps to head off the Japanese. In fact it was Long himself who cautioned against oil sanctions against Mussolini, when the crisis came, just as it was Grew who opposed an embargo against Japan.

Adding confusion to paradox, the same document which reports all this advance knowledge—which in fact assures us that the President and Mr. Hull "early became convinced that the aggressive policies of the Axis powers were directed toward an ultimate attack on the United States"—also reports Hull as saying in April, 1939, that "he could not believe that any nation had entered irrevocably upon the road to war."

What "Peace and War" adds up to is that our policy makers expected each aggressive step taken by the Axis but rejected any approach other than verbal censure; that they hoped on each occasion that the succeeding step could be averted by this treatment and were invariably deceived; that they thought it all worth while, nevertheless, for the sake of preventing a world conflict, and that in the end, "despite" all their efforts, the world was plunged into war. As an unwilling witness against the doctrine of isolationism, the State Department has given valuable testimony. May it be taken to heart by those who already dream of again making the ostrich our national emblem after the war.

Pigeonhole for Negro Equality

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

Washington, January 15

THE Administration's effort to combat racial discrimination in war employment has reached a sudden, explosive crisis. The blow-up is the direct result of Manpower Commissioner Paul V. McNutt's order "indefinitely postponing" the Fair Employment Practices Committee's exposure of the anti-Negro coalition on the railroads—the coalition of rail management and "lily-white" unions to drive Negroes from present jobs and bar them from future ones. Public hearings at which the full story was to be told were scheduled to begin on January 25. Preparations had been announced as far back as last October; the move had been widely heralded in the Negro press and by Negro labor leaders, A. Philip Randolph describing it as a "showdown test" of the FEPC's power to put Jim Crow out of business. On January 11 McNutt formally called off the show. He promised that "other ways" would be found to secure "maximum utilization" of labor on the railroads. He didn't say how. One committee member commented privately, "They've been trying the other ways since the Civil War."

McNutt's action has obviously paved the way for the FEPC's collapse—either through the abrupt resignation of its members or the slow deterioration of its prestige among minority groups. But the story behind the ban provokes much bigger questions than the fate of the committee, which might conceivably be replaced by another agency. In the minds of informed officials here the crackdown on the FEPC has stirred inescapable suspicion that the "Negro issue" is to be pigeonholed—as if it could be for any length of time. Belief that McNutt's order is part of a deliberate retreat by the Administration has been publicly voiced by Negro leaders. This view is being communicated to the Negro people. Walter White, head of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, has openly charged that Marvin McIntyre, a Southerner and White House secretary, is "making the Administration's decisions" on the handling of the fight against discrimination; and that the decision is to stop fighting.

There are unmistakable signs that suppression of the railroad hearings is not an isolated administrative blunder committed by McNutt. I know that McNutt has privately told other officials he was acting at the direction of the White House, and was ready to "take the rap" for his chief. It is obviously unlikely, moreover, that the Manpower Commissioner would have made so controversial a decision without consulting anyone except members of the Indiana Alumni Association.

The consequences of his action will be vast—perhaps more serious than some Administration officials want to believe. McNutt's intervention in the railroad case threatens to overshadow the authentic progress made under the Roosevelt Administration toward giving the Negro—and other minorities—a better break at the employment offices. It will give the Axis radio plenty to say about our democratic pretensions. It directly affects war production, where full employment of Negroes is desperately needed. And it is a cruel slap in the faces of Negro Americans, whose devotion to the democratic cause has been so severely tried already.

The full impact of McNutt's action can be seen only in terms of the FEPC's background and the circumstances under which it has operated. On June 25, 1941, President Roosevelt issued his celebrated Executive Order 8802 declaring it to be official United States policy "to encourage full participation in the national-defense program by all citizens of the United States, regardless of race, color, creed, or national origin." The order directed that all contracts between the government and private firms should embody an anti-discrimination pledge. The Fair Employment Practices Committee was set up to act as an enforcement agency. The committee included representatives of the public—Mark Ethridge, a Southern publisher, was its first chairman—of the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O., of Negroes, and of industry.

To American Negroes Executive Order 8802 was a sort of minor Emancipation Proclamation. It was more than a pious thought; the order established concrete machinery as well as a firm moral foundation for carrying on the struggle against discrimination. To an equal degree, of course, the order aroused the hostility and hysteria of the white-supremacy fanatics in Congress and elsewhere. They have never been willing to concede that when a Negro asks equal employment rights he is not "propositioning" the boss's sister; the FEPC inevitably became the target of attack in all the best lily-white circles. But it went to work with impressive sobriety and a clear awareness of the potentialities of the situation. In retrospect one might say that the FEPC's chief defects were the product of timidity.

After holding public hearings the committee published findings of discrimination in many areas and issued "cease-and-desist" directives. Last April 12, for example, it exposed discriminatory practices in ten key manufacturing plants in the Chicago and Milwaukee areas. It hit both employers and unions. There is no way to estimate conclusively the effectiveness of these reports and directives. Functioning with a meager staff and limited funds, the committee could not undertake to police as well as to probe. If defiance of its orders was extensive, no showdown ever took place. Reports indicate that, whatever its limitations, the FEPC's exposures were sufficient in many important cases to alter long-established hiring policies. Its activities helped to create a climate of opinion in which employers felt a growing guilt about their traditional prejudices—in so far as they affected war work. This was the essential beginning from which greatly improved practices might develop.

Paul V. McNutt

After Pearl Harbor speculation arose immediately as to whether the Administration would continue its frontal attack on discrimination or yield to pleas for "unity"—on Jim Crow terms. The FEPC was continued. Government officials from President Roosevelt down uttered repeated pleas to employers to break down racial barriers on the assembly lines. As the scope of the war effort became apparent, it was equally clear that the need for maintaining the anti-discrimination drive had grown rather than diminished.

Yet the FEPC faced mounting resistance. Representative Rankin and other noted Negro-baiters took the floor of the House to decry its activities. Throughout the first year of its life the committee operated on a budget of $80,000. Then, last July, the President announced that the FEPC, which had been an independent agency directly responsible to him, was being merged with the War Manpower Commission. This step aroused widespread fear that the agency was slated for slow death; it was pointed out that its funds would be subjected to Congressional approval, that its acts would be submerged in the larger politics of the Manpower Commission. After months of negotiation, however, McNutt granted what appeared to be virtually autonomous status to the FEPC. He also promised to help obtain an increase in its budget. I have no reason to believe that McNutt was not earnest in these commitments. But other things were taking shape.

For one thing, the State Department, it is reliably reported, took exception to hearings which the committee was planning with regard to discrimination against Mexican laborers in Texas. The hearings did not occur. A high navy official suggested to the FEPC that hearings scheduled for the Detroit area would hamper navy "morale-building" plans. (I understand that this protest has been withdrawn since the current row broke out.) The Railroad Brotherhoods joined the railway magnates in behind-the-scenes pressure to stop the FEPC investigation. Governor Dixon of Alabama defied FEPC mandates in that state and virtually seceded from the Democratic Party. Most important, however, were the Congressional elections, the ensuing gloom in Administration circles, and increased White House dependency upon the whims of the Southern Democrats. McNutt is expected to go before Congress soon to ask for more money for the United States Employment Service and fewer restrictions on its personnel. Questions will inevitably be asked about the FEPC.

The developments cited were encouraging to those within the Administration who wanted to suspend all efforts against discrimination and who regarded Mrs. Roosevelt as an incorrigible idealist. At the same time, however, the FEPC was staying in business and appeared on the verge of obtaining an increased appropriation. It had hired Henry Epstein, former Solicitor General of New York, to conduct the long-advertised railroad hearings. Epstein and his staff had collected their evidence. And in a larger sense the FEPC, despite its inadequacies, was becoming a court of appeals and a hope for Negroes who found employment gates slammed in their faces. It needed more men and more money, but its mere existence was a symbol of the President's plans for a new deal for the Negro. The problem still remained enormous: a recent survey in relatively enlightened New York City showed that Negroes, who form 6.1 per cent of the population, formed 26 per cent of the unemployed.

Now even the symbol of progress and hope is slipping away.

Can we afford to "buy off" the Southern Democrats at the expense of the Negroes and other minorities? Can we afford it in the face of the man-power demands of the production program and the crucial challenges of psychological warfare? To put it bluntly, the hopes of Negroes have been raised, and their disillusionment now will be far more disastrous than if the President had never shown a willingness to wage this battle. There are delicate balances which must be achieved in pushing the campaign against discrimination; the FEPC was fully sensitive to them. But now, swiftly, the President must act to silence the doubts and despair which will envelop the Negro population. The FEPC must be kept alive. Its right to function freely must be reasserted. There is not much time to retrieve the ground already lost.

Carlo Tresca

BY JOHN DOS PASSOS

CARLO TRESCA was born in 1879 in Sulmona in the Abruzzi. Sulmona was an ancient stone town set in a bowl-shaped, well-watered valley in the midst of the highest mountains of the range that forms the Italian peninsula's backbone. It was a town of cobbled streets and old churches and large irregular squares that filled up on market days with peasants and their carts and booths and jingling donkeys. Traditions reached far back into the Roman past. The main street was named after Ovid, who was born there. There was an aqueduct with pointed arches. Many of the thick-walled houses of squared stone had been built in the fourteen hundreds. The portals of the churches were ornamented with stone carving of the early Renaissance. In the first part of the nineteenth century Sulmona had been a prosperous center of many small industries. Hats were made there and violin strings and textiles. There were many tanneries. The surrounding country was rich in wine, olives, grains; sheep grazed on the grassy slopes, and in the oak woods in the mountains pigs were herded.

Carlo was the sixth child of a well-to-do family. They say that in later life he very much resembled his father, Don Filippo. His mother, Donna Filomena, came of a family of doctors, lawyers, and professional people much respected in the locality. Carlo grew up in a period when the town's prosperity was ebbing. Imported factory-made goods had put the handicraft industries out of business. Sulmona had become a railroad junction with roundhouses and repair shops and had a considerable population of railroad workers. Don Filippo's holdings of farming land had got tangled up in some unfortunate investments, and the family was coming down in the world.

Class lines were immensely rigid in the old Italian towns. The better people wore black broadcloth and starched collars and cuffs and scorned manual labor and everybody connected with it. Two of his elder brothers had managed to continue their studies in medicine and the law, but there was an effervescence about Carlo that kept him from fitting into the strict patterns of bourgeois life. He took to associating with the peasants and railroad workers. He was even seen eating and drinking with them in wineshops and taverns. He began to identify his life and their lives. He read Marx and Kropotkin. To his family he remained the favorite black sheep, somewhat indulgently nicknamed il scapestrato, the scatterbrain.

Carlo Tresca

The social and economic organization of Italy was still semi-feudal. The liberation of the country from the Bourbons had not brought the freedom the patriots of the early part of the century had dreamed of. All over Europe workmen were boiling with the ideas of the Paris Commune. In Italy the Bourbons had gone, but the church remained, blocking the way to progress. A certain explosive and direct logic was inborn in the peoples of Latin speech, and they had never lost their early Christian faith in the millennium. Direct action would bring about the revolution which would set workmen free to take over the good things of the world. Carlo became a Socialist agitator and secretary of the new Railroad Workers' Union, and began to publish a paper called I Germi (the Seeds), the seeds of revolution.

Impulsive, warm-hearted, with a taste for food and wine and flowers and everything that was lively in men and women, with the special aptitude for leadership of a man born to be looked up to, and with the best type of cold, shrewd Italian brains, he early became a danger to the established order. After a number of clashes with the authorities he had to run off to Switzerland to escape being clapped into jail. He was twenty-four years old.

Immigration to America was at the flood. It was natural that Carlo should be carried west with the great tide of his countrymen. He found himself in America still in Italy, but in an Italy set down in the middle of an unfamiliar exciting society. The immigrant was at the bottom of the heap, but he always had before him the hope of breaking through into prosperity by himself, instead of having to wait for the revolution. Meanwhile there was the struggle for labor organization, for better conditions on the job. Carlo Tresca, with his ready sympathy for anybody in trouble, with his passionate hatred of restraints on himself or anybody else, with his taste for danger, found himself a leader of his people in the class war. It was a time of bloody strikes, mass-meetings, long-fought engagements in the courts. Careless of money or security, he became a leader of guerrilla forces.

In fighting that war Carlo Tresca learned a great deal about the United States. He never really learned to speak English, but in a way he became an American. He even came to see some of the advantages of the illogical law-abiding, law-twisting procedures of our peculiar type of political evolution. During the last ten years, in his last great fight against the Fascists and Communists, he became in the best sense of the word a conservative. His last campaigns were all aimed at protecting the Italian population he loved against a new influx of brutal European logic. The great European revolution had turned into a gang war on an immense scale.

Against the gang leaders trying to organize the Italians of America for the destruction of our form of government and of our existence as a nation, Carlo Tresca kept up a subtle and ruthless war. Like most good generals his defense was attack. One day last week he fell into an ambush and was killed. I think it can be truly said that he died in defense of America.

Russia and the West

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

II

RUSSIA as a national state must find its security after the war, in common with other nations, in some broad scheme of mutual security in which it will deservedly share hegemony with Britain, the United States, and China. But this same Russia maintains an international revolutionary party which ostensibly believes in the march of history toward a world revolution that will solve all internal and international problems upon the basis of worldwide communism. Russia as a nation is forced to work out its salvation within historical complexities which defy all utopian dreams of world redemption. Russia as the fatherland of international communism is a threat to all the nations with which it must ally itself. How is this contradiction to be resolved?

To complicate the matter still further, the international Communist Party, though ostensibly devoted to the cause of world revolution, has increasingly become an instrument of the foreign policy of the Russian state. Through such use it has been discredited in most of the Western countries. There is a class struggle in every one of these nations, and it will probably become a more desperate struggle after the war. But the class structure is more complex than Communist theory envisages. The failure of Marxism to gauge its complexity and to understand the position in it of the agrarians and the lower middle classes was indeed a contributory cause of the rise of fascism. The Communist Party is no longer an effective instrument in the class struggle, not only because its dogmas only partially fit the social complexities of the Western world but also because its special relation to Russia tempts it to subordinate the necessities of the struggle in each nation to Russia's foreign policy.

Since the leaders of the Russian state are not likely to continue to desire revolution in the nations with which Russia is allied, and since in any event there is little prospect of a revolution on the Russian pattern in those nations, however great the class tensions may become after the war, one would imagine that the liquidation of the Communist Party would be the inevitable strategy of the Russian leaders, who have already proved their willingness to bow to the "logic of facts" and revealed their primary interest in the security of the Russian state. Why do they not follow this policy? Is maintenance of the Communist Party merely a gesture of devotion to the faith of their youth, now discredited by the logic of history? Or does the Russian leadership maintain the party because it regards it as an effective instrument of Russian power in the international tensions which will inevitably appear in even the most favorably balanced world order? If both motives dictate the present Russian policy, the second is unquestionably dominant. The use of the party machine for agitation in favor of a "second front" clearly indicates the primary interest of the Russian leadership.

The question remains whether the Communist Party is in reality an effective instrument of Russian policy and whether it is one which nations allied with Russia can afford to tolerate. In answering that question a sharp distinction must be made between the forms taken by Russian policy on the continent of Europe, in China, and in the two great Anglo-Saxon nations.

In both China and continental Europe the Communist Party has greater potential strength and is a more serviceable instrument of Russian policy than in Britain or America. It is not likely that communism will prevail in China after the war. But on the other hand the Russians may fear that a united and powerful China will demand the withdrawal of Russia from Mongolia, and they may want to maintain the party for whatever bargaining power it may give them.

We do not know to what degree communism has been discredited in either Germany or France by the tortuous foreign policy which the party had to follow or to what degree the prestige of communism in Europe will be increased by the ultimate triumph of Russian arms. But it is obvious that communism is still a living creed in large parts of Europe, and there is good reason to believe that it may become a rallying point for elements opposing any efforts to stabilize Europe along traditional lines. The conflict in Yugoslavia between the Chetniks and the Communist-supported partisans is a case in point. American foreign policy, with its dubious flirtation with Vichy and its even more revealing quasi-recognition of the Hapsburgs, is obviously pondering some general plan to prevent the bolshevization of Europe by furthering its domestic reconstruction upon the basis of Catholic loyalties, slightly refurbished dynastic politics, and the use of sobered but hardly regenerate military leaders. Against such a plan Russia is naturally maintaining all its instruments of power. And since the Communist Party in this situation can not only serve Russian policy but strengthen the efforts of the common people to ward off a retrogressive solution of the social problem, it can be a very effective instrument for Russia. Thus the efforts of the American State Department to prevent the spread of communism on the Continent are likely rather to have the opposite effect.

It is significant, however, that Britain is not a wholehearted party to the ridiculous politics of our State Department. It is obviously disquieted by developments in North Africa. While its impatience with certain aspects of Washington diplomacy is not due solely to its special relations with Russia, it is a fact that these relations are more intimate than the bond between Russia and ourselves and are bound to become even closer. A symbol of the difference is that the isolationists in America still hope that somehow or other Germany and Russia will destroy each other, while the chief British isolationist of yesteryear, Lord Beaverbrook, has become the primary champion of continued collaboration with Russia.

Anglo-Russian collaboration after the war is bound to be intimate because the two nations will need each other in the stabilization of Europe whatever the framework of international relations. The British are still quite uncertain about our continued partnership after the war. They cannot be sure that we shall not try once more to disavow the responsibilities of our power, or at least to reach a mean between isolationism and interventionism that will satisfy both these impulses in our population. The British are much more certain of Russia as a partner than of us. Even in the event of our collaboration they would require Russia as a counterweight against our superior power. I do not suggest that the world can or ought to be organized again in terms of a precarious balance of power. I suggest merely that the strength of opposing forces is bound to be considered in even the most ideally conceived world organization, just as it is in domestic politics. It may be added that though a radical revolution is hardly likely in Britain, there is every indication that domestic politics there will have more affinities with Russian collectivism than with the very probable efforts of post-war America to throw off the political restraints which have been placed upon industry and to make one more adventure in laissez faire.

Whatever the differences between British and American politics, it is clear that the Communist Party cannot usefully serve social revolution or Russian policy in either of the English-speaking nations. It is too obviously a tool of the Russian state. Nations resent nothing quite so much as the manipulation of domestic political forces by a foreign power. The loyalty of the Communist Party to Russia has become particularly odious among us because it must always hide its loyalty behind pretended devotion to some mythical international working class. The inconsistencies of Russian foreign policy, understandable when viewed purely as parts of the policy of a state seeking to maintain a precarious security in an unstable world, become ridiculous when defended as furthering the welfare of an international proletariat.

The continuance of the Communist Party will actually be an embarrassment to good relations between us and Russia for the simple reason that international policies which would be mutually beneficial to both nations will be rejected by our reactionaries on the ground that Communist advocacy of them proves them to be beneficial only to Russia. We have a suspicion that the Russians will mistakenly regard the maintenance of the party as more necessary among us than in Britain. The ties of common interest between us and Russia will be less strong than the ties between Russia and Britain; the friction will be greater. But that is all the more reason why the irrelevances of Communist Party politics should not be allowed to aggravate the friction.

The Russians can hardly be expected to know the Western world well enough to understand this hazard to mutual relations. That is why in a post-war settlement we may have to demand something analogous to the banishment of the Jesuits in the Peace of Westphalia. That banishment was not completely successful, and our efforts may not completely succeed either. Even if Stalin should liquidate the Communist Party in the Anglo-Saxon world, he is certainly not powerful enough to liquidate orthodox communism as the creed of a minority of intellectuals and workers. If he cuts it adrift, it will probably revert to its purer, more international, and more apocalyptic form. It will in short become Trotskyite. It will be fatuous rather than dangerous. At least it will not embarrass, by its support, the only possible settlement of world problems, a settlement in which Russia as a nation must be allied with the other powerful nations in the hegemony of a world organization.

[The first part of this article appeared last week.]

The Red Army Hits Its Stride

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

TWICE the Red Army has rolled back the Wehrmacht as it stood on the verge of success. But this winter's Russian victories are different from last year's in having strategic as well as tactical importance; they contain the threat of continued offensives more dangerous than any Germany has faced in the war.

On November 19 the initiative passed into Soviet hands with startling suddenness when Red Army units pushed against both bases of the Stalingrad salient in an attempt to encircle the attacking Germans. The move was definitely a surprise to the Nazis, and until their reserves slowed down its early impetus, the drive inflicted heavy casualties and made large gains. But though it rendered the German position much more critical, it did not entirely succeed as an encircling move.

A few days later action opened on the central front, in the Rzhev-Vyazma-Velikie Luki triangle, where the Russians had long enjoyed superiority in force but had been unable during the summer months to make a genuine break-through. The objective of this drive was to cut off German communications by land with the troops besieging Leningrad and thus to help in raising the siege and at the same time endanger the German troops north of the Russian offensive line. German resistance in this area proved extremely strong, though the capture of Velikie Luki, one of the strong German fortresses, and the partial encirclement of Rzhev represented definite tactical gains. They might also mean that an answer had been found to the Germans' "hedgehog" defense, which had been singularly successful in guarding important outposts in 1942. However, the large number of fortified strong points remaining in German control in the immediate vicinity and the distance a successful thrust would have to cover indicated that this Red Army offensive could not constitute an immediate major threat.

Far more important was the offensive launched south of Voronezh along the middle Don on December 16. To all appearances the Germans were again unprepared, and two break-throughs were scored, as they later admitted in their communiqués, one along a front of more than fifty miles. Both spearheads advanced southward at a rapid rate, inflicting extremely heavy casualties and capturing or by-passing several German fortified points.

It is quite possible that this march south through the Don valley, led by General Nikolai Vatutin, may prove the most important single maneuver of the war. It offered a twofold threat. Moving south, the Russians passed to the rear of the partially surrounded Axis divisions at Stalingrad, and on January 1 a Soviet communiqué stated that the army of the middle Don had made a junction with a Soviet spearhead which had renewed the advance southwest of Stalingrad, thus isolating forces estimated to consist of twenty-two divisions of German and Rumanian troops and drawing a band of steel across their only line of retreat. In early January the Red armies started to constrict the German pocket.

The second purpose served by the push down the middle Don was greater though less immediate than the sealing of the Stalingrad salient. After their initial progress had been slowed by strong resistance, the Russian columns again gathered momentum, and at the moment of writing they are reported to be less than sixty miles from Rostov. The opening of a fourth and inexplicably strong Russian offensive in the North Caucasus in late December and the advance of spearheads southwest from Stalingrad to flank the German Caucasus conquests increase the danger to the whole German position in southeastern Russia. The strongly fortified and well-equipped key points upon which German defenses rested last year have not proved serious obstacles in the south. The size of their forces in this area, their steady loss of ground, the insufficiency of the exit across the Kerch Peninsula, and the narrowing corridor north of Rostov are factors which the Germans can scarcely afford to disregard. Their position is becoming militarily untenable.

The entire winter campaign is a high tribute to the Soviet High Command, especially to Vatutin, who has been the most successful among the field commanders. For the first time in the war the Red Army chiefs appear to have out-thought and out-maneuvered their opponents. Victories this year are not primarily the result of cold weather; the comparatively mild winter seems to have conferred its greatest benefits on the Russians. While no more land has been regained than was recovered last winter, the areas taken have been far more important, and the offensive is still young. The continued blows in many widely separated regions suggest that the Russians have retained their numerical superiority and have also considerable industrial strength left. Improvement in leadership and tactics has been marked. In rapidity of movement the Red Army now rivals the Wehrmacht. It has found the offensive punch which it formerly lacked.

But Russian strength is not the whole story. German lines of communication are long and hard to maintain. The North African campaign has probably diverted few troops, but it has drawn off some of the dwindling strength of the Luftwaffe. Rising plane production in the Allied countries, plus bombing for which the Germans are unable to retaliate effectively, is taking away from Hitler the ability to maintain aerial superiority in Russia or anywhere else. The long eastern campaign has caused a severe drain on his man-power with no let-up in sight, and the reserve divisions which he had hoped to rest during the winter have had to be thrown in to avert disaster.

The Russian front has always been the hardest one to interpret, and several mysteries in the current situation have not yet been satisfactorily cleared up. The first concerns the German situation at Stalingrad. According to orthodox military ideas the 300,000 Axis troops there are slated for destruction. Yet last winter smaller garrisons occupying strong positions were surrounded and nevertheless maintained themselves until spring. Supply was one of the headaches of the German officers before Stalingrad even in the early fall, and it seems highly unlikely that an entire winter's supplies could have been accumulated. Yet nothing in recent communiqués has suggested frantic efforts to break out of a closing trap. Another interesting question is whether General Vatutin's Don armies, with enemy troops to the east, west, and south, are themselves safe from being encircled in turn. The German retreat in the northern Caucasus, where Soviet forces have long been weak, is hard to account for unless it was necessitated by threats elsewhere.

Though reports from Sweden have generally been unreliable, a fairly plausible explanation of the riddle of southern Russia recently appeared from that source. It was to the effect that a break occurred between Hitler and the General Staff when Hitler demanded a continuance of the fruitless attempts to take Stalingrad and reversed the decision of the army chiefs to withdraw to an easily defended winter line. The yes man, Zeitzler, tried to carry out Hitler's program, failed, and is now undertaking, under much more difficult conditions, the retreat to prepared positions planned for earlier in the season. This explanation, if true, may help to account for the large number of prisoners taken and their indifferent morale. It may also solve the mystery of the behavior of the German armies before Stalingrad and the rather surprising way in which they have been outgeneraled and outmaneuvered. It may well be that Hitler is again replacing his veteran generals with yes men whom he trusts to carry out his intuitions.

All these things point toward eventual defeat of the Axis, but it must be remembered that territorial gains in Russia do not alone mean an early end of the European phase of the war. In case of necessity the German armies could retreat for hundreds of miles over scorched earth before being compelled to defend their homeland, and the Nazis will not give up before they are thoroughly whipped.

Russian victories are of vital interest to the United Nations from still another standpoint. They have delayed the necessity for an immediate opening of a second front, thus allowing time for further preparation and also for recovery from the renewed U-boat campaign, which, though it has not received much attention, is again cutting heavily into our shipping. But on this score we can, perhaps, comfort ourselves with the knowledge that Hitler's submarine successes are purchased at the cost of losses elsewhere, notably in the air. As he faces steadily increasing threats from many directions, his own powers are dwindling. Any move like the reinforcement of Tunisia is paid for by defeats elsewhere. Time is no longer fighting for the Axis.

In the Wind

BOAKE CARTER'S recently sworn allegiance to an "old Hebraic faith" has had considerable effect on his newspaper column. In a recent article which asks that the war be called the War of Expiation he says: "It may well be that Stalin is indeed another Cyrus, as reported in this dispatch recently, raised up by God to assist the Anglo-Saxon Celtic-Judaic people, as once before in man's history."

AN ORDER to reduce by a quarter of an inch the size of the wire clips that hold paper matches together will save, according to WPB figures, 200,000 pounds of steel a year.

FROM the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette: "Meadville's District Number 2 [draft] board has been ordered to send ninety-eight men and five Negroes on November 4."

THE SIX LEADING trade unionists in Jamaica, B. W. I., have been imprisoned by the government for allegedly undermining morale.

A NEW YORK news letter, the Rubicon, has this to say about a proposed Italian-American good-will mission to North Africa: "Certainly, no appointment should be made of persons who have been militant anti-Fascists."

GEORGE SPIES, INC., a leading manufacturer of school jewelry, recently made this patriotic appeal to high-school principals: "A large proportion of our plant and personnel has been turned over to the war effort, and we need all the school jewelry business we can handle to help finance our war work."

IN THIS COLUMN for January 9 it was announced that Max Eastman would explain Ely Culbertson's plan for post-war organization in the March issue of Reader's Digest. Mr. Culbertson himself has written an article about his plan for the February issue of that magazine.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

As Simple as That

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

FOR nearly four months now this section has been hammering away at certain specific points. We have considered them important enough to return to again and again. The points are these:

1. Hitler and his Axis accomplices will try everything before giving up.
2. Should he be obliged, for the moment, to renounce conquest by offensive, Hitler will intrench himself in "Fortress Europe," the stronghold fabricated out of the territories occupied or still to be occupied, and will try to win the war by way of peace maneuvers, cultivating disunity among the Allies and persuading them that an invasion of Europe would cost untold millions of men only to plunge them thereafter into bolshevism and chaos.
3. To disregard the fact that the defeat of the Axis still requires all our strength, to believe that morale can be sustained by cheap optimism and headlines screeching victory, is to do exactly the opposite of what the character and dimensions of this war demand. If it takes months to conquer Tunisia and Bizerte, the task will not be easier when it comes to storming the Brenner Pass.
4. When we gamble on dissension inside Germany we turn this war into a kind of Belmont track. Betting on the Reichswehr horse against the party's—on the generals against Hitler—is sheer waste of time. It is equally fruitless to trust to the diplomacy of appeasement to win over to the Allied cause the Francos who go about shrouded in a fiction of non-belligerence. In spite of the "Iberian bloc," in spite of assurances apparently given to Allied ambassadors, Franco in the end will march with Hitler.
5. The peoples of the United Nations have taken to heart the statements of their leaders—the Atlantic Charter, the four freedoms, the "century of the common man"—and they will not easily permit the reaction to present them with a world order no better than the one which produced two wars in the space of twenty-five years.
6. At the first sign of military success—hardly had the American troops landed in North Africa and hardly had the Russian advance made itself felt—reaction threw off its mask, discarded in an hour all pretense that this was a war for democracy, and prepared in every way to make good its own victory at the moment when hostilities should cease.

It is on these six points that we have tried to concentrate the attention of our readers. Whether the subject was political strategy in Latin America or Asia, whether it was a Darlanist or a Hapsburg maneuver, whether it was a speech of Hitler's or the anti-British and anti-American excesses of Radio Falange, writers of different nationalities have agreed on the essentials. This agreement is itself proof of the universal character of the present war. It is also proof that the name given to this section was no caprice, that this war is in large measure a political war, and that it is in this field, more than in the military or economic fields, that the United Nations still find themselves in a precarious position.

In every war—and in this one perhaps most of all—the thing that matters most is to know where one really stands, and to recognize what are the strong and the weak points on the enemy side and on one's own side. On the side of the United Nations the one weak point, and perhaps the only possibility of defeat, lies in the lack of a leadership capable of reaping the full benefit from the advantage that the Allies' superiority in material resources, in man-power, and above all in war aims gives them. With all his strength and stubbornness, with his ten years' head start in preparation, with Fortress Europe armed to the farthest corner, with the Francos and Lavalis all on his side, Hitler still cannot escape defeat if the democracies eventually decide to wage the only kind of war that can inflame the enthusiasm of free men.

Up to now there has been little evidence that things are looked at this way in those quarters where the conduct of the war is planned and executed. Instead of emphasizing the idea of a people's war as the struggle progresses, the people, their desires, and their reactions have more and more been shoved aside. More and more the war is being looked upon as purely a job for the generals, and the peace as an object on which the future "authorities of the United Nations," now being turned out in series on the assembly lines at certain American universities, will demonstrate their superior sagacity. The result is already to be seen. For every step forward in the military sphere we have moved two steps backward politically, and this procession has in turn reacted unfavorably on the military operations.

A growing irritation and mistrust is weakening the common front of the forces aligned against the Axis. It doesn't help much that identity of feelings and purposes is exalted in official messages and telegraphic greetings exchanged on birthdays between chiefs of states. The facts speak for themselves with all the weight of their undisputed existence. When a magazine like Time runs a leading article entitled "Disunited Nations," when the British Prime Minister has to call a secret meeting to tell the House of Commons what he thinks of the political deal in North Africa, when only last week the British censor considered it necessary to prevent certain editorials in London papers from being cabled over here, when in his remarkable dispatch from London in the New York Herald Tribune on January 13 Geoffrey Parsons, Jr., says that our foreign policy "is under question by our allies as it has not been for many years," when one hears on all sides the urgent need for "committees of the United Nations"—then the offices of Elmer Davis and of the British Ministry of Information are put to a pretty severe test. And such differences of opinion are no less great between others of the nations of the Allied coalition. In the face of all this it seems hardly necessary to produce further proof of the lack of political leadership on the side of the democracies.

It is this lack of leadership that is responsible for a situation which, if it continues, will hamper the military effort and delay victory, if it does not compromise the outcome of the war. Moreover, it may create such antagonism between the Allies that when the war is over there will be no common purpose upon which to build the international organization that alone can make impossible a Third World War.

It has already led to a sad state of confusion. Listening to commentators on the radio or in the press this past week, one could hardly avoid the impression that the real enemy in North Africa was the Fighting French, who placed so many difficulties in the way of an agreement with the former Vichy collaborationists. For some of us this is no new experience. At more than one meeting of the Council of the League of Nations I had to contend with gentlemen for whom the real aggressor in the Spanish war was not Germany or Italy, which by invading Spain had torn up the League Covenant, but the Republican government which dared to burden the Council with its troubles.

The same thing is happening again. And the danger is that Americans of good faith—the others, the appeasers, know well enough what is going on and what they themselves are up to—will be completely at a loss. The danger is that they will put the blame for what is happening, not on the lack of a straight political line for the conduct of the war, but on the peoples of Europe, of Asia, of Latin America—those irresponsible who don't appreciate the sacrifices that the United States and other great powers are making to save them from a Hitler victory. Most of all, the danger is that they may come to believe that there is only one set of alternatives: either to impose the American point of view, or if possible the Anglo-American point of view, by an action combining relief to the distressed countries with a paternal but strong hand that would put an end to so-called "factional rivalries," or, once the security of the Western Hemisphere is obtained by military defeat of the Axis, to give the whole thing up and go back to the isolationism of the last twenty years.

No, we are not confined to such a calamitous choice. There is a much more rational alternative. Wage this war as a war of the people for a democratic victory and for a democratic peace. Fight for democracy without being afraid of the democratic world that will come in the end even if we must go through a painful period of disorder and revolution.

To take this position it is really only necessary to remember one thing, a thing that seems to have been forgotten lately: that this war was started by fascism, and that the real point of issue between the two sides is fascism as against anti-fascism. For this war to make sense it must be a war of democracy against fascism, allowing for no possibility of an alliance between fascists and anti-fascists, or of regarding semi-fascists as friends and true anti-fascists as undesirable.

Just by remembering that this is a war between fascism and anti-fascism it will become clear why in North Africa the French anti-fascists don't want to collaborate with ex-Vichy fascists; why Austrian democrats can't cotton to the idea of restoring an Otto von Hapsburg who, though undoubtedly not a fascist himself, is not likely to take a stand against the clerical reaction through which the little Metternichs of our time hope to neutralize the effects of Russian victory. It will become clear why Latin American leaders insist that if the invasion of Europe would start with Spain and restore the Spanish Republic, the Allies could count on the whole-hearted support of Latin America. It will become clear why Lin Yutang, in the last issue, denounced the men "associated with the London Non-Intervention Committee and with the Munich era." And it will become clear that years of fascist crimes have created a problem that must be contemplated with courage and imagination; and that a fundamental revolutionary process is under way which must go on to its bitter end and which cannot be cured by canned milk and vitamins, seasoned with a dash of democracy.

Just by remembering that this is a war between fascism and anti-fascism people will discover what is at the root of the evil in the present crisis of the United Nations and what is the way out. No complicated or tortuous interpretations are needed. Fascism against anti-fascism. It's as simple as that.

Anti-Semitism: Norway

BY HAAKON LIE

Secretary, Executive Board of the Trade Unions of Norway

IN THE minds of my people the attack on our Jewish compatriots is the cruelest thing that ever happened in our country. For Norwegians it has always been a matter of course that all people had the right to enjoy the freedom we so jealously guarded. We never had a race problem. That is why the Quisling attempt to create a problem met with such instant protest, and why the atrocities which followed have provoked the deepest feelings of bitterness, hatred, and sorrow.

As long as the Nazis still hoped to conciliate us, they paid heed to the protests and forbade the local Quislings to proceed with their plans. But when they understood that Norwegians refused to take part in the "New Order," an open fight broke out, and the Jews, as always, became the chief scapegoats.

From the time Quisling was made Minister President in February, 1942, things went worse for the Jews. A new decree was issued which denied them the right to remain in Norway. We didn't take this too seriously because we didn't see how it could be carried out. But soon we learned. Quisling, wishing to give his regime the semblance of legality, called a National Assembly to which were invited representatives of the various industrial and commercial organizations, among them the Nazi-controlled trade unions. The plan failed completely because the workers resigned in a body. This action, organized by our underground leadership, was a high spot in our movement of resistance. The prestige of the Germans received a serious blow, and they now had to find other ways and other agents.

Shortly after this affair an incident occurred near the Swedish border. A Norwegian who was helping two Jews escape shot a Quisling border policeman. This was used as a pretext for a systematic attack directed against the whole Jewish population. A decree ordering the confiscation of all property belonging to Jews was followed by an order to arrest all Jewish men and boys over fifteen years of age. Eight hundred were sent to concentration camps, and Jewish families were robbed of their clothing, their jewelry, even their wedding rings. The climax was reached on November 26, when 1,000 Jewish men, women, and children were herded aboard a 9,000-ton ship bound for Poland. These Norwegians will never again see their homeland.

Try as they would, the people of Oslo were unable to stop the deportation of their countrymen. Crowds gathered at the barriers of the pier—the police had to block off the whole district. The police showed their sympathy, but they could not disobey orders.

Norwegian church organizations and Norwegians individually have protested against these horrors. But anyone who signs a letter or a declaration does so at the risk of his freedom, if not of his life. More than one Norwegian has in this way signed his own death sentence. The Nazi terror, however, only renews our will to fight. "A people conquered but not vanquished is the victor."

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE title of the American "White Book," "Peace and War," reminds me of Tolstoy, and so do its contents. As proof that America was guiltless of causing the war the volume is completely successful; as a record of accomplishment it is rather depressing. Public opinion here sensed that fact, and the book's appearance had few reverberations.

It was a real surprise to hear its echoes resounding in Germany as if they would never end. When I say "in Germany" I mean within Germany itself. Material sent from Germany to foreign countries, by wire or wireless, included very little about the "White Book." Nor was it more than touched on in the news served up to the occupied regions. The German people, however, were treated to an overwhelming bombardment of comments. Certainly German newspaper readers and radio listeners read and heard ten times as much about it as Americans.

The drumfire began promptly on the day of publication in Washington and continued for a whole week. Editorials appeared in serial form; column-long quotations from Italian, Japanese, and all kinds of Quisling newspapers gave samples of "world opinion." M. Laval, an undisputed expert in world politics, was dragged on the scene. Countless neutrals, including a Portuguese so-called "historian," were mobilized. Documents were dug up in refutation, allegedly from the archives of the conquered nations. On the third day the German newspapers in a body dedicated their front pages to the subject. At the press conferences in the Wilhelmstrasse the well-known government spokesman Dr. Schmidt discussed it

Non-Intervention

"If the political and social institutions of this country undergo change or modification in future years it will be the work of Spaniards within Spain, not of the United States or of Spanish émigrés.—
From a speech by Ambassador Hayes in Madrid on January 15, 1943.

four times. And morning, noon, and night, variations on the theme came over the radio.

It is interesting to observe the technique used in a dictatorship for putting across a campaign of this sort. Never once were any passages quoted from the "White Book." Disproof, unmasking, revilements poured out in a cataract, but not the most rudimentary abstract of the contents was given. The only concrete fact communicated to the public was that the United States tried to place the blame for the war on the Axis.

The Goebbels argument was developed along three main lines. First, the "White Book" was presented as evidence of growing difficulties within the United States and between the Allies. "The hand of the Jewish master-criminal Roosevelt can be clearly traced in it. The real reason for its issuance at this time was the meeting of the new Congress." The attention of Congress was to be diverted from the Administration's failures and the necessity of new sacrifices. Or, as Schmidt of the Wilhelmstrasse expressed it, "Economic difficulties and the draft have created so much unrest in America that Roosevelt had to issue the 'White Book' to try to overcome it." The American reader of Ambassador Grew's recent book will be astonished to learn that the "Report from Tokyo" also necessitated the publication of the "White Book." There was "great popular indignation" in the United States because the President had "refused to act upon Ambassador Grew's reports and adopt a policy of appeasement toward Japan." The mood of the English people was cited as another reason for the fabrication. "Britain begins to realize that Roosevelt's megalomaniac policy embraces the destruction of the British Empire."

Secondly, the "White Book" was called a "monstrous forgery," "the most shameless diplomatic document ever published." "The diplomats who concocted it and whose reports are reproduced in it are well-known crooks. The character of the documents is especially well illustrated by the author of one—Mr. Douglas Miller, the former commercial attaché who wrote 'You Can't Do Business with Hitler.' This is the swindler Miller." He was usually found engaged in "criminal not diplomatic transactions," was often "under investigation by the Berlin police, and was obliged to leave his post in great haste."

Thirdly, it was charged that the "White Book" itself provided incontestable proof that Roosevelt, not Hitler, was responsible for the war. "The document is the most severe bill of indictment ever brought against Roosevelt." "Every page presents proof of American guilt." It "clearly demonstrates that as far back as 1937 Roosevelt had decided to drive Europe into war and in the ensuing turmoil set up a Jewish empire." It "historically confirms for all time that Franklin D. Roosevelt was guilty of launching the Second World War to an even greater degree than his friend Churchill."

As I said above, such a voluminous reaction from Berlin was a complete surprise. The Nazi leadership was under no apparent compulsion to make such an uproar, for the Allies would have found it technically impossible to pump many details from the book into the German people; 144 pages of compact diplomatic reports are not easily popularized in short radio broadcasts suitable for furtive listeners. There seemed to be no necessity for Goebbels to "refute" and "unmask" so extensively. We should have expected rather that he would content himself with a few belittling remarks.

If he departed from his usual custom he must have believed he had good reason to do so. It looks as if the Germans were increasingly occupied with a question on which their morale greatly depends. It is not the most important question for them; that, of course, is will they win the war. But the more doubtful they feel about this question the more urgently the second presses for an answer: Was the war really necessary? The Nazi leadership seems to feel that the people are reverting to this question more and more frequently. Hence its excessive reaction to an event which might ever so slightly nourish the people's doubts. Under other conditions the "White Book" might well have been ignored; it seemed necessary at this time to try to smother it under an avalanche of counter-propaganda.

Nazi "Socialism"

FROM the Bulletin of the International Federation of Trade Unions we get this interesting illustration of the workings of industrial National Socialism. Wage ceilings in Germany are so low that it is only by means of individual increase of production that workers are able to meet the rising cost of living. But the "joker" here is that as soon as a whole group succeeds in increasing its output the scale of the contract is lowered on the ground of "technical improvements." Of course the employer gets state aid—he often receives advances on government orders up to 50 per cent of their value. In one of the largest and best-known building companies funds thus obtained exceed the amount of its own capital. With such aid it is not to be wondered that the great armament concerns are accumulating enormous reserves. The "Gute Hoffnung" mining combine has increased its capital out of its own means from 80,000,000 to 104,000,000 marks. The Rochling-Buderus steel works has trebled its stock capital out of dormant reserves. This firm is, to be sure, very close to the government. The owner is Herr Rochling, a member of the Reich's Munitions Council.

File and Remember

[Each week on this page we shall print items, short and long, taken from the British press or, less frequently, from that of other countries.]

Fear of Betrayal

WE ARE not alone in feeling an uneasy curiosity about the recent mission of the American envoy, Mr. Myron Taylor, to the Vatican. The propertied conservative class in America, terrified lest communism or socialism should play a part in the creation of the new Europe, tends to look on clerical fascism as the most hopeful alternative. That is why it smiled on Darlan, on Franco, and now on Otto Hapsburg.

No irreparable harm has yet been done, though in France as among ourselves the fear of a betrayal is undermining the confidence of youth in the men, on both sides of the Atlantic, who lead us. While the Americans reproach us, with only too much justice, about freedom in India, we have our own grounds for doubting them. We are glad that our own government has treated the Fighting French fairly by placing them, under General Le Gentilhomme, in charge of Madagascar. . . . General de Gaulle, because he was the first soldier of distinction who refused in the hour of collapse to despair, has become the symbol of resistance. There is always a danger in accepting any soldier, even in war time, as a political leader. The merit of General de Gaulle in our eyes is that he is acting with this underground movement (socialist, radical, and democratic-Catholic), in which we see the hope of the future.—New Statesman and Nation (London).

On Power Politics

National power politics carried on by the traditional ruling classes of the traditional Continental countries—it is a most fascinating spectacle to see these rising like a phoenix out of the ashes of the "New Order." If the process becomes more marked, as it probably will, it will provide many tempting opportunities to political warfare—and many dangers to the building of a stable peace. We have no reason to discourage developments which may contribute to a speedier collapse of our enemies. But we have still less reason to encourage them to anything like the point of even the slightest commitment. We certainly have no ill-will against any European nation—or class—as such. But we can never sacrifice the interests of those who stood by us in our dark hours and suffered in our cause to those who tried to run with the hares and hunt with the hounds.—The Observer.

"No Negotiations in Progress"

In the House of Commons yesterday a Labor member asked Mr. Eden "whether the government in consultation with the United States and the U. S. S. R. is preparing a common program of post-war economic cooperation so as to carry into effect the objects of the Atlantic Charter, the lease-lend agreement, and the Anglo-Russian agreement."

Mr. Eden replied, "Although no negotiations are at present in progress, the British government has every intention of working with these and other nations toward such a common program."

The situation, therefore, is that the governments have still to come to brass tacks. "Contacts," "talks," and "intentions" must not be confused with negotiations. The planning of post-war reconstruction is still in a tentative stage. Those of us who hoped that a rapid advance had begun must realize that, so far, the governments are proceeding at a slow march. Nor is it yet certain that they are all in step.

Cannot the pace be quickened? How long, we wonder, will preliminary contacts and conversations go on? How soon will long-distance diplomacy give place to decisive conferences? How soon will the round table, rather than the ocean cable, become the means of communication? . . .

We urge the government to examine with critical eyes the machinery by which the preliminaries are being conducted. We urge it to seek methods of speeding up that machinery. . . . If we stumble into the next peace as blindly as we stumbled into the last one, the consequences of our negligence will dwarf even the present catastrophe.—Daily Herald.

Open City?

I suspect that most of the arguments we hear for and against bombing Rome have, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, nothing to do with the case.

There are people who look on Rome as holy ground, not because it has been made sacred by the blood of martyrs, but because of the political influence it can wield among reactionary elements in Europe who may be ready to do a Darlan on the Axis. They are looking to the clerical fascism Darlan represented to establish the political guaranties that a "liberated" Europe is not a socialist Europe.—Reynolds' News.

Controlled Enterprise

Mr. Morrison [in his first public address since he became a member of the War Cabinet] was clear that much of the social control of production made necessary by the war will need to be continued into the peace, if the high purposes which the nation has set before it are to be attained. Control must not operate to stifle the essential spirit of initiative, enterprise, and adventure. As Mr. Morrison said, no natural reason exists why control should be a cramping, limiting thing. Properly exercised, it should be stimulating and enlarging. He reminded his hearers that enterprise does not need to be private in order to be enterprise. In this century, with its inevitable tendency toward centralized organization, private management has often resulted in restriction, in a slowing down of activity, and in consequent unemployment, while many of the most remarkable examples of enterprise have been public. Mr. Morrison instanced the electric grid in this country, the great constructive work of the Tennessee Valley Authority in the United States, and engineering and industrial achievements in Russia. Russian needs and conditions are very different from ours; but it cannot be without significance that so much vigor and imagination and spirit of adventure should have proved not incompatible with public control.—The Times (London).

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Modern Socrates

LET THE PEOPLE KNOW. By Norman Angell. The Viking Press. $2.50.

THE pages of contemporary criminal fiction are sometimes brightened by a device known as the "lie-detector." This mechanical instrument is never quite convincing. Completely convincing, however, both in the precision of its aim, the sensitivity of its recording, and the unsparring honesty of its operation, is the sociological lie-detector by now perfected by Norman Angell. His method is that of Socrates, as of every great teacher: carefully, patiently, candidly he extracts and assembles the questions that bother the plain man. Stating them fairly, he draws out their often unconscious emotional associations. Then he subjects them to an analysis as vigorous as it is frank. Names vanish; things emerge. A mass of confused particulars is finally assembled into a significant pattern.

His new book is, I think, the most successful and the most useful example he has given us of the application of this method. Its title aptly indicates its purpose: let the people know what it is all about, this war in which their present and their future are involved. Let them, above all let the boys who are perhaps to die and certainly to endure long and hideous hardships, understand why this horror is upon us again after twenty-five years of fears and fumbings, so that we see what we must do, to prevent its rhythmic recurrence. The "quality of the public mind, the quality of the common people's political judgment," is the vital factor in the shaping of our society. If it is confused and divided, no blueprint will save us. "The present miseries of the world are not due to lack of 'book-learning,' but to lack of better understanding of the great commonplaces of human association."

It is therefore to these "great commonplaces" that the lively and eminently readable pages of this book are mainly devoted. Its text—a text central to democracy—can best be stated in the author's own words: it is that "the right of each to life must be defended collectively or it cannot be defended at all; that if we will not defend the rights of others against violence, we shall be unable to defend our own and will ourselves become the victims of that violence." War came because we failed to see this in time, allowed violence to destroy its victims one by one. Peace will not endure unless we act on conviction. At present it is blurred for the average mind; issues, often rooted in ignorance, constantly and skillfully exploited by the enemy, confuse and divide it and conceal its vital outline. It is Norman Angell's primary task to clear away the confusion and heal the division by lifting into the light and faithfully exploring a series of questions, constantly felt but less often fully discussed—awkward questions, heavy with unconscious feeling, about British imperialism, Russian communism, India, the "old school tie," the New Deal. This task he performs with the skill of a great surgeon. Thus he clears away a mass of dead tissue he has found surrounding the current view of the British Empire by clearly expounding the Statute of Westminster of 1931, and showing how the statute carried to its final stage, so far as the dominions are concerned, a process of transfer of full responsibility—the same process which is approaching fruition in India and being prepared for in the colonies by steps appropriate to their various levels of development. Talk of British "ownership" is today absurd and wholly unreal: the various parts of the Commonwealth have achieved through friendly discussion the freedom the United States had to win by fighting. To loosen such a free association of peoples would not only be to play the dictators' game for them; it would be to undermine the principle on which alone we can build a stable world of growing freedom. Slowly and painfully social science has brought us to realize that the isolated and self-sufficient individual cannot exist. The same is true of nations. Safety, freedom, growth depend on a cooperation that allows scope for difference. To maintain and extend such cooperation between Britain and the United States is the main object of this honest, faithful, and stimulating book.

MARY AGNES HAMILTON

Artists in a Society

ENGLISH PAINTERS: HOGARTH TO CONSTABLE.

By Andrew C. Ritchie. Johns Hopkins Press. $2.25.

ENGLISH painting charms by its paradoxes: by the spectacle of a general tradition of minor and mediocre effort giving birth to three masters and several schools of great and even revolutionary stature; by a continuity of aesthetic servility that extends, on human and social grounds, an appeal as irresistible as that offered by any modern nation. Roger Fry went so far as to declare that its limitations were due to "what amounts to a congenital optical deficiency," and no observer can remain unaware that his own vision, applied to British painters, is obstructed by everything from the social and personal distractions of an era of good taste like the eighteenth century to the suffocating anecdotalism of the Victorians. Yet these discouragements provide the integrity of the genuine talent with great and dramatic antecedent advantages: thus the luster that attaches to Hogarth, Bonington, Constable, Blake, and the Norwich school; thus the wit and independence that absolve the limitations of Romney, Cotman, Brown, Rowlandson, and the satirists; thus also, alas, the weight that drags at the powers of Reynolds, Gainsborough, and Turner and wholly sinks most men even a shade less talented than these in the bogs of fashion, academicism, political melodrama, moral utilitarianism. The steadily recurring taste that led a nation to its periodic triumphs in line drawing, handicraft, folk art, cabinet-making, and architecture operated at the feeblest possible level in pictorial art, obviously because this medium was the one most amenable to the ethical obsessions of the English, to the uses of bourgeois flattery in portraits and subject-pieces, to the hunger for imperial exoticism and the discreet removal of human terrors, passions, violence, and abomination to the confines of those enormous frames of glaring goldleaf which now represent the only money value in the galleries of the Victorian potentates. English painting is usually literary but it is seldom poetic. It offers the compromises, utility, and embarrassments of prose.

Its history, as apart from the consideration of its isolated geniuses, cannot be written without the reinforcement of the conditions in society, thought, and literature that explain its successes in satire, illustration, and characterization. But where the chauvinistic scholarship of earlier days justified English painters by these facts, recent criticism has reversed that procedure—which was fundamentally the procedure even of Ruskin and the Pre-Raphaelites—by setting the English product against its Continental rivals, accepting the initial sacrifice entailed by that contrast, and rescuing the surviving talents on sanely judicial grounds. Or it has frankly accepted the secondary status of the art, and by relating painting to moral, literary, and utilitarian motives, produced a series of the most valuable cultural studies we have had in recent years of the extra-aesthetic role occupied by painting as an underprivileged servant of social progress—invariably the least considerate of its masters. Fry, Wilenski, Binyon, Read, and Roger Hinks have led the first of these activities; the second has produced such valuable studies as Elizabeth Manwaring's "Italian Landscape in Eighteenth Century England," Christopher Hussey's "The Picturesque," John Steegman's "The Rule of Taste," and Kenneth Clark's "The Gothic Revival."

Mr. Ritchie's book—lectures given at Johns Hopkins—is not to be compared with these in length, detail, or documentation, being a slighter sketch on the order of C. B. Tinker's "Painter and Poet." It starts by disavowing a defensive position on its subject and by hoping to show that the mercantile and industrial prosperity which enslaved the average English painter after 1688 also accounts for the creative individualism whereby "Hogarth, Blake, and Constable foreshadow the determined independence of a Cézanne and Picasso." His chapters on Hogarth, Reynolds, Gainsborough, Blake, and Turner and Constable say many good things: about the difference between moralism and satire in Hogarth, about Reynolds's compromises and the deadly dishonesty they have fostered ever since at the Royal Academy, about the contrast between Turner's reckless eclecticism and Constable's heroic tenacity of purpose, about how Blake extended the resources of painting by the "inevitable struggle with material means of representation which all great artists, and none less than Picasso in our own day, have experienced in a search for a more complete externalization of their visions." All this points to the fundamental significance of a monument like English art and to the modern import of that "Wordsworth-like 'speech of common men,'" the "English individualistic current in all its satirical, mystical, and naturalistic variety," that he seizes on for the redemption of his painters. But it would take more social and literary annotation than Mr. Ritchie gives, and also a more consistent aesthetic analysis, to show the full scope of this phenomenon and its value to the interpretation of painting in the last hundred years. The implicit problem is one now oppressively apparent in American art, in its new era of social and nationalistic prowess. The situation once present in Italy, Holland, France, and England has passed to the United States, and if Mr. Ritchie does little more than sketch it, he does that modestly and so may lead his readers to the kinds of study I have recommended above, which have become an urgent necessity among the promoters of our own pride, ambition, and general confusion in art.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

The Mussolini Myth

BALCONY EMPIRE: FASCIST ITALY AT WAR. By Reynolds and Eleanor Packard. Oxford University Press. $3.

THE authors of this book, husband and wife, correspondents for the United Press, took the place, in 1939, of another correspondent in Rome who had been expelled for sending out the rumor that Mussolini was sick. The Packards never did anything to merit expulsion. They lived in Rome in an artificial world of Fascist politicians and newspapermen and foreign correspondents, most of whom were affiliated with the Fascist propaganda machine. This was the worst possible vantage-point for anyone wishing to understand the real conditions and the state of mind of the Italian people. But the Packards were not interested in anything of this sort. They were reporters engrossed in gathering and getting out "good news" ahead of other journalists. They had no time to go back to past events or to get in touch with those Italians who do not live in Rome and who, fortunately for their intellectual and moral health, have nothing to do with newspapermen.

No wonder, therefore, that the Packards are persuaded that "history" will "certainly" divide Mussolini's dictatorship into two parts. The first part ran from the end of 1922 to the end of 1934 and "was marked by his collaboration with the democratic powers of Europe, including France and England." During these years Mussolini "did carry out a social program that was good"—"child and maternity welfare, social security for workers, housing and reclamation schemes, general improvement of sanitation, water-power projects, and agrarian reforms of all kinds." The second part began in 1934 when Mussolini planned the war with Ethiopia. "From then on he became a menace to world peace. He dropped his domestic reforms and concentrated on building up a war machine for conquest."

Had the Packards gone a little farther in their investigation they would have learned that from 1925 to 1934, no less than in the following years, Mussolini was in constant conflict with France; that he became a menace to world peace from 1934 onward, not because he became naughty just in 1934, but because Hitler had come to power in Germany and therefore Mussolini was at last in a position to join hands with somebody who could effectively challenge the rest of Europe; that Mussolini carried on the war in Ethiopia in 1935 and 1936 with the full consent of the French government and thanks to the underhanded connivance of the British government; that his intervention in Spain from 1936 to 1939 was accomplished in accordance with the British Foreign Office; and that, therefore, it is not true that he became a menace to world peace solely when he began to disagree with the "democratic powers."

As for Mussolini's domestic reforms, they had either been enacted by the pre-Fascist regime, or were paper reforms and window dressing, or were bound to be enacted by anyone who was in power in Italy, since no government could have squandered billions of yearly revenue without doing some good in some sphere even if a great deal of evil was being done in all other spheres. Anyhow, let us thank heaven for the fact that the Packards do not relash again the trains which run on time or the beggars that are no longer to be seen in the streets.

On the day that the news got about that Mussolini was going to declare war on the United States of America the Italian employees of the United Press "were standing around looking forlorn and lost." The headwaiter of the restaurant the Packards frequented told them: "It is terrible. It is the end of everything for Italy." "He wore the party badge himself," they continue, "yet he talked about the Fascists as though he were no part of them." At the end of the meal he offered them a bottle of champagne as "a sort of farewell present" and said, "May you return soon." When they paid the salaries of their employees, "many turned their heads away as they shook hands with us; they were embarrassed at the tears that welled in their eyes." The book swarms with evidence of kindness and friendship on the part of humble folk. But the Packards were not taken in. "Just how far could such friendliness be trusted? Certainly these people were risking their positions, even their careers to be so friendly with us. Were they thinking ahead, thinking of the day when Americans would return to Italy? No other people can be so sincerely friendly and yet make such effective use of friendliness as a means to an end." If the two Packards had spent more time with Italian peasants, fishermen, and housewives, and less with newspapermen, Italian and non-Italian, they would have drunk the champagne of the headwaiter with less suspicion.

The chapters devoted to the Ethiopian War, the Spanish War, the Greek War, and the conditions of the Italian armed forces are worth reading. The last subject in particular is handled with keen intelligence and on a basis of diligent and correct information. Had the actual state of the Italian navy, air force, and army been made known to the public outside Italy, Mussolini's bluffs would not have been as successful as they were, and many evils would have been prevented. But it took a World War to make the foreign correspondents lift some veils from the face of truth.

GAETANO SALVEMINI

Jefferson, Citizen

JEFFERSON HIMSELF. Edited by Bernard Mayo. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

AS THE young lady who went through Monticello ahead of me said to her mother, "Why, they never told me in school that he was an architect!" Very likely not. Though Jefferson and his house have now reached the fame required to adorn a nickel, the man's versatility and genius have remained almost secret among his compatriots. No doubt this is an indirect sign of his continued power as a living influence: a man can still be a Jeffersonian, and it is therefore necessary to down him, usually with the remark that Jefferson never foresaw the Industrial Revolution.

In Mr. Mayo's attractively printed and illustrated volume the American reader will have a chance to discover one of his most distinguished and lovable fellow-citizens. Made up almost wholly of extracts from Jefferson's diaries, letters, and public papers, this book is at once a personal narrative, a history, and a work of philosophy. The skill and tact that have gone into making it deserve our best thanks. At times, indeed, the tact almost overshoots the mark: Jefferson's love for Mrs. Cosway was certainly such as to need no hushed introduction; and since Mr. Mayo very properly modernized spelling and punctuation, one wonders why he prints, in his own portions of the text, "Maison Quarée at Nismes." But these are trifles. The sounder objection that one may have to snippets from great works is here overcome by the total number given, the range of subjects they deal with, the adequacy of the brief remarks introducing each group, and—on practical grounds—the impossibility of giving the public more at a first sitting. Let us hope, however, that the plan, already thirty years old, of bringing out the important writings of our great Presidents in large single volumes may be revived as the result of this present publication. As I recall, only a Washington was issued. We could do with a Jefferson, not to mention a Hamilton and a Wilson.

JACQUES BARZUN

The Army of the Soviets

THE RED ARMY. By Michael Berchin and Eliahu Ben-Horin. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

IT IS impossible to write a really good book about the Red Army. The necessary materials are not accessible, even to high-ranking Soviet citizens. It is not surprising, therefore, that Messrs. Berchin and Ben-Horin, who are not versed in military matters anyway, have not been able to set down more than the usual collection of informational bric-a-brac. Yet the reader having even the slightest acquaintance with military life will find this book only a hazy sketch of the hard-fighting, disciplined force that astonished Hitler.

In dealing with the Red Army's relations with Soviet society as a whole, the authors are much more successful. Every army, in greater or less degree, expresses the political principles and characteristics of the society from which it is raised. If this seems to be truer of the Soviet army than of the British or American, it is because we are accustomed to our type of society and because the Soviet Union is a country in stormy transition. The successive appointments and dismissals of the entire corps of political commissars, for instance, indicate that the Russian leaders have not been, until recently, sure to what extent the contemporary political atmosphere would prove breathable to a mass army in heavy exertion. The November abolition of commissars, wrongly represented by some as evidence of a political struggle between the officers and the Communist Party, was, in reality, the consequence of the Red Army's exhibition of sound morale. Only for one brief moment and on one sector did Russian orders of the day report retreating soldiers throwing away their arms; and that was at the very height of the German onslaught. Since that now distant month in 1941 there has not been the least sign of weakness.

Nevertheless, if the Red Army's morale must be declared sound, that is not to say that its political temper is identical with that which prevailed in the time of Lenin and Trotsky. Messrs. Berchin and Ben-Horin, who do not follow the party line but who show no bitter prejudice against the Soviet regime and its party, point to two reasons for the change. Once the Red Army was really red and not merely "beautiful," ■ Duranty would translate the Russian word. "But with the development of the civil war and the increase in numbers of the armed forces, the Soviet composition and the psychological make-up of the Red Army underwent a radical transformation." That is perfectly understandable. Similar transformations occurred within the Spanish Republican army during the civil war.

The authors have another explanation of the change, the conventional one now in vogue with almost every writer on the Soviet Union. When the Kremlin rulers became convinced that the world revolution was not likely to get under way for a while, they "decided that the Soviet state had to intrench itself for the time being, and, accordingly, shaped the Red Army to be the defender of the state and of the regime. The revolutionary phrases remained, but the international spirit gave way, step by step, to the spirit of nationalism." This thesis, about the only proposition which is asserted by both Kremlin diplomats and the Trotskyist opposition, seems far too simple to this reviewer, particularly when the question is raised in its military aspect. Nevertheless, the authors' discussion is extremely interesting. And since the future of the world depends upon what course the Kremlin takes, the present book is valuable enough for the help it gives on these points.

RALPH BATES

Shakespeare Today

SHAKESPEARE AND THE NATURE OF MAN. By Theodore Spencer. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

THEODORE SPENCER has undertaken one of the most difficult of critical jobs: to present a unified and consistent picture of the Shakespearean world. If he has not entirely succeeded, it is at least partly due to the disorder and uncertainty of our thinking about Shakespeare. For there is scarcely any Shakespearean criticism these days, in the way of contemporary reevaluation. Nor do we have a precise idea of him, ■ we do of practically every other large figure. The fact is that he is no longer a part of our literary imagination; hence we do not feel the critical compulsion of certain periods in the eighteenth and nineteenth century to renew the Shakespearean image. Instead, he has been largely appropriated by the graduate schools and put through the mill of research. But while this new genre of literary detection has immensely increased our textual and biographical information, ■ the same time its making a fetish of fact and its lack of historical and literary bearings has almost hopelessly fragmented our entire approach to the Shakespearean problem.

Spencer's feat is to have organized the dangling parts of Shakespearean scholarship into an interpretative scheme that ostensibly reveals the underlying values and beliefs of the plays. Briefly summarized, his thesis is that Shakespeare was ■ writer of the transition from the medieval to the modern and that he gave dramatic form to the deep-seated conflict between the traditionally optimistic, orderly conception of the universe and the new mood of pessimism and skepticism. And Spencer's approach, basically an examination of the more striking correspondences between the theoretical life of the time and the actual content of the plays, helps to define the cultural conventions at Shakespeare's disposal. There are also some remarkable insights into the sources of Shakespeare's leading ideas. But the trouble with Spencer's description of Shakespeare's intellectual background is that it is at once too literal and too general. It is too literal in that it is couched in terms that are more applicable to the cosmological concern with good and evil of minds like Hooker and Donne, and could at best be used to explain only the marginal meanings in Shakespeare; it is too general in that by taking in almost every Renaissance figure it fails to account for the secular and naturalist accent peculiar to Shakespeare.

As a result, Spencer's reading of the plays—especially the tragedies, which he regards as the consummation of Shakespeare's philosophy—is largely deductive and analogical, as he tries to fit them into the cultural abstractions of the Renaissance. In Spencer's version the tragedies reenact the clash between order and chaos, good and evil, appearance and reality. Spencer argues the case with some textual plausibility, but, obviously, the drives and entanglements of the leading characters go far beyond these simple antitheses. True enough, Iago is, as Spencer asserts, a personification of evil concealed behind a benign appearance; but how explain his compulsive ambition, which is rationalized—it is patently not fulfilled—through his destruction of Othello? Nor can Lear's worldly madness, which to my mind is an expression—or symbol—of his inability to understand his predicament, be reduced to the dry schematism of harmony and disorder. Spencer's analysis really provides no clue to the distinctive features of the Shakespearean hero, who brought into literature a peculiarly modern pride of ego; self-dramatizing and monstrously self-conscious, driven by a kind of obsessive energy, he constantly strains his personality in the effort to hold on to its reality.

As Eliot once remarked, Shakespeare's portrait has been retouched each time he has been brought up to date: for example, there is the rough-and-ready genius presented by Johnson, the Faustian soul-searcher of Goethe, the imaginative sage of Coleridge, the demonic spirit of Wyndham Lewis. Lately, however, there has been a tendency, in the more formal scholarly studies, to present Shakespeare as a virtuoso. Something of this tendency has crept into Spencer's re-creation, in which Shakespeare appears as a sort of eclectic genius, who was fixed within the bias of his time, but whose extraordinary powers are to be explained mainly by his grasp on what Spencer calls the universals of human existence, that is on life, struggle, death, the relation of man to nature, society, and heaven. And in Spencer's attribution of an "affirmative" and highly moral vision of life to Shakespeare, there emerges an essentially conservative, almost religious figure, intent on preserving harmony and proportion in man's inner being as well as in the world at large. Thus conceived, Shakespeare becomes a secular theologian of the good life—bearing a striking resemblance to those literary men of today who would replace the faith of the past with the fashionable image of "tradition."

WILLIAM PHILLIPS

Fiction in Review

TO DISPEL some of the mystery that surrounds the life of Italians in America, two new books have appeared in these last weeks—"Maria," by Michael De Capite (John Day Company, $2.50), and "Mount Allegro," by Jerre Mangione (Houghton Mifflin Company, $2.50). With the exception of the Negroes, probably no large minority in the United States has received so little serious attention in fiction or been so stereotyped in popular art as the Italians. If this is a situation in which the Italian Americans themselves are not without responsibility (after all, despite their numbers, they have produced very few writers and artists), here are two books which should help explain why they are such peculiarly easy victims of ignorance and condescension.

Both books are first novels, both are written by young men born here of Italian parents, and both make it pretty clear that the Italians, of all the foreign-language groups in this country, are probably the most resistant to absorption into a new culture. Although the people in "Maria" and in "Mount Allegro" live in large American industrial cities, they are aware of the life around them only to fear it. They huddle together in their little Italys, clinging to their native land by every means at their command—language, food, religion, social and family ties. They left Italy in most instances because of poverty, but the slightly better livings they earn over here seem small compensation for the fields and the olive trees and sunlight to which they dream of returning. Even their gregariousness doesn't tempt them beyond their own family groups. When Mr. De Capite reports that in 1914 his Little Italy learned that war had broken out in the old country only when a fire attracted sightseers from "outside," we begin to grasp the problem of Italian American assimilation.

But apart from their parallel backgrounds Mr. De Capite's and Mr. Mangione's novels have few points of similarity. "Mount Allegro" is not even strictly a novel, but a well-ordered series of recollections of Mr. Mangione's Sicilian childhood in Rochester—lively, witty, easy in the manner of the New Yorker, a kind of Italian "Life with Father." Mr. Mangione has traveled a long distance in the course of his self-education; at moments he may appear to be a bit uncertain whether he is any the better for having reached the place, now, where he can poke even such serious and tender fun at his past, but this is a self-consciousness he shares with most of the first-person writers for the New Yorker and has little to do with the fact that he is an Italian: the reminiscence form, with its substitution of tolerance for passion, has a way of betraying both author and subject. Mr. De Capite's "Maria," on the other hand, although full of expressed feeling, is fairly dull compared to "Mount Allegro"; passion without personality turns out to be less good reading

THE CHILEAN POPULAR FRONT

By

JOHN REESE STEVENSON

Chile's significant political and economic development from 1920 to the present. The character of the Popular Front, its operation and continuing influence, are described in full detail. A vivid picture of Chile, its people, their leaders, means of livelihood, needs for the future.

Just out, $1.50

OUTLINES OF RUSSIAN CULTURE

By

PAUL MILIUKOV

Edited by MICHAEL KARPOVICH

Translated by VALENTINE UGHET and ELEANOR DAVIS

First English translation of the only comprehensive and thorough history of Russian culture in any language, by one of Russia's leading historians. "An outstanding work... not only a valuable contribution to Russian History in so far as factual information is concerned... (also) an analysis of the great spiritual, moral, intellectual and esthetic currents which set in motion Russia's creative energies." THE COMMONWEAL

Published in three parts: RELIGION AND THE CHURCH, $2.50; LITERATURE, $1.50; THE ARTS, $2.00; Set of three parts, $5.00.

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA PRESS
PHILADELPHIA

A Vision for a Global Democracy

WINNING THE WAR AND A LASTING PEACE

By Frederick Kettner

"Far-reaching proposals... certainly to be welcomed." —Herbert Agar

Foreword by Mary E. Woolley
President Emeritus Mt. Holyoke College

And a Letter by Francisco Castillo Najera

Mexican Ambassador to the U. S. A.

Published by the

BIOSOPHICAL INSTITUTE

HOTEL DAUPHIN, 1977 BROADWAY, NEW YORK N. Y.
Price: Twenty-five Cents

Mid-Winter Books

The Nation will publish its regular Mid-Winter Book Number on Feb. 27. Advertising space reservations must be placed by Tues., Feb. 16; copy appearing well forward must be OK'd by Thurs. night, Feb. 18; final deadline for copy OK's is Friday night, Feb. 19. To avoid delays, make your space reservation now.

Advertising Department

THE NATION

55 Fifth Avenue

New York, N. Y.

than personality without passion. The heroine of his title is an American-born Italian girl who at sixteen marries the man her parents choose for her. Maria's detailed history, through two marriages, motherhood, and up to the brink of old age, is Mr. De Capite's dual indictment of the Old World culture that formed her and the New World culture in which Maria has such difficulty making her way.

The America of MacKinlay Kantor's novelette "Happy Land" (Coward-McCann, $1.25) bears very little resemblance to the America of Mr. De Capite or Mr. Mangione. Rusty Marsh, a "typical" small-town boy, has been killed in the Pacific, and to comfort his father by showing him that where there is something to live for there is something to die for, Rusty's grandfather rises from his own veteran's grave to reconstruct the boy's life. It is a charming life, but in the opinion of at least one reader too overwhelmingly on the side of high-mindedness for credibility; the men fighting in the Pacific are heroic but they are also human. We at home ought certainly to be able to draw fortitude from stronger stuff than this.

Of the latest, the fourth, volume of Upton Sinclair's fictionalized history of the modern world, "Wide Is the Gate" (The Viking Press, $3), it should be noted for the record that Mr. Sinclair has currently completed the period between 1934 and 1937 and that Lanny Budd, that wonder boy of ubiquity, is still as much at home with Hitler and Göring ("Ja, Lanny!" he is greeted by Göring) as he is with the depressed masses of Germany and Spain. If you can swallow Mr. Sinclair's non-dimensional characterizations and not be too much thrown off by the naivete with which he describes the world of wealth and power—in his innocent way he really leers, like a socialist small boy watching a capitalist strip-tease—"Wide Is the Gate" is an easy way to refresh your knowledge of events not very distant from memory.

DIANA TRILLING

Sassoon's War

THE WEALD OF YOUTH. By Siegfried Sassoon. The Viking Press. $2.75.

THE fate of Siegfried Sassoon presents something embarrassingly like an object lesson to the contemporary poet, for in his work I see displayed the moral that, at the risk of losing his intellectual head, the poet should always remain at a remove from the subject of his poems. I do not mean that the poet must necessarily inhabit either a glass case or an ivied tower or the mantel shelf: I merely mean that the poet who has too large and too sharp an ~~ax~~ to grind usually finishes up by cutting his own throat with it. (The discomfort of such an operation constitutes perhaps its most moral characteristic.)

Siegfried Sassoon has a war on his conscience. He has it, if I may say so without levity, buzzing in his bonnet, skeleton in his cupboards, displayed on all his sleeves, and both between and upon every admirably written line of his memoirs and his poems. How it happens that Sassoon should have succeeded in arrogating to himself so great a sense of guilt I find explained in the demonstrable fact that he is a poet; and poets, along with criminals, seem to suffer more than most from this consciousness of impersonal responsibility. But only so long as this sense of guilt functions under the jurisdiction of the poem does it remain sane. For when the poem functions under the jurisdiction of the sense of guilt, then it is propaganda and not poems that result. This, as I see it, indicates the difference between Hopkins, who, fanatic as he was, remained ashamed of the domination of the poem over the responsibility, and, say, Rudyard Kipling, for whom the responsibility always dominated the poem. It was the pity and not the wrongness of war that moved the greatest poet of the First World War. It is the wrongness of it that has turned too many of Sassoon's poems into a tremendous roll of logs.

Here, however, in "The Weald of Youth," where Sassoon rather applauds peace than condemns war, where he merely remembers his own youth, I see all his curiously posthumous dignity exemplified. The book simply describes Sassoon's somewhat rustic life until the day in August, 1914, when everyone's death suddenly became possible. He speaks with great charm and grace of such matters as a bicycle ride to Rye, a horse race almost won, the publication of his first collection of verses, his meeting with the slightly supercilious Apollo Belvedere in gray slacks who turned out to be Rupert Brooke, and his part in a village cricket match. And all this is observed, as through St. Paul's glass darkly, through the never-to-be-mentioned melancholy of the war that ended it all. I have called this book posthumous, because clearly someone died. I think of Sassoon as the poet who spent twenty years decapitating himself with an idealistic battle-ax.

GEORGE BARKER

"The most effective and the most satisfactory play about the war yet to reach our stage."
—Joseph Wood Krutch, Nation.

THE PLAYRIGHTS' COMPANY Presents

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A new play by Maxwell ANDERSON Cost of 25, incl. Aline MacMAHON
CORT 49th St. E. of B'WAY. Eve. 8:40, $1.10 to $3.30. 261 seats $1.10.
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40, $1.10-$2.75. Seats selling for next 8 weeks.
MAIL ORDERS PROMPTLY FILLED

IS MAJORITY RULE A SOUND PRINCIPLE OF GOVERNMENT?

Wm. Crocker

The Nation Index

for Volume 155 of The Nation, covering the period from July through December, 1942, is now available. This excellent reference aid may be had for 15 cents.

Send your order for the Index, with remittance, to

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue New York, N. Y.

IN BRIEF

THE JERVIS BAY AND OTHER POEMS. By Lieutenant Michael Thwaites, R.N.V.R. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.75.

The title poem in this collection is good rousing narrative, says Stephen Vincent Benét. It is, except in the passages where the vocabulary becomes literary and symbolical instead of nautical and direct; but there are too many such passages. The Newdigate Prize poem, Milton Blind, which concludes the book, is an excellent specimen of the kind of work for which admiring dons give prizes. In between are half a dozen, more or less, really lovely lyrics—The Tunnel, Coming into the Clyde, The Tactician, Air and Water, The Well. The perils of steering a true poetic course may be somewhat abated if Lieutenant Thwaites can manage to use these lyrics as navigating stars; but it will be a difficult voyage.

VAN LOON'S LIVES. By Hendrik Willem van Loon. Simon and Schuster. $3.95.

In order to tell the life stories of certain historical characters, from Erasmus to Thomas Jefferson, from Confucius to Queen Elizabeth, and many more, Mr. Van Loon had the pleasant idea of describing a series of mythical dinner parties at his native town of Veere in Holland. Illustrated in his own pleasing style and embroidered with a full account of some uncommonly good menus with the accompanying music, the book is interesting enough to read if taken intermittently. But why go to the trouble of bringing back to life Descartes and Emerson, say, or Emily Dickinson and Chopin, only to have them talk like Mr. Van Loon himself?

THE ENJOYMENT OF ART IN AMERICA. A Survey of the Permanent Collections of Painting, Sculpture, Ceramics, and Decorative Arts in American and Canadian Museums. By Regina Shoolman and Charles E. Slatkin. J. B. Lippincott Company. $10.

This is a historical and descriptive account of art through the ages rather than a catalogue of the collections in American museums. The many illustrations, however, are of works housed permanently in this country. From these the reader gets an idea of the enormous artistic wealth produced by other peoples which is now in our institutional hands. This country, apparently, became imperialist in art long before it became so in anything else. The book is magnificently produced and belongs in every reference library for the sake of its plates alone.

ANTHOLOGY OF NORWEGIAN LYRICS. Translated by Charles Wharton Stork. With an Introduction by C. J. Hambro. Princeton University Press for American-Scandinavian Foundation. $2.75.

Mr. Hambro gives a succinct and clear account of Norwegian poetry from Welhaven (1807-1873) and Wergeland (1808-1845) to contemporaries who have written poems of Norway under the Nazi invasion. Mr. Hambro is high in his praise for the translator, Dr. Charles Wharton Stork. "Every single poem is rendered in English in a form identical with the original; the rhythm and the meter, the grouping of rhymes, the distribution of masculine and feminine rhymes correspond exactly to the Norwegian text." Unfortunately, a man can do all this and still not be a good translator: the reader who has only the vaguest ideas of the quality of Norwegian verse will do some uneasy wondering, one suspects, as to whether the originals are quite as prettily versy as Dr. Stork makes them sound. Even if it runs up the cost, the originals should be printed, in this kind of collection, on the facing pages; the method is hard on the reader, and harder on the translator, but in the long run fairer to the original.

FILMS

WILLIAM DIETERLE is to be respected as a man who obviously wants to make fine moving pictures, and to use them for serious teaching. It would be a pleasure to say better of him, but that is at best a pleasure deferred. "Tennessee Johnson" is another of those screen biographies for which thousands of cultivated people will lay aside "Jalna" for an evening because they like to feel benevolent toward a really good movie. It is as sincere as Henry Wallace, whom it is perhaps predominating, and now and then, helped usually by Van Heflin, the sincerity breaks loose from its male nurses and becomes vigorous and warming for a minute or two. Lionel Barrymore, too, is sometimes better than you could think possible after all these years of grunting to stay awake under the boredom of his assignments. The rest is Dieterle's cus-tomy high-minded, high-polished mélange of heavy "touches" and "intelligent" performances. Within the limits of its nearsighted traditions it does its very best; but anyone who wants a measure for the inadequacy of that should watch Morris Ankrum, as Jefferson Davis, announcing the secession of Mississippi.

It is unimportant whether Ankrum is perfect, or anywhere near it. The important thing is that he works in a world apart from the rest of the company; a world where good historical films have a chance to exist. He looks like a daguerreotype, not an impersonation. He bears himself like a man of 1860, not like a studious actor in a costume picture. He talks like a half-crazy devil. He supplies, in fact, the two primal requirements of the camera, in whose neglect or dilution you might better not use a camera at all: living—rather than imitative—visual, aural, and psychological authenticity, and the paralyzing electric energy of the present tense as against the rest of the show's gloss, comfortably researched reenactment at eighty years' remove.

Perhaps it is unkind to knock a picture for its neglect of problems which never occurred to its makers, and which are habitually neglected throughout an industry; but I cannot feel it is irrelevant. Here by some accident is this actor, dead right in every essential, showing up the bumbling of the rest. If all that he means had been realized, and studied, the following suggestions would be unnecessary.

Since Americans of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries differ in face, bearing, speech, and spirit as deeply as the men of different races, scour the country for the atavisms and actors who can at least suggest the difference, and preserve us from any more of these affable masquerades.

The historical events or inventions must look like newsreels made under ideal conditions, or poor ones if that edges the illusion of veracity.

The "private-life" scenes must attempt a related kind of realism which so far has only been dabbled at, staggily, in Lubitsch's earliest films, and innocently, through transcendent chromos, in "The Birth of a Nation."

If you can give this realism poetic clarity without blurring its naturalistic clarity, you will have the beginnings, at least, of a good historical film, instead of a Drinkwater play.

All this detail will be as dead weight as its neglect is unless it is given present-tense immediacy rather than the customary optative pluperfect. The use of orthochromatic film will at least help toward this; whereas the seed-pearl shine which is so rarely appropriate to romance, irony, and special atmosphere, and which possesses even newsreels today, will drown in fatuousness every other care you take.

In this film, instead, where the common people are intended to mean so much, the one faintly convincing rural face is Heflin's when he briefly recalls Barthelness in the first production of "Tol'able David." Much more nearly typical is a bit by a supposed country boy who has a city face and body and a new straw hat which is scissored into a calendar reminiscence of a Whittier poem.

Those who think that I am quibbling over detail instead of deploring an ignorance of basic obligations should logically think the same if I objected to a performance of a Mozart quartet on a bass ocharina, a kazoo, and a team of Hickman whistles, or pointed out inadequacies in a production of "Coriolanus" which was staged by a particularly art-minded group of fox terriers.

I have given perhaps exorbitant space to "Tennessee Johnson" because it furnishes, for many, the illusion that Hollywood is "coming of age," and because a lifetime subscription to the Atlantic Monthly does not seem to me synonymous with "coming of age." In the little space left, a few regrets and recommendations.

Hitchcock's "Shadow of a Doubt" is a much better and more interesting picture, with some real attention to what places and people really look like, in Santa Rosa and in New Jersey, some very good (and some fussy) photography by Joseph Valentine, and some clever observation of rabbitly white-collar life which, in spite of a specious sweetness, is the best since W. C. Fields's "It's a Gift."

"The Commandos Strike at Dawn" will remind you why John Farrow won the Critics' Award for direction with "Wake Island." It is "mature," for Paul Muni begins as a meteorologist widower and ends as a corpse. It glorifies the common man, for Muni says, "We Norwegians are sturdy folk." Its climax is a commando raid in which no point is made of the likelihood that every trick of fighting has its countertrick and that the enemy, having boned up on them, may not be entirely cooperative. The raid is done in what currently passes for montage, so freely used in "Wake Island." It has about the relation to Eisenstein's montage that a whickering prose, punctuated entirely by dashes, has to good poetry. Lillian Gish, formal and archaic though she is, shows how far pictures have degenerated since her time.

"Journey for Margaret" contains a few poignant flashes on children and parental emotion, some writing ("I'm mad at 1940," etc., etc.) as awful as the people who talk like that, and a well-meaning performance by Fay Bainter which suggests that if Anna Freud—whom she is supposed to echo—really treats children like that, they were far better left shocked in the bomb-rubble than deshoocked in her clinic. Those who want to see evil, cruelty, and some archetypal national diseases should see "The Powers Girl" and two out of three other musicals; few other films manage, even inadvertently, to get down so much. The subject here is American bitchery, with a demon photographer and his insurance-ad Mom and Pop thrown in, and some overloaded music from Benny Goodman, who should have refused to take off his glasses.

The best recent war short is "Conquer by the Clock." It develops some questionable emotion over a munitions girl who, through sneaking time for a cigarette in the ladies' room, sends a dead cartridge to a soldier and the soldier to his death. It fails to suggest that the same thing might have happened if her visit to the toilet had been sincere; but like "Private Smith of the U. S. A." it shows that when Slavko Vorkapich can keep his hands off a fancy transition (he still cannot) he is one of the straightest and most sharp-eyed men in Hollywood.

JAMES AGEE

ART

AMERICAN SCULPTURE OF OUR TIME: GROUP SHOW. At the Buchholz and Willard Galleries, until January 23.

THERE has been a renaissance of sculpture in this century. How much of one becomes evident when you try to recall the names of outstanding sculptors between Houdon and Rodin. Thorwaldsen? Barye? Rising industrial capitalism, with its concern with distances, energies, and dreams, found sculpture too literal a medium in which to express itself well. Rodin, finally, managed to put into stone something of the nineteenth century that had been expressed by others in poetry, painting, and music, but in doing so he dissolved the Renaissance tradition of sculpture. It is mainly the work of painters—Cézanne, Renoir, and even Seurat and Van Gogh—that has made sculpture once more possible as a great form. In our time there have been Maillol, Despiau, Lehmbruck, Brancusi, Lipchitz, Laurens, and others; the occasional sculpture of painters such as Renoir, Matisse, Picasso, Braque, Gris, and Masson; and the production of the constructivists and their similars—Pevsner, Gabo, Vanton-gerloo, Giacometti, Gonzales, and Arp. Significantly, these last derive their antecedents from painting rather than sculpture, and their work, except for Arp's, is more pictorial than sculptural in its effect.

The renaissance has reached our country. In the twentieth century we have had for the first time two professional American sculptors worth mentioning, Flannagan and Lachaise, and the constructor or fabricator, Calder. Now there is David Smith, whose work puts in the shade almost everything else at the Buchholz and Willard exhibition. Not that many of the other sculptors and the examples of their art are not well chosen. A small bronze nude by Lachaise is the best I have seen in his bulbous style, the distortions of which usually seem gratuitous; there are also two good bird themes of Flannagan's, an excellently compact stone ram by Heinz Warnecke, heads by Burlingame and Laurent, a fine Calder mobile, a wooden lady by Steig, and even a heroic stone head by William Zorach that is not quite so pompously inflated as most of his work. Peter Grippe, using cubism in a way that does not remind one of the cubist sculpture of painters, and adding a bit of Picasso's latest style of decomposition, has hold of an idea which he has not yet succeeded in embodying in his terra cotta.

All this shows the comparatively high level sculpture has reached since the nineteenth century—leaving aside the hideous expressionistic, "functional," and stylized statuary of which only contemporary sculpture is capable, and of which there are enough samples present. Yet of the better work none comes close enough to great art. None except David Smith's "Interior." Smith, who, fittingly, is more smith than carver or modeler, has welded and molded rods of steel and bronze into a sort of horizontal cage figuring the skeleton of the organism which is the family, and whose corporeal identity is the house. Molded into the framework and given by the merest resemblances are a key, a wall picture, a reclining female, and other domestic items. Smith shows for almost the first time that a house can be a proper subject for sculpture in the round. However, the work does not stand on its symbolism but on its formal energy, for which the symbolism is only a springboard. One's eyes are led along the rods without a misstep; the divisions of empty space within them have a life of their own and develop and change like chords in music; and the rust on the metal adds the right final touch.

It is obvious that Smith aims at effects closer to drawing than to sculpture. He employs the "metaphysics" of line to direct and connect across intervals of space; the essentially sculptural, on the other hand, presents itself with more solidity, its form rise from a central mass and are related to each other by it, with the sense of possible touch and weight brought into play. (See G. L. K. Morris's interesting article on the connections between sculpture and painting in the current Partisan Review.) But Smith's linear style is perhaps closer to the nature of metal itself as we feel it today, for metal has become pliable under the welder's tools as it never was for those who could shape it only by casting and hammering.

Smith is thirty-six. If he is able to maintain the level set in the work he has already done—of which other fine examples may be seen in the back room of the Willard Gallery—he has a chance of becoming one of the greatest of all American artists.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

THREE years of daily reviewing for a newspaper enable me to luxuriate in the blessedness of being able to stay away from orchestral concerts and solo recitals by the dozens, and to attend the few that give some promise of being worth hearing and writing about. Thus my interest in Mozart and in Szigeti caused me to attend all five of Szigeti's Mozart sonata recitals in the Y. M. H. A., the first of which I discussed a few weeks ago. Although some of the works that I heard for the first time turned out to be quite dull there were two, the superbly dramatic K. 379 and the fine K. 306, that were exciting discoveries; and as it happened each provided an occasion for the great playing—great, for one thing, in the power of its wonderfully inflected and sustained large-spanned phrasing—that one can expect to hear from Szigeti sometime during a recital, when after achieving mental equilibrium he functions at the highest point of communicative intensity. For those great moments I willingly endure the scratchy, wiry sounds he is likely to produce in the opening work of the program, when he is not yet at ease, or the fussy or distorted phrasing he may indulge in later on; whereas for no amount of Heifetz's dazzling perfection of sound and technique would I listen to what he makes of Mozart—or, for that matter, of Beethoven or Bach or Schubert (the simplicity of his phrasing in the recorded performance of Schubert's Trio Op. 99 is exceptional; and I am inclined to ascribe it to the influence of Feuermann). I should add that I would have got even more pleasure from the performances if Szigeti's partner had been a pianist and musician of a stature commensurate with his own, or at least without the deficiencies and mannerisms that one was increasingly aware of in Andor Foldes's playing.

Koussevitzky being the great conductor and the considerably less than great musician that he is, I go to one of his concerts only infrequently, to hear a new work which interests me, or to hear the almost unbelievable playing he gets his orchestra to do in the music of twentieth-century French and Russian composers that he does understand well—to hear those performances of Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes" and "Après-midi d'un faune," and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloë" that are among the wonders of the age. The January concert in Carnegie Hall that I attended began with Corelli's Sarabande, Gigue, and Baderine, in which one heard the fabulously beautiful sound and finish of the Boston Symphony strings, and also the excessive vehemence of Koussevitzky's treatment of what he evidently thought of as the "climax" of the Sarabande (I could imagine the plastic continuity of the passage as Toscanini would have played it). Then came Martinu's new Symphony, which enabled one to hear the even more astounding sound and finish of the entire orchestra, and which Koussevitzky performed very effectively. The effect, however, was only that of a pleasantly inconsequential, if gorgeously orchestrated work, produced by a man whose musical feeling seemed to have translated itself into obsessive ostinato rhythms, mostly in three-quarter time, that he had managed to keep going until he had the four movements of a symphony.

Berlioz's "King Lear" Overture got me into Carnegie Hall for a performance by Mitropoulos with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. The work is, as Tovey put it, "a magnificent piece of rhetoric in tragic style"; it is, moreover, an early piece, in which nevertheless the Berlioz ways of thinking—melodic, harmonic, orchestral—are already present, lacking the richness and sureness and subtlety of their maturity in later works, but astonishing and exciting even in their youthful sprawling vigor. On Christmas Day, on the other hand, C. B. S. broadcast Bernard Herrman's performance of a few passages of "L'Enfance du Christ," one of Berlioz's last works, which W. J. Turner said was his best. Having heard only a few passages, and these few broadcast in a way that caused the orchestra to be blanketed by the voices, I am not in a position to have any strong conviction about the work; but I will mention the impression I got from much of what I heard—that the Berlioz ways of thinking were operating with the expertness of age where poetic impulse was no longer effectual.

As for the Metropolitan Opera Association, I have not yet heard any of its productions, but hope to be able to report on them soon. Meanwhile, I have been interested by the Metropolitan's announcement that Friedrich Schorr, who had wished to retire, had been persuaded to stay for at least one performance with which the Metropolitan would bid farewell to an artist who had given it distinguished service for many years. I have, that is, been struck by this gracious acknowledgment of a debt to one artist, and the failure to make such acknowledgment to another artist who deserves it no less. For many years the exquisite voice and musicianship of Elisabeth Rethberg constituted one of the Metropolitan's most valuable artistic and financial assets; recently Mme Rethberg, whose singing used to be effortless, has got herself into difficulties of voice-production that have made her short of breath and unable to stay on pitch; and at the beginning of this season the Metropolitan announced her "resignation" without as much as a verbal statement of its indebtedness to her for her long and distinguished service.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Booth, Beveridge, and the Work-Shy

Dear Sirs: Editorial reference to the Beveridge report in a recent issue of The Nation prompts me, a visitor to the United States at the present time, to submit to you some observations on a subject to which I have devoted considerable time and attention in the past fifty years.

1. You rightly say that the foundations on which the Beveridge report rests were laid over thirty years ago. I believe they were laid in Charles Booth's "Life and Labor of the People of London" (1889-1903), and in the later published accounts of researches made by Sidney and Beatrice Webb, particularly their "Break-up of the British Poor Law." I know that Sir William Beveridge has built on these, and that they have provided the bricks and mortar to which you refer as being used by various British governments for building a new social structure.

2. Nearly fifty years ago, when the Asquith government at the behest of the Webbs established labor exchanges, my friend Beveridge was known to his London familiars as "Fluidity of Labor Beveridge." I recall this because at a meeting of the Economic Section of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, shortly before the outbreak of war, Sir William Beveridge expressed his personal opinion, in answer to a question I put, that the result of the labor exchanges and the social services built around them had been to render some classes of labor less mobile than they had been in other days.

3. I have not yet had an opportunity of studying the full text of the report, but when you refer to the "impending final overthrow of the Poor Law system" I venture to predict that when all is said and done, there will remain a hard core of defiant, intransigent human creatures. Although the "won't work" have now been largely eliminated in England, the "work-shy" persist. Note in passing that the able-bodied Scot until after the last war did not have the legal right to food and shelter if he were destitute that was acquired by the Englishman by an Act of Parliament passed in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and around which the whole of the British social amenities have been built. In recent years this right has been translated into the right to work. This right, in one form or another, will probably survive the "final overthrow." Some day the courts will have to be asked for a ruling as to whether a man will be required to take work one, two, three, or any given number of miles away from his home. At present the man is the sole arbiter.

4. Despite all the mechanics of progressive social legislation the human problem will persist, and spiritual considerations alone will suffice for the "won't work" and the "work shy." In saying this I do not forget that even the Salvation Army some forty years ago promoted a bill in the British Parliament to establish labor colonies with powers for the compulsory detention of the residuum of human derelicts whom they found slipping through their hands in their various social activities. The principle of this bill was approved by an interdepartmental government committee, and the bill got its first reading, but liberal (?) opinion, seeing an infringement of the liberty of the subject, saw to it that the bill got no farther, and vagrants—sources of moral and physical contagion—were left free to roam at will. DAVID C. LAMB,

Commissioner of the Salvation Army
Detroit, Mich., January 15

[We agree that "the right to work" will survive the enactment into law of the Beveridge proposals; in fact, we see it as the moral basis for whatever degree of government intervention is necessary to insure a high level of employment, failing which the "abolition of want" can hardly be achieved. Commissioner Lamb, however, seems to be concerned about the right not to work and suggests that new steps will have to be taken to deal with the voluntary unemployment which the Beveridge scale of payments might seem to make too attractive. But he will not deny, we are sure, that the last thirty years, during which Britain's social services have been steadily enlarged and increasing efforts have been made to prevent unemployment from resulting in utter destitution, have seen a steady decline in unemployability and vagrancy. Some bums no doubt are born but most of them are made—by ill-health, by maladjustments in childhood, by the demoralization occasioned by prolonged unemployment. The Beveridge proposals attempt to deal with some of these causes, and the effect of their enactment would undoubtedly be to diminish still further "the residuum of human derelicts." No doubt a few natural bums, recruited from all classes, would continue as eyesores on the social landscape. But an economically healthy society should be proof against their contagion, and we ourselves could bear an occasional pan-handler better than the sight of the most humanely administered concentration camp.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

The Hindu-Moslem Chasm

Dear Sirs: In The Nation of January 2 Reinhold Niebuhr, reviewing Shridharani's "Warning to the West," says that "the deep chasm between Hindu and Moslem is racial as well as cultural and religious." Deep or not (and here the real question would be, Who wants to deepen it?) that chasm is not racial. Jawaharlal Nehru told me that 95 per cent of India's Moslems are former Hindus converted to Islam by the Mohammedan conquerors of India. Mr. Jinnah, the president of the Moslem League of India, told me that 75 per cent of India's Moslems are converted Hindus. So the chasm is not racial.

I find it very indicative of a certain war-time type of American liberalism that Dr. Niebuhr contrives to write a long review of a book on India by an Indian nationalist without once mentioning the evils and mistakes of British imperialism, to which the bulk of the book is devoted. LOUIS FISCHER

New York, January 11

Oriental Self-Righteousness

Dear Sirs: I should like to remind Mr. Fischer that Shridharani's book in both title and content is primarily an indictment of Western arrogance toward the Orient and deals only secondarily with British imperialism, as a part of a general Western policy. I chose to accept the indictment as essentially true and to devote some of my limited space to a refutation of what seems to me a dangerous illusion—the idea that ethnic friction is caused purely by the white man's shortcomings.

Mr. Fischer quotes Nehru and Jinnah in order to disprove my contention that religio-cultural tensions in India are "racial as well as religious." According to Nehru, the racial element amounts to only 5 per cent and according to Jinnah to only 25 per cent. Suppose we split the difference and say that it is 15 per cent. That fact hardly supports Mr. Fischer's conclusion: "So the chasm is not racial." Does the fact that the tension between Belfast and Dublin is primarily religious disprove the contributory element of racial friction between Scotch and Irish?

Mr. Fischer and I are in essential agreement upon the main question. But he tends to bow in unqualified contrition before the Oriental indictment of the Occident, and I think it important to refute the compensatory self-righteousness of the Orient because it is a source of political confusion.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

New York, January 14

Security for Jews

Dear Sirs: In your editorial Murder of a People (December 19) after discussing various proposals for counteracting the scientific murder of millions of Jews, and after suggesting, among other things, threats of retribution and protests to be relayed to Berlin via Franco and the Vatican, you conclude that "it is unlikely that any of these measures would make the slightest difference to the Germans." And let me add that they would not make the slightest difference to the two million Jews who already have been sacrificed on the altar of international fascism or to the millions more who face the same fate.

You, no doubt, realize that this process of extermination is not a new atrocity invented by the Nazis but rather the culmination of a 2,000-year-old recurring crime of civilization against the Jewish people. Surely the world owes it to its most frequent martyrs to admit the inadequacy of stop-gap and piecemeal solutions of the Jewish problem. If we are helpless to stop the current blood-bath we must certainly take the steps necessary to prevent its recurrence.

Will the democracies attempt to solve the Jewish problem by creating for the Jewish nation new havens and new asylums and thus relegate it to eternal minority status, with all the woe and suffering appertaining thereto? Or will the world finally admit that the only realistic and abiding solution for Jewish homelessness lies in mass immigration into Palestine and the reestablishment of that country as the national Jewish Homeland?

How long can the United Nations deny to the Jewish people their divine and historical right to take their rightful place in the family of nations? How long can the United Nations deny to the Jewish people the elementary right of self-defense through the creation of a Jewish army for Palestinian and stateless Jews? How long can the United Nations deny to the Jewish people the right to rebuild their own thousands of Lidices on their own soil?

Let us, liberals and democrats, who were so shocked by this "murder of a people" band together today and not "on the day of liberation," not only for joint expression of horror and sympathy, not only to demand retribution for the Nazi murderers, but for the speedy realization of this only positive solution. Let us see that Jews obtain "the peace and security which they have gone through hell to merit" by establishing the long overdue National Jewish Homeland and admitting it to the ranks of the United Nations.

LEONARD ROSENFELD

New York, January 4

Join Up, Radio!

Dear Sirs: Here is a direct appeal to radio advertisers:

You buy time on the air to increase the sale of your product. In so doing you give the American public many programs that are of great educational and entertainment value. You also consume thousands of irreplaceable air-hours in attempting to concentrate attention on your product by means of repeated exhortations, slogans, dialogues, songs, rhymes, skits, and so on, which are rapidly losing whatever selling force they may once have had.

We ask you for the duration to cut the time given to these "commercials" to the minimum, in order that this time may be utilized for announcements and broadcasts calculated directly to further the war effort. Save every minute you can and in this accumulated time tell the public how they can help win the war. State, by all means, your product and what you claim for it—but do this in the briefest number of words.

Some few sponsors have taken the initiative and donated time for war-bond and Red Cross appeals. It should be universal. The public is avid for knowledge, for instruction, for advice on a multiplicity of topics. The ground is only roughly covered by the regular announcers, newscasters, and special speakers. Conservation, war economy, defense measures, health programs, morale building, and so on, cannot be too fully explained or too frequently stressed. New problems arise each day.

Advertisers in other fields are feeling restrictions. The wholesaler has foregone the illuminated roadside sign. The retailer no longer has a brightly lighted show window. The radio advertiser should play his part as well.

There is an unequaled opportunity for American radio, by "joining up," to come belatedly of age. Our "commercials" have long been the laughing-stock of the B. B. C. and other foreign systems. American listeners are becoming increasingly fed up with the school of chewing-gum poetry and hair-tonic dramatics.

American radio, get aboard!

DALE WARREN

Boston, Mass., January 16

Myron Taylor, Episcopalian

Dear Sirs: Your correspondent, Dolph Swenson, may be quite right that there is a mysterious influence being exerted on the State Department by the Roman Catholic church, but it is only fair to point out that Myron Taylor is not a member of that church and that Mr. Swenson's implication that he may be carrying out "the wishes of the spiritual head of his church" is based on misinformation. Mr. Taylor is and has been a prominent and useful member of the Protestant Episcopal church and is a communicant in good standing of St. Bartholomew's Church, New York City.

JOHN MCGILL KRUMM

New Haven, Conn., January 15

Prejudice or Fear?

Dear Sirs: I have been a resident of the South for seven months, and I object strongly to any representation of anti-Negro prejudice as an expression of the white man's struggle for survival. That is specious "reasoning." We are creating deplorable conditions and then blaming the colored man for becoming the victim. In the same way we are making an education difficult for him to obtain and then accusing him of being stupid and ignorant.

I hear constantly the statement that the Negro is innately inferior to the white, and so he doesn't deserve anything better. Is the superior white man afraid of the inferior Negro? Is that why the whites won't let the colored establish a USO at Camp Tyson? An anticipated 4,000 Negro soldiers have no place to go for something to eat or to spend their leisure time. But these troops will become objects of vicious criticism when trouble breaks out.

H. C. HART

Nashville, Tenn., January 14

Progressive Teacher Speaks

Dear Sirs: The accent of despair in the article Violence in the Classroom by Agnes E. Benedict, in your issue of January 9, seems to me unworthy of the author of "Progress to Freedom." Do not the forces of war place all that we call civilization "in imminent danger"?

LANGUAGES

"LANGUAGE IS A WEAPON"

• • • Forge ahead, win special assignments, in global war and the ultimate peace, through ability to speak a foreign language.

MEET ANOTHER LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly
by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone EAR-EYE Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers into YOUR OWN HOME. No English is spoken. You learn the new language by LISTENING.

Home-Study Courses in 29 Languages:
RUSSIAN JAPANESE SPANISH
PORTUGUESE CHINESE NORWEGIAN and 23 others

Send for FREE book
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
3 RCA Building, New York • Circle 7-0830

BOOKS

BOOK BARGAINS

A Planned Society: George Soule.....	$.40
Europe in the Series: Clare Booth (2.50 ed.)..	.40
Haven: Ludwig & Edna Lewisohn (2.75 ed.)..	.50
Dutch Vet: A. Roethlis (2.50 Macmillan).....	.50
The Maid Silja: F. E. Siljanen (Nobel Pr. ed.)..	.50
The Majority of the People: E. Hims, Jr.....	.75
Friendly Contemporaries: Hamlin Garland.....	1.00
The Maurizius: Jacob Wasserman (3.00 ed.)..	1.00
The Furthest Village: Steinbeck & Kline.....	1.00
Glass House: Carleton Beals (autobiog.).....	1.00
The Hills Beyond: Thomas Wolfe (3.50 ed.)..	1.00
Mission to Moscow: Joseph E. Davies.....	1.35
The American Artist & His Times: Homer St. Gaudens, orig. $5 Doid Mead edition.....	1.98
Modern American Painting: P. Dowell, Jr., the original $5 Doid Mead edition.....	2.49
Scene for the Citizen: Lancelotti Hobben, the original $10.50 edition, 108 pp.....	2.49
The Public Papers & Addresses of F. D. Roosevelt, 5 vol., orig. $15 Random H. ed.....	4.95
Price of 3 postage on $1.00 in order, or add the little

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR, 212 2nd Ave. N. Y. C.

MEETING

A Dinner-Forum

ON INDIA'S PLACE IN THE DEMOCRATIC WORLD

RPRABHIS

PEARL BUCK

LOUIS FISCHER SYUD HOSSAIN
WALTER REUBER WILLIAM SHIRER

TOASTMASTER

ROGER N. BALDWIN

Will be held on INDIA INDEPENDENCE DAY
TUESDAY, JANUARY 26th, at 7:30 P. M.
In the Grand Ballroom of the HOTEL BILTMORE
Ninth Avenue and Forty-Third Street
Ampley, INDIA LEAGUE OF AMERICA

For reservations ($3.50 per plate) write or phone
Mr. John Gunther, Chairman, Committee of Sponsor,
4 West 40th Street, Larchmont, N. Y. 10538

It is certain progressive education will come into its own in winning the peace. Most liberal teachers do not broadcast their plans and progress, but it does not follow that they "cherish the comfortable illusion that all is well with our schools." There are, of course, many defeats as grievous as the New York cases mentioned in the article, but the progressive American teacher, like our armed forces, is "hell-bent" for victory over "an authoritarian approach, regimented pupils, and a formal and bookish curriculum." R. L. M.

Chicago, Ill., January 19

One Woman's Meat

Dear Sirs: I hope you will feel it worth while to stop in the midst of your morning mail long enough to read what a friend of mine has to say about The Nation. It has been my custom to send her my copy as soon as I have read it. Speaking of a plan whereby she might receive the paper in another way, she says: "Don't stop The Nation till you hear I am launched on the new plan, for that little paper is my meat and drink. It's astonishing how little one can get from other sources that doesn't appear sooner or later, at least in brief, in The Nation. That fact helps to reconcile me to the severe curtailment of my reading." MARY R. LAKEMAN

Rochester, N. Y., January 15

Praise Preferred

Dear Sirs: I quote from your opening editorial note in your December 26 number commenting on Mr. Henderson's resignation:

But it is probably fair to say that no one could have succeeded at this task in the face of constant sniping from a section of the press more interested in discrediting the New Deal than in winning the war.

Substitute President Roosevelt for Mr. Henderson in this statement, and your journal for the "section of the press," and you have a very true picture of what you are doing. You, of course, are not trying to discredit the New Deal, but you do seem more interested in vindicating your own pet theories than in winning the war. At least, I do not now recall a single strong, affirmative paragraph from any of your editorial force in the past four or five weeks in approval of the President and his acts. Anybody can find fault—suppose you try the other course.

FRANK C. REID

Pasadena, Cal., January 5

CONTRIBUTORS

IRA WOLFERT was correspondent for the North American Newspaper Alliance in the South Pacific. He has just published a book entitled "Battle for the Solomons."

JAMES A. WECHSLER is in the Washington bureau of PM.

JOHN DOS PASSOS is the author of "U. S. A." "The Big Money," and "The Ground We Stand On."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of Applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary, is the author of "The Nature and Destiny of Man."

HAAKON LIE, secretary of the Executive Board of the Trade Unions of Norway, with headquarters in London, is at present lecturing in the United States.

MARY AGNES HAMILTON, alderman of the London County Council and formerly a Labor member of Parliament, is now in this country on a lecture tour.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL, professor of English at Loyola University, appears frequently in The Nation as a critic of art and literature.

GAETANO SALVEMINI, Lauro de Bosis lecturer on the history of Italian civilization at Harvard University, is the author of "Under the Axe of Fascism."

JACQUES BARZUN, assistant professor of history at Columbia University, is to deliver the Lowell lectures in Boston this winter. The title of the series will be "Romanticism and the Modern Ego."

WILLIAM PHILLIPS is an editor of the Partisan Review.

GEORGE BARKER is an English poet and critic now living in the United States.

JAMES AGEE contributes a monthly article on films to The Nation.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 65 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $9; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 30, 1943

NUMBER 5

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

145

EDITORIALS

- Design for Victory 148
- How Large an Army? 149
- The Next Step 150

ARTICLES

- Moral Issue for Mr. Hull by I. F. Stone 151
- Germany After Hitler by Hiram Motherwell 152
- Impasse in Puerto Rico by W. Adolphe Roberts 155
- The Jews of Europe. III. Alternatives to Zion by Philip S. Bernstein 158
- In the Wind 161

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- Fascism Without Mussolini by Gaetano Salvemini 162
- Sikorski's Opposition by Peter Davenport 163
- Watch Spanish Morocco! 165
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 166

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- The Antrobuses and the Earwicks by Edmund Wilson 167
- Poetry of Latin America by Mildred Adams 168
- Pan-Europe, Old Style by M. W. Fodor 170
- Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 171
- The Beverage Plan by Maxwell S. Stewart 172
- Nothing Too Much by Rolfe Humphries 173
- The Nazi "State" by Hans Ernest Fried 174
- Fairy Tales for Guernica's Children by Philip Blair Rice 176
- Drama Note by Joseph Wood Krutch 176
- Art by Clement Greenberg 177
- Music by B. H. Haggin 177

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

178

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Music Critic Drama Critic

B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

HITLER HAS STRUCK AT THE MARSEILLAIS, and as might have been expected, they are hitting back. The inhabitants of the great French seaport have long been noted both for their toughness and their devotion to Republican tradition, and when forty thousand of them were ordered to leave their homes they instinctively resisted. The Nazi authorities demanded the evacuation of the Old Port district, perhaps for the purpose of building fortifications, more probably to hamstring the underground movement which had found that rabbit warren of narrow alleys and dark courts a useful base for operations. When troops moved in to clear the area, the inhabitants answered them by digging up arms and building barricades, and the Nazis have now resorted to artillery and tanks. It is no doubt a hopeless contest, but it serves as a reminder to the world that the France of the Revolution lives on. Allons, enfants de la patrie . . .

✱

WITH THE FALL OF TRIPOLI AND THE imminent Russian threat to Rostov and Kharkov, propaganda on the Axis home front has gone into sharp reverse. For a month or more Dr. Goebbels's men tried to ease the Germans gently into the knowledge that the Wehrmacht had run into trouble all the way from Leningrad to the Caucasus. A kind of military double-talk was evolved in which a withdrawal became an "elastic defense in depth," doomed divisions became "hedgheggs," and a full retreat was simply a "detaching from the enemy according to plan." This verbal gloss has now been abruptly abandoned in favor of the strongest medicine the Herrenvolk have had to take since they inherited the earth. German papers, with orders to go the limit, have blossomed out with such heads as "The Fate of the Reich Is at Stake." The Russian sweep is compared with the German break-through from the Meuse to the English Channel, and the master race is urged to prove itself "spiritually stronger" than the once decadent and plutocratic British. These sudden shrieks of alarm reflect more than the fact that Germany has had sharp military reverses. Nazi leaders, hoping for a stabilized Russian front during the winter, had banked on returning hundreds of thousands of soldiers to the Reich to assist in the desperately needed overhauling of the transportation system and of factory machinery. Instead, the Nazis are now compelled to risk defeatism in order to drive home to German workers the urgency of straining every muscle to keep pace with American war production. With the Italians, the shift was even more sudden and more stunning. Up to thirty-six hours before the fall of Tripoli Italian communiqués told of "operations continuing in our favor." Signor Gayda now announces that the sacrifice of the city was carried out according to a plan worked out even before the launching of General Montgomery's drive—a kind of Rommel pay-as-you-go plan, as it were, with the Germans going and the Italians paying.

✱

A STORM IS ABOUT TO BREAK OVER THE head of the American Department of State, and it remains to be seen whether its guiding spirits will know enough to come in out of the rain. Time was when only we "professional cranks" worried over the deep maneuvers of Mr. Hull's agency, but the appointment of M. Peyrouton to the governorship of Algiers has thrown the field wide open. It was last November that we introduced the temporary expedient of fighting fascism with fascists on the North African front. Now, nearly three months later, the Nürnberg laws which they introduced are still in force; Radio Algiers still broadcasts anti-Semitic propaganda; Radio Dakar still eulogizes le Maréchal; Spanish Loyalists remain behind barbed wire; and the man who Himmelerized France has been brought out of an obscure retreat in Argentina to become civil administrator of Algeria. Confronted with a direct question concerning the scandalous muddle in North Africa, Secretary Hull, as Mr. Stone relates elsewhere in this issue, smugly suggested keeping our minds on the war and implied that he was interested in the military aspects of the North African situation, not the political. This crowning touch of irresponsibility opened the sluiceways of public dissatisfaction. The sober New York Herald Tribune demanded an explanation; other papers launched a campaign to clean house in Mr. Hull's musty old quarters; Paul H. Appleby, a responsible official attached to the department, resigned in protest over the whole policy; and even Ernest K. Lindley, one of the department's most assiduous defenders, was forced to take issue with his heroes. It is widely believed that the forthcoming pronouncement on United Nations strategy will advance a solution of the North African tangle. If it does, the State Department may be saved again, but it can hardly be exonerated.

✱

THE INNOCENCE AND UNWORLDLINESS OF the political boss, which are so conclusively displayed whenever he appears on a witness stand, have always made us wonder why the American people persist in believing that he is cynical and shrewd. Take the case of Mr.

Flynn before the Senate committee. He didn't know that the paving blocks with which his courtyard was paved were city property, laid down with city labor, until he was told so by his law partner two months later; and then, according to his partner, Mr. Flynn was "astounded, surprised, distressed, angered; and swore considerably." He didn't know that the Mr. Flegenheimer he commissioned as a deputy was "Dutch" Schultz. Neither he nor any of his friends had anything to do with obtaining a federal job for Daniel Daly, foreman of the grand jury that found no indictment in the paving-block incident, though most of us have the delusion that political bosses interest themselves as a matter of course in such appointments, which are vulgarly known as patronage.

✱

ROBERT MORAN, FORMER COMMISSIONER OF Public Works of the Bronx, rather smudged the alabaster cast when he said he had resigned his job because "politics in New York at the present time is not any place for a decent man," but his testimony in favor of Mr. Flynn contradicted this bitter and no doubt thoughtless remark. Mr. Moran denied that he was a political protégé of Mr. Flynn although he admitted that the future Minister to Australia (it seems to be in the bag) had recommended him for the Public Works job. It was Mr. Moran also who said that because of the war and the problems it created for him the small matter of paying the city employees for their work on Flynn's farm had "slipped his mind until he found out that Mr. Kern was investigating the situation." Having read the reports of the Senate hearings with care, we cannot but conclude that Mr. Flynn and all his cronies are selfless, high-minded, cultivated, idealistic gentlemen who are being persecuted; we reject the idea that their unanimous testimony has anything to do with that old adage about letting him who is without sin cast the first paving stone. But we are still opposed to having Mr. Flynn represent us in Australia. We don't see how our interests there can be adequately protected by a man who doesn't even know what's going on in his own back yard.

✱

A PAY-AS-YOU-GO TAX PROGRAM SEEMS certain to be adopted by Congress within the next two or three months. At the moment, however, there is a wide difference of opinion as to the best means of putting the income tax on a current basis. Despite repeated refutation by competent authorities, the preposterous Ruml plan has been effectively sold to a not unwilling general public. The most recent Gallup poll, for example, shows that 90 per cent of those who have opinions on the matter favor it. This is not surprising in view of the attractiveness of being "forgiven" a year's taxation. But the plan has created more confusion in the field of tax policy than any other proposal in history. So many persons have got the idea that they will be excused from paying their 1942 taxes that the heads of the two Congressional tax committees have had to issue a stern warning that these taxes will be due as scheduled on March 15. It is doubtful whether even this warning has succeeded, however, in making the public fully conscious of the enormous taxes that will have to be paid in the coming year if inflation is to be headed off. For estimates indicate that an excess spending power of at least $50 billion has been created by the war, which will have to be eliminated by higher taxes and war-bond sales if present price levels are to be held. Even to approximate this absorption of spending power, the pay-as-you-go program will have to be imposed, as the Treasury has indicated, on top of the present tax program, thus doubling up, in part at least, 1943 collections.

✱

ALL SORTS OF TAX PLANS ARE BEING OFFERED to sugarcoat the bitter realities of the 1943 tax prospects. It is alternately proposed that the Victory tax be repealed and that it be doubled. The Administration is said to have a plan for increasing the pay-roll tax under the Social Security Act to 10 per cent as an ingenious means of increasing the general tax revenue. And the annual drive for a sales tax has started—this time as a war measure. Representative Wesley E. Disney of Oklahoma, a member of the Ways and Means Committee who has long championed this obnoxious levy, has enthusiastically declared that "all roads lead to the sales tax." This year's drive is likely to prove especially serious because the sales tax, since it is paid in small dribbles, fits in with Congress's desire to conceal the tax increases as much as possible. Yet it has never been so important to resist the organized pressure for the sales tax as it is in a year when food shortages and high prices threaten to depress living standards to unprecedented low levels. Moreover, the sales tax is peculiarly ill adapted for tapping the available sources of excess spending power. A graduated spending tax which allows an exemption for necessities and rises in proportion to the amount spent is far better suited to war-time requirements.

✱

IN RECENT WEEKS THE VICE-PRESIDENT HAS been showing a new and most encouraging capacity to slug it out with his opponents within the Administration. His latest victory is an order taking from Jesse Jones those RFC subsidiaries which buy metals and other supplies abroad. Under an order issued by the President last April, the Board of Economic Warfare was given the power to issue directives to these subsidiaries. But Jones, who is tenacious and stubborn in holding on to power, has been able to delay the carrying out of these directives and thereby often to hamstring the BEW's activities. Mr. Wallace has ended the difficulty by an order taking over the personnel and virtually all the functions of these RFC agencies, leaving the RFC with little more than the disbursement of the actual funds to pay for BEW purchases. In the future the BEW will negotiate its own contracts, which means that Jesse Jones will be unable to interpose a veto over clauses designed to improve wages and working conditions in Latin America. It is unfortunate that in one sphere of activity, the purchase of rubber, Jeffers has taken power from the BEW and given it to the RFC's Rubber Reserve. Under the wide authority given Jeffers by the President, there isn't much Wallace can do about that.

✱

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS APPEARS EAGER TO have the anti-trust suit filed against it by the Department of Justice tried anywhere but in the courts. It has already submitted its case to the newspapers, which have returned a vociferous verdict of "not guilty"—hardly a surprising result considering the relationship of the majority of them to the A. P. Now an attempt is being made to carry the matter to Congress through a threatened House investigation of the "circumstances preceding the filing" of the suit. This blatant effort to intimidate the Department of Justice is sponsored by Representative Shafer, who hails from Michigan but has long been dependent for political inspiration on the Chicago Tribune. We have heard much lately about executive invasions of the legislative branch, but in this instance, as in the case of Senator Wheeler's attack on the Department of Justice because of its sedition indictments, we are faced by legislative interference with the sworn duties of the executive. We hope that the department will resist these pressure tactics, but we are disturbed by Washington rumors of the early "promotion" of Assistant Attorney General Thurman Arnold and his replacement, as head of the anti-trust division, by someone more pliable. In the A. P. case there is, as Keith Hutchison will show in two articles beginning in the next issue of The Nation, strong prima facie evidence of monopoly, and no obstacle should be permitted to bar its submission to the courts.

✱

WE THINK DONALD M. NELSON CORRECT and the Truman committee wrong in their controversy over production of farm machinery. The committee's interim report on farm machinery and equipment seems to us an easy acquiescence in a point of view favored both by the farm lobby and the big machinery manufacturers. The facilities of these manufacturers are ideally suited to the production of several important items of heavy armament. Nelson and the Office of Civilian Supply made a wise decision in ordering the concentration of the farm-machinery business in the hands of the smaller manufacturers, thus freeing the big ones for war work. The War Production Board also seems to have been justified in cutting production quotas for the farm-machinery industry. Though maximum farm output is important to the war effort, farmers entered this year with the greatest aggregate quantity of machinery in their history, much of it relatively new. The cut brings production only 25 per cent below the 1931-40 average; it has been compensated for by allowing production of repair parts at 67 per cent above the 1940 level. The cut will save 500,000 tons of steel, the labor of 100,000 men, and much valuable arms-producing facilities. After the boom in farm-equipment sales during the past two years the new quota should be ample. Judging from samplings made among farmers by the Office of Civilian Supply, it seems indeed to be greater than necessary.

✱

NOT SO LONG AGO REPRESENTATIVE COX OF Georgia was lustily thumping a tub on the dangers of interfering with administrative agencies. He was one of those who joined in the unsuccessful fight to enact the Walter-Logan bill. Now hearings before the Federal Communications Commission are revealing that he was paid $2,500 by a radio station in Georgia some months after he helped it obtain a license from the commission. The hearings are not yet over and before they end should explain why the fee was paid the Congressman. It is a felony under Section 113 of the federal criminal code for a federal official, elected or appointed, to represent a client before a federal agency. The public policy behind this statute should be readily apparent to one who, like Representative Cox, has campaigned so vigorously for independent administrative agencies. The Congressman, with a striking sense of reciprocity, has countered the FCC's investigation of him by getting the House to make him chairman of a committee to investigate the FCC. Cox called the commission "the nastiest nest of rats to be found in the country," and his investigation should serve not only to distract attention from his own $2,500 fee but provide the opposition with the first of the inquiries to "smear the New Deal" which are planned for this session.

✱

CHILE'S SEVERANCE OF RELATIONS WITH the Axis powers is no less welcome because the step was delayed so many months. The thirty-to-ten vote in the Senate approving the break shows that President Rios has overwhelming political support for his action. Because of this support, the breaking of relations has taken on a positive quality such as is usually found only in a declaration of war. In a statement announcing the action President Rios declared that Chile had an "essential interest in this fight" and added, "We are fighting so that all men and all nations may live in peace." A huge mass demonstration indorsing the move has been held in Santiago, with a vast majority of the political parties, labor organizations, and other groups participating. Japan also seems to have grasped the significance of the break, for the Japanese radio lost no time in threatening retaliation against Chile. Both President Castillo and Foreign Minister Guíñazu of Argentina have stated officially that Chile's action will in no way influence Argentina's decision to maintain relations with the Axis. As long as they hold office, this is no doubt true. But the enthusiasm with which Chile's decision was greeted in the Argentine press indicates that it will have a profound effect on Argentine internal politics.

✱

SOME OLD CUSTOMS HAVE THEIR CHARM AS well as their uses, but they sometimes produce strange results. On January 21 the New York Times carried a five-column streamer running as follows: "Nazi Raid Kills 34 pupils." Reading the story one was brought up short at the foot of the column by another headline, to wit: "British Pay Honors to Dead Nazi Fliers." . . . Speaking of old customs, school ties are no longer to be made in England because of the shortage of dyes. We deeply regret their passing. What shall we substitute for that eloquent phrase "the old school tie," which has been sufficient in the past to indicate all the varicolored evils of toriyism at home and abroad?

Design for Victory

ASPATE of obviously inspired stories from Washington and London has made it clear that major developments in United Nations strategy are in the making. In commenting on these reports The Nation is handicapped by the probability that an official announcement on recent conversations between the chief Allied powers will appear after this issue has gone to press, but before it goes on sale at the newsstands. Nevertheless, it is not necessary to have access to the agenda of the conferences now concluding to have a fairly good idea of what has been talked about.

It has long been clear to us that no over-all design for victory was going to be achieved by the separate concoction of plans by each of the Big Four powers—the United States, Britain, Russia, and China. In this global war actions taken in one theater necessarily react immediately on every other theater, and no amount of liaison machinery can make the fractional strategies of a number of autonomous authorities add up to complete coordination. In the past year Russia has plowed a lonely furrow, even though America and Britain have helped to power its tractor, while China has been dangerously isolated, physically and psychologically. In some spheres of action there has been close cooperation between the two Anglo-Saxon nations, but unified policies on such momentous questions as political warfare and the defeat of the submarine menace have not been achieved.

All four of the great powers, however, are believed to have participated in the discussions which have been going on for the past two weeks, and if optimistic forecasts can be trusted, a global program for 1943 has been drawn up and a Supreme War Council charged with the task of carrying it into effect. This should mean that the man-power and supplies of the United Nations will henceforth be regarded as in a common pool and that the one central planning authority will decide how and where they can be used to the best advantage. Obviously this will be an extremely difficult assignment, particularly since Russia is not directly concerned with the war in the Pacific and China is not involved in the struggle in Europe. Yet all four powers are essentially at war with the same enemy, and as Alvarez del Vayo pointed out last week, if we proceed on the basis that this is a war against fascism in all its forms, the will to victory should be powerful enough to overcome inevitable national frictions.

Much as we sympathize with China's claims for greater support, we feel that the weight of Allied striking power must be employed in Europe this year. Hitler is groggy under recent blows. The Red Army has delivered a powerful left hook to his chin; the British capture of Tripoli and the Anglo-American concentration in French North Africa are the equivalent of a hard blow to the belly. But it would be fatal to let up now that he is staggering, for he will recuperate fast if allowed any time out. Rather, this is the moment for a knock-out punch to the solar plexus which can only be delivered by an invasion of the European fortress.

With such an opportunity it would be a fatal error to divert to the Orient the resources necessary to stage a major offensive there, and we feel certain no Allied conference could countenance such a proposal. On the other hand, some way has to be found of preventing the Japanese from consolidating their gains, and this means that we must maintain in the Far East a harassing defensive. The most economical way of achieving this end would be to increase the flow of supplies to China and so make possible the use of its abundant man-power.

Assuming then, as we must, that the major effort of the United Nations in 1943 will be in the West, what are the prerequisites of victory there? Recent anxious discussions of the submarine danger suggest one answer. In the field of production the United Nations now have a big edge on the Axis, and almost certainly we and the British have enough trained men to invade Europe. But the problem of keeping an invading army supplied remains a very tough one. Official silence toward the end of last year contributed to a popular belief that the submarine had been conquered. Now we are allowed to know that ship sinkings are keeping level with new construction, while the Germans are building new U-boats at about twice the rate that we are destroying them. How this very grave situation is to be remedied we do not know, but one essential step would seem to be complete coordination of Anglo-American anti-submarine forces. We hope, therefore, that the rumor that this will be effected under the command of Admiral Sir Percy Noble, now head of the British naval delegation in Washington, is well founded.

An equally important preliminary to an all-out offensive in Europe is a full understanding on political questions between this country, Britain, and Russia. If we are moving rapidly toward the liberation of the conquered peoples of Europe, we must have a sounder political strategy than that cooked up by the amateur Machiavellis of the State Department. A necessary first step is the clearing up of the mess they have created in North Africa, the stench of which is blowing far across the Mediterranean and poisoning our cause in distant lands. Political prognosticators suggest that the question of North Africa will be firmly handled in the forthcoming report of the Allied conversations and that an agreement between Generals de Gaulle and Giraud will follow. We hope this information proves correct, for the present scandal, topped off by the appointment of Peyrouton, is worth many divisions to the enemy.

How Large an Army?

SENATOR BANKHEAD'S proposal that we let our allies do the fighting while we concentrate on production is but one of many recent indications that the most fundamental of all man-power issues—that of establishing a balance between military and civilian requirements—is still unsettled. Although Secretary of War Stimson some weeks ago announced plans for increasing the number of men in the armed services to 9,700,000 by the end of 1943, this decision is being challenged both within the Administration and in Congress. The Senate Military Affairs Committee has started an inquiry into the wisdom of expanding the armed services to this extent, and Under Secretary Patterson has felt it necessary to defend that plan. The question is not, of course, whether we should allow our allies to do our fighting for us; we already have more than seven million men under arms. It is whether we should see to it that our allies, who are at present doing most of the fighting, are properly armed and fed, or divert needed supplies from the fighting front for equipping an additional three million men to fight sham battles in our Southern training camps.

It is becoming increasingly evident that the United States cannot hope to raise and equip an army of ten or eleven million men and at the same time serve as the "arsenal of democracy." There is unfortunately real substance in former President Hoover's warning that something will have to be done to remedy the farm-labor shortage if we are to have sufficient food supplies for the exceptional demands of the war and post-war periods. While the man-power situation in industry is not yet as serious as in agriculture, both military and civilian production is being limited by lack of suitable labor. Donald Nelson admitted last week that there were many in the WPB who felt that we have gone too far in clamping down on civilian production.

So far our record in supplying our allies, with the notable exception of China, has been a reasonably good one. The announcement last week that we had shipped 2,600 planes, 3,200 tanks, and 81,000 trucks and jeeps to the Soviet Union in 1942 was a pleasant surprise. Unfortunately, however, there is growing pressure from army and navy authorities, as well as from Congress, for a reduction of lend-lease shipments in 1943 so that we may send more supplies to our own forces. In the case of foodstuffs—particularly dairy products and meat—there is grave danger that shipments may have to be cut down because of declining production here at home. Such a development, it need hardly be pointed out, would be a major disaster. The needs of our allies, of Russia and China in particular, are bound to become more acute with the passage of time. And as we pass to the offensive, the significance of supplies as a factor in speeding victory will certainly increase. Since much of what is needed can come only from the United States, we have a responsibility that we cannot safely dodge.

Some of the sentiment for keeping the size of our armed forces at a lower figure may, as Secretary Stimson charges, be isolationist in origin. There are still some persons against our participation in the war, and they would doubtless prefer to see the army kept small. But the essential arguments of those who urge a ten- or eleven-million-man army are just as clearly isolationist in character. Until recently the advocates of a large army argued that we must be prepared to carry on the war alone in the event that our allies collapse. Today, in view of Russia's amazing show of strength, one is likely to hear an even more sinister argument to the effect that a large army will be necessary to enforce America's will at the peace table. Those who believe in making United Nations cooperation as effective as possible during and after the war will not necessarily be on the side of a smaller and more manageable army. But they will ask that our allies be given a chance to share in the final decision on a matter of such great strategic importance. It is possible that there have been some consultations on the matter, but it is hard to believe that the Chinese, for example, would rather see equipment for three million additional men delivered to an American training camp than turned over to them for use in China. And we suspect that the Russians, the French, and the British feel much as the Chinese do.

The Next Step

WE WELCOME the appointment of Colonel Robert W. Johnson as chairman of the Smaller War Plants Corporation and look to him for the first vigorous attempt to bring smaller enterprises into the war program that has been made since Floyd Odium resigned. Such action is essential if we are to produce the materials and fabricate the armaments required to meet 1943's production goals. Colonel Johnson, as the head of the famous firm of Johnson and Johnson, pharmaceutical manufacturers, has made a deserved reputation as an outstanding progressive business man. He was the President's first choice to head the Smaller War Plants Corporation but decided instead to go into army ordnance. The experience gained in the army procurement service should be of great help to him in obtaining the cooperation of the armed services in spreading work from the topheavy backlogs of big business to the idle facilities of small.

Colonel Johnson's predecessor, Lou E. Holland, of Kansas City, is a man who showed great organizing ability in his home town, where he formed one of the earliest small-business pools to handle war orders. But Holland seemed unable to get results in Washington in the face of WPB Chairman Donald M. Nelson's covert reluctance to do anything but make speeches on the plight of small business. Holland may serve a useful function as Johnson's assistant, and Johnson, as a big-business man himself, may be less easily overawed by the dollar-a-year crowd. Johnson's appointment seems to be the result of White House prodding and of the dissatisfaction expressed by the Senate Small Business Committee with the record so far made by the Smaller War Plants Corporation. The chairman of that committee, Senator Murray, was one of the first to applaud Johnson's appointment.

In our opinion, Colonel Johnson has a better chance of success than his predecessors. His prestige, his backing in Congress, and the growing awareness of the problem's importance in the War and Navy departments are all in his favor. But it is unlikely that he will be as successful as the needs of war production and the preservation of small enterprise require unless given actual power over procurement. Since Nelson is unwilling to exercise this power himself or to delegate it, and there is some doubt as to the powers originally conferred upon him by the President, it would seem best to give this to Colonel Johnson by statute. The procurement services of army and navy are too much dominated by conventional thinking and big-business men in uniform for us to rely on their voluntary cooperation. Colonel Johnson needs power to direct the placing of contracts if he is to be successful and if we are to meet this year's goals.

Moral Issue for Mr. Hull

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 24

THOSE inspired stories you have been reading which blame General Eisenhower for the Peyrouton appointment just are not true. From all I know, on and off the record, General Eisenhower was distrustful of, if not opposed to, the proposal that Peyrouton be brought from Buenos Aires to be made Governor General of Algeria. In this connection it may be significant that the State Department has been attacking the General's brother, Milton Eisenhower, as a "trouble-making idealist." In the lexicon of our current diplomacy this means a man who dislikes duplicity, fascist stooges, and pint-sized Machiavellis. Eisenhower is second in command to Elmer Davis at the OWI, and it is no secret that the OWI is unhappy over the trend of events in North Africa. Davis admitted at a press conference last week that political prisoners, including men who helped our forces to land, were still held in concentration camps. The Nürnberg laws have not yet been repealed in North Africa. A liberating army that does not liberate is not the most inspiring subject for democratic propagandists.

The hope is that in the very near-future the President will clarify the situation, for decisions of importance are in the making. Unfortunately, what needs clarification is not so much the situation as the State Department. Mr. Roosevelt's statement of November 17 on the Darlan deal was sufficiently clarifying, but little attention seems to have been paid to it by the men directing our foreign policy. Informed opinion here is agreed that Darlan was prepared to do almost anything we asked of him. Blame for the failure to free political prisoners and to repeal the Nürnberg laws must be assessed against the State Department.

There is very little evidence that it pressed for either action, although Mr. Roosevelt had asked for both clearly and publicly on November 17. The way in which the request was made involved the prestige of the President of the United States in the eyes of the world, and diplomats are supposed to understand the value of prestige—at least they are always talking about it. When I first inquired at the State Department about the failure to repeal the anti-Jewish laws in North Africa, I was told that ours was not an occupying army and could not give orders to the civil population; the relations between the United States and the authorities in North Africa were relations between friendly and allied powers. In that case, the President's request that political prisoners be freed and the Nürnberg laws be repealed would seem to be a matter to be taken up by our Minister, Robert D. Murphy, with the civil authorities in North Africa. How can the State Department operate on the theory that ours is not an occupying army and at the same time declare that the carrying out of the President's request is the responsibility of General Eisenhower and the War Department?

I suspect that men like Murphy, James Clement Dunn, Ray Atherton, and A. A. Berle have little interest in freeing those political prisoners. Berle as Assistant Secretary of State, Dunn as political adviser for Europe, and Atherton as acting chief of the European division were among the principal architects of our pro-Vichy policy. I know that these State Department officials are delaying, though they might hesitate openly to oppose, repeal of the Nürnberg laws. One of their arguments is that it might "offend the Arabs," a point on which Berle feels so deeply that he doubted the wisdom of appointing a Jew to the recent inter-departmental commission which went to North Africa. Someone has been confusing Islam with National Socialism.

More than two months have passed since the President asked that all laws in North Africa which had been inspired by Nazi ideology be repealed. The first State Department official to whom I spoke was Samuel Reber, assistant chief of the European division. He said the State Department was making a study of the question. Reber spoke vaguely of certain anti-Arab decrees and laws which should properly be repealed along with the anti-Jewish laws. This seemed sensible, until I checked it from French sources and found that the department's admittedly vague ("we're having it looked up in the library") ideas on French law gave an incorrect impression. Reber had mentioned the Lyautey decrees in Morocco as anti-Arab, but French sources insisted that instead of being anti-Arab, these decrees favored Islam by permitting Moroccans who so chose to live according to their own religious laws and customs rather than those of France. An Arab might have as many wives as the Koran allowed, though French law does not permit polygamy. Reber spoke vaguely of French Republican laws also involved in this question, but the only one a French lawyer could find was the Grennieux decree of the 1870's, which gave the Jews of France the right to be naturalized. When I reported back with these findings, an inquiry by the press office of the department brought a denial that the State Department was even studying the question. I was advised to inquire at the War Department.

Later, at a press conference, I asked Secretary Hull, "Is the State Department taking any steps to follow through on the President's request of last November 17 that all laws inspired by Nazi ideology in North Africa be repealed?" The answer was that he wished we could get our minds on the war for a few minutes out of each day. He went on to say more in the same vein, and he was quite angry, but he did not answer the question. What the Secretary said was nevertheless revealing. We have a department, the War Department, for military matters. The State Department is supposed to handle political matters. The Secretary's answer implies that these political questions have little bearing on the war. Yet it is on the political issues of human equality and freedom that the President and the American people are fighting this war, and it is on these issues that our government appeals to the masses of Europe and Asia. Mr. Hull is fond of dwelling on moral issues in his speeches but seems to resent it when he is asked to make his words good in the actual conduct of our foreign policy.

The final blow to State Department pretenses about North Africa is the news which leaked out here on the reasons why Under Secretary of Agriculture Paul H. Appleby resigned after three weeks as special assistant to Secretary Hull in charge of the Office of Foreign Territories. Appleby was asked by the President himself to take the post and was supposed to be in charge of all matters affecting occupied and conquered territory. He resigned when he discovered that behind his back Murphy, Dunn, Atherton, and Berle had arranged for Peyrouton's appointment as Governor General of Algeria. Appleby had reason to suspect that this was rushed through against the wishes of General Eisenhower, and he was angered when Secretary Hull dispatched a cable to Buenos Aires clearing Peyrouton's travel papers for North Africa less than forty-eight hours before a departmental meeting at which Appleby was prepared to present the full facts on Peyrouton's malodorous past.

Germany After Hitler

BY HIRAM MOTHERWELL

WHAT Germany will be like on armistice day is something for which our imagination has no precedent. This time will be radically different from last time. Germany on armistice day will be a social shambles comparable only to the anarchy of the Dark Ages. The German social structure of 1918 was devastated by fire. That of 1942, by the time total defeat comes, will have been blasted by dynamite, shattered not only by war but by Hitler's own hand.

THE GERMAN STRUCTURE OF NOVEMBER, 1918

The elements of German social stability which persisted throughout World War I, and emerged more or less intact when fighting ceased, were:

The Political Parties. These, though sometimes changing their labels, continued to represent substantially the interests they had promoted in 1914: the Nationalists—the Junker landowners and the aristocracy of the army; the Conservatives—the big industrialists and bankers; the Democratic "middle parties"—the shopkeepers, the professions, and much of the peasantry; the "Center"—that portion of the middle and working classes and peasantry organized, parallel with the Catholic trade unions, under the aegis of the Catholic church; the Social-Democratic Party—the majority of the wage workers and many of the lower middle class.

The Catholic Church. This, though not formally in politics, was a powerful force resisting radical change.

The Evangelical churches exercised a comparable influence, though less directly.

The Army (in part). Although the army as a whole ceased to be an instrument of the state, certain portions of it, preserving Junker discipline and tradition, constituted themselves independent political weapons for conservatism, and were far more successful in preserving the old Germany than the fiasco of the Kapp Putsch would suggest.

Big Industry. This came through the war intact, despite heavy wear and tear on its working equipment. At first, after the armistice, it replaced the banks as the national repository of liquid capital and source of slush money for reactionary politics. It was the first element in the German economy to reconstitute itself completely.

The Municipalities. The German municipalities were largely non-political and admirably administered. They maintained their governmental machinery and traditions straight through war and revolution and inflation. The same is true in lesser degree of some of the German states.

The Press. The German press preserved its individuality and traditions through the war untouched, save for military censorship and spasmodic pressure by the government.

The Peasantry. This was less an active political force than a reservoir of conservative influence. It held on to its food, voted for the same old politicians, and supplied the rank and file of the monarchist regiments which periodically shot up the discontented cities.

The German Civil Service. This body of methodically trained, industrious, unimaginative, and incorruptible administrators remained the nervous system of the German state organization through thick and thin. To them orders were orders, whether emanating from S. M. (Seine Majestät) Wilhelm or from S. M. (Saddle-Maker) Ebert. Thus, though cabinets toppled and politicians followed one another as through a revolving door, the day-by-day business of government was carried on punctiliously, honestly, and—despite appalling disorder and starvation salaries—fairly efficiently.

THE INTANGIBLES

The chief intangible force that held revolutionary Germany in check after the 1918 armistice was hunger and the hope for speedy food. In Russia, the previous year, revolution meant to the masses "peace and bread"—the end of the war and "therefore" food. In Germany the war had already ended, and the masses rightly believed that further disorder would delay the restoration of normal food supplies.

A second intangible was the well-nigh universal belief—carefully nurtured by Allied propaganda—that since Kaiserism had made, and lost, the war, a democratic regime, presumably Kaiserism's opposite, would bring and preserve peace. The Fourteen Points were for a short time a powerful agent for the encouragement of a sincere attempt to achieve German democracy.

Another intangible was the reverence of the Germans for order and authority. When the superstructure of the social order was falling about their ears, and the invincible army itself was splitting and disintegrating, a red stamp on a piece of paper remained a command. To the Germans, if it is not in the official scheme of things it cannot happen. If the official weather report says "Fair," then the rain simply is not falling.

Parenthetically, the one intangible that most effectively wrecked the will to democracy and collaboration in post-war reconstruction was the exclusive-war-guilt clause of the Treaty of Versailles. Probably never in history have a few dozen mere words had so fateful an effect.

HITLER'S REVOLUTION THE REAL THING

Now compare the structural elements which survived World War I with those of which Hitler's Germany is made. While doing so, bear always in mind that there was no true revolution in Germany in 1918—only a change of regime. There has been a broad and deep revolution in Germany between 1933 and 1942.

All political parties except the Nazi have been suppressed and their underground remnants persecuted. All trade unions have been dissolved and supplanted by a state labor organization. Business and the professions have been purged and manacled, and authority within them has been largely transferred to Nazi hands. The churches have, so far as Hitler has been able to contrive it, been split and gagged. The ordinary police have become Nazi errand boys. Even much of the army has been effectively Nazified. The press has morally ceased to exist. Such grand old names as the Frankfurter Zeitung and the Berliner Tageblatt, though doubtless retaining their old typography and make-up, are only names, commanding not a scrap of credence or authority. Above all, the civil service has been completely demoralized and forced to do the infinity of little crooked jobs whereby the Nazis administer the daily life of the land. As a force for social cohesion it no longer exists.

But not only has the social structure of old Germany been physically shattered; it has been spiritually dissolved by the Nazi poison. The tradition of inflexible service to the state and to the laws has vanished. Even Hitler dared not at first nick the granite of the German judicial tradition. To the astonishment of the world, the Reichstag-fire trial was conducted with absolute fairness and faithfulness to legal procedure. Today Hitler can instruct his puppet judges to render justice not in accordance with the law but according to "instinct." Everyone must take Nazi orders, not only to pervert justice for Nazi politics, but to levy graft for Nazi pockets. Every business office, every government bureau, is bossed by a petty Nazi chief either in the swivel chair or in the near background.

It is this denial of the Prussian state tradition—autocratically revered from the days of Frederick the Great down to 1933—that clinches the certainty of German moral fragmentation on armistice day. Even so recently as 1932 the judge who delivered an opinion based on anything but the law, the civil servant who accepted a bribe for winking at an infraction of die Verordnungen, would have been as unthinkable as a minister of the Gospel who introduced his mistress at a church sociable. Today not only the body but the soul of Prussian-German society is shot through with political disease.

To understand why this loss of faith in governmental incorruptibility is so devastating to Germany, you must bear in mind a basic peculiarity of the German character. That is its complete dependence on theoretical certainty as a prerequisite to action. The Germans' faith in government is rigid. For a century and a half they have believed that judges render judgment precisely according to the law, that state employees sign papers exactly according to the regulations. In this certainty they have been able to achieve miracles of organization. And for a century and a half their certainty was justified.

Then Hitler forced upon them a new certainty—that the Führer and his clique are always right. On armistice day they will see that this new certainty has brought them to disaster. Where shall they turn? What is there left for them to rely on? We can hardly imagine the spiritual panic of the average German on armistice day.

With total defeat the official Nazis will be yanked out of government, national and local, out of the pseudo-trade-union structure, out of the banks and business houses, out of the professional associations and the press, and out of the churches. Leaving what? An emptiness, an absence of certainty and authority, of any pattern for living, of any ruling force that can treat for peace in the name of the nation. When on armistice day certainty vanishes, Germany will be one vast psychosis.

STRUCTURAL ELEMENTS IN TOMORROW'S GERMANY

The Army. It is impossible, of course, to foresee what shape the German army will be in when the smash-up comes. Since it will continue to be whipped on to the fight until the last moment, it will probably tend to break down in all parts at once, like the one-hoss shay, with general refusal of commands, mutinies, killing of officers, mass desertion. But parts of the army will certainly carry over some of the Nazi authority and will doubtless attempt to set up the first post-Nazi government.

The Catholic Church. This has persisted relatively unimpaired in strength, although its political and social expressions—the Center Party and its associated Catholic trade unions—have been thoroughly crushed. The church commands the religious faith of at least 20 per cent of the German people. Its influence would be a definite element of support for any social order of which it approved. The Evangelical churches, though speaking for a much larger proportion of the population, are less well organized to exert political influence.

The Communist Party. This is in all probability the only one of the pre-Hitler parties, in Germany as in the rest of Europe, which has managed to maintain an effective underground organization. By virtue of this fact, and of the prestige of what will be victorious Soviet Russia, it will exercise influence out of all proportion to its numbers. Paradoxically, it will probably present itself as the party, not of revolution, but of law and order—which, by comparison with the surrounding chaos, may well be true. It will be out in front in its ability to reorganize and discipline the industrial workers, a substantial part of the professional and lower middle classes, the peasants of the large-estate regions of the northeast, and an unpredictable proportion of the defeated army.

The Small Peasantry. This appears to have come relatively unscathed, as a class, through the Hitler revolution. However, it will represent only a passive force for stability rather than an active force for the reorganization of social life.

Big Industry. This has been bossed and kicked around by the Nazis to such an extent that it will emerge from the war spineless and unable to exert positive political influence until its equities and its markets have been clearly defined—by which time a lot of things will have happened. Its natural ally, finance, will be literally nonexistent.

Large Landowners. In default of an army and state machine to protect them, the large landowners will be a liability rather than an asset to conservatism, especially since they are largely situated in the northeast, closest to Soviet Russia, which supplies a historical example to peasants living on big estates.

Such are a few of the elements out of which a new Germany might be built after the collapse. They are not sufficient material on which to construct anything that could be recognized as the old German Reich. That is gone forever. For in between these scattered fragments of stability there will be one immense vacuum—the space left vacant by the old German state. That has already been destroyed by Hitler himself.

ALTERNATIVE TO CHAOS?

Before the final crack-up—before total German resistance faces total annihilation—the German Junker-led army will in all probability present itself to the world as the destined inheritor of the Prussian state. When defeat becomes certain, when the Nazi regime is clearly doomed, the army generals will say to the world—doubtless through puppet politicians—and say in all sincerity: "We are the only force left which can eliminate the Nazis and form a government to prevent collapse of the German state. We are the only great tradition which has held over from Frederick the Great, all through the Nazi hysteria. Make peace with us now, before we are completely disarmed, or expect all Europe to go down in ruins." The argument will carry weight with many loyal persons in the United Nations who honestly believe that military order in Central Europe is preferable to total disintegration.

But a peace with the German generals would be only a truce. War would break out again in time—have no doubt of that. And meanwhile Germany's victims throughout Europe would turn the continent into a hell. The United Nations would find themselves in a virtual alliance to protect Germany against the nations it has butchered. The deal cannot go through. The German army itself could not restore order in Central Europe. Hitler has destroyed too much of the old Germany to permit its ever again being pieced together. There is no alternative to the final destruction of the German power and the chaos which will follow.

That chaos, at the beginning, will be as complete as it will be inevitable. Just because the Germans are spiritually so dependent on authority they will be Europe's most furious anarchists when authority collapses. Besides the fragmentation of the German economic apparatus—and its bombed and worn-out factories, its shattered transportation system, its exhausted farming land, its valueless money—we must expect a bewildering fragmentation of its social and political loyalties. The German body politic will fall literally to pieces. Although the old states of the Reich will try to resume their local rule, they will not, in fact, be able to administer their own territories. Each city, in a mad scramble for available food and industrial materials, will become a law unto itself. Nor will the cities be able to maintain orderly government. They, too, will be riven with civil war and private murder as the people settle their scores with their Nazi oppressors. The units of local authority will more probably be such entities as church parishes, political party cells, hastily formed shop unions, district farmers' leagues, voluntary vigilante bands, improvised factional militias. And throughout the country will range wandering regiments of the former German army, which our forces will not yet have been able to disarm, looting and requisitioning, fighting one another in the name of some political gospel or slogan—the very substance of national anarchy.

THE FUTURE

The Wagnerian legend pictures Siegfried holding the broken pieces of his father's sword, facing the alternatives of patching it together or making a new weapon of it. He decides he must grind it to powder and from the steel-dust forge another and sturdier sword to protect him against the curse of the old gods.

When armistice day comes it will be too late to patch together the remnants of the Reich. Germany will have been shattered. But Germans, the fine steel-dust of Siegfried's sword, will remain. They, their proud municipalities, their stern religious loyalties, their ancient adherence to local tradition and state, will eventually be dependable elements for the making of the new federated Europe.

[What forms may evolve out of Germany's chaos will be the subject of articles to appear in forthcoming issues.]

Impasse in Puerto Rico

BY W. ADOLPHE ROBERTS

THE economic life of Puerto Rico is at a standstill, and starvation threatens a large part of the population. The situation has been brought to its present acute stage by the war, but its underlying causes must be sought in evil conditions that existed long prior to the war. The problem calls for realism, and for harmony among the various elements seeking a solution. Instead, we find confusion in Washington and political feuds dividing the island. The House Committee on Agriculture in the last Congress was actually persuaded by Bolívar Pagán, Puerto Rican Resident Commissioner, to tack on to a bill appropriating $15,000,000 to overcome the island's food shortage an amendment providing that none of the money could be used so long as Governor Tugwell remained in office. And last week the Senate Territories Committee approved a bill introduced by Senator Vandenberg to remove Tugwell from office. Before voting, the committee listened to a speech by Pagán in which Tugwell was accused of using the island as "a guinea pig for crazy experiments." But at least the fight has served to focus attention on the lamentable state of Puerto Rico.

Puerto Rico depends for income upon the exportation of sugar, its major crop, and of rum, tobacco, coffee, needlework, and fruits and vegetables. The United States takes 95 per cent of all exports, and in return the island imports from this country 40 per cent of its food, as well as almost everything else necessary to the life of its people. With the greater part of its arable land used for products for export, it cannot be self-sustaining. It long maintained a favorable, though diminishing, trade balance on paper, but that balance was always fictitious, for the lion's share of the profits from sugar and other industries went to capitalists in the United States.

Even before the war Puerto Ricans were desperately poor—the average income of a family was about $200 a year. The island is seriously overpopulated, and tens of thousands of adults of the present generation have never held a job or earned any money simply because the opportunities to do so were non-existent.

When the German submarine campaign got under way in the Atlantic and the Caribbean last winter, Puerto Rican commerce was paralyzed. Some of the larger boats carrying freight to and from the United States were taken over by the navy; others were sunk. Smaller, slower craft, usually without refrigeration, were substituted. The minimum shipping needed to serve the island was 56,512 tons a month, and the War Shipping Administration was promptly informed of this fact. But according to the recent report of the Chavez Senatorial committee, the administration "picked from the air the figure of 25,000 tons and set it as the minimum tonnage to be allocated to Puerto Rico." Even this was not maintained. In September, 1942, the tonnage which reached the island had dwindled to a little more than 3,000 tons. After that the situation improved slowly.

Today the warehouses are glutted with sugar which cannot be sent out of the country. It could be more safely stored if converted into syrup, but containers for this purpose are lacking. Nor are there bottles enough for the rum distilled. The needlework industry, which used to pay scandalously low wages and had been injured by the wage-and-hour law as well as by competition from China, is practically extinct. Coffee and tobacco, fruits and vegetables remain on the island for home consumption. But the supply of vegetables is so inadequate that the army has had to refrain from buying them in order to give civilians a chance.

Rice, the staple food of the masses, was almost all imported, and little has been received lately. The price has been fixed at eight cents a pound, an increase of two or three cents over normal prices. When a small quantity was put on the market, the supply was exhausted almost immediately in spite of rationing—usually two pounds to a person—by the storekeepers. The disappointed people rioted in several towns.

Potatoes have disappeared, except for a few very small tubers shipped in from Santo Domingo, which sell for twenty cents a pound. Macaroni and spaghetti are usually unobtainable. Meat is extremely scarce; the stockmen assert that they cannot afford to sell at the prices fixed by the government. Small quantities of beef, mutton, and pork from the Virgin Islands are bought by the rich at high prices. Lard has disappeared and vegetable substitutes are scarce. Olive oil sells at $4 to $5 a half-gallon. Small native eggs have found purchasers at $1.08 a dozen. In normal times very little milk is produced on the island. The demands of the armed forces have made inroads into the small supply, and a cattle disease has further diminished it. Stations for distributing evaporated milk to children under seven have been established, but the stocks are low.

So far, bread is plentiful, though the quality is poor. All flour is shipped in from the States, and preference appears to have been given this commodity. Butter, rarely obtainable, sells at a minimum fixed price of seventy-five cents a pound. String beans are sixteen cents, cabbage twenty-five and thirty, tomatoes twenty to thirty cents a pound, and lettuce twenty to twenty-five cents for a small head. Native standbys, such as plantains, yams, and yautia, which ought to be abundant in a tropical country, fail to meet Puerto Rico's needs, for land which should be in the hands of farmers has been swallowed up by the huge sugar estates. A plantain now brings a nickel in San Juan, a fantastic price according to old standards. It is difficult to imagine what the great mass of the population, always penniless and always undernourished, is eating today.

Because he foresaw these conditions, attempted to reform Puerto Rico's economy even before the outbreak of war, and is seeking a way to free the people permanently from want, Governor Tugwell has become the object of bitter attacks. His enemies in the United States call him a visionary with a lust for squandering the public funds. In Puerto Rico the case against him is much more concrete. Politicians are disturbed by the rise to power of the Popular Democratic Party which supports him, and the moneyed interests fear any prospect of economic changes; they are perfectly willing that the island should continue to produce mainly sugar while the immense majority of its inhabitants go hungry.

Shortly before we entered the war, a local program to stimulate subsistence farming was proposed. It was originally believed that the plan could be financed by the WPA, which still functions on a large scale in Puerto Rico, and this idea seems to have been encouraged by certain WPA officials. It turned out that regulations governing the relief agency made this impossible. After much valuable time had been lost in the attempt to obtain the help of the WPA, a bill appropriating money for the original purpose was introduced in Congress with the approval of Governor Tugwell. Defeated in one session, it was revived in 1942 only to be amended by Tugwell's enemies as described above.

In spite of some increased planting of crops under the guidance of the Insular Department of Agriculture, Puerto Rico's food problem, more than a year after we entered the war, is still unsolved. To extend the farming program, 18,000 tons of fertilizer are needed urgently, as well as a large quantity of seed. These would have to be imported from the States, and it is difficult to see how they can be brought in when every cubic foot of shipping space is needed for food.

The United States public may well ask how such an impasse could have developed and who is to blame for it. The situation is extremely complex. Rexford Guy Tugwell came to Puerto Rico under severe handicaps. His advocacy of the "five-hundred-acre law," which provides for the redistribution of land held by the sugar corporations, had made the wealthiest and most influential citizens his implacable enemies. The fact that he was named chancellor of the university as well as governor made a bad impression on other elements, an impression not wholly effaced by his early resignation of the chancellorship.

Tugwell assumed office just after the Popular Democratic Party, led by Luis Muñoz Marín, president of the Senate, had been victorious in the 1940 elections and was coming into full possession of the machinery of government. The Populares, as they are called, were in sympathy with his liberal ideas and with the New Deal. But they had drawn their strength from the masses, not from the educated white-collar class, and consequently provided Tugwell with little good material for public office. Moreover, they had won by a very narrow margin and were able to control the House only with the aid of the Unification Party, a collaboration which has often threatened to fail them. The election by island-wide vote of Bolívar Pagán as Resident Commissioner in Washington has enabled the Republican-Socialist coalition, Pagán's party, to claim that the Populares are not really a majority party and that Tugwell has no right to govern through them.

From the outset Tugwell has been ruthlessly criticized by the island's leading newspaper, El Mundo, nominally independent, and its English-language subsidiary, the World Journal. El Mundo's attacks have been echoed over the radio by important groups, including the Association of Farmers.

What have been the specific charges against the Governor? We may dismiss as sheer nonsense the statement that he caused a "wave of communistic terror," neither Communists nor terror being at all in evidence. The charge that he is the tool of Luis Muñoz Marín and the Populares scarcely deserves more attention. No American chief executive needs to be the tool of any Puerto Rican, and we may assume that Tugwell has allied himself with the Populares because he feels that they share his ideas regarding the future of the island and will help him to carry them out. To bear out the accusation that he is impractical and extravagant, much emphasis is placed on his previous record in public life. His opponents also argue that it is unwise to institute long-term experimental projects at this time, under the extremely difficult conditions caused by the war. A planning board set up by the legislature and approved by the Governor has been savagely attacked, especially for the appointments made to it—a young university professor as head at a salary of $8,000 and two other members at salaries of $6,000 each. This would seem to be one of the most valid criticisms of the Governor and the Populares, for although Puerto Rican economy has long needed planning and revision, an expensive project of this kind is hardly practical now. Moreover, the National Resources Planning Board has a regional office in Puerto Rico which costs the people nothing and appears to be doing a conscientious job.

Other grounds for the charge of extravagance are found in the acquisition by the insular government of several power companies and in the entire set-up of the so-called Water Resources Authority, a project dear to the Governor's heart. In this matter the Governor's critics are undoubtedly influenced by the antagonism to government ownership felt by all capitalists, enhanced by actual loss of profits. It should be pointed out that in the past utilities companies in Puerto Rico have charged high rates and given poor service. The Water Resources Authority has not been functioning long enough for one to know whether or not it has revolutionized things for the better. Cases brought against it by some of the power concerns are still being appealed.

The insular law taxing all incomes of $15.05 a week and up, just passed at a special legislative session, has been greeted with indignant protests. Since it is designed, however, to raise a fund for the relief of unemployment, it cannot be openly attacked by any political party. Certainly $15.05 is too little for any person with dependents to live on in Puerto Rico today. Yet had the tax been placed only on higher incomes, with the rate for those incomes necessarily greater, many persons now complaining would be still more outraged. Retroactive clauses in some tax bills passed by Popular Democratic votes and approved by the Governor have aroused resentment which it must be admitted is justified. The principle of retroactive taxation is a dangerous one at best. Property owners and business men in a country with a shattered economy cannot fail to be alarmed by it.

Governor Tugwell is charged with trying to establish a socialistic government in Puerto Rico and with suppressing civil liberties. Neither accusation seems well substantiated. The unwise and cumbersome ruling that all news from heads of departments and official sources must pass through the office of the Coordinator of Information at the palace lent some color to the charge of tyranny, but the idea did not originate with Tugwell, and the regulation, fortunately, has been abolished. Nothing the Governor has sponsored can really be called socialistic except in the broadest sense of the word. Government ownership of utilities and water resources is a commonplace in the world today. The distribution of sugar lands among the peasantry parallels agrarian reforms carried out in typically capitalist countries years ago. For that matter, the law restricting sugar-plantation holdings to 500 acres has been on the books, unenforced, for decades. It was adopted by an early American administration which was not inspired by any political theory but saw clearly that Puerto Rico, with its abnormally rising population, could not afford to allow the sugar people indefinitely to crowd out the cultivators of food crops. Tugwell and Muñoz are using simple arithmetic when they revive this law and insist that the distribution of land cannot wait for the end of the war. In 1899 the island's population was 953,243; in 1940 it was 1,869,255, having very nearly doubled in forty-one years.

Muñoz stated the other day that every head of a rural family was entitled to a minimum of a quarter-acre of land. He added, "If we can acquire 180,000 acres we can abolish the last remnants of the feudal system in ten years." Governor Tugwell is in hearty agreement, and if that makes him a socialist he is doubtless willing to be called one.

Rexford Guy Tugwell

The Jews of Europe

III. ALTERNATIVES TO ZION

BY PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN

THE struggle to save the Jews must be waged on several fronts. First, Hitlerism must be destroyed. Not a Jew is safe as long as that philosophy rules anywhere in the world. It cannot be confined within any borders; its anarchistic nihilism drives it perpetually toward aggression. It must dominate the world or be destroyed; there are no other possibilities.

When the war has been won, Jewish rights and property should be restored in all countries where restitution is possible. For example, in France, Holland, Belgium, and Norway, where relatively small Jewish populations genuinely enjoyed equal rights, there should be insistence upon immediate restoration of those rights and of property seized by the Nazis from the Jews. These countries are on the whole orderly and law-abiding. Written records and a sense of justice still abide among their peoples. Such of their Jews as survive the holocaust may hope, however scarred, to regain their former status.

In Central and Eastern Europe, where most of the Jews have lived, it must be insisted that at least the principle of equality for the Jews be accepted. This war will have no moral meaning if at its end any people are denied the rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness that others possess. The peace treaty should contain guarantees of human rights to Jews in all countries, and of minority rights in those East European countries where Jewish religion and culture can best be safeguarded by special provisions. There is no Jew, regardless of ideology, who will not work and fight for this principle: No good Christian, no genuine democrat can be content with less.

These rights, to have any meaning at all, must be protected by international police power. The unhappy experience of minorities from Versailles to Vichy demonstrates the emptiness of legal formulas without adequate machinery for enforcement and sanctions. The full safeguarding of minority rights is obviously bound up with the establishment of a superstate organization limiting the sovereignty of individual states. In the light of the recent intensification of nationalism in Russia, Great Britain, and the United States, the creation of a truly powerful league of nations may seem uncertain. But that minorities will be defenseless without it is very certain.

The principle of equal rights for all groups has been accepted by the various governments-in-exile. But what bearing does this really have on the Jewish problem in Central and Eastern Europe? Can the dignity and the security of Jews be defended by laws against anti-Semitism? Can police eradicate prejudice? Can international guarantees genuinely assure Jews of equality or contentment in countries where they are unwanted? How long would the United Nations be ready to provide soldiers to keep minorities where they are not welcome? Will not the historic question of the position of the Jew in Europe still confront us, regardless of the outcome of the war? And must we not measure our hopes and plans against the realities of Jewish life in Europe? Let us look closely at these realities.

We are compelled to note in the first place that Jews were guaranteed precisely similar rights by the Treaty of Versailles. In the Polish Minorities treaty of June 28, 1919, which served as the model for all others dealing with minorities, Poland undertook to grant "full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Poland without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race, or religion" (Article 2). But it was soon demonstrated that in the dislocated post-war economy this treaty could not protect Jews against the traditional anti-Semitism of the Polish masses streaming to the cities or against the resentment of the rising Polish bourgeoisie with whom the Jews were in competition. Every Polish government was compelled to make concessions to Jew-baiting. They did not formally repudiate their obligations; they simply evaded them. The law restricting the Jewish religious slaughtering of animals was a clear illustration. Under the guise of humanitarianism a decree was enacted which was designed to drive Jews from their important position in the meat trade. Until that time 30 per cent of the butchers of Poland were Jews. The motives of the anti-Semites were made perfectly plain when their spokesman, Dudzinski, said in the parliamentary debate, "We desire to plunge a knife into the vital nerve of Polish Jewry and to make their lives unbearable." No treaty could prevent Vice-President Miedzinski from publicly proposing in the Polish Sejm in 1937 that all but fifty thousand of Poland's three million Jews emigrate from the country.

There is one way by which laws protecting the rights of Jews might be enforced, as was indicated by Sir Archibald Sinclair, leader of the British Liberal Party, in his reply to a Jewish delegation: "When the war is over we shall see to it that equal rights are promised to you in every constitution in Europe. But there is only one way to guarantee that this promise is carried out—to station British troops in every country and to have them intervene wherever the promise to you is broken." It was obvious that Sir Archibald saw no possibility of such a course and was merely emphasizing the fact that paper promises are worthless if they run contrary to the wishes of the population.

With the steady deterioration of the Jewish position since Versailles clearly before us, we shall be not only naive but criminal to act on the assumption that another peace treaty, another blueprint for a new world order, will solve the Jewish problem in Europe. Such a treaty will help toward the solution only if it is supported by the will of the various peoples. Let us look at the prospects in countries with large Jewish populations, like Germany, Poland, Hungary, and Rumania.

In Germany who will supersede the Nazis? Will it be Otto Strasser, founder of the Free German movement and Hitler's Enemy No. 1? He insists in his recent book, "The Prussian Eagle over Germany," that in his new order the Jews may not acquire German citizenship, must be subject to alien legislation, and may not marry non-Jews. Will it be the Junkers? They are traditionally anti-Semitic out of snobbishness. Will it be the middle class? They fear the competition of Jews. Or will it be the youth of Germany, the most troublesome group confronting the Western world? How can the other nations live in peace with a generation utterly corrupted by Nazi unscrupulousness and ruthlessness?

Since September 1, 1939, the attitude of the Poles toward the Jews has somewhat improved. I have spoken to Polish leaders who expressed genuine gratitude for the loyalty and courage of the Jews in resisting the Nazi invasion. The Polish Premier Sikorski has promised the Jews equal rights. But after the war, as vast numbers of men again seek some foothold in a shaky economy, there will be a bitter struggle for survival. The Jews will find themselves as always in the most insecure interstices of the economic order. The Polish peasants have remained on their land; more than 80 per cent of the Jews have been dislodged from their homes. The Polish workers will be able to return to their factories, the lumbermen to their forests, the miners to their mines. But the Jews had been forced by history into the petty bourgeoisie. They have no roots in the soil of Poland, no abiding stake in its economy.

The Nazi conquerors have given more than 90 per cent of all convertible Jewish enterprises to Poles. In view of the deliberate squeezing of the Jews out of Poland's economy before the war, in view of the fierce competition for a livelihood which will follow the war, can we hope that these enterprises will be returned to Jews after the war, or that Jewish youth will be permitted to enter the professions on an equal basis? Moreover, signs of virulent anti-Semitism, now partially submerged in the universal misery, are not lacking. Polish anti-Semites, it is reported from London, have formed a bloc of three parties within the Polish National Council to oppose Premier Sikorski's liberal policies. This is an outward manifestation of the fact that the Jews will have to continue to live with their historical problem in Poland, that their status will be at best the subject of continued acrimonious debate.

The prospect in Hungary is hardly brighter. As if to warn Jews not to hope for any betterment in the post-war world, Prime Minister Nicholas von Kallay solemnly stated in the Hungarian Parliament, "Never again will the Jews of Hungary be able to own land."

In Rumania the situation is even worse than in Poland. The Poles at least see that the Jews stand at their side in resisting the Nazis. Rumania, however, has lined up with the Nazis, and Rumanian leaders know that the Jews wish and work for the downfall of their allies. If Jews who fought loyally for Germany were accused of the "stab in the back" after the last war, what will they be blamed for after this?

The whole tragedy of European Jewry was made clearer to me by one experience in Rumania than by all these larger political considerations. In the summer of 1930 I went with Eugene Kovacs, Bucharest correspondent of the New York Times, to Balaceano, a little village in the north where there had been a pogrom. We found a community of thirty-five Jewish families that had been left desolate by hate-maddened peasants. Most of the Jewish men had been beaten physically; limbs were broken, heads were split open. Their homes had been smashed, their shops looted, their synagogues desecrated. The primary cause of the pogrom was economic. Abundant crops throughout the world that summer had forced down the price of Rumanian wheat. The peasants could not pay the debts incurred during the winter to the Jewish merchants and bankers. Frustration produced fury—and a pogrom followed. Every important agency of Rumanian life encouraged, condoned, or participated in the attacks. The signal for the outbreak came from the belfry of the village church. The schoolmaster led the rioters. The police conveniently disappeared from the village. The government refused to send troops to keep order. The women and children joined the men in the rioting and looting. The next day I saw the aftermath of the pogrom and spoke with the victims. As long as I live nothing can convince me that Jews will ever be able to live a normal, self-respecting life in Balaceano. They were utterly resigned to the idea that as this had happened to them innumerable times before, it would be their fate also in the future.

The tragic conclusion forced on the realistic observer is that for most of the Jews of Europe the continent is a vast Balaceano. Unutterably miserable, clearly unwanted, rootless, hopeless, they are driven about like the last dying leaves before the chill winds of winter. There is nothing on the European horizon to which they may look with hope. The trend toward economic statism is against them. For whereas Jews might hope to survive in an economy of free competition, in Poland for example, their experience has taught them that state control is invariably employed in anti-Semitic countries as a device to eliminate the Jews. Nor have they heard adequate words of encouragement from the leaders of the governments-in-exile. Some governments have promised equal rights to Jews after the war, but there have been no specific promises on which to base the hope that the expelled Jews will be welcomed home again. I have yet to meet a single German Jewish émigré who wishes to return to Germany. One fine woman said to me, "Now that the Nazis have built a garage on the little Jewish cemetery where my parents were buried, I have nothing, not even their ashes, to return to."

The most saddening aspect of this situation is that it is not an aberration but the logical culmination of the whole history of the Jews in Europe. Of course the fanaticism of Hitler has given a special virulence to the current phase, but even he was the product, not the cause, of German anti-Semitism.

The Jewish problem in Europe, then, has existed so long, is so profound, so stubborn, that it must be accepted as it is. If the Jews had adopted Christianity, they would not have remained the one enduring dissenting, unpopular minority in Europe. But they remained Jews. If they had not been excluded by the church from normal economic pursuits, social activities, and civil rights they would not have developed those special characteristics which irritate some non-Jews. Perhaps if the nations had been richer in resources and less densely populated, and had developed policies making for peace and the free flow of commerce, the Jews might have been more secure. But Europe was poor, overcrowded, Balkanized, always ready to welcome war or persecution as a diversion from its unsolved problems, and the Jews were the handiest scapegoats.

A gifted people that is capable in freedom of being great and giving much is doomed in Europe to pogroms, degradation, fear, and the blocking of their creative energies. Their only hope lies in mass migration. But where shall they go? Let us examine briefly various possibilities for the mass resettlement of Jews.

Alaska. When the King-Havener bill to open Alaska for refugee settlement was introduced in the United States Senate in 1940, it was so vehemently opposed by the Alaska delegate to Congress, Anthony Dimond, by Colonel John Thomas Taylor of the American Legion, and by Senators Reynolds, Bone, and others that it was allowed to die a quiet death. Many Jews also were opposed to it because it contained discriminatory clauses designed to prevent these refugees from entering the United States on the same basis as other inhabitants of Alaska.

Argentina. On October 12, 1942, a mob of 18,000 persons attended an anti-Semitic, anti-American mass-meeting in Buenos Aires and cheered wildly when General Molina attacked the Jews, the Communists, and the United States. Even if a considerable number of European Jews were admitted by Argentina, which is most improbable, they would obviously make a delicate situation worse and would soon find themselves in the same difficulties that had compelled them to flee Europe.

Australia. This is a vast, sparsely populated continent. But when it was suggested as a haven for Jews at the Evian Intergovernmental Refugee Conference, the Australian delegate replied, "Gentlemen, we in Australia have no racial problem, thank God, and we do not intend to have one started."

Biro-Bidjan. The role that Soviet Russia will play on the European continent after the war is at this moment unpredictable. It depends on how long the war lasts, on whether Russia will be exhausted by the prolonged struggle, on whether armies of Great Britain and the United States can successfully invade Germany, on which German groups, left, right, or center, emerge strong from the struggle, and on many other considerations. But there is little reason to hope that the national project at Biro-Bidjan which the Soviets established for the Jews will make a substantial contribution to the solution of the problem. After six years of energetic promotion by the government, only 19,635 Jews had settled in this Siberian outpost. Subsequently it was found that 11,450, or 58.4 per cent, had departed from the colony. In recent years more Jews have left Biro-Bidjan than have settled in it. Nevertheless, the Soviet government steadily refuses to admit non-Russian Jews to it, and no change in this policy can be expected.

Bolivia. On September 22, 1942, the Bolivian Chamber of Deputies approved a statute barring Jews specifically from immigration to their country. Although final disposition of this legislation is still unsettled, it leaves no doubt as to the attitude of the nation's leaders.

Dominican Republic. General Trujillo, President of the republic, announced in 1939 his willingness to permit 100,000 selected refugees to enter his country, and shortly thereafter a promising experiment was begun at Sosua. The Brookings Institution has recently issued a report which states that fewer than 500 persons have entered the colony and that it is already overcrowded. Investigation has revealed that the maximum number of refugees who could be absorbed in Santo Domingo is 5,000, not 100,000. Furthermore, the process of absorption in a country of this type must be slow and gradual, whereas the need at the war's end will be for the swift admittance of large numbers.

Madagascar. It was reported that Hitler had selected Madagascar as a dumping place for Jews before he decided to liquidate them. That this island is highly unsuited to the mass settlement of Jews was made plain by its Governor General, Léon Cayla: "It would be difficult to settle European workers in Madagascar because the demands of the native workers are very modest and competition by the immigrants would be impossible. As to agricultural possibilities, the only suitable region with regard to climate where European families could be settled would be the upper plateau, but free land is no longer available there."

Mexico. Mass immigration from European countries is now barred by regulations issued on December 17, 1942. Jews were bitterly attacked by rightists in the debates in the Chamber of Deputies which preceded this action. One of the most influential men in Mexico, not an anti-Semite, recently told a friend of mine that no more Jews could be admitted, for any immigration would be exploited by the powerful anti-democratic, anti-Semitic forces to overthrow the government.

United States. Although no post-war policies regarding immigration have yet been announced, there are indications that any large-scale influx would be contrary to the wishes of the American people. Congress recently refused the President the war powers he requested for fear he would use them to admit a number of refugee technical advisers. The American Legion at its September, 1942, convention approved resolutions to bar all immigration after the war. Let the United States, it demanded, provide jobs for its own returning war veterans "before we start trying to solve the world's unemployment problems." Although this is neither good humanitarianism nor sound economics—recent immigrants have added to American wealth by contributing new skills and ideas to the nation's economy—it is shrewd politics. With millions of men returning to a shrinking economy after the war, there will be no disposition to welcome large-scale immigration from Europe. Even some Jews—not this writer—would oppose it for fear of arousing anti-Semitism.

These, then, are the realities. I do not suggest that they be accepted as final. Every effort should be made to effect a liberalization of immigration policies. An agreement among all Western nations, or among all the countries in this hemisphere, to accept a reasonable number of refugees of all faiths would impose no hardship on any one of them. The economic reeducation and redistribution of the surviving Jews might enable them to adjust themselves better to industry and agriculture either in Europe or their new homes. A generous, practical, far-reaching program for the economic reconstruction of Europe will certainly improve the lot of the Jews. Finally, every man of enlightenment, every agency of good-will must continue to act on the assumption that the minds of men can be educated, that their conduct can be improved, that this welter of blood and hate is not the ultimate fate of mankind. The Zionist solution, to which I shall devote my concluding article, should not, and in fact does not, exclude these other possibilities for ameliorating the condition of the Jews. It does bring to the solution of the Jewish problem in Europe a realism, a boldness of imagination, a constructive statesmanship which alone are equal to its magnitude and its persistence.

[The concluding article of Dr. Bernstein's series will appear in our next issue.]

In the Wind

IN THE LETTER COLUMNS of the Goshen, New York, Democrat and Independent Republican, a reader of that journal contributes his bit to war morale: "Because official Washington has become the antithesis of everything that is hateful in American government is no reason for the American people to give up the fight."

BY WAY OF THE MADRID RADIO comes word that a large party of German "ski-experts" has arrived in Spain to instruct the inhabitants of that sunny land in the technique of the Arctic sport.

A MUSICAL REVUE by members of the Louisville Central Labor Union is packing 'em in two nights a week at the recreation hall of Bowman Field, Kentucky, an army air training base. Previous entertainments had never drawn much of a crowd. The union troupe now has invitations from Fort Knox and U. S. O. centers in the Louisville area.

CHILE RECENTLY experienced a spy scare when a series of personal notices addressed to "Charlie" appeared in newspapers throughout the country. Investigation showed they were "teaser" ads for the movie "Charlie's Aunt."

THURMAN W. ARNOLD explained the government's side of the coming anti-trust suit against the Associated Press at a recent meeting of the International Executive Board of the American Newspaper Guild in New York. It was strictly off the record, but Editor and Publisher came out with an accurate summary a few days later.

THE MAGAZINE Free World is being microfilmed each month and sent to India by the OWI.

THE CATHOLIC LEGION OF DECENCY has made no statement as yet on the case of Donald Gordon, a versatile journalist who was recently discovered to be editor of both the Catholic International, a religious monthly, and Top Kick, a magazine of smutty cartoons for soldier consumption. Formerly an editor of two publications banned from the mails on grounds of obscenity, Gordon has made the Catholic International more brazenly anti-Semitic than Social Justice ever dared to be.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

Fascism Without Mussolini

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

IT WAS a great relief to learn that Elmer Davis, director of the Office of War Information, does not expect open revolt in Italy against the Nazi overlords. Any sensible person must realize that until the British and American armed forces smash the Nazi-Fascist military machine, a revolution cannot be anticipated in any of the Nazi-controlled countries. Unorganized and unarmed people cannot start revolutions against governments provided with machine-guns, artillery, airplanes, radio, telephones, and all the means of transportation. Nobody insists that the French, the Belgians, the Dutch, the Norwegians, or the Danes should revolt against their Nazi masters. Only the Italians are called upon to stage a revolution—as if they were better provided with the essential means of warfare than other countries. This doubtful privilege has been bestowed upon them solely because British and American armed forces may attempt a landing in Italy, and an Italian revolution at the right moment would be a godsend.

But in rejecting the prospect of an Italian revolution before a military breakdown occurs, Mr. Davis should not also discard the expectation of revolutionary upheaval after the Fascists' military power has begun to crumble.

In Italy today people can be divided roughly into three groups: (1) a small but organized and armed pro-Nazi minority, buttressed by Nazi troops and the Nazi Gestapo; (2) an anti-Fascist minority, larger than the first but unorganized and unarmed, ready to come forward at the first opportunity; and (3) the "masses," suffering from malnutrition, dejected, desperate, in a state described by John O. Crane in the New York Times as "political coma." Men and women who go to bed starving and wake up not knowing where to find food for their children do not start revolutions. Revolutions are not launched by masses anyway, but by aggressive minorities. The masses follow.

While there is no doubt that Italy swarms with underground revolutionary cells of every political color, nobody can guarantee that a revolution will really be attempted when the Fascist military structure collapses as a consequence of military defeat. Much that has happened in the world since June, 1940, could never have been predicted. Revolutions no less than battles often depend on fortuitous circumstances: news late in arriving; a man standing at a door, breaking in; the door happens to open; a corporal's toothache. If there had been a man like Lenin in Berlin at the time of the German collapse in November, 1918, or in Rome after Matteotti's murder in June, 1924, history would have taken a different turn, though nobody can say in what direction. However, one can still express wishes and hopes which are reasonable under existing conditions, and state what should be done to govern events as far as is humanly possible.

As reported by the New York press, Mr. Davis said: "There is no sign of an active group [in Italy] which could organize real resistance, and we are not encouraging it." He would have come closer to the facts had he stated that the State Department and the Office of War Information not only are giving no encouragement to any groups which might organize resistance, but are actually doing everything in their power to discourage such action. Since they cannot rely upon a revolution in Italy before British and American armed intervention has smashed the Fascist military machine, and since a later revolution would serve no military purpose, they are not interested in anti-Fascist revolution. Further, they do not intend to have any such nuisance. According to the American Plan for a Reorganized World described in the American Mercury for November, 1942, one of the American aims is to "prevent revolution from developing in the defeated countries." It appears that Article 3 of the Atlantic Charter, which pledged Britain and America to "respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live," is to be interpreted as meaning that they will be allowed to choose only forms of government like those of Franco in Spain or of Pétain in France, or such as "Otto of Austria" would set up somewhere in Central Europe.

As for Italy, the theory that "one man and one man alone" is responsible for the present war between Italy and the United Nations enables us to understand why the King of Italy, quintessence of "legitimacy," is consistently ignored in the short-wave broadcasts to Italy from America. "This government," Mr. Davis said, "is not broadcasting personal attacks upon King Victor Emmanuel." He might have added that anyone addressing the Italians on an American broadcasting station must pledge himself not to remind them that the King is as responsible as Mussolini for the tragedy of present-day Italy. And an army of newspapermen is instructed by the State Department to teach us, day in and day out, that if not the King then at least his son is to be regarded as the "leader of the anti-Fascist groups"; or perhaps the Crown Prince's wife, or the King's cousin the Count of Turin—since unfortunately the Duke of Aosta is no longer alive—or Badoglio, or Grandi, or Mussolini's son-in-law, Ciano; even Caviglia and Orlando, eighty and eighty-two years old, respectively, are dragged out of the attic and dusted off for our delectation. Graziani, too, has been put back in circulation as a possible successor of Mussolini, the sadist Graziani who in Cyrenaica dropped native chieftains from airplanes to smash on the ground below.

It may be that the names of all these prospective opponents of Mussolini's are disclosed in order to sow mistrust and suspicion between them and Mussolini and thus make the situation in Italy more confused. If this is so, it indicates a failure to realize that any eventual advantage is outweighed by important disadvantages. For twenty years most of these possible "successors" have been indispensable accessories to Mussolini's crimes. If they ever thought of breaking away from Mussolini, they would be fools indeed to do so now. The fear of revolution which blinds the leaders of the "liberty-loving" peoples makes the lot of Fascists a comfortable one everywhere in the world.

Sir Gerald Campbell, special assistant to Viscount Halifax, has told us that "although Italy may wish to withdraw from the war, the country has no leader with whom the United Nations might negotiate," and he has expressed the hope that "such a leader will arise" (New York Herald Tribune, November 7, 1942). Sir Gerald well knows that while under a free constitution the opposition always has a leader, under a dictatorship any leader or possible leader would be dispatched to the next world as soon as he appeared. Matteotti experienced this fate. Summoning Italy to produce a leader now—because Sir Gerald needs one to negotiate with—is a joke, if he is to be sought among those who have fought fascism these twenty years while British Foreign Ministers were traveling to Rome to do business with Mussolini. Leaders to supplant Mussolini cannot appear before the breakdown of the Fascist regime; they will rise up then from among those who are on the spot. Actually, what Sir Gerald wishes is to negotiate with someone who was among Mussolini's henchmen during those happy years. Signor Grandi, who was so popular with the Cliveden set when he was Mussolini's ambassador to Great Britain, might do. But no revolution in Italy, for heaven's sake!

While serenades are being sung under the windows of every available pro-fascist "leader" in Italy, Assistant Secretary Berle, in his address of November 11, exhorts the Italians to "drive out the traitors and foreigners who have led Italy to the rim of destruction," and reminds them that "freedom is not a gift, it is an achievement; you have to attain it yourselves." At last someone has referred to "traitors" in the plural and not to "one man and one man alone," and has told the Italians that they have duties to perform for themselves rather than for Great Britain and the United States. If it is absurd to incite the Italians to revolt before America and Britain have shattered the Axis, it is good sense to tell them that they will deserve no consideration if they do not win their own liberty by revolting when the Fascist military might collapses. But how can the Italians reconcile Mr. Berle's exhortations to revolt with Sir Gerald Campbell's search for a "leader"?

To be sure, nobody in his senses should expect American and British armies of occupation to start or to support revolutionary movements in any of the defeated countries. Their task will be to demolish the Nazi and Fascist military machines. What will happen while this is going on nobody can tell. As far as Italy is concerned, if I were in the habit of breakfasting daily with Almighty God—a privilege enjoyed by Viscount Halifax alone—I should advise Him to leave Mussolini, the King, and their associates in their places until the moment they sign the armistice; at that point, while the British and Americans are engrossed in immediate military tasks, He should stir up the anti-Fascist underground groups to make short work of Mussolini, the King, the Crown Prince, Badoglio, Grandi, Ciano, and their like. Then Sir Gerald Campbell would find no "leaders" with whom to negotiate except those who had formed the Provisional Government of the Italian Democratic Republic. After that order should be restored; that is, the armies of occupation should prevent any irresponsible extremist clique from seizing power, and the people should be given time to organize themselves again into political parties, to discuss the issues before them, and finally to choose their own new government. This would be the right course; and the United States, in pursuing it, would not only remain loyal to its traditions but would gain the love and gratitude of all peoples.

Sikorski's Opposition

BY PETER DAVENPORT

THE recent visit of the Polish Prime Minister, General Wladislaw Sikorski, to the United States has brought into the open his differences with his rightist opposition. The main issue is Polish policy toward the Soviet Union. Seeking to establish a policy which would be in line with Allied political and military strategy, General Sikorski has signed an understanding with Stalin and initiated collaboration between the two Slavic nations. And with this new relationship established, the Polish government in London has organized a large army on Soviet soil and in the countries of the Middle East.

Sikorski's action aroused immediate and violent opposition among the old reactionaries of the "League of Colonels" that ruled Poland after the last war. Two adherents of the league withdrew from the Cabinet after the Sikorski-Stalin understanding. Soon an anti-Sikorski movement was organized in the United States under the leadership of Ignacy Matuszewski, former Polish Minister of Finance, aided by V. Jedrzejewicz, another reactionary. Although it has not succeeded in enlisting any considerable number of Polish Americans, the movement has been very aggressive and created serious disturbances among the immigrant population of large industrial centers. M. F. Wegrzinek, a Polish American importer and publisher of the Polish-language daily, Nowy Swiat, of New York, has been won over, and Wegrzinek's paper now carries editorials directed against the Soviets, Sikorski, and Czecho-Slovakia. Direction of the movement has been placed in the hands of a National Committee of Americans of Polish Descent, under the presidency of Wegrzinek. The committee has an official organ, Biuletyn Organizacyjny.

The activities of the faction led by Matuszewski and Wegrzinek not only create confusion and antagonisms among the Poles in America but through the international alliances of the clique may actually work against the unity of the United Nations. The movement was at first closely connected with the so-called "Independent Hungary" movement of Tibor Eckhardt. Wegrzinek, publisher of the Nowy Swiat, was, and possibly still is, also the publisher of the Hungarian daily Amerikai Magyar Nepszava, the mouthpiece of Eckhardt's movement; both papers have the same mailing address. The Nepszava has followed a policy similar to that of the Nowy Swiat and published numerous attacks on Czecho-Slovakia and Rumania. For years an exponent of Horthy's regime and an ally of Nazi Germany, it opposes a democratic solution of the Central European problem. The collaboration between the Polish and Hungarian groups was very visible until the democratic Hungarian movement of Rustem Vambery fought Eckhardt to a standstill.

Worthy of mention also is the link that exists between Matuszewski and representatives of the "Greater Serbia" movement which for some time has been fomenting dissensions among Yugoslav Americans. This movement is outspokenly anti-Croat and anti-democratic and seeks to break up the unified Yugoslav state. It is formally organized in the Serbian National Defense, of Chicago, and its organ is the Pittsburgh American Srbobran, a Serbian-language paper written in the vein of the Nepszava and the Nowy Swiat.

Serving as a bridge between Matuszewski and the "Greater Serbia" group are some left-overs of Colonel Beck's diplomacy on one side and some Yugoslav diplomats on the other side. Active in this "exchange of thought" is one Edward Weinthal, now on the pay roll of the Yugoslav Ambassador, Constantin Fotich.

Of late Matuszewski has been going outside his own territory and taking a more than active "interest" in Yugoslav affairs. The Nowy Swiat recently printed an article of his in defense of General Draja Mihailovich. He partly repeated his arguments in a letter to the New York Times, which contained the following interesting passage: "The Polish, Lithuanian, Latvian, Estonian, and Serbian laborers and farmers cannot view the Russian experiment with the complacency of a Mr. Lamont." For this Matuszewski was rewarded by the Srbobran in its issue of January 4. In a discussion of the independence of Albania, that paper cast doubt on the intentions of the Soviets and reopened the question of the Polish-Soviet frontier.

Drawing by Hoffmeister

Watch Spanish Morocco!

MY NAME does not matter. That is to say it would be of interest only to the leader of the Phalanx in my native village, and he might find in it a pretext to proceed against my more remote relatives who still live there. The nearer ones have already spent three years in prison. But what does matter, since I am going to speak about military things, is my profession. I am a lieutenant of Carabineros, formerly with the Spanish Loyalist army. After the end of the war, like other men who had not been conspicuous in parties or organizations, I could disappear in the great mass of former Loyalist fighters—but of course on the condition that I should not go back to my native village. In Spain, under Franco, the terror may be very great, but the disorganization is still greater. The police work well only when directed by the Gestapo. Left to themselves they act in most contradictory ways, and if it is true that one cannot allow oneself to express out loud one's opinion of the regime, it is no less true that occasionally one can move from one corner of Spain to the other carrying on intense anti-fascist activities.

I think I am one of the last Republicans to come from Spain to the United States. Anyhow, I am one of the few to have come from Spanish Morocco after the landing of the Americans in Africa. I left Ceuta November 21, 1942. The previous weeks I had been in Gijon, Bilbao, Motril, and Málaga. When I left Ceuta, five days had elapsed since the publication of the decree ordering the partial mobilization of the Spanish forces. During those five days people talked about nothing except the entrance of Spain into the war. Everybody talked about it—military and civilians. In the coffee-houses frequented by the officers; in the popular bars; in the lobbies of the movie houses; in the markets. Consternation was general among the civil population. Opposition to Spain's coming in on the side of the Axis was enormous. No date was named. Some officers said: "Around next March, when the American and British decide to open the second front. Then the counter-move will start here. Hitler will try to attack from Spanish Morocco. Then we'll find ourselves dragged in." In this sort of talk there was no joy, no enthusiasm; it was discussed as something fatal and unavoidable.

People felt the same in Ceuta as in Gijon or in Bilbao or in Málaga. Everywhere the people are against the Nazis. And maybe some of the officers are, too. Nevertheless, our American friends should not rely too much on this state of mind. If the army of Morocco receives the order to attack, it will attack. And the army of Morocco is no joke. I don't read English myself, but some Spanish friends in New York tell me that when the papers here speak of the Spanish army in Morocco, they put it at 150,000 or 200,000 men. Well, that may have been right some months ago. When I left Ceuta, the best-informed people spoke of half a million men. I have not counted them. But I saw with my own eyes the endless lines of camiones full of war material moving through the streets of Málaga, and all this was for Morocco.

Ceuta is very strongly fortified, and it is full of Germans. Not a single one of them in uniform, but it is only necessary to see them walk along the street or go into a cafe to recognize them. Probably many of them are not soldiers, but Gestapo men or agitators. I don't know who was the *tío alemán who many years ago spoke of "the Spanish fly on the neck of France," but now one might speak of "the Spanish fly on the neck of the Americans." Those Germans in Ceuta, they have not crossed the Straits for nothing.

The signs of military action are not restricted to the south or to Spanish Morocco. At the same time they are fortifying the Atlantic coast [of Spain]. Probably, in case something goes wrong in Spanish Morocco, to prevent a British landing in the northwest. On November 2, also in 1942, I was sitting in a coffee-house on the Calle de Oria in Gijon when I saw passing by more than twenty camiones carrying artillery intended for the coastal fortifications. New airfields have lately been built. The most recent and most important one, at Aguño de Ribeira, dominates the Galician coast at its vital points.

For all this work of fortification, and for the construction and repair of military roads, the batallones disciplinarios are used. It seems that in New York stories have been published about several amnesties during the past year. It is the truth. Many people have been released from the prisons—but only to be put into these disciplinary battalions. The Franco regime is convinced that it pays better to use the prisoners for building fortifications than to have them shot or keep them locked up.

They may hope also, in the same way, by sending several thousand peasants back to the land, to get a better harvest next summer. All the wheat brought from Argentina is not enough to reduce the famine. Prices soar to the clouds. One kilo of dried beans costs thirteen or fourteen pesetas, and wages have not gone up; the average daily wage is eight and one-half pesetas. Not to speak of the price of clothes and other needed things. For the shoes I'm wearing I paid 104 pesetas—and they are bad enough. For this suit, 750 pesetas. If everything is so fantastically expensive, it is also partly due to the black market. It is scandalous, the extent of the black market in Spain today, and the greatest robbers are the Phalanx "purifiers."

Three years after the war the fighting spirit of the people has not diminished. The guerrilleros have only been reduced in the proportion that they have been killed, and some others have even taken the places of the dead. While I was in Gijon, the bus from Gijon to Sama that carried the money to pay the workers in the mines was attacked by guerrilleros who took food and more than a million pesetas and killed four civil guards.

* Literally "German uncle," or more freely, "big guy." He is referring, of course, to Bismarck.

It is the discontent and opposition to the entrance of Spain into the war on the side of Hitler that makes the situation in Spain potentially so favorable for the Allies. If the Allies only use it! With 5,000 men I could take all of Galicia. To organize an army of 1,000,000 men in Spain to fight the Nazis would be the easiest thing in the world. But if the Americans go on putting their trust in Franco, they will have a rude awakening some day.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

ON JANUARY 14 Dr. Joseph Goebbels, after remaining on the defensive for some time, suddenly took the offensive. In the weekly article which he writes for his own paper—and which is reprinted throughout the country, read aloud from all radio stations, and referred to for days afterward—he launched one of the most furious attacks he has ever been known to make. The object of the attack was the enemy within.

Usually when Goebbels lets loose against enemies within, he does not define them very precisely. But this time he was fairly clear. "For the most part they call themselves conservatives," he said. And he quoted one of their characteristic remarks: "Pfui, how ordinary! The Nazis learned that from the Bolsheviks." It was plain that he was attacking the so-called "best people." He went on to picture their behavior as bordering closely on treason. "They couldn't go much farther if they were paid by the English."

What have these people done? Of what are they accused? Herr Goebbels brings a twofold charge against them: their mentality and their manner of living are both offensive. "They are completely unreliable. Continually looking for variety in their meals and amusements, they are just as changeable in their likes and dislikes, their ideas and opinions." "Their hearts and minds are absolutely empty. They are not worthy of living in these stirring times, for they are incapable of understanding them." "They are the ones who complain most bitterly about the war."

As for their manner of life, "They still stand aside from the problems and trials of the war." "Because honest, hard-working people give up their leaves, these idlers and parasites take longer vacations. They crowd the trains and lounge in winter resorts; they babble about the latest scandal, lament that dancing is not allowed, and eat up the peasants' butter and sausage." "They do nothing, are good for nothing." "They are plain lazy and unprincipled."

Such is the charge. What is the lesson? What message has Goebbels, the man of the people, for these persons "who call themselves conservatives"? About their mentality he seems to feel helpless. He contents himself with asserting that as a class they have no importance and the English can hope for little from them. "I know that the London propagandists will wind themselves around my utterance like ivy around the oak, but if London sees in this corrupt group an 'opposition to the war,' it does them too much honor." "They form only a small fraction of our people."

Their manner of life, however, must be changed. "Nobody has a right to withdraw from the war effort to further his private interests. In former times, perhaps, part of the people could wage war while the others looked on. Now such a division is intolerable; it angers the whole people. . . . All who wish some day to enjoy the fruits of victory must submit to the compulsions of the war. The leadership must mobilize all the nation's reserves. Anyone who refuses to do his share simply prolongs the war; if he does not cooperate willingly, he must be compelled to. We do not believe that any honest patriot will object to that. And so, let's go all-out." What, specifically, he meant by going all-out, Dr. Goebbels did not say.

What lay behind this outburst? Certainly it confirms the known fact that the "best people" in Germany are thoroughly sick of the war. But that alone would not have driven Goebbels to such violent recriminations. Normally it is not good propaganda to trumpet forth the fact that any kind of opposition to the war exists.

A cardinal Nazi principle was invoked here—one to which Goebbels gave classic form in his volume of memoirs. In 1932, he relates, the party found itself temporarily in a critical position. Goebbels thereupon said to Hitler, "We must get closer to the people. We must talk to them in their own plain speech." And he promptly started a turbulent campaign against the "barons," as the expression went at that time. Now a campaign has been started against the people "who call themselves conservatives." At critical moments Man-of-the-People Goebbels can always make good use of the class struggle.

In this instance he had an added motive in attacking a limited group. It appears from a talk given by General Dittmar several days earlier—other sources confirm this—that extreme measures had had to be taken on the civilian front: there have been new strict regulations and an excessive number of arrests. Goebbels, clearly, is trying to make these measures more palatable by conveying the impression that they are chiefly directed against "idlers and parasites" and those "who lounge in winter resorts." They are really all-out measures against everybody, but they will be less unpopular if they are presented as an all-out attack upon a small group.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE ANTROBUSES AND THE EARWICKERS

BY EDMUND WILSON

THE Saturday Review of Literature of December 19, 1942, published an article by Joseph Campbell and Henry Morton Robinson asserting that Thornton Wilder's play "The Skin of Our Teeth" derived from James Joyce's "Finnegans Wake." At the time this article appeared I had been concocting the following little parody, based on Book I, Chapter 6, of Joyce's book, which I was intending to send to Wilder. I did not send it because the Saturday Review article would have taken the edge off the joke; but since the assertions of Messrs. Campbell and Robinson have been rather widely questioned, I am producing it in corroboration:

"What pyrrhotechnical edent and end of the whirled in comet stirp (a) brings dionysaurus to Boredway yet manages to remain good bronx orpheus; (b) gave Jed horrors but made Mike meyerbold; (c) was voted a tallulahpalooza and trumpet allakazan by the waitups of the dramatrical dimout; (d) stamps them bump, backs them bim, oils them in the bowels and rowels them in the aisles, causes them to keep buckups and sends them hope sobhappy; (e) adds a dash of the commedia dead-hearty and a flicker of Fleerandello to the whoopfs of hellzapiaffin; sidesteps coprofoolya but seminatees heimatophilia; (g!) translinitates polyglint prosemetics into plain symbol words of one syrupull; (h---!!) disinfects Anna Livia and americanizes H. C. Earwicker?

"Answer: Skfinnegone Sleek."

The Messrs. Campbell and Robinson are, of course, quite right in their contention that Wilder has been influenced by Joyce. "The Skin of Our Teeth" is based on "Finnegans Wake"—as Mr. Carl Ballett, Jr., another writer in the Saturday Review, has pointed out—in very much the same sort of way that "The Woman of Andros" was based on Terence's "Andria." It would certainly have amused Joyce to know that a Broadway play inspired by "Finnegans Wake" had been praised by critics who were under the impression that his book was unintelligible gibberish. People like Mr. Wolcott Gibbs, who has ridiculed, in a skit in the New Yorker, the discoveries of the Campbell-Robinson article, make a very naive mistake when they assume that situations presented in the straight English of Thornton Wilder's play can have nothing to do with situations presented in the "kinks english" of sleep in which "Finnegans Wake" is written. It is precisely the same mistake that they would make if they insisted that "The Woman of Andros" could have nothing to do with Terence because Terence wrote in Latin. In Mr. Gibbs's case, it is clear that he has looked at the first page of "Finnegans Wake," one of the relatively few passages in the book which present a real appearance of opacity, and emitted a hoot of derision. That he has not explored Joyce for himself is proved by his invoking a passage which is not in "Finnegans Wake" at all but which was printed in an article by Robert McAlmon before Joyce had removed it from his manuscript.

Mr. Gibbs's readiness to scoff at the borrowings indicated by Campbell and Robinson is due to his not understanding the peculiar kind of close attention to phrases, words, and rhythms which the reader of "Finnegans Wake" must cultivate. Words and rhythms here have a different kind of value from their value in ordinary books: they do not merely describe, they represent, the characters and the elements of the plot; and any real addict of "Finnegans Wake" recognizes in Wilder's play—though these may sometimes have been brought over unconsciously—cadences and words to which Joyce has given a life of their own. The general indebtedness to Joyce in the conception and plan of the play is as plain as anything of the kind can be; and it must have been conscious on Wilder's part. He has written and lectured on "Finnegans Wake"; is one of the persons who has been most fascinated by it and who has most thoroughly studied its text.

This derivation would not necessarily affect one way or the other the merits of Wilder's play. Joyce is a great quarry, like Flaubert, out of which a variety of writers have been getting and will continue to get a variety of different things; and Wilder is a poet with a form and imagination of his own who may find his themes where he pleases without incurring the charge of imitation. I do not think that "The Skin of Our Teeth" is one of Wilder's very best things, but it is certainly an adroit and amusing play on a plane to which we have not been accustomed in the American theater lately, with some passages of Wilder's best. It deserves a good deal of the praise it has had and all of the success.

I do think, however—though what Wilder is trying to do is quite distinct from what Joyce is doing—that the state of saturation with Joyce in which the play was written has harmed it in certain ways: precisely in distracting Wilder from his own ideas and effects; and that it suffers, as a serious work, from the comparison suggested with Joyce.

In the first act you get, for example, the following line spoken by Sabina in her description of Mr. Antrobus: "Of course, every muscle goes tight every time he passes a policeman; but what I think is that there are certain charges that ought not to be made, and I think I may add, ought not to be allowed to be made; we're all human; who isn't?" This has obviously been caught over from the first book of "Finnegans Wake," in which Earwicker, in his fallen role of Lucifer-Napoleon-Finnegan-Humpty Dumpty-Adam, is arrested for obscure offenses. But this theme, which is wonderfully developed by Joyce at a length of several chapters, gets no farther attention from Wilder. Antrobus in the second act becomes self-important and careless, falls for the hussy Sabina and is ready to divorce his wife; but we do not hear anything about him which makes us see why he should fear the police. The promising scene in the third act between Antrobus and Cain falls flat because the father is not really made to share the guilt of the son. Again, the letter which, in the second act, Mrs. Antrobus throws into the sea is Wilder's echo of the letter which plays such an important part in Joyce. But this scene is rather pointless in the play because it is simply something caught over and has no connection with anything else; and rather irritating to readers of Joyce because the letter is one of the main themes of "Finnegans Wake," in which it represents the mystery of life itself, whereas Wilder has merely exploited—and in a rather sentimental way—Mrs. Earwicker's version of it ("Finnegans Wake," pp. 623-624).

Again, the character of Sabina-Lilith seems conventional and even a little philistine in comparison with the corresponding characters both in "Finnegans Wake" and in Bernard Shaw's "Back to Methuselah," another work which "The Skin of Our Teeth" resembles without, I imagine, owing anything to it. The Lilith of Joyce is Lily Kinsella, who plays the remote and minor role of a woman who is odious to Mrs. Earwicker for having once had designs on Earwicker; but the conception of the Woman as Seductress is impossible to identify with any of the individual women of either the Earwicker family or the dream-myth. You cannot put your finger on her or isolate her because she may under appropriate circumstances be incorporated in any one of them: by the wife in her younger days, by the daughter in her adolescence, by the niece who is known as the "prankquean." She is something that any woman may be at some period or moment of her life. The Lilith of Shaw is the principle of change who always breaks up the pattern and leads to something different and higher. But the Lilith of Wilder is a hussy: parlor-maid, gold-digger, camp-follower—a familiar comic type perhaps a little too close to Mrs. Antrobus's disapproving notion of her.

Finally, I believe that Wilder has been somewhat embarrassed and impeded by the model of the Earwicker family. He has taken over the Earwicker daughter—in "The Skin of Our Teeth," Gladys—and done with her practically nothing; and he has tried to avoid taking over the twin Earwicker brothers, who give Joyce a Shaun as well as a Shem, an Abel as well as a Cain, and figure in their duality the conflict inside the personality of their father. Wilder has got rid of Abel by having him killed by Cain in the Ice Age phase of the Antrobuses before the play begins; and in the subsequent phases he does not show us or hardly shows us the people whom Cain attacks. Thus we never see Cain confronted, as Joyce's Shem always is, by his inevitable complementary opponent—with the result that there is no real dramatization of the "war in the members" in humanity. Even the scene between Cain and Antrobus, as I have said, fails to get this on the stage. The pages of "Finnegans Wake," with their words that take on malign meanings, produce a queer effect of uncertainty. The Antrobuses are a little too cozy, even when ruined by war.

Poetry of Latin America

AN ANTHOLOGY OF LATIN AMERICAN POETRY.

Edited by Dudley Fitts. New Directions. $3.50.

THIS anthology has been in the making for at least a year and a half. The man-hours of labor that have gone into it, if laid end to end, would bridge the gap in the pan-American highway. The number of people who have tried to be helpful about it, if each bought a copy, should insure its financial success. It would be a pleasure to report that the finished product was worth the devoted effort that has been lavished on it.

But something went wrong. Perhaps there was a fundamental weakness in the concept of a single volume that would give us a complete picture of Latin American poetry. Perhaps Latin America is, as any number of people have said, a figment of the imagination created to satisfy the Yankee love for a simple tag; and if so, a collection of poetry made on that basis would also seem artificial and unsatisfactory. Perhaps poetry freezes when used in the service of propaganda. Perhaps too many cooks spoiled the mulligatawny. Or perhaps the fault lies with the editor.

At any rate, here in this fat volume are 226 poems from 95 poets in 21 countries. All poems are "modern," which is to say that, as the editor defines the term, they all date since the death of Rubén Darío in 1916. Each is printed in its original Spanish, Portuguese, or French, with an English translation on a facing page. All translations were made to order, as literal as possible, and the making took a corps of sixteen translators.

The first effect on the reader is of bewilderment. Ninety-five poets are too many to meet at once in any language, or in any four languages. Turn the pages and famous names flash by—Alfonso Reyes, César Vallejo who wrote those moving poems about the Spanish Civil War, the great Gabriela Mistral, Cicerón Huidobro of Chile with some poems in French and some in Spanish, Jaime Torres Bodet of Mexico, Nicholas Guillén of Cuba with his pen dipped in acid, Alfonsina Storni of Argentina. But the best of them flash by too quickly and are buried under the weight of a host of lesser men. One understands that in a volume of this kind—with the Coordinator's Office behind the scenes—it is politically courteous to include a poet or two from each country. But surely it would have been better to have presented the best poet, or the two best poets, and to have presented them well, rather than to have thrown in so many and given so few a chance to be fully savored.

In certain instances good poets are presented not only too skimpily, but in such fashion as to give the reader a totally wrong impression of the character of their work. Otero Silva of Venezuela, for example, whose work is largely and bitterly political, is here presented as the author of a couple of mild love poems. Pablo Neruda, one of the most socially aware of modern poets, here contemplates himself, though he is also allowed one ambidextrous political blast in which he celebrates the defense of Madrid and the creation of the Soviet Union.

If it is difficult to find any understandable basis of choice of poets or poems—aside from the statement of the editor that he chose poems that would translate literally—it is equally hard to figure out why they are arranged, or unarranged, as they are. Presumably the editor had a scheme, but this is the wrong place for editorial subtlety. Whatever the chosen pattern of arrangement may be, it is too well hidden to help the reader. The 226 poems are flung at him in a single volley, and he must make his way among them as best he can.

His way is not helped by the quality of the translation. It was a Chinese scholar who was credited with that immortal rendering of a famous poem, "It says here about a bird," but Mr. Fitts has allowed his corps of translators to go only one grade above that, and he rewrote any attempts they made to go higher. Shunning any part in modern efforts to improve the quality of translation from Spanish and Portuguese, he has kept strictly to the classroom method—"to stay as close to the original as possible, line for line and sometimes word for word." "Our versions," he adds, and is thereby redundant, "are not poetry, except accidentally."

Why he, or anyone else, thought it a good idea to turn foreign poetry of great charm and diversity into English non-poems made out of blue denim is a puzzle. It can hardly please the poets, if they read English. And if they do not, there is the Spanish version of Mr. Fitts's preface to show them what his standard of translation is. He has a kind of unripe schoolmaster attitude toward the whole book, and it is possible that in making it he had the needs of his own prep-school students in mind. However, if this is the secret of much that is puzzling, it still does not explain why he has not grouped poems in some reasonable order as well as having them translated for an eighth-grade intelligence.

The word-by-word method and the admonishing forefinger are bearable in prose, though even there they seldom make for more than the first step in good translation. But in poetry they defeat their own purpose. For poetry is not primarily a statement of a fact.

And if you rob it of what Mr. Fitts seems to consider mere trappings—its word color, its rhythm, its play of allusion, its web of sound—you are likely to destroy not only its beautiful surface but also its sense. The words into which you try to put its meaning may all be in the dictionary, but the non-poem in English does not say what the poem in Spanish said. So the reader who must depend on translation, or he who tries to compare the English with the Spanish, the French, the Portuguese, is doubly misled.

For the average North American reader this volume is a kind of tourist's trip through Latin American poetry. In it he will find that south of the Rio Grande they write verses about love, and death, and children. About goat pens, and legs, and dawn, about mangoes and Indian girls in spring. Sometimes they are preoccupied with rain; sometimes they are drunk with bright color. They touch on the class struggle; they write movingly about the Spanish war. Having wrung the neck of the romanticist's "delusive swan," they still tend to linger over its decaying guts—or perhaps that, too, is the editorial touch. They write surrealist poems full of strained images, and wistful quatrains about street corners. They are sensitive to all the recent European models.

Perhaps this is all the average reader wants to know about Latin American poetry. If so, he will be content with this book. But the best poets in countries to the south merit a better introduction here. Their poetry is a living part of their life, and if this is the best attempt we can make at turning it into our tongue, we'd better learn to read it in its original Spanish, or Portuguese, or French and stop making anthologies that only distort one of Latin America's most cherished art forms.

MILDRED ADAMS

Pan-Europe, Old Style

VICTORY IS NOT ENOUGH. By Egon Ranshofen-Wertheimer. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

IN THE thick jungles of the literature of post-war reconstruction Egon Ranshofen-Wertheimer's "Victory Is Not Enough" constitutes a bright spot. This outstanding book, however, deserves both praise and serious scolding. The analysis of the situation and of the mistakes of the period after the First World War is probably the best among the many of its kind, even better than that of Professor E. H. Carr in "Conditions of Peace." The trouble with most books on reconstruction is that they are written either by people who know only the European mentality or by those who know only that of the Anglo-Saxons. Ranshofen-Wertheimer has the advantage of being well acquainted with both Anglo-Saxon mentality and the mind of Europe. He was born and educated in Austria, the most important melting-pot of Europe, and became correspondent of a Vienna liberal newspaper in London. Later he came to this country.

The knowledge of the two mentalities almost predestines Ranshofen-Wertheimer to acquaint us with the problems of peace. While even his analysis shows important flaws, he approaches the period 1919-39 from a very sane angle. He gives a good analysis of the German mind. All those who advocate German national unity after this war should read Wertheimer's arguments carefully. He rightly proposes, like Professor Carr, a cooling-off period before peace is concluded. He praises Metternich for letting the Congress "dance" for the whole year of 1814. "If only the Conference of Paris in 1919 had danced—danced through the winter and the spring of 1919-20—the world might be happier today." His analysis of the failure of political socialism in Europe is also lucid and convincing.

The trouble starts when Ranshofen-Wertheimer comes to consider a solution for war-torn Europe. Many details of his propositions are interesting, but the general scheme is in part old and in part extremely reactionary. In his analysis Ranshofen-Wertheimer appears in the guise of a progressive liberal. But when he tries to deduce the lessons of the failure of peace after the last war and attempts integration, he cannot disentangle himself from his early Austrian past. This Austrian heritage made Ranshofen-Wertheimer, just as it made another Austrian, Adolf Hitler, extremely suspicious of Soviet Russia. And thus, after 250 pages of brilliant analysis, he falls back on the scheme of another Austrian, the Pan-Europe of Count Richard N. Coudenhove-Kalergi. Count Coudenhove-Kalergi was a typical Austrian. His father's family through the Coudenhoves was Flemish, through the Kalergis Greek; he had French and other European blood in his veins, and his mother was a Japanese. This mixture made the noble count a "typical" Austrian.

In the late twenties Count Coudenhove-Kalergi developed a scheme to save Europe, bleeding from the wounds of the last war, and proposed a synthesis of the nations into a huge European federation. At that time France was the military master of Europe, and Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, who was much under the influence of French culture as were most of the higher classes in Austria, tacitly visualized this future Pan-Europe under French leadership. Britain was no longer interested in European affairs, and Soviet Russia was still treated as an outcast from the society of "decent" nations. In 1930 Aristide Briand, the great French Premier, "borrowed" Coudenhove's Pan-Europe plan, which thus received official notice. To make the bait of European unity sweeter to certain countries, Coudenhove counted on the anti-Soviet feelings of most of the conservative governments in Europe and started a very strong anti-Soviet and anti-Stalin propaganda, excluding Russia from the European unity. To please France, he also excluded Britain.

Ranshofen-Wertheimer steps into the heritage of Coudenhove's Pan-Europe and serves it up to us in almost the old form. He has forgotten even to invent a new sauce for it. The world, however, has changed since Coudenhove. France will never become the dominating European power. The fate of Britain and Russia is definitely tied up with Europe, and no European unity can be imagined without them. Wertheimer's Pan-Europe would play the continent into German hands. Herr Wertheimer went to sleep in 1930 apparently. Otherwise he could not propose that the new European federation should exclude Russia.

Liberals will rightly be impatient with this book, yet I must say that everyone who wants to understand the problems of European peace should read the first 250 pages.

M. W. FODOR

Fiction in Review

WE HAVE a tendency to forget, nowadays, that in the long run what really counts about a novel is the story it tells. "To create a world" is not only to evoke the emotion or atmosphere that surrounds situation, but to create situation itself, in some of the dramatic suspense of actual life; and observation, sensibility, documentation, however fruitful they may be as adjuncts to a story, are no substitute for action or plot. But the sin of telling us everything except what happens is certainly never the sin of our best serious writers, only of our next-best serious writers; and it is never the sin of frankly commercial writers. The addiction of even the educated public to detective stories can be explained quite simply by the fact that thrillers are our most readable books; naturally they will be the most read.

For instance, of four recently published novels, one, "The Gaunt Woman" by Edmund Gilligan (Scribner's, $2.50), is a spy story; another, "Tropic Moon" by Simenon (Harcourt, Brace, $2), is a psychological novel by the well-known French writer of detective stories; a third, "Circle in the Water" by Helen Hull (Coward-McCann, $2.50), is a problem novel conceived on a one-cut-above-commercialism level of earnestness and literacy; and the last, "The Looking Glass" by William March (Little, Brown, $2.50), is elabo-

FACTS we need are given in these books

VICHY TWO YEARS OF DECEPTION

By Léon Marchal

The former Counselor of the French Embassy in Washington, now on the Fighting French staff, here presents a searching report on the Vichy regime from capitulation under Pétain to total enslavement under Laval. As Chief of the Trade and Industry Department of French Morocco, M. Marchal initiated negotiations for sending supplies to North Africa. He gives much valuable information on affairs there and revealing analyses of the men of Vichy. $2.50

ITALY from Within

By Richard G. Massock

What Mussolini's regime has done to Italy is here expertly reported by the former Chief of the Associated Press Rome Bureau. "The most revealing and convincing picture of the Italian nation at war which we have as yet had."—N. Y. Herald Tribune books. $3.00

Postmortem on Malaya

By Virginia Thompson

Why Malaya fell so easily to Japan is fully exposed in this thorough book by a noted authority on Southern Asia. (Author of "Thailand" and "French Indo-China," the standard reference books on those countries.) $3.00

A Latin American Speaks

By Luis Quintanilla

A brilliant analysis of the problems facing the Americas and telling arguments for unity. "It ought to be read by as many Americans as count themselves of good will in the twenty-one republics of the Western Hemisphere."—N. Y. Times Book Review. $2.50

The most discussed book of the year

THE BEVERIDGE REPORT

SOCIAL INSURANCE AND ALLIED SERVICES

By Sir William Beveridge

A "must" for all interested in the future of mankind. $1.00

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
60 Fifth Avenue New York, N. Y.

rately artful. In the same descending order, from spy story to literariness, they hold your attention. "The Gaunt Woman" is a Literary Guild selection and will go to thousands; if they are troubled about their literary taste because they honestly prefer Mr. Gilligan's exciting war yarn to Mr. March's circumambulatory investigation of small-town life, they should remember that even good novels are novels you can't put down.

Not to suggest, then, that "The Gaunt Woman" is really a good novel, it is still good entertainment and should give you pleasure. Mr. Gilligan tells the story of a fishing schooner out of Gloucester which runs full sail into a mother ship for German submarines; halibut fishing gives place to spy chasing, with its full quota of sentimental hokum, piousness, and not quite credible heroics. But what is unusual about "The Gaunt Woman" is that it also has the lash of the sea and a lot of tacking and rigging which this reviewer enjoyed enormously, without pretending to judge its authenticity. By successfully combining a sea story and a spy story, in other words, Mr. Gilligan has rung an exciting change on the usual war thriller.

Although "Tropic Moon," Simenon's novel of French Equatorial Africa, includes a murder, the author of the Maigret stories is here concerned not with tracking down the culprit—we know who did it from the start—but with the effect upon a young Frenchman, new to the tropics, of discovering that his mistress is a murderess. The heat and fever, the confusion of a young man's relation to a woman who has given herself not only to him but to every white man in the settlement, the new moral standards the hero is up against in the governing class—all this is material, certainly, for a better novel than Simenon has written, but what he has written is swift and clever, rather more complex, psychologically, than Somerset Maugham's colonial stories yet in much the same manner. The main fault of "Tropic Moon" seems to be an excess of the virtue of objectivity; by keeping himself too much out of his novel, the author leaves the picture a little bare. At the end of the story, for instance, the exposition is so sparse that we are left with some of the hero's own confusion.

And then, far less interesting than either Mr. Gilligan's book or Simenon's, there is Miss Hull's novel about a writer who hasn't the stamina to retain his integrity. His first opus, a realistic slice of his early life in Maine, loses Miss Hull's novelist his college post; so he comes to New York, where the struggle to retain his vision is even harder, despite the devotion of the most devoted wife in current fiction. Eventually he gives up the battle, sells his soul to Hollywood, leaves his wife for a divorcee, and hires a ghost—all of which, if you are acquainted with the creative processes in second-rate stories, could have been predicted from the beginning. And yet Miss Hull's novel, like Rachel Field's "And Now Tomorrow," is a notable example of the special kind of talent it takes to create a fictitious reality—although her portrait of the artist as a human being is only less embarrassing, in the way in which artists in the movies are embarrassing, than her companion portrait of the artist's wife.

Finally, scarcely interesting at all, there is "The Looking Glass" of William March. With the "Spoon River Anthology" in one hand and Kraft-Ebing in the other, Mr.

March draws a composite picture of life in a small Alabama town in the early years of the century; in his Reedyville, not a family but has its lunatic or other horror, and although this may be accurate reporting—after all, all Southern novelists can't be themselves crazy, much as a reader unacquainted with their territory may sometimes like to think they are—Mr. March is rather too coy with his psychopathology to hold even our morbid interest. One's chief response to "The Looking Glass" is irritation with its author; Mr. March's novel fails to support the consideration his short stories seem to have earned for him. DIANA TRILLING

The Beveridge Plan

SOCIAL INSURANCE AND ALLIED SERVICES. Report by Sir William Beveridge. American Edition Reproduced Photographically from the English Edition. The Macmillan Company. $1.

READERS who approach Sir William Beveridge's celebrated report with the expectation of finding a convenient blueprint of the post-war world are doomed to disappointment. Contrary to a rather widespread impression, the report is confined solely to the problem of social insurance; it does not stray into the larger aspects of post-war planning. Furthermore, it is quite apparent that Sir William was interested primarily in the mechanics of unifying and strengthening Britain's social-insurance system and little concerned with elucidating his plan for an American audience. Americans who are not familiar with the existing social-insurance arrangements in Great Britain, and the background of these arrangements, will find it extremely difficult to understand and evaluate the specific recommendations of the report and will be somewhat mystified regarding the applicability of its principles to our own social-security legislation. For this reason it is particularly important to understand just what it is that is proposed.

Many of the features of the Beveridge plan merely represent an extension of the traditional British approach to social security. The program is based, for example, on the established British principle that social insurance should be paid for jointly by the employer, the employee, and the state. In contrast with American practice, it also rests on the principle of equal contribution and equal benefits regardless of income. Moreover, in considering the audacious scope of the program, it must be remembered that the British social-insurance system has always provided much broader protection than is afforded by our Social Security Act.

Ignoring changes in detail and the manner in which the conclusions are arrived at, Sir William makes eight significant recommendations. These are: (1) the integration of Britain's social insurance system to cover all normal risks; (2) the extension of protection under that system to all Britishers regardless of age, occupation, or income; (3) a general increase in benefits so as to provide the essentials of life as set forth by competent social surveys; (4) creation of special protection for the special risks of married women; (5) creation of a system of children's allowances so that all children may have their minimum needs cared for; (6) abolition of Britain's historical cumbersome system of workmen's compensation in favor of a simple plan for disability benefits; (7) provision of funeral benefits in place of the shocking waste of private industrial insurance; (8) elimination of the distinction between unemployment insurance and unemployment assistance, and the payment of the unemployment benefit indefinitely, without means test, as a right.

Each of these recommendations involves a minor revolution in Anglo-Saxon thinking regarding social security. As Sir William declares in the foreword, "a revolutionary moment in the world's history is a time for revolutions, not for patching." Taken as a whole, the program is so complete and so carefully planned that it is scarcely open to criticism. From an American standpoint the benefits are low; but the protection offered is so much more adequate than is now commonly given, either in this country or Britain, that no one will quarrel seriously with the report on that basis. Politically, too, the recommendations are extraordinarily astute. Full consideration is given to all legitimate questions and doubts, and the whole program is so neatly integrated that it can hardly be subject to piecemeal attack. Although the organization and vocabulary of the report are highly technical, it is so permeated with a spirit of practical idealism that no one can read it without an enhanced respect for the value and dignity of the common man.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Nothing Too Much

THE GREAT AGE OF GREEK LITERATURE. By Edith Hamilton. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

THE first sentence of Miss Hamilton's preface reads as follows: "My former book, 'The Greek Way,' which is included in this volume, was an incomplete work." To that volume, published in 1930, Miss Hamilton has now given a new preface and added five new chapters—on Pindar, on the three historians Thucydides, Herodotus, and Xenophon, and on the religion of the Greeks. That this material is interesting in itself, and does round out the former volume, there can be no doubt; but there is in some of it, particularly that which describes the historians, an ever so slight, and ever so slightly disturbing, difference of tone, a suspicion that the book has been not merely completed but brought up to date; as if modern events had impinged a little too much on the author's consciousness, and we were being prompted, in our study of the wars between the Greeks and the Persians, the Athenians and the Spartans, to consider Persians and Spartans not strictly as such but as prototypes of our enemies; and tempted into a too facile identification of ourselves with Greeks, in the one case, and Athenians in the other. I do not think Miss Hamilton consciously means to do this, or wants us to do it: elsewhere she is quite severe about such excessive, sentimental, un-Greek attitudes: "We . . . make a refuge from a world that is too hard for us to face by sentimentalizing it. The Greeks looked straight at it. They were completely unsentimental. It was a Roman who said it was sweet to die for one's country. The Greeks never said it was sweet to die for anything. They had no vital lies."

Miss Hamilton writes with ardor, clarity, and high spirit; at the same time she has constantly in mind the Greek prin-

AMUSEMENTS

"The most effective and the most satisfactory play about the war yet to reach our stage." —Joseph Wood Krutch, Nation.

THE PLAYWRIGHTS' COMPANY Presents

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A new play by Maxwell ANDERSON Cast of 25, incl. Aline MacMAHON
4th St. E. of B'WAY. Box 5.00, $1.10 to $5.30, 291 seats $1.10.
Mat. Wed. & Sat. 2.30, $1.10-$2.75. Seats selling for next 2 weeks.

MAIL ORDERS PROMPTLY FILLED

PUBLICATION

Free Churchill Pamphlet

The new Archbishop of Canterbury was appointed by Prime Minister Winston Churchill against the wishes of Tory reactionaries in Britain. A huge audience in the Albert Hall, London, heard the Archbishop declare for transference of taxes from production equipment to ground values. (See Christian Century, October 7, 1942.) Churchill himself, in a volume recently issued in New York, says: "Who could have thought that it would be easier to produce by toil and skill all the most necessary or desirable commodities than it is to find consumers for them? It is certain that the economic problem with which we are now confronted is not adequately solved, indeed is not solved at all, by the teachings of the textbooks, however grand may be their logic, however illustrious may be their authors." Churchill is also for the taxation of ground rental values.

Send at once for free copy of Churchill pamphlet, edited by Louis Wallis.

THE HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
30 East 29th Street New York City, N. Y.

MID-WINTER BOOK NUMBER

Dated Feb. 27; on sale Feb. 25. Deadline for space reservations and copy to be set, Feb. 16. Final deadline for copy OK's, Friday night, Feb. 19. For further information, phone ALgonquin 4-3311 or write

THE NATION • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York, N. Y.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine

- ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Introductory Offer: 13 Weeks $1
☐ Remittance is inclosed

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

ciple of "Nothing too much." A good thing, too; for just a little more, and she would seem to be gushing, and adoring "her" dear Greeks. She does not trim, or hedge. This forthright habit leads her, at times, into inconsistencies, or statements that sound pat, or sweeping. The reader will find many questions raised, and not all answered; he is not relieved of the responsibility of doing some thinking for himself. Nothing too much. Or, as an American character puts it in "Ruggles of Red Gap," "I can be pushed just so far." Does not this apply also to accepting ideas that are sane, orderly, and wholesome? Take Socrates, for instance. Are we being merely morbid and modern if we find him not entirely a fount of wisdom but also a bit of a bore, with a fair-sized streak of Polonius in his make-up? Or is Socrates himself maybe a little perverse? "How I wish" (he said) "that wisdom could be infused by touch. If that were so, how greatly should I value the privilege of reclining at your side, for you would fill me with a stream of wisdom plenteous and fair, whereas my own is of a very questionable sort."

It may be that in confining herself to a great age Miss Hamilton is bound to oversimplify, to generalize too much, to underemphasize the wild and Gothic side of Greek genius, and if their whole literary history from Homer to the Alexandrians were covered, a juster portrait would emerge. Freud once, on an official occasion when he was being acclaimed as the discoverer of the unconscious, disavowed the praise; he said that long before his time the unconscious had been discovered by the artists of the human race. To the understanding on which he based a therapy the Greeks contributed, certainly, more than their share; and it is perhaps unjust to them to leave out the Gorgons, Harpies, and Chimæras dire, the Furies and Minotaurs that they created in themselves, found, faced, and mastered.

The printed page of Miss Hamilton's book is a delight to read; and even the jacket contributes to its enjoyment, its clean blue and white bringing to mind the flag of Greece, the skies and the streets and the houses of Athens.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

The Nazi "State"

THE NAZI STATE. By William Ebenstein. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.75.

THE battle against the onslaught of Nazi ideas is not yet won. To this day, serious writings about Nazism are a mere trickle if compared with the stream of Nazi-tainted clichés which are assiduously put forward under many a disguise. True, Hitler's most ghastly crimes are generally despised in so far as they receive publicity, though some—for example, the mass sterilization and eugenic murder of "Aryan" Germans—have received little attention. Yet on certain vital questions—the sources of Nazism, the real mistakes of the Versailles treaty, the social changes wrought by Nazism, the relative strength of pseudo-nationalism and pseudo-socialism in National Socialism, the technique by which a punctilious Nazified bureaucracy has been able to dispense with legality yet still keep a government running, to mention just a few—there exists as yet not even general agreement among the professional students of politics.

Whoever writes about the Nazi government runs two dangers. If he tries to present it in terms commonly used to describe the familiar traits of the American scene, he may easily obscure the degenerate monstrousness of Nazism. And if he stresses the irregularity of the Nazi structure, the irregularity not only in a moral and ethical sense but in the techniques and handicraft of government and the variegated aspects of political life, he may obscure the international ramifications of Nazism and the existence of similar trends in contemporary societies outside of Germany.

Professor Ebenstein has faced and mastered this dilemma in an exemplary way. Those who study his book will recognize that its very title, if properly understood, is a sort of danger signal because it expresses a contradiction in terms. He calls his book "The Nazi State," but to speak of a Nazi state is the same as to speak of "the biased judge" or "the square circle." The Nazi state is not a state in the accepted sense. This is not a question of terminology. It goes to the root of the matter. Ever since the emergence in the Western world of a pattern of independent states living side by side, it has been axiomatic that the two essential elements of a state are a definite population and a definite territory. A people forms a state when it exercises exclusive jurisdiction over a particular portion of the world's surface—their "country." Citizenry and territory—these are not only two necessary concomitants but two limitations of every state. Otherwise, the coexistence of a plurality of independent states becomes impossible. In order to have such a thing as a comity of nations, the nations must exist side by side, and not inside of each other. But this, among many other fundamentals, the Nazis boldly deny. They destroyed the very concept of citizenry by outlawing part of their own citizens, and by unilaterally extending their jurisdiction over persons living outside of Germany and owing allegiance to other states. At the same time they destroyed the very concept of the state territory by extending their political activities all over the world.

Nazi "diplomats" behave not very differently before and after the actual military occupation of foreign countries. From the outset the Nazis not only mutilated the school curricula in Bavaria, but through various methods of direct action worked for the same thing in Hungary and Bulgaria; they harassed freedom-loving persons not only in Berlin but also in Ankara; and John Schmidt of New York or Juan Schmidt of Buenos Aires was to be forced into the self-same worldwide S. A. as Johann Schmidt of Breslau.

The author clarifies the basic anomalies of Nazism by "translating" them into the categories of accepted political institutions, taking great care, however, to show how much the meaning of these institutions has been twisted by that regime. He describes, for example, how "the citizen has been deprived of protection against illegal acts of officials." But he makes it clear that a Nazi "citizen" is not an equal among equals but a person who keeps a precarious place in a hierarchy of varying levels of inequality; that a Nazi "official" is neither elected by the people nor appointed by somebody responsible to them; that there is no judicial review, and if there were the judge could not possibly be impartial; and that, finally, it is mere negligence on the part of the ruling clique if "illegal" acts, that is, acts contrasting with that will save you as much as $3.50

6 Magazine Combinations

● THE Nation
and HARPERS MAGAZINE $6.50
You save $2.50

● THE Nation
and CONSUMERS UNION $7.00
You save $1.50

● THE Nation
and HARPERS MAGAZINE
and CONSUMERS UNION $9.00
You save $3.50

● THE Nation
and FREE WORLD $7.50
You save $1.50

● THE Nation
and SATURDAY REVIEW of LITERATURE $7.50
You save $1.50

● THE Nation
and READER'S DIGEST $7.00
You save $1.00

THE Nation BY ITSELF: 1 YEAR $5 — 2 YEARS $8 — 3 YEARS $11

Fill Out and Mail this Convenient Order Form Today

THE NATION • FIFTY-FIVE FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.
Magazines Send to Address

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.
Canadian and foreign postage are extra.

1-80-43

statutory regulations, happen at all, since the Nazi top men can issue and amend and repeal whatever ukase they wish, and this will be "the law."

With equal clarity the author analyzes the devices used by the Nazis to romanticize their real aims. They organized their industry, for instance, along "corporate" or "estate" (Stände) lines. In reality, they combined the machinery of cartels with a militarized one-party rule and strictest police dictatorship, and then coated the whole mixture with Gothic turrets suggesting medieval "Meistersinger" coziness "without class differentiations."

The book complains little and explains much. It combines with extraordinary poise factual information and penetrating analysis. Everything is set out straightforwardly. At times the thoughtful frugality of the presentation is interrupted by just one or two tersely ironic and irate lines—which is like taking a breath of clean air but only in order to return immediately to the duty of exploring the morass which threatens to engulf us all.

HANS ERNEST FRIED

Fairy Tales for Guernica's Children

BLOOD FOR A STRANGER. By Randall Jarrell. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

IN MOST of its usual connotations "lyricist" is not the word for Randall Jarrell. Despite his sensitive ear for sound values, no one would try to sing these elaborate chants of horror. His elaborate accentual line—Audenesque but used with greater control than by Auden himself—inclines toward the pole of meaning rather than toward the pole of form. Yet the poems have more in common with the lyric than the fact that they are short. What Jarrell has done more effectively than his contemporaries is to condense the impact of his time, the time of Guernica and Munich, into a personal experience. This experience is not a representation, however dislocated, of the events which prompted it, but of their effects in a consciousness that has sought to shut out the events themselves while giving free play to their flosams from the subconscious. We are shown not the air raid but the nightmares of a precocious child trying to sleep through it in a bomb shelter.

The child, as I have said, is precocious; it is one who has meditated sharply on science, politics, and metaphysics. The vision is none the less a child's, and, so we must suppose, with intent. Picasso drew upon children's art, with its blatant sheer colors and its sacrifices of grace and perspective to expression, in order to give supreme visual fixation to the agony of a period which could be adequately symbolized only in terms of regression to the infantile. For Jarrell, similarly, the relentless settling of Western civilization to its nadir could find its appropriate emotion only in a child's cataleptic fears and oppressions. To the child, living in the moment, pain is utter, unrelieved by memory or hope:

... nothing comes from nothing,
The darkness from the darkness. Pain comes from the darkness
And we call it wisdom. It is pain.

So the imagery of the poems is that of drowning, of polar cold, of the doctor's waiting-room, of the solitary journey to a foreign city, and, above all, of the fairy tale with its inexplicably malignant witches and ogres. For Guernica's maidens the fairy godmother never came, and the prince sat across the waters clipping his coupons.

Jarrell's poetry is not, except by indirection, of the kind that we have been accustomed to label "social criticism." It seeks to isolate the evil of the day and make it into an eternal form of evil. And so we have the circumstantial sin of the "ego" foreshortened into the dumb writhings of the "id." Since the "id" is always with us, it would be incorrect to call such writing topical. The change of mood that has accompanied our passing from inaction to action does not invalidate a mood that may recur, and that in any case was valid for its circumstances.

A more appropriate judgment would be that Jarrell has pretty thoroughly explored the vein in which his first book was formed—for the "id's" habits are listed and obstinate—and that a second volume in this vein could be little more than repetition. A shift in the objects of attention would involve also a change in technique. There is at present, however, no reason to predict insuperable limitations on a talent that has the resources of thought and feeling to produce passages such as the following:

From the disintegrating bomber, the mercenary
Who has sown without hatred or understanding
The shells of the absolute world that flowers
In the confused air of the dying city
Plunges for his instant of incandescence, acquiesces
In our death and his own, and welcome
The fall of the western hegemonies.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

Drama Note

DARK EYES" is certainly one of those titles which once heard is never remembered. It happens, however, to belong to a very pleasant little farce comedy now current at the Belasco and is worth writing down for those who would like an evening of light entertainment less witlessly noisy than most of the current farces. The subject is amiable pre-war Russians in a quiet Long Island household; the authors are Elena Miramova and Eugenie Leontovich, who ought to know their characters. And if nothing very new is said about the Russian soul in its comic aspects, at least the topic can still be amusing when handled with wit. The Misses Miramova and Leontovich act their own roles, and there were times when I wondered whether they made Russians behave so precisely as Americans suppose they do merely because the Misses Miramova and Leontovich have been here long enough to see themselves through our eyes or whether, surprisingly enough, Russians really are (or were) like that; but I will leave the determination of this fine point to others better qualified. One proverb I liked very much both for its hearty downrightness and for the fact that I imagine it is useful in many contexts other than the amorous: "If you love me do not hesitate to say so right out—but please stop pinching my leg."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ART

CUBIST, ABSTRACT, SURREALIST
ART. Guggenheim Collection. Art of this Century Gallery. Permanent.

A tendency dominant in painting since cubism is that which, by means of abstraction, collage, construction, and the use of extraneous elements such as paper, cloth, sand, cement, wood, string, metal, and so forth, tries almost literally to disembowel the painting. Its pictorial content no less than the physical fact of the canvas itself is to enter the actual presence of the spectator on the same terms, and as completely, as do the walls, the furniture, and people. What takes place within the borders of the picture has the same immediate status as the borders themselves. The new gallery Frederick J. Kiesler has designed for the Guggenheim collection of modern art carries this tendency to an ultimate conclusion by still other means. Unframed paintings are suspended in mid-air by ropes running from ceiling to floor, hung on panels at right angles to the wall, thrust out from concave walls on arms, placed on racks at knee level, or, with seeming paradox, put into peepshows and view-boxes.

That Mr. Kiesler knows what he is about is evidenced by this last; for paintings by Klee are seen in the peepshow and view-boxes; and Klee was almost alone among the more abstract artists to maintain the fictive nature of the world within the picture frame. And in a different way Marcel Duchamp insisted upon the same thing in his little quasi-cubist paintings, shown here—with less success—in a glass cage.

The surrealist pictures, thrust out on rods from tunnel-like walls, seem, because of the dramatic lighting, which switches at intervals from one group of canvases to another, to hang in indefinite space. This is exactly right, because it emphasizes that traditional discontinuity between the spectator and the space within the picture to which most of the surrealists have returned.

Except for the surrealist room, the gallery is, however, a little crowded and scrappy. Mr. Kiesler overdid the functionalism in not providing the other rooms with a more unified background. The ropes should have been covered with dark cloth and the walls toned more darkly to set off the high-keyed colors and pale tints of the abstract and cubist paintings. As it is, the eye is unable to isolate them easily.

Nevertheless, the décor does create a sense of exhilaration and provides a relief from other usually over-upholstered or over-sanitary museums and galleries. And inadequate as it may be in each single department, the collection itself is one of the most comprehensive in this country of cubist, abstract, and surrealist art as a whole. In addition to the very fine Klee in the peepshow, there is a large orange painting by Ernst and a classical view by Chirico which are the best examples of these artists' work I have seen in this country.

CLBMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

AS IN Strauss's orchestral works after "Don Quixote" or "Ein Heldenleben" so in his operas after "Salome" one hears prodigious technical powers which continue undiminished while the musical thinking they serve deteriorates in appalling fashion. "Der Rosenkavalier" provides an enjoyable evening; but what is enjoyable is von Hoffmannstahl's play, with which one hears now and then a bit of pretty music like the tenor's aria, the Princess's monologue, the Presentation of the Rose, the third-act trio and finale, but which one enjoys even during the long stretches when the music is nothing more than expertly contrived sounds with no significance in themselves or in relation to words and action.

In "Elektra" too it is what happens on the stage that is moving, not the music. It is, for example, the great scene of Elektra's recognition of Orestes, not the pretty tune which she is given to sing, and which is even less adequate to its situation than the music for the Princess's thoughts on old age in "Der Rosenkavalier." And elsewhere in the opera the music is again mere sounds shrieked by the voices and crashed out by the orchestra—sounds which exercise the power not of musical expressiveness in relation to words and action, but of mere physical assault on the ear.

"Salome," however, not only offers the Oscar Wilde play, which makes an excellent opera libretto, and which calls for precisely the luxuriant style of Strauss's musical writing; but this time Strauss achieves expressive vocal declamation and orchestral comment, underlining, and intensification which culminate in the powerful concluding scene with the head—though the score also has its vulgarities which culminate in the dreadful dance of the Seven Veils.

The performance of "Salome" that I attended at the Metropolitan was superb in every respect. Lily Djanel's Salome was not without its operatic mannerisms and excesses; but they were few, and were only slight flaws in an impersonation notable for the plastic economy with which its high degree of dramatic effectiveness was achieved; and to her remarkable achievement of dancing the Dance of the Seven Veils plausibly she added the more important one of singing all the music which preceded the dance in a way that left her able to cope with the cruelly taxing climaxes of the finale. Frederick Jagel is someone I normally don't enjoy watching or hearing; but that liquid-brass timbre of his voice was excellent for the part of Herod, and when he didn't fling himself about he did some effective and amusing things in the part—for example his triumphant "Er hat deinen Namen nicht genannt!" to Herodias. Julius Huehn's rough-textured baritone was good for the part of Jokanaan, and despite a plumpness where he should have been gaunt he was an impressive figure while he stood motionless on the edge of the cistern; only when his arms began to make their wooden movements did this impressiveness crumble. There were such slight imperfections in a performance that was admirably put together on the stage by Herbert Graf; and George Szell, whose conducting of a Mozart program with the New Friends of Music Orchestra last season was quite unexciting, achieved a magnificent statement of Strauss's score in living sound this time.

At the performance were a number of soldiers and sailors—including some who evidently were not among the men pining for good music at the camps, for they struggled unsuccessfully to keep from falling asleep; and one of them, awakened by the final crash of the orchestra, muttered: "What's goin' on?" Even the ones who had stayed awake may have asked this question when they saw Salome wrapping herself around a silver plate on which was a not especially enticing piece of white cheesecloth—the Metropolitan touch of this production. And before that they had appeared to be baffled, as well they might be, by forty-five minutes of operatic fun consisting of Salvatore Baccaloni's huffing and puffing and eye-rolling and Bidu Sayao's hands-on-hips pertness in the endless recitatives of Pergolesi's "Serva Padrona," the persistence of which in the Metropolitan's repertory is a greater mystery to me each time I have to sit through its dullness. B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

The Teacher's Problem

Dear Sirs: Agnes Benedict's article Violence in the Classroom is timely and important in acquainting the public with the need for enlarged school services for children in war time, and for the spread of progressive methods of teaching. It should be noted, however, that the strength of the reactionary educators lies in a large measure in the impossible situations in which teachers find themselves. Regard for the individual child in an atmosphere of harmony and constructive effort is essential to the newer concepts. The teacher confronted with a large, difficult class becomes discouraged by the threat of defeat and frustration and falls back on the old disciplinary methods which make for efficiency, though at the cost of vital education.

The article has the following error of fact: "The Teachers' Guild of the American Federation of Labor joined with the reactionary Teachers' Alliance in demanding that the police commissioner send officers into the schools." The Teachers' Guild, Local 2, was the only organization which appealed to Police Commissioner Valentine for greater police protection for the schools. This appeal was made for police assistance in ejecting unwily intruders from the schools, for the protection of children and teachers alike. The Teachers' Guild, Local 2, has not joined in any action with the Teachers' Alliance. The programs of the organizations vary widely in both philosophy and method. The only reason for associating the two groups is the fact that both recognize the growing delinquency and want something to be done about it.

The public was confused by the deliberate misinterpretation of our action as calling for "the use of cops' nightsticks to discipline children" by the Mayor and by one discredited teacher group which in 1941 was expelled from the American Federation of Labor.

We believe that the guild's action, together with the publicizing of its comprehensive program for the curbing and prevention of delinquency, has made clear some important truths about the interdependence of social, public, and civic agencies in facing the delinquency problem. For more than a quarter of a century the union movement among teachers has emphasized the need for teachers to view their problems in the light of the needs of the entire community. As a labor-affiliated teacher group, the guild accepts its responsibility to facilitate and encourage, both inside and outside the school system, the appreciation of the need for an immediate, integrated attack against the conditions that produce juvenile delinquency.

REBECCA C. SIMONSON, President,
New York Teachers' Guild, Local 2,
American Federation of Labor
New York, January 16

The Job to Be Done

Dear Sirs: With the war going as well for the United Nations as it is, one is tempted to accept many faults of which one should be critical. In the air corps, the lack of any discussion of current events, of why we are fighting, of the world after the war is a serious defect. As far as I can judge, the technical training is excellent. There is a shortage of good instructors but that is explainable.

The discipline is poorly administered. We are treated like boy scouts rather than soldiers. Soon the men lose respect for their superiors and practically disobey them. This is in regard to small matters. When one discusses the problem with the fellows who "goldbrick" and disobey, it is interesting to find out that they know they are doing wrong. They are not just lazy or unpatriotic. They are fed up with the childish way they are treated and the lack of responsibility given to them. For instance, here we keep our barracks cleaner than ever before—and there are no non-coms living with us or yelling at us.

The singing situation is perhaps the best illustration. In the air corps we have to sing when marching. Our superiors order us to sing as soon as we step off—even at 7 a. m. on dark mornings. Well, the fellows just refuse. In every situation, however, where it is natural for men to sing, they sing, and in a spirited fashion. The air corps has about six songs they order us to sing. We refuse to sing them. We sing our own songs and they are very lusty.

Very, very few of these fellows are aware of what is going on politically. They are too concerned with their own day-to-day existence. We need a rude awakening. I am most concerned about the post-war situation. If victory comes with too little suffering, America will not have learned how the world has changed. People applaud Wilkie's speeches about Russia and China and then damn Roosevelt, whose feelings are much more genuine.

The more I think about the problem in the army, the more convinced I am of the need for those who feel as we do to get together and go to work on the men around us. Union members, liberals of all sorts, etc., should get together and start discussion groups. When I get permanently set I hope to do something of the sort. There is so much free time in the army that could be well used instead of wasted. Is anyone doing anything about it? If so let me know so that we can share experiences. The job can be done. The men will respond when properly approached. They simply do not have the initiative and do not realize the importance of it.

AIR TRAINEE
Somewhere in the U. S., December 3

One for Agee

Dear Sirs: Your newest film critic, Mr. James Agee, is excellent. His style I thought both swift and refreshing. Unfortunately once a month is not very often for such a column.

I sincerely hope more of his work will be forthcoming, as do my friends.

ALVIN LUKASLOK
New York, January 20

A Sponsor Protests

Dear Sirs: Your newest film critic, Mr. International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, received a communication from you on the letterhead of The Nation asking me, as manager of Local 155, to be one of the sponsors for a testimonial dinner for ex-United States Senator George W. Norris. We were only too glad to join in honoring this outstanding fighter for justice, Negro rights, and civil liberties. We understood that this testimonial dinner was in no sense a rally for political parties or political groups, especially since the sponsor list included individuals from many different political groups and parties. It was a tribute to George W. Norris, and it was only on this understanding that many individuals agreed to serve as sponsors.

The testimonial dinner included a broad gathering ranging from employers to labor leaders, Republicans, Democrats, and representatives of the American Labor Party and the Social Democratic Federation. After looking over the list of sponsors, we noticed that Norman Thomas, one of the outstanding liberal citizens and fighters for civil liberties and justice in our country, was not on the list. After questioning some people, we were informed that Norman Thomas was not invited to be one of the sponsors.

As one who disagrees with Norman Thomas on many problems, just as I disagree with many of the individuals and the Union for Democratic Action as a whole in principle, I believe that that was not the issue in this case. Because of the desire to honor George W. Norris, I overlooked, as many others did, that some political groups or splinter groups might utilize George W. Norris for their narrow sectarian aims. As a trade unionist, I know that Norman Thomas has contributed to the trade unions probably more than many of those who claim today to be a liberal driving force in our country. We did not act as sponsors or as participants to George W. Norris's testimonial to give prestige to the Union for Democratic Action or to Freda Kirchwey or any other individual.

We don't want to make a political issue of the George W. Norris testimonial at this moment, but many individuals present at the testimonial are indignant that Norman Thomas was not invited as one of the sponsors. We believe that no political group had the right to utilize George W. Norris for their own narrow personal political gains.

While many of these so-called liberals of the Union for Democratic Action may serve reaction in the future as some of them have done recently, Norman Thomas will still be in the ranks of labor and fighting for a better world to live in.

LOUIS NELSON, Manager-Secretary,
Knitgoods Workers' Union, Local 155
New York, January 9

[In arranging the dinner to Senator Norris it was decided quite deliberately that invitations to be sponsors or speakers should not be extended to men who have been fundamentally opposed to the war and to the whole Anti-Axis policy which led up to the war and gives it meaning. To the people who organized the dinner the idea of inviting isolationists and pacifists to take part would have seemed entirely inappropriate.—
EDITORS THE NATION.]

Caste and Vocation

Dear Sirs: Dr. Niebuhr, in his review of Shridharani's "Warning to the West" in The Nation of January 2, speaks of the Indian caste system as "the most rigid form of class snobbishness in history." One could not have a better illustration of the fallacy of claiming that the form of one's own government "is the best, not for himself only, but also for the rest of mankind" (Franz Boas, cited in the same issue). In the first place, it may be observed that no snobbishness can exist where there is no social ambition: Indians do not, like Americans, have to keep up with the Joneses. And let me add that the form of his social order is the last thing that it would occur to an Indian to apologize for, when he compares it with the informality of Western proletarian industrialisms. I say "industrialisms" rather than "democracies" because in these so-called self-governing societies the Indian sees nothing that can be compared with the really democratic character of the internal self-government of his own castes or guilds and his own village communities.

It has been very truly pointed out by A. M. Hocart, author of "Les Castes" (Paris, 1938), probably the best book on the subject available, that "hereditary service is quite incompatible with our industrialism, and that is why it is always painted in such dark colors." Mr. Hocart also points out that we must not be frightened by the connotations of the European words that are used to translate Indian terms. The caste system, he says, is not one of oppression, "but, on the contrary, may be much less oppressive than our industrial system." The members of the most menial castes are charged with certain functions; but there is no one who can compel them to perform them, otherwise than by the employment of a proper etiquette, addressing them with requests and treating them with respect.

Traditional societies of the Indian type are based on vocation. The vocation is sacred, and one's descendants in due course take one's place in the framework of society for the fulfilment of what is strictly speaking a ministrations (it was for exactly the same reason that Plato held that we owe it to society to beget successors). If the Indian has no children, this can be remedied by adoption; but if one's children adopt another profession than their father's, that is the end of the "family" as such; its honor is no more, and that holds as much for the lowest as for the highest

OUR MEN WANT BOOKS★

SEND
ALL YOU CAN SPARE

That book you've enjoyed—pass it along to a man in uniform. Leave it in the nearest collection center or public library for the 1943 VICTORY BOOK CAMPAIGN.

partisan review

"THE NEW FAILURE OF NERVE"

John Dewey, Sidney Hook and Ernest Nagel

Beginning a series of articles analyzing the reactionary and obscurantist tendencies gathering force in the cultural world today: the revolt against reason and scientific method; the revival of supernaturalism; the new socio-theology of Original Sin.

Other Features: "Of this Time, of that Place," a long story by Lionel Trilling ... "The Skin of Our Teeth," a theatre chronicle by Mary McCARTHY ... "Relations of Painting and Sculpture" (Illustrated) by George L. K. MOHR.

INTRODUCTORY OFFER: FOUR ISSUES FOR $1.00

PARTISAN REVIEW,
45 Astor Place, New York City

Enclosed is $1. Please send me the "New Failure of Nerve" issue and the following three issues. (Add 15c for Canada; 30c for other foreign countries; single copy: 35c; FULL YEAR: $1.50.)

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

functionaries of the hierarchy. As Margaret Mead in her recent book, "And Keep Your Powder Dry," has shown, the reverse situation in America, where "success" is thought of only in terms of social ambition and one therefore chooses a profession in which one can outshine one's parents, has precisely this destructive effect.

From the Indian point of view, social function or vocation is predetermined by a man's own innermost nature; and for that reason "success" in the Indian sense of self-perfecting is only possible in that type of activity to which one has been "called." On the other hand, as Margaret Mead has also pointed out, "the man who has shifted, easily and unworried so long as the pay was good, from one job to another, has no deep respect for himself." From an Indian point of view, to be able to adopt any profession at will, merely as a job and in order to earn money, as if the profession had nothing to do with one's innermost character, can only lead, in the words of René Guénon, to "the pure and 'inorganic' multiplicity of a kind of social atomism, and . . . to the exercise of a purely mechanical activity in which nothing properly human subsists."

The disastrous effects of Western contacts on traditional societies lie just there—that the vocational basis of the society is destroyed, and the worker reduced to the status of a "job man," usually a mere producer of raw materials; and if it may appear on the surface to be the European's arrogance that earns him the dislike of the Oriental, it is this destruction of his honor that even more, although perhaps less consciously, arouses the Oriental's anger. As Gandhi has said, India has been ground down, not so much under the British heel, as under that of modern civilization.

I have not written this letter because I feel called upon to come to India's defense, which would be unnecessary; but because it has become so urgent a necessity for Americans to be able to meet the members of other civilizations without condescension. There is only too much danger that after this war is over, Americans may still believe that they have a civilizing mission. It would not be too much to say that the greatest cultural deficiency of Europeans at the present day is their inability to meet the members of other civilizations on equal terms. Peace will be impossible until the West abandons its self-righteousness and "proselytizing fury." Dr. Niebuhr's general treatment is very fair, but still he does not understand the Indian point of view as well as Indians understand the American. ANANDA K. COOMARASWAMY

Boston, Mass., January 5

I don't think it adequate to describe and justify the Hindu caste system purely in the idealistic terms of "hereditary service" or vocational dedication. The most basic class distinctions of India were formed from conquest. The word used for them denotes "color," and to this day a racial difference between the Aryan conquerors and the indigenous population is perpetuated in the caste system. Furthermore lower castes are subject to serious disabilities, economic, political, and cultural. The religious doctrine of transmigration frequently justifies caste injustices by which the conscience would be otherwise revolted. One might ask in conclusion in what sense the poor outcasts can achieve any sense of human dignity "based on vocation." REINHOLD NIEBUHR

New York, January 15

Parnassus in Jersey

Dear Sirs: A group of liberals, with an artistic and literary flair, have organized a social, discussion, and arts club in Jersey City. They lack sufficient funds to furnish their club rooms. Any generous and sympathetic reader who may care to donate furniture, pictures, paintings, prints, bric-a-brac, vases, drapes, books, etc., which might otherwise be discarded, is implored to communicate with the writer. We will gladly call for these donations, and put them to good use in a city where free discussion and cultural edification are sorely needed.

J. OWEN GRUNDY, President pro tem.
The Parnassus Club, Jersey City, N. J.
December 29

Negroes and the War

Dear Sirs: This is just a note of thanks for the publication of the article entitled Harlem at War by Charles Williams.

It is particularly fortunate that The Nation ran this article after the distorted one by Warren H. Brown in the Reader's Digest entitled A Negro Warns the Negro Press.

On the day Mr. Williams's article was published, I received a letter directly from Pearl Buck. This was a copy of the letter written to Mr. Angell, the president of the Council for Democracy. Miss Buck very vigorously took issue with the Warren Brown article.

It is particularly heart-warming to know that there are some people who understand Negro leadership and the Negro press—people who know that we are not against America but for it, and because we are for it so vigorously we want to share all of its burdens and all of its victories.

A. CLAYTON POWELL, JR.
New York, January 19

Sacco-Vanzetti Case

Dear Sirs: I am undertaking a study of the way in which the Sacco-Vanzetti case has contributed to American literature. If Nation readers know of any pertinent references, may I ask them to send them to me at the University of Texas?

G. LOUIS JOUGHIN
Austin, Tex., January 5

CONTRIBUTORS

HIRAM MOTHERWELL was formerly foreign correspondent for the Chicago Daily News. His article is a chapter of a new book, "The Peace We Fight For," to be published next month by Harper and Brothers.

W. ADOLPHE ROBERTS is the author of "The Caribbean," "The French in the West Indies," and other books.

PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN is director of the Committee on Army and Navy Religious Activities of the Jewish Welfare Board.

GAETANO SALVEMINI is the author of "Under the Axe of Fascism."

EDMUND WILSON is the author of "The Wound and the Bow: Seven Studies in Literature," "Note-Books of Night," and other volumes.

MILDRED ADAMS has for many years been closely in touch with cultural affairs in Spain and Latin America.

M. W. FODOR was for many years foreign correspondent of the Manchester Guardian and the Chicago Daily News. He now writes a column on international affairs for the Chicago Sun.

ROLPHE HUMPHRIES has recently published a book of verse entitled "Out of the Jewel."

HANS ERNEST FRIED, author of "The Guilt of the German Army," is in the Department of Government of the College of the City of New York.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 6, 1943

NUMBER 6

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 181

EDITORIALS

Anti-Climax in Morocco 184
Farm Prices and Wages 185
Hull and the Press 186

ARTICLES

Capital Notes by I. F. Stone 187
Burma and Our Pacific Strategy
by Donald W. Mitchell 189
The Truth About the A. P.—I. Growth of a News
Trust by Keith Hutchison 190
Woolcott and Fourier by Edmund Wilson 194
The Jews of Europe. IV. The Case for Zionism
by Philip S. Bernstein 196
In the Wind 200

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

The Führer-Makers by Alfred Kantorowicz 201
Japan's Racial War by Selden C. Menefee 203
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 204
File and Remember 205

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Literature of the Third Reich by Eric Russell Bentley 206
William James by Jacques Barzun 208
The Poetry of Mark Van Doren
by Robert Penn Warren 209
"Heroic Historian" by Louis Filler 211
Dali's Autobiography by H. P. Lazarus 212
In Brief 213
Records by B. H. Haggin 213

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 214

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART
Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Drama Critic

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Notice to Our Readers

The Nation is making every effort to serve its subscribers and newsstand readers as promptly as possible. Although the magazine is mailed regularly every Wednesday evening, you may find that your copies sometimes do not reach you promptly. If they are delayed, the reason is war-time curtailment of transportation. We sincerely regret any delay and the inconvenience it may cause.

The Shape of Things

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS CAN buy two medium tanks or it can treat Martin Dies to another two years of self-seeking publicity. It can give our men in Tunis two 155-mm field guns or it can be spent by Mr. Dies on knifing their government back home. Representative Cox of Georgia has introduced a resolution to continue the life of the Dies committee through 1944. Even if Dies's motives were the best, that would be a scandalous waste of public funds. "We now have three highly competent agencies all working together—the FBI, the Army Intelligence, and the Navy Intelligence," as the Attorney General of the United States has pointed out. "It is always a pity to have this amateur stuff developed by Mr. Dies or any other individual." Dies has fulfilled his responsibilities with an incompetence that borders on the criminally negligent. The powers given him to track down subversive elements he has shamelessly used to vilify patriotic men and women whose liberal views are politically distasteful to him. Time and again he has come before Congress and promised to reform, but he has never kept his word. Last July he promised a thousand-page exposé of Nazi activities in the United States. The report was prepared but never issued. Instead he comes before Congress now with a list of forty names of government employees whom he calls "crackpots and radical bureaucrats," every one of whom has been devoting his energies to the winning of the war while Martin Dies has been engaged in sabotaging the morale of the country. We intend to deal with this subject more fully next week. Meanwhile, if you resent this scandalous misuse of taxes, let your Congressman know about it in terms he can't forget.

THERE IS NO NEED TO MEET HITLER'S proclamation with detailed refutation of its preposterous argument. No need even to remark upon its weak-spirited gloom. Gone is the exultation. Absent is the martial spirit. Everything in this document is in contrast with the dignity, say, of Churchill's appeals in times of stress. Even the political tricks are stale. By implication Hitler offers us the choice of a Europe overrun by the Bolsheviks or a negotiated peace. It is too naive. The world has seen who is the destroyer. Then, having tested the force of this vain appeal within his own furtive mind, as it were, Hitler suddenly mutters, "In this war there will be neither victor nor vanquished but only those who survive and those who are destroyed." Some have seen in this a repetition of the old threat of the Nazis to slam the door of history, if they are driven from the scene, with such violence as will horrify the world. But note how this man stumbles in his appeal to the German people—shouting one minute that Germany will surge on to victory and muttering the next that there will be no victory on either side! The wretched interjection may be a threat, but most likely it was a case of strained nerves. He cannot take it. There is so much he will have to take. The Russians have not yet finished with him, and we have hardly begun. *

FOR ALL THE HANDSHAKING THAT WENT on at Casablanca, it was evident from the first communiqué that all Gaul would continue to be divided in three parts. Part One is governed by General De Gaulle, who insists that fascists be eliminated from power along with the Vichy laws which they administer as his price for joining forces with Part Two. Part Two is governed by General Giraud, who lays down as the pre-condition of unity with Part One the complete merging of the De Gaulle army into his own fighting forces in North Africa. He is opposed to Vichy law, he says, though he would move slowly to eliminate it; but he makes distinctions among Vichy men, seeing a villain in Laval and a patriot in Peyrouton. Part Three, the 40,000,000 people of metropolitan France, suffers in a dazed helplessness. According to Count de Bois Lambert, who escaped from a French jail just in time to accompany De Gaulle to Casablanca, Part Three is alarmed at the power retained by such patriots as Peyrouton and Noguès in the very presence of the liberating army from America. "Extremist reactions," said Bois Lambert, "are to be feared in such conditions." Evidence accumulates to justify their fears. General Giraud has impressed correspondents with his sincerity, but also, says Drew Middleton, he has "astonished them with his political ignorance." One must be ignorant indeed to treat as a French patriot the man who served as Himmler to the Marshal and who from his retreat in Argentina assailed all Fighting Frenchmen as "cowards and traitors." Only the valor of ignorance, in fact, could allow General Giraud, brought to power by the bayonets of the United Nations, to announce that democracy and decent treatment of the Jews in his domain are internal questions, "in which the world as a whole has no interest."

✱

THE FINNISH GOVERNMENT, IT IS REPORTED, has proposed a Finnish-Swedish alliance. Helsinki's intention cannot be mistaken. As the Russian advance continues, hope of Finnish victory disappears. Finland, therefore, must make defensive treaties—against whom? Some commentators have pointed out the danger from Germany; yet Sweden surely could not be of much assistance against the Reich. Other commentators, remembering that in 1940 Moscow strongly objected to Finland's attempt to form a Baltic alliance, have suggested that the proposed pact would be one way of winning some anti-Axis support should the Soviets prove vindictive. Peace is in the Finnish air. Mannerheim has refused to become a candidate for the Presidency; the pro-German, anti-American Finnish Foreign Minister will shortly be pushed out of office. The people are weary of a useless war. The London Daily Mail even reports that Helsinki has asked the Papacy to act as go-between. Yet formal peace is obviously impossible until the Russians have driven the Nazis from the nearby Baltic shores. When that has been done, Soviet demands will probably not be too severe, especially as the Finns are said to be willing to accept the 1940 frontiers established after the Soviet invasion.

✱

TAKING ADVANTAGE OF THE CIVIL WAR IN Yugoslavia, the Germans on January 23 launched a new campaign, apparently directed against Mihailovich's forces alone. This may indicate that Berlin believes the Chetniks to be more vulnerable and more easily isolated from the people than the Partisan forces. The immediate result was a crop of rumors concerning a possible ending of the civil war. Noticeably absent from the British Communist press were the customary attacks on Mihailovich. Sources in Berne have reported that a deal is about to be made between the powerful Constituent Assembly, virtually the new Yugoslav government, and the royal government-in-exile. On the other hand, the London correspondent of the New York Times wires that matters are no better than they were. But, despite reports, London is not intransigently backing the royal government's foreign policy or its attitude toward the Partisans. And Moscow is probably less interested in the formation of a Yugoslav Soviet state after the war than it is in preparing for easy collaboration with United Nations forces should they invade the Balkans. Knowing that governments, temporary or otherwise, are established by invading armies, Moscow would probably prefer a friendlier collaborator than a restored royal government might prove to be.

LAST WEEK'S MAN-POWER HEARINGS BEFORE the Senate Military Affairs Committee indicated that the armed forces are determined to go through with their program calling for a substantial increase in army and navy personnel in 1943. Present plans call for a total of approximately 10,420,000 to be enrolled in the armed services by the end of the year—8,200,000 in the army, and about 2,220,000 in the navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard. Many observers, inside and outside of Congress, are still unconvinced of the necessity for withdrawing such a large additional number of workers from civilian production this year, and it is not yet certain that the President will indorse the recommendations of the services. In the course of his report to Congressional leaders on Casablanca he is said to have estimated that an army of 7,500,000 would suffice to finish the job. The higher figure desired by the services could be borne by the economy but only if far more drastic steps are taken to mobilize man-power for factories and farms. Mr. McNutt is again talking of drafting workers in non-essential occupations, and there is likely to be a revival of plans for saving labor by compulsory standardization of civilian goods. A necessary preliminary, however, to constructive action is a coordination of the overlapping government authorities concerned in man-power and the mobilization of economic resources such as is provided for by the Kilgore-Pepper bill. And, incidentally, a consolidation of legislative committees dealing with the subject might help to dispel confusion.

✱

THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE has reported out the Hobbs bill, which would make unions subject to penalties of the Anti-Racketeering Act of 1934. Heads of unions whose members are convicted of interfering with interstate shipments of any kind would be liable under this bill to twenty years' imprisonment and a fine of $10,000. Thus, in effect, all strikes, picketing, or soliciting for union membership affecting truck, railway, or express service would be outlawed. Although labeled as an anti-racketeering measure, the bill obviously has nothing to do with rackets as such. Its one purpose is to break labor unions in so far as this can be done by federal law. A similar, though milder, measure was reported out by the Judiciary Committee at the last session of Congress but was kept from the House floor by public pressure. This year, however, the strengthened anti-labor forces are obviously hoping to rush the bill through as a Peglerian anti-racketeering measure before its implications are generally realized. No hearings were held, and the committee's action was taken in an executive session. Undemocratic tactics of this kind can best be countered by the traditional democratic methods of widespread publicity and the utmost popular pressure on Congress.

IN THE LETTER COLUMNS OF THE NEW YORK Times one day last week there appeared a communication under the head, "Mr. Wolfert States Position. Upholds His Report of Conditions as He Found Them on Guadalcanal." In the interests of accuracy the caption might have read: "Times Caught in Flagrant Deception. Distorted Correspondent's Report but Sees No Need for Apology." The letter was Ira Wolfert's painfully restrained complaint about the leading editorial in the Times of January 25, purporting to compare Captain Eddie Rickenbacker's version of how the men on Guadalcanal Island feel about the post-war world with the version set forth by Mr. Wolfert in The Nation of January 23. In his article Wolfert described a "bull session" on the island in which an enlightened if somewhat crudely formulated point of view was expressed by one of the marines. After the marine spoke, Wolfert wrote, "somebody said something about a soapbox," and when the colonel followed up by expressing the view that the marine's dream was fine but impossible of realization, "the sudden lift of the crowd disappeared and gave way to a vague restlessness." The Times editorial writer made it appear that the soapbox jibe was addressed to Wolfert, who had made similar remarks several days earlier, and that it was his speech that produced the "vague restlessness." He went on from there to compare Mr. Wolfert's position with that of the Popular Front in France, "which also stirred up a 'vague restlessness' among the French masses that in the end led to the French collapse." Ira Wolfert's reputation as an objective newspaperman can probably withstand the Times's picture of him as a Popular Front soapboxer among the troops. The reputation of the Times for objectivity is left on somewhat shakier ground.

✱

THE AMERICAN-HUNGARIAN FEDERATION, which held a public meeting in Bridgeport, Connecticut, last Sunday, was founded some years ago by Ivan Nagy, emissary of the Hungarian Goebbels, Dr. Antal. It is composed of various mutual-aid and insurance societies. Its members are not interested in politics; its leaders are, as they proved by taking an active part in the congress, held in Budapest in 1938, of the World Federation of Hungarians, which bears a striking resemblance to the Bund der Auslandsdeutschen. The congress demonstrated for revisionism and the German alliance. The American-Hungarian Federation, which, as its president once said, "is not anti-German but pro-Hungary," is still part of the World Federation. Yet the Bridgeport meeting was honored by a message from Assistant Secretary of State A. A. Berle, Jr. He spoke of the "Nazi tyranny which is today plundering Hungary and sending Hungarians by thousands to die on the Russian plains." We had thought it was Horthy who was sending Hungarians to die on the Russian plains. But wait. It seems that Horthy, having lost faith in a Nazi victory, would now renounce the German alliance and become the "Danubian Darlan." Perhaps Mr. Berle was just being "expedient" in omitting mention of the fact that we are at war with Horthy's Hungary.

*

DUN AND BRADSTREET SEEM TO HAVE BEEN hired by the army as an investigating agency. One of our editors had a call from a Dun and Bradstreet representative asking about an applicant for a commission. The investigator wanted to know if the person in question came of "an American background" and was surprised to hear that the applicant already had his commission. "An American background" is sometimes a euphemism for something else. What this something else is may be illustrated by the report recently given to us of a conversation between a Naval Intelligence investigator and a government employee. The investigator was a woman, and finally got to the question, "What is his racial extraction?" "I don't know what you mean," was the answer. "Well, you know," the investigator said, "is he Italian or Spanish or Jewish or anything like that?" "I never asked about his parents' nationality," was the reply; "naturally he himself is American." "Come now," the investigator said impatiently, "you know what I mean. Is he Anglo-Saxon?"

*

PROBABLY A GOOD DEAL OF THE EVIL THAT Governor Talmadge did lives after him in Georgia, but in one instance, at least, it has been undone. The Board of Regents has voted to reemploy, as president of Georgia Teachers College, Dr. Marvin S. Pittman, who was ousted, along with Dean Walter D. Cocking of the University of Georgia School of Education, in the course of one of Talmadge's rampages on "white supremacy." Enrolment in the Georgia Teachers College had dropped 50 per cent because the Southern Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools withdrew the accredited standing of the Georgia university system. Dr. Pittman will apparently return. Dr. Cocking, runs the report, has no desire to go back to Georgia at this time. We hardly blame him.

*

IN AN EFFORT TO BOOST NEGRO MORALE the OWI is distributing 2,000,000 copies of a booklet entitled "Negroes and the War." Lavishly illustrated, it describes what American Negroes are doing in agriculture, industry, and the armed services, outlines progress made by Negroes in all fields during recent years, and refers to the achievements of outstanding Negro citizens. In addition, it discusses what an American victory will mean to Negroes and what they have to lose if the Axis triumphs. The OWI has done an intelligent and sincere job, and it is not its fault that other government departments persist in tearing down the edifice it is trying to build. The latest example of sabotage to come to light is the army's undermining of its much-advertised program for training Negro pilots and other air-force personnel. Unable to make any headway against prejudice, Judge William H. Hastie has resigned as civilian aide to Secretary of War Stimson, charging that the air force has not wanted Negro personnel from the beginning and that it is influenced by "wholly unscientific notions that race somehow controls a man's capacities and aptitudes." More than two years ago, Judge Hastie recalls, a plan for a segregated training center at Tuskegee was submitted to him. His detailed objections were ignored, and since then no projects affecting Negroes have been referred to him by the air command. Meanwhile, he says, Negro volunteers for the ground forces have been organized in "aviation squadrons (separate)" "without any specific military duties but with odd jobs of common labor the characteristic assignment." While attitudes like this persist, the best efforts of the OWI can hardly be expected to bear much fruit.

Anti-Climax in Morocco

CASABLANCA was a big story, but it did not quite match its build-up; so that the actual release of the news of the latest Anglo-American conference produced a general sense of anti-climax. The official communiqué was lavish in giving names of participants, but very sparing in its details of discussions and decisions. Correspondents on the spot did their best, but their combined efforts could only produce a colorful background to a very incomplete picture. Of course, any meeting between the war leaders of the two Western democracies is news in itself, and its dramatic interest was heightened by President Roosevelt's unprecedented flight. We can all applaud his physical courage and his disregard of conventions.

But when that is said we must record our feeling that Casablanca represents a great but fumbled opportunity. In an editorial in last week's Nation we commented on some of the obviously inspired stories which preceded the release of news of the conference and, with more optimism than discretion, suggested that the United Nations might be about to develop a political and military strategy based on real union. These stories were something more than reportorial wishful thinking. They came from several sources in Washington and London and were clearly based on inside tips. Yet the event showed that as forecasts of the Casablanca decisions they were wide of the mark.

It had been indicated, for instance, that all four of the great allied powers were engaging in the discussions;

it turned out that once again global strategy was being considered in an Anglo-American framework. It is true that the British and American governments were not alone responsible for this disappointment. Stalin was invited, apparently in the most cordial terms, to join Messrs. Roosevelt and Churchill, and an offer was made to suit his convenience by shifting the venue of the conference much farther east. The reason given for his refusal is that he was fully occupied directing the great Russian offensive, and this is a perfectly valid explanation. But if Stalin could not attend the meeting personally, could he not have been represented by some leading member of the Soviet government or at least have sent a qualified military observer? No entirely satisfactory answer to this question has been given by any commentator on the conference, and we are left wondering if the U. S. S. R. still feels insufficiently certain of the goodwill of its allies. Some of the recent actions of the State Department, it must be admitted, are hardly calculated to allay Russian suspicions.

Another forecast, which proved without foundation, hinted at the early advent of a supreme United Nations War Council. Apparently, however, we are to continue as before, with local Anglo-American unity of command on fronts where forces are jointly engaged, but no over-all authority to decide the main lines of strategy. No doubt, if it is impossible to get the leaders of the Big Four around the same conference table, it is too much to hope for a supreme War Council.

The most satisfying parts of the Casablanca communiqué, despite their necessary vagueness, were the references to coming military actions. Aided by a galaxy of high officers, the American and British leaders reached complete agreement upon "war plans and enterprises to be undertaken during the campaigns of 1943 against Germany, Italy, and Japan with a view to drawing the utmost advantage from the markedly favorable turn of events at the close of 1942." So far as Europe is concerned, that favorable turn is represented by the pocketing of the Axis forces in a corner of Africa and the ever-increasing momentum of the Russian winter offensive. These successes, however, have still to be exploited: first, by completing the clearance of Africa and so opening the Mediterranean gateway into Fortress Europe; second, as the communiqué says, by drawing "as much weight as possible off the Russian armies." Clearly, every blow we land on the Axis in the Mediterranean contributes toward the relief of the Red Army. But it is doubtful whether the German defeat on the eastern front can be turned into demoralization without the application of Anglo-American pressure at some point nearer to the Reich itself. The Casablanca communiqué implies that some new front is in the making, and we look for an early substantiation of this hint.

The chief political announcement of the Casablanca conference did not receive any official form. It was the President's statement to the press that the keynote of the deliberations was "unconditional surrender" of the enemy. This is a good slogan which ought to put a severe damper on any peace-offensive moves which Hitler may have been contemplating. But we are regretfully unable to share Walter Lippmann's confidence that fixing "unconditional surrender" as our war aim means the unconditional doom of the Axis satellite regimes. The captive peoples of Europe, he continues, will now understand "that the future in each country lies, not with those who have collaborated with Germany, but with those among them who have resisted."

We agree that this is what "unconditional surrender" should imply, but the French African laboratory test suggests that we are far from arriving at any coherent war-and-peace-aims policy. The European peoples will judge us by deeds, and so long as these suggest that it is profitable to run with the Axis hare and hunt with the democratic hounds, we shall continue to gladden the hearts of Quislings while forcing our real allies within Europe to look for salvation toward Moscow. The fact that the Casablanca conferees failed apparently even to face this problem is the real measure of their failure to rise to their opportunities.

Farm Prices and Wages

WHILE news from the battlefields is on the whole encouraging, the defense of the home front has reached a critical stage. It begins to look as if the battle against inflation is being lost, that all we can hope for is a delaying action that will keep the front from collapsing completely. The most serious immediate threat comes from the farm bloc, which has pushed its bill for redefining parity through the House Agricultural Committee. It is predicted that the bill will be adopted quickly by the House and sent to the Senate, where sustained opposition is unlikely. Even the sponsors of the bill admit that it would bring a substantial increase in food costs. But they insist that the rise is necessary to stimulate the increase in food production which Food Administrator Wickard has requested for 1943.

Wickard's proposal to bring about this increase by paying a $100,000,000 subsidy to the producers of the needed protein crops has come under heavy fire from the farm-bloc Congressmen. They argue that the proposed subsidies are "inflationary" because, unlike higher prices, they encourage consumption. The purpose of the subsidies is of course to alleviate as far as possible the existing shortages in dairy products, meat, and legumes, and thereby improve the nutritive quality of America's war-time diet. A subsidy to the growers of fresh vegetables was announced earlier with the same end in view. Any large government expenditure is inflationary to a degree, but the payment of subsidies makes it possible to stimulate production without endangering existing price ceilings and to absorb through increased taxation the additional buying power created. Any further rise in prices, on the other hand, is bound to result in a demand for increased wages, thus setting off the spiral of inflation.

Increased food prices account for the bulk of the 22 per cent rise in living costs since August, 1939. Food prices are 33 per cent higher than before the war, and are continuing to rise at the rate of about 1 per cent a month. In view of this steady upward trend and of the farmers' demand for still higher prices, it is hardly surprising that organized labor is asking for a review of the Little Steel formula, which restricted wage increases to 15 per cent. The fact that the request is justified on the basis of common fairness does not make it less dangerous. Any substantial increase in wages is bound to be followed by renewed pressure for higher prices from the farm bloc. Already what might be called the employers' bloc is holding up the Treasury bill on the public-debt limit by insisting on a rider to repeal the $25,000 restriction on earned income after taxes. Yet rejection of labor's demand for revision of the Little Steel formula would almost certainly lead to a wave of strikes and disputes highly detrimental to the war effort.

In this difficult position the War Labor Board will undoubtedly try to stave off disaster by some compromise on the Little Steel formula. As a first step a 5 per cent increase in the cost-of-living allowance is being considered; this would permit wage increases up to 20 per cent above the January, 1941, level. But such action assumes that the Administration will crack down and permit no change in the parity formula and will find some way of at least slowing down the increase in food prices. Politically this will be very hard to achieve. Price Administrator Prentiss Brown has announced that he expects prices to continue to rise at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent a month, which seems optimistic. The vast reservoir of excess buying power that has been created by the war—totaling at least $50 billion—is bound to break through existing controls unless one of two things is done: either all consumers' goods must be so strictly rationed that the excess money can only be used for the purchase of war bonds, or the excess must be absorbed by taxation and compulsory savings. At the moment OPA policy seems to be headed, somewhat cautiously, toward the first of these alternatives. It is, however, an extremely hazardous and unpleasant course to follow. It presents immense problems of enforcement and plays into the hands of black-market dealers. The other alternative—drastic taxation—is politically unpopular, but appears to offer the only real hope of preserving our present wage-price ceilings and staving off inflation, which, as Bernard Baruch has said, is one of the most destructive consequences of war.

Hull and the Press

TO UNDERSTAND Secretary Hull's recent outbursts of peevishness over the press, one must understand the nature of State Department press conferences, which are stiff and musty affairs. Everyone stands. There is none of the good-humored give-and-take which exists in other departments and at the White House. The Secretary is not accustomed to be asked real questions, and the routine queries of department press conferences are answered in the vague phrases and ambiguous sentences of diplomatic communiqués. This language seems to come naturally to the Secretary.

The Secretary has not denied, because he has been unable truthfully to deny, recent stories in The Nation and PM on Bolivia and on North Africa. The overwhelming majority of American papers of all shades of opinion are critical of North African policy. Hull's moment of triumph at the time of the North African landing has dissolved into a dismal failure and left him and his moral pretensions discredited. He has sought to escape criticism by shifting responsibility for our African foreign policy to the War Department, the OWI, and the White House. At one and the same time he has accused his critics of not wanting information and has refused to answer questions when asked. As the Washington Post said in a leading editorial entitled Mr. Hull's Ire, these questions "are not answered by the slurring personalities in which the Secretary of State is by innuendo indulging or by the spleen which seems to characterize his latter-day discussions on high policy."

One of the innuendoes to which the Post referred was the Secretary's slur on Walter Lippmann. Another was his petty attack on our Washington editor, I. F. Stone. The Secretary uses questions planted with friendly reporters to permit the press to infer facts he will not take the responsibility for stating. It was of such a planted question that Stone asked whether the Secretary accepted the implication that the State Department opposed the Peyrouton appointment. Instead of replying, the Secretary asked his name and when told "Stone," asked, "You have some other name, too, have you not?" This was a reference to the fact that Stone was born Isidor Feinstein and that I. F. Stone is a pen name made legal several years ago. We know the Secretary is not anti-Semitic, but he has provided another incident on which papers of the type of the Chicago Tribune have seized to do a little dabbling in dirty waters. He has encouraged Congressional Jew-baiters like Rankin of Mississippi, who made Hull's remarks the occasion for a scurrilous attack on Stone from the floor of the House.

The affair does no credit to Cordell Hull. It is appalling that a Secretary of State should stoop to the level of a cheap and childish retort in his anxiety to evade a proper question.

Capital Notes

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 31

WHILE we announce the sending of a commission to Bolivia, one from Bolivia has already arrived in Washington. It is made up of the Big Three of tin—Patino, Hochschild, and Aramayo—and the purpose of their visit may be succinctly summarized as higher prices for themselves and lower wages for their workers. They may or may not find a friend in Joseph T. Rovensky, former vice-president of the Chase National Bank and former vice-president and director of the Patino mines. Rovensky says he has kept hands off tin since arriving in Washington in the middle of 1940 as right-hand man of Nelson Rockefeller. Rovensky is in charge of commercial relations at the Coordinator's office, and there is no evidence that he has played or will play any part in the tin situation. (Sometimes one wishes that the influence of the big business men here would work in reverse and that a man like Rovensky might buttonhole a few old associates and tell them of the Good Neighbor policy. I suppose I'm being naive again.)

The sending of a commission to Bolivia is something of a victory. Of the six members of the group I can report only on Judge Calvert Magruder, who will be chairman, and Robert J. Watt of the A. F. of L. Both are excellent appointments. The commission was picked at the State Department, and this may explain the absence of a C. I. O. member. One of its jobs should be to force the release of the forty Bolivian labor officials who are still in jail for their part in the recent tin strike. The appointment of a commission is an admission that the tin strike was not a Nazi plot but the result of genuine grievances; yet no step has been taken to reinstate in the Pan-American Union the official who had the courage to bring this situation forcibly to public attention. Ernest Galarza is looking for a job.

ANOTHER RECENT casualty among progressive officials is Gardner Jackson, a Shelleyan character whose rise and fall in Administration circles has become a political barometer. He has been fired by the Department of Agriculture, where he was special assistant to Under Secretary Paul H. Appleby. Though Jackson played a major part in making Secretary of Agriculture Claude A. Wickard Food Administrator, he was dropped in an effort to adjust the department's sails to big winds expected from the Dies committee. Jackson earned the hatred of the farm bloc by mobilizing labor counter-pressure to support the White House during the parity fight. Farm Bureau bigwigs hate him for splitting their own organization and for his work with the Farmers' Union. The big lumber interests regard him as an enemy for his work to revive abandoned sawmills and expand lumber production. Jackson was also marked for slaughter because he sided with Parisius and the friends of Farm Security.

A sample of Jackson's work was his campaign for the establishment of a $100,000,000 Forest Products Corporation to put idle sawmills to work. Some interested officials launched the idea last July, but the opposition of big lumber interests was strong. In November Jackson was called in. He dramatized the campaign with the help of Paul Rasmussen, who was formerly Floyd Olson's budget director and who now represents independent lumber owners in Minnesota. Rasmussen had come to the Agriculture Department to see if there were orders available for fabricating wood storage bins for farms. His group had had a contract for 2,000 but was unable to find the lumber in the yards of the Twin Cities. An engineer and woodsman was sent into the country; he found an abandoned lumber yard and mill and got farmers in the neighborhood to cut their timber. The idea of reviving these ghost mills offered a way not only to alleviate the lumber shortage but to increase farmer income. Jackson took Rasmussen around town to tell the story of this project and of the need for government funds to finance others like it. He ran into an obstacle in Ben Alexander, chief of the lumber and lumber-products branch of the War Production Board and president of the Masonite Corporation, which makes wall board. Alexander has big lumber holdings of his own on the coast and seemed to think there were too many lumber dealers already. A visit to one of Nelson's assistants and the announcement that Rasmussen would hold a press conference at the Mayflower and tell the whole story broke the log jam. Jackson was asked to postpone the press conference for twenty-four hours while Nelson himself had a chance to examine the facts. The WPB chairman agreed to the proposal, with some minor modifications, and the order establishing the corporation is now on the President's desk for signature. Obviously Jackson is a dangerous man.

THE OWI, with some of the ablest newspapermen in America working for it, has fought hard to be honest. Considering all its difficulties, it has succeeded to an amazing degree in telling the truth. Its long-awaited survey on war production in the Detroit area is a good example of dispassionate reporting in a situation where there was great pressure to indulge in ballyhoo. A sample is its treatment of Willow Run. "One of the spectacular plants that attract a lot of attention and discussion," the OWI reports, "is the Willow Run bomber plant built by the Ford Motor Company, thirty miles west of the city, which is beginning to produce giant bombers though still in relatively small volume. There have been many disappointments in connection with the Willow Run operation, and the plant, even now, is far from peak production." The report reveals the extraordinary labor turnover at Willow Run: "In November it hired 3,900 workers and lost 2,100." This is blamed on housing and transportation difficulties. When the full history of the war effort comes to be written, it will contain no more extraordinary chapter than Ford's insistence on placing Willow Run out "in the sticks" and at the same time successfully opposing the housing required for the necessary labor supply. It is hard to believe that an industrialist as able as Ford could have overlooked the crucial housing factor.

Credit for the report must also be given to the WPB officials who approved it before release. These certainly included Vice-Chairman Charles E. Wilson and probably also Chairman Donald M. Nelson. One of the items in the report which interested me most was the comparison of Detroit's war production with its civilian production. "The physical volume of this production," the report says, "is not as great as when passenger cars rolled off the assembly lines, but the value is as great." The report goes on to provide the first glimpse of war as compared with civilian prices. "A medium tank costs the government about $1.50 a pound—guns cost more—whereas a popular-priced automobile costs about 27 cents a pound." This comparison indicates that physical volume of war production must be far below civilian, and it is well to keep in mind that, except for the internecine warfare between Macy's and Gimbel's, battles are not won by dollar volume. Armament is, of course, more intricate than the automobile; it represents new production problems and requires more labor. But one reason for the increased labor cost is the waste and hoarding of man-power which come quickly to the attention of every visitor to Detroit. One wonders about some of these arms costs in view of the fact that while automobiles were built on machinery owned by the manufacturer, tanks, guns, and even jeeps are made largely on new machinery belonging to the government. Few prices are known, but those which come to light indicate that the cost accounting still takes little account of such intangibles as patriotism. The jeep, according to the war-stamp advertisements, costs about $1,000. Army officers to whom I have spoken think $400 would allow an ample profit.

THERE HAS BEEN a good deal of speculation here about the appearance of Sir Willmott Lewis, Washington correspondent of the London Times, as a witness for John O'Donnell of the New York Daily News in his successful $50,000 libel suit against J. David Stern, publisher of the Philadelphia Record and the Courier-Post. The suit took on the appearance of a political battle between Administration and anti-Administration elements. It arose over an editorial Stern wrote attacking O'Donnell as, among other things, a "Naziphile" because O'Donnell in April, 1941, printed a story declaring that American men-of-war were conveying lend-lease materials to England. The White House called the story "a deliberate lie." Lewis has long been regarded as a kind of unofficial British ambassador. Yet he came forward to help O'Donnell. The Stern newspapers supported aid to England after the war began; O'Donnell opposed it. Lewis testified that O'Donnell was anti-Administration rather than anti-British. This was magnanimous, but untrue. In the meantime the appeasement press, the three big papers in New York, Chicago, and Washington which seem anxious to play John the Baptist to an American fascism, are hailing the verdict against Stern as a great victory. These papers are also anti-British.

THE STATE DEPARTMENT marked the tenth anniversary of Hitler's accession to power by issuing a 510-page volume on National Socialism. Though the book contains little that is new about Hitler or Hitlerism, it tells us a good deal—by implication—about the department. Much of it might have been written by George Creel. The volume consists of two sections, a 350-page hodge-podge of documents and a 150-page "treatise" on National Socialism. The treatise sounds as though the four officials who wrote it were bored to death with their task and had no difficulty in maintaining a diplomatically correct objectivity. The treatise ends with what the authors seem to think is a clincher, a quotation from a Berlin short-wave broadcast asserting that "National Socialism is a matter of the racial German." The authors seem not only to expose but to adopt this not too novel thesis. Their discussion of Nazi ideology, program, and methods occupies but 62 pages and exhibits a chaste unawareness of economics. Nazism is presented as a German racial phenomenon. The department traces Hitlerism, as it once traced Kaiserism, back to Herder and Hegel. Bernhardt is here again and "Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche (1844-1900), whose writings . . . glorified the blond Teuton beast." One sentence haunts me, "After the Nazis had gained power in Germany," the authors declare, "their spokesmen stated clearly that their program was not composed of temporary measures, as some German circles had been led to believe." I found myself turning back to that sentence and thinking of our own temporary expedients in French North Africa.

Burma and Our Pacific Strategy

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

SINCE our naval victories in November, the fighting in the southern Pacific has been relatively unexciting. The United States has made its position in the Solomons reasonably secure and has had well-deserved but minor successes in New Guinea. Further nibbling by MacArthur is likely, but can hardly be of great importance since the forces at his disposal are small. A major naval offensive awaits new plane carriers. These should be completed within the next several months. With American effort centered on the defeat of Germany, it is improbable that an immediate large-scale attack will be planned in the Pacific.

With a deadlock in the islands, southeastern Asia has become the most important sector of the war in the Far East. Here continued air fighting, a Japanese drive into the southern part of Yunnan Province, and a British push into Burma indicate more important action ahead. The strategic background in this area has changed considerably since disaster in Burma rewarded a poorly managed Allied defense in May, 1942. Save in the air, China is weaker than a year ago, the trickle of supplies formerly reaching it by the Burma road having dwindled to occasional drops brought in by plane. In response to the situation, Japan has transferred numerous divisions to Manchoukuo, but it still has not decided that the moment is propitious to attack the Soviet Union. Its strength in the air has passed the high-water mark; both its planes and its pilots seem to be definitely inferior to those of a year ago and are less numerous. The Bay of Bengal, in which Japanese sea power once scored startling triumphs, is now empty of naval vessels and has become a kind of watery no man's land. In India Wavell has been enormously strengthened, especially with mechanized troops and planes.

The operations in Yunnan and Burma cannot be counted major campaigns but are rather in the nature of preliminary moves. Japan's aim seems to be to reduce still further the supplies reaching China by taking Kunming and other stopping-points along the line of air transport. The initial failure of its attempt can be credited in part to the stubborn Chinese resistance and the mountainous terrain, but more to General Clare Chenault's American air force, which demolished enemy bases of supply. The performance of this unit, operating against an able opponent and under unusual conditions, has been one of the most brilliant feats of the war. Despite reverses, the Japanese have apparently not abandoned their project.

The tremendous difficulties faced by a British campaign in Burma can be summed up in two words—topography and transportation. Burma is separated from India by some of the most rugged mountains to be found in any tropical country on the globe, and the movement of men and weapons would encounter greater natural obstacles there than in any of the areas so far penetrated, save possibly New Guinea. These difficulties might be avoided by the use of sea and air transport, but a successful large-scale invasion by sea would either have to surprise the enemy or be made under the cover of naval and air supremacy, or meet both conditions. It would also require a great deal of shipping. The balance of air power is inclining heavily in our favor, but the availability of enough ships is more doubtful, even though the haul is relatively short. Man-power should present no problem, since Wavell, at least on paper, has over a million men at his disposal. The vitally important question of whether the British armies and such American and Chinese units as might be used have the tactical skill and leadership to meet the experienced jungle fighters of Japan on even terms can be answered only in combat. Reports indicate that Wavell is fully conscious of this problem and is pushing the attack on Akyab partly to develop improved transportation methods and tactics in difficult country.

The recapture of Burma offers many advantages. Bases would be made available for direct attacks on Thailand and Malaya. Regaining the Burmese oil reserves would be a definite benefit to the United Nations, though their loss would not greatly affect the Japanese as long as they hold the Dutch fields. The reopening of the Burma road would allow more supplies to be sent to China, which could again become an important factor in the war.

The advocates of a strong air war have been especially eager to retake Burma. They point to the indecisiveness of the present sea fighting in the Pacific and urge an air attack on Japan from continental bases. This suggested strategy deserves careful consideration. The difficulties of island-hopping as a means of defeating Japan are obvious. Is the method urged by the air-power school any more promising?

A glance at a map of Asia and a little sober calculation show us that heavy air attacks on Japan from continental bases is not now feasible and cannot be made easy. The Siberian bases glibly suggested by some enthusiasts are still pure fantasy. They will not be available until war breaks out between Japan and the Soviet Union or until the German threat is liquidated. We should, however, keep this eventuality in mind and be prepared to take immediate advantage of any developments in the northwestern Pacific.

The only other possible bases are the Chinese-held airfields to the south, which are also within bombing distance of Japan. The failure to use them is due simply to the difficulty of transporting men, planes, and supplies to them. The opening of the Burma road as a line of land transport would not entirely solve this problem in logistics, since the road was always an emergency route of limited carrying capacity.

These considerations do not prove that a campaign to smash Japan from the skies will not some day be worth trying, but they do indicate that it is no simple undertaking. If any lesson of the war has been firmly established by events it is that attacks on industrial objectives must be continuous and made in great force if they are to be effective. Winning and adequately supplying bases for such large-scale attack would first necessitate the defeat of Japanese land power not only in Burma but in Malaysia and Sumatra and conceivably in the Philippines as well, the wresting of air and sea control over the South China Sea from Japan, large-scale transportation of supplies by sea to convenient bases, and overwhelming superiority in bombardment aviation. When these conditions can be met, Japan will be well on the way to defeat irrespective of the possible effect of mass bombings.

A campaign in southeastern Asia must also be viewed in terms of the entire Pacific strategy of the United Nations. Up to the present that has been one of attrition rather than decisive action. Since our galling early defeats we have attempted to whittle down Japan's strength in the air and at sea while increasing our own. By our attacks and the enemy's fruitless efforts to recover lost ground we have inflicted severe losses—though not without risks and losses on our side, too. Although we have achieved considerable local success in both New Guinea and the Solomons it has now been six months since we opened the latter campaign. For some time we have not been forcing the Japanese to risk heavy losses in an attempt to beat off threatening attacks. Our war of attrition has become relatively passive, and we have already allowed the enemy too much time for strengthening his outposts and consolidating his gains.

It is useless to urge attacks when the military means of implementing them do not exist. But that is not the actual situation. We have in the Pacific at present the bulk of our navy, a nucleus of military strength, and superior air power. Perhaps this strength is not sufficient for an all-out attack, but certainly it is adequate for waging a more active campaign to wear down Japanese strength, and unless it is so used the task of decisively defeating Japan will steadily approach the impossible.

The Truth About the A. P.

I. GROWTH OF A NEWS TRUST

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

A PHILOSOPHER of the seventeenth century is reported to have said: "If a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws of a nation." Substitute "news" for "ballads," and this apothegm is brought right up to date, as men in all parts of Europe today have learned the hard way. Listening to the whisperings of forbidden radios, desperately seeking information not "made" by their conquerors, they know so well the connection between "news" and freedom that they risk their lives daily to snatch it from the air and pass it on to their fellows. We in America can barely imagine either their plight or their passion. For constantly exposed to news in huge volume and variety, we take it for granted much as we take the air we breathe, accepting far too readily the guaranties of purity offered by its purveyors.

News is the oxygen of democratic society, and our form of government cannot long endure if the supply is impeded or allowed to suffer contamination. If any group, by force or fraud, obtains the right to dictate our news, that group will soon dictate our laws. And the danger is nearer than most people realize, for, to paraphrase a famous parliamentary protest to Charles I, the concentration of control over the news has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished.

The main instrument of that concentration is the Associated Press, the news agency with tentacles reaching around the world which for some fifty years has operated to restrict the flow of new blood into the newspaper business. Now this organization has been charged, in a complaint filed by the Department of Justice, with "combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade and commerce in news, information, and intelligence among the several states." More particularly, it is asserted, the A. P. supplies news only to its members and maintains insuperable barriers against applicants who compete with newspapers already within its fold; further, by virtue of exclusive contracts with its members for furnishing local news, it unfairly handicaps other agencies. It will become clear in the course of these articles that the department has understated rather than overstated the case against the A. P.

The answer to the complaint filed by the defendant not only denies all charges but declares that they are "based upon a construction of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and the Clayton Act which violates the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States in that, if the judgment prayed for herein were granted, it would abridge the freedom of the press." In short, it adopts the stereotyped offensive-defensive of the publishing industry whenever it is asked to comply with a law it finds inconvenient. In a case arising out of the discharge of Morris Watson, an A. P. employee and member of the American Newspaper Guild, counsel for the A. P. asserted that the Wagner Act was invalid because it was "a direct and palpable" invasion of freedom of the press. But a majority of the Supreme Court, in a decision delivered by Justice Roberts, dismissed this argument as irrelevant and unsound. The same plea was also raised in vain by newspapers contesting the government demand for disclosure of ownership in connection with second-class mailing privileges.

American newspapers are quite rightly zealous protectors of the freedom of the press, but they have served as its guardians for so long that they have come to believe that the First Amendment is practically their private property. They forget that freedom of the press means properly freedom for a press and that it involves not merely the right of established newspapers to operate without a government license but the right of any member of the public to buy or hire a press and print any matter for which he is prepared to take responsibility. Constant vigilance may be necessary to insure that this right is not curtailed by government action, but we must be equally on guard against a more insidious danger—its restriction by means of private monopoly. And if the Department of Justice's complaint against the A. P. is well founded, that danger is already a reality.

THE A. P.'S WAR OF NERVES

A special "expediting court" of three judges with Judge Learned Hand presiding has been appointed to hear this anti-trust suit, and to their judgment the case might well have been left. The Associated Press and its publisher-owners have, however, shown themselves unwilling to abide by the judicial process, and they have been fighting the case in the newspapers and in Congress. I have on my desk a large red volume twelve by nine inches, weighing over four pounds. It is a sample of the propaganda which the Associated Press has been distributing and might be described as the report of a packed grand jury. Within its covers are facsimile reproductions of hundreds of editorials drawn from newspapers which, because of their membership in the A. P., have a material interest in the dismissal of the government's complaint.

Very little of this selected comment is devoted to any attempt to argue the merits of the complaint. Instead, we have that traditional corollary of a weak case—monotonous abuse of the plaintiff's attorney, Thurman Arnold, who must be remembering wryly the praise he received from many of the same papers when he attacked monopolistic practices of labor unions. In addition we have charges that the action is inspired by a political feud and allegations of a deep-laid New Deal plot to assassinate freedom of the press, together with flowery tributes to the beauty of the "cooperative" system evolved by the A. P. and hyperbolic claims for the purity of its motives and its methods.

In Congress, resolutions have been introduced by Representative Paul Shafer of Michigan and Representative Harness of Indiana asking for an investigation of "the circumstances preceding the filing" of the anti-trust suit. Another Congressman, W. Sterling Cole of New York, has called upon Attorney General Biddle to suspend prosecution of the case under a law providing for postponing anti-trust actions if they "would seriously interfere in the prosecution of the war." It is hard to see by what process of reasoning the A. P. case can be fitted into this category.

There might be something to be said for a Congressional investigation provided it included a thorough airing of the unprecedented propaganda campaign which is being carried on by interested parties. But Representatives Shafer and Harness have made it clear that their intention is to use such an inquiry to smear the Administration and to spread the myth, assiduously cultivated by A. P. newspapers, that the suit is solely designed to force the A. P. to reverse itself and open its ranks to Marshall Field's Chicago Sun. The truth is that denial of membership to the Sun figures in the suit only because Mr. Field is the first man for many years who has been willing and able to incur the financial risks of bucking monopoly by starting a morning newspaper in a big city dominated by an A. P. publication.

Representing as it does more than 1,200 newspapers, including almost all those in the morning field with more than 10,000 circulation, the A. P. can, of course, lobby very effectively. Most Congressmen appreciate publicity, and few can disregard entirely the influence of their home newspapers. Moreover, at least one Representative, Ellsworth of Oregon, and four Senators, Glass and Byrd of Virginia and Capper and Reed of Kansas, are owners or part-owners of newspapers enjoying the A. P. franchise.

What can be the purpose of this campaign of combined press propaganda and political pressure? Since the A. P. can hardly hope to sway the decision of the court, the only possible conclusion is that it fears a trial of the issues and is therefore attempting by means of a war of nerves to bully the Department of Justice into withdrawing the suit. A bitter and fateful day for American democracy will dawn if it succeeds, for it will mean that a combination of press lords has proved able to put itself above the law.

BLACKBALL AND BLACKLIST

The A. P. can trace its ancestry back to 1848, when six New York publishers made an agreement to pool telegraphic and foreign news, but it only assumed its present shape in 1893. According to Oliver Gramling, author of "A. P.—the Story of the News," which can be regarded as approved by the organization, the foundation of the Associated Press of Illinois in that year was the outcome of a revolt by Western publishers against a corrupt alliance between the Associated Press of New York and a commercial agency called the United Press (no relation of the present U. P.). There are widely different accounts extant of the ensuing struggle between the two groups, but we need not concern ourselves here with who double-crossed whom.

The Western group of publishers pictured themselves, and no doubt quite sincerely, as champions of free enterprise fighting an attempt to organize a press trust. One of their number, James E. Scripps of Detroit, stated the issue thus: "Shall the newsgathering business be permitted to fall into the hands of a syndicate of mercenary sharks . . . or shall the newspapers continue, as in the past, to cooperate in the collection of their own news and to enjoy the advantages of controlling the service and getting it at actual cost." Urged on by such eloquent speeches, the Westerners decided to raise a fighting fund and invade the enemy's territory. A period of intense competition followed, but in four years the alleged monopolists of the United Press had been put out of business by a bigger and better monopoly.

The A. P. of Illinois was organized as an exclusive club. It admitted only proprietors of a newspaper to membership and divided these into two classes, "A" and "B," with the former given the right to blackball any new candidate for membership operating in their territory. Every member, however, was required to execute a contract agreeing to supply local news exclusively to the corporation and to abide by the by-laws, of which the most significant was as follows:

Article XI, Section 8. Sale or purchase of specials.—No member shall furnish or permit anyone to furnish its special or other news to, or shall receive news from, any person, firm, or corporation which shall have been declared by the Board of Directors to be antagonistic to the association, and no member shall furnish news to any person, firm, or corporation engaged in the business of collecting or transmitting news, except with the written consent of the Board of Directors.

Compliance with this article was enforced by the threat of suspension or expulsion of member papers, and their employees were subjected to blacklisting if they were found having any dealings with a competing agency. In 1898, however, the Chicago Inter-Ocean challenged this by-law by printing dispatches of the Laffan News Bureau, an organization which had been declared "antagonistic." It was duly suspended, but seeking legal redress, it finally obtained from the Supreme Court of Illinois an opinion declaring not only that the section of the by-laws of the A. P. of Illinois quoted above was null and void but that:

The appellee corporation being engaged in a business upon which a public interest is engrafted, upon principles of justice it can make no distinction with respect to persons who wish to purchase information and news, for purposes of publication, which it was created to furnish. . . . Its obligation to serve the public is not one resting on contract, but grows out of the fact that it is in the discharge of a public duty, or of a private duty which has been so conducted that a public interest is attached thereto.

This decision, which, in effect, treated the A. P. as a public utility, destroyed its usefulness as a publishers' protective society and proved a shattering blow to its members. They agreed that it was "impracticable to conduct a press association on the basis indicated by the court, the exclusive character of the news being an essential element of its value and incentive to its collection." The upshot was a decision to fly from the cold legal climate of Illinois to the warmer airs of New York, where a charter was obtained under a law specifically providing for non-profit-making corporations. The new corporation undertook "to admit all members of the Illinois corporation with rights and privileges as nearly as practicable exactly the same as those they now enjoy." At the same time, however, it was felt necessary to rewrite the by-laws so as to forestall another legal challenge.

The distinction between the two classes of members was eliminated, and all were given "protest rights" against the admission of new members publishing within their sphere of influence. Unless the applicable protest rights were waived, a candidate had to secure the affirmative votes of four-fifths of the members of the A. P. at the annual meeting or special meeting. These barriers, the incorporators were legally advised, represented "the extreme limit to which an embodiment of the old veto power could be safely attempted." In practice they have proved impassable. As the complaint of the Department of Justice puts it:

The purpose of the provisions relating to "protest rights"—to bar competitors of members from access to A. P. service—has been effectively achieved. . . . During the years 1900-28, inclusive, more than 100 applications for membership subject to outstanding "protest rights" were submitted to the vote of members. In only six instances was there the requisite affirmative four-fifths vote. Moreover, in each of these six instances the favorable vote was due to special circumstances.

Changes in the by-laws in 1928 did not materially alter this situation. A side-entrance to the A. P. was, however, left open. Memberships were recognized as a species of property which could be sold and assigned, and any newspaper owner could purchase one if it were available in his territory. On a number of occasions this has meant that newspapers have been sold and killed just for the sake of the A. P. franchise. Thus Munsey, the old paper butcher from Maine, paid $2,000,000 for the New York Press and its A. P. membership in order to merge it with the morning Sun, which had always been outside the fold. Later he obtained an A. P. franchise for the evening Sun by buying and slaughtering the Globe.

An A. P. franchise, therefore, apart from providing its holder with an exclusive news service, has a definite cash value. I have before me a "sales" letter from an A. P. divisional superintendent to the manager of a small-town newspaper. Urging the desirability of A. P. membership, this letter emphasizes that it is a capital asset and may be included as part of a newspaper's investment for income-tax purposes. But as the A. P. frequently points out, the assessment levied on each member in return for service is based strictly on actual cost. Hence the cumulative capital value of membership represents something for which nothing is paid. It is, in short, a monopoly value.

This fact is rather blatantly recognized in the amendment to the by-laws approved by the last membership meeting in April, 1942. If a "right of protest" is now exercised, only an affirmative vote of a majority of members is required, but, in addition, the applicant must pay "a sum equal to 10 per cent of the total amount of regular assessments" paid since 1900 by those existing members with whom he will compete, this sum to be distributed among the members in the applicant's field. On this basis, it is estimated, a New York morning franchise would cost nearly $1,500,000 and would thus provide a handsome unearned increment to established A. P. members, while placing a discouraging financial handicap on any newcomer.

The capital value of the A. P. franchise also serves as a convenient strait-jacket for obstreperous members. M. Koenigsberg, former manager of the International News Service, tells in his autobiography, "King News," how W. R. Hearst, in the course of one of his frequent rows with the A. P., considered bringing a civil anti-trust suit against it. His lawyers gave the opinion that the A. P. was a combination engaged in the illegal restraint of trade but added that victory in the courts would compel the Department of Justice to seek its dissolution. "Upon such advice," Mr. Koenigsberg says, "judgment was reached that the millions of dollars represented in the memberships owned by Hearst would be exposed to too great a hazard by the institution of any suit attacking the validity of Associated Press regulations."

KENT COOPER AND THE DRAGON

One of the A. P.'s trump cards in its struggle with the old United Press was the exclusive contract it secured with Reuters, the great British news agency, and for long after the flight from Illinois this alliance was regarded by the Board of Directors as an invaluable asset. Through Reuters the A. P. was linked with the Havas Agency of France, the Wolff Telegraph Bureau of Germany, and a score of national agencies tributary to these three, which, in association, ruled the news channels of the world. The A. P., despite its avowed hostility to commercial news trusts, bought exclusive rights to distribute Reuters' news reports in the United States and in return agreed that only Reuters should send A. P. news to foreign countries.

In his recently published book, "Barriers Down," Kent Cooper, present general manager of the A. P., pictures the American agency as a pure and forlorn maiden in the clutches of a sinister international dragon and himself as the valiant knight who for twenty years fought to effect a rescue. The foreign agencies, he asserts, were either subsidized by their governments or at least subject to strong official influences. The American news they distributed thus passed through a filter of un-American interests and was likely to emerge contaminated, while the foreign news they supplied to the A. P. was often tainted with foreign propaganda.

In declaring that this state of affairs was most unhealthy for the American press, Mr. Cooper is entirely correct. The fact that the A. P., while boasting of its purity and of the absolute integrity with which it handled the news, should have tied itself up with foreign agencies in this manner, in order to strengthen its domestic monopoly, was nothing short of a scandal. But his report of the battle to mend the situation is, to put it mildly, exceedingly disingenuous. Between the lines of his book the truth is revealed that his real opponents were not the foreign agencies but Melville Stone, general manager of the A. P. up to 1918 and afterward "counselor," and the Board of Directors. The compromising contracts could have been canceled at any time by a stroke of the pen. The directors, however, feared to take this course in the face of Mr. Stone's assertion, reported by Cooper: "When you get rid of those agencies, the expenses of the Associated Press for foreign news will double at least."

Apart from the question of expense, the directors were troubled by the prospect that the foreign agencies, once cast off, would link up with a competitive service or deal directly with individual newspapers, actions barred by their contracts with the A. P. Defending this position, Mr. Stone argued that it was a protection against foreign propaganda being fed to the American press, propaganda which, presumably, the A. P. itself was able to detect and abstract before retransmitting foreign-agency reports. But as Mr. Cooper says candidly:

This bar, however, was not established through any altruistic motive of protecting American newspapers against any evil intentions of the agencies. It was established solely because if the foreign agencies served newspapers directly, the Associated Press could not compete with them on the same news.

Kent Cooper finally won his battle with the directors, partly, at least, by proving to them that the Scripps-Howard United Press, free from entangling alliances, was forging ahead of the A. P. in the field of foreign news. Convinced that the Reuters alliance was no longer an asset, the board gave its general manager a free hand. Gripping his sword, he closed in on the horrid monster whose blood he had sought so long, but, alas, it turned into a reluctant dragon and surrendered almost meekly, forcing our unfortunate hero to end his book on a note of anti-climax. Nevertheless, we have to congratulate him on putting up a very good case against monopoly in news, whether the brand be foreign or A. P.

[In the second half of this article, to appear in the next issue, Mr. Huichison will tell the story of the A. P.'s effort to secure legal sanction for the concept of "property in news." He will also explain the mechanics of its stranglehold on domestic coverage in the morning-newspaper field.]

Woollcott and Fourier

BY EDMUND WILSON

ALEXANDER WOOLLCOTT is dead; and the hostile obituary in the New York Herald Tribune, which dwelt on his disagreeable traits, has prompted me to try to pay some tribute to his more attractive ones.

I knew Woollcott only slightly, but my relations with him were based on an aspect of him which may not have been very well known. He was born at the North American Phalanx near Red Bank, New Jersey, and I was born at Red Bank. The North American Phalanx was one of the longest-lived of the socialist communities that flourished in the middle of the last century, and Woollcott's grandfather was for many years the head of it. My family knew all his family, and my grandfather, who was a doctor at Eatontown, brought Woollcott into the world.

When I first came to New York and met Woollcott, I did not connect him with the Woollcotts of Red Bank or the curious old Fourierist building, half barracks and half hotel, to which I had been taken to call as a child. At that time, when I had just started working in the office of Vanity Fair, to which he was a distinguished contributor, I saw his more erinaceous side. I provoked him to ferocity one day by asking him who the Father Duffy was to whom he was in the habit of referring as if he were the Apostle Paul. I had spent a year and a half in France during the war but had never happened to hear of Father Duffy; and I had not grasped the fact that Woollcott had created for himself a calendar of saints whose glory must not be questioned.

But one day at the Algonquin he asked me whether I was the son of Lawyer Wilson of Red Bank, and we talked about the Phalanx. He told me about a Fourierist uncle who had devoted himself to painting with so much single-mindedness and so little material success that he had finally had to go into bankruptcy. My father had extricated him from his troubles; and I presently discovered that a picture that hung in my mother's house—the old phalanstery building itself dimly looming behind the fresh green of the straight-stemmed New Jersey forest—had been painted by this uncle and was a memento of my father's relations with him. I had been struck, when Woollcott told me of this incident, by the evident admiration he felt for the completeness of his uncle's unworldliness: not only the number of pictures he had painted but the enormous sum of money he had failed for. I learned later that Woollcott had long been supporting the remaining members of his family.

From then on our relations were cordial. When a play of mine was done at the Provincetown Playhouse in the early nineteen twenties, Alec, then the dramatic critic of the Times, gave it a sympathetic notice but ended by explaining that his judgment might possibly have been somewhat softened by the fact that thirty-odd years before a certain kindly old country doctor had been called on a snowy night to attend Mrs. Woollcott of the Phalanx, etc. When he found out later on that the kindly old doctor had gone to Hamilton College, of which Alec was one of the most loyal alumni, my grandfather came to figure, from his connection with Alec's birth, as a species of Angel of the Annunciation; and I found myself involved in one of the sentimental myths on which he fed the unsatisfied affections that had for objects only his heroes, his friends, and the memories of his family.

This myth would occasionally crop up in his writings, and even after I ceased to see him, I would hear from him from time to time. One day I met him in the West

Drawing by B. Brussel-Smith
Alexander Woollcott

"Whistler Room" had been the title of my play at the Provincetown. Later on, when I published a study of Kipling, he wrote me several long letters on the subject, about which he had some sober and shrewd ideas. I had also, however, been writing about Dickens and praising his gloomy later novels; and this elicited from Alec a sulky "I do not care to discuss Dickens with you." He did, nevertheless, indicate his preferences; and I could see him as a child in the phalanxster lying in the hammock on a summer day with "Pickwick" or "David Copperfield." His point of view was perfectly infantile. It turned out that he did not like "Bleak House" simply because it was the only one he had not read as a child.

In the meantime, however, in the years of the depression, I had had with him a curious interview. I had been traveling around the country doing articles on labor and economic conditions, and he wrote me that he had been reading these articles and said he would like to talk to me. I invited him to dinner with us, but he replied that he was a much older man than I and that I ought to come to him. So I called on him at Sutton Place, where he occupied a splendid apartment that looked out on the East River. As soon as I entered the room, he cried out, without any other greeting: "You've gotten very fat!" It was his way of disarming, I thought, any horror I might have felt at his own pudding-like rotundity, which had trebled since I had seen him last. He did not rise and was wearing a dressing-gown, so I inquired whether he had been ill. He answered shortly, no; and wanted to know whether I thought he was ill because he was wearing a dressing-gown. There were other guests, and they kept coming and going. Drinks were brought—by a butler: Woollcott never stirred from his chair; and there was a backgammon board, at which people were playing. A secretary in a room beyond was typing an article for him; and he would rap out from time to time peremp-tory orders to the butler, who was feeding a phonograph in a neighboring room with Gilbert and Sullivan records.

He made no attempt to talk to me, and I wondered why he had wanted to see me. At last there came a moment, however, when all the guests had gone and there was nobody but him and me. His demeanor changed entirely. He began to speak naturally and frankly: a note of uncertainty came into his voice, and a look of distressful anxiety tightened his brows above his spectacles. He asked me about the Communist movement in America. I told him a little, and he went on to talk about the North American Phalanx—on which he had been collecting material and about which he meant some day to write. He said that he had always known that labor was going to be the great force in the modern world; and he told me about the Labor Day rites at the Phalanx over which his grandfather had presided. He said that the kind of thing I had been doing was the kind of thing he should like to do: he should like to go around the country and see what was going on—he had friends in the West and the South whom it would be easy for him to visit; and the only thing that had prevented him from doing so was the fact that, reduced as his income was, he had difficulty in finding a chauffeur who could also do dictation and typing.

Then another batch of guests came in, and Woollcott resumed his role in the theatrical-journalistic New York world in which he was both a "personality" of print and a "star" in an eccentric part. I wasn't sure that anybody but me could recognize in his anagrams and croquet, his Dickens and Gilbert and Sullivan, his idealization of stage reputations like the Barrymores and Mrs. Fiske, and his general wide-eyed excitement of the semi-suburban Jerseyman over all that was going on in New York—could recognize in this the persistence of the atmosphere and the habits of an old-fashioned country life with which I was familiar from my childhood, but which seemed quite exotic, almost perverse, in the modern New York of the thirties.

When "The Man Who Came to Dinner" was done, I was rather depressed to hear that Woollcott was acting in the West the character drawn from himself. But when I saw the play in New York, I ceased to be troubled by this. Kaufman's comedy was stupid enough; and it was slightly offensive, like all his things, because it was an exploitation by an expert contriver of curtains and exploder of firecracker laughs of an idea that had better possibilities. But its very comic-supplement mechanics made it relatively innocent as far as Woollcott was concerned. Kaufman had put on the stage some of Woollcott's superficial idiosyncrasies without ever even attempting to do anything with his genuine personality. The bad side of "The Man Who Came to Dinner" was simply a combination of fiendishness and childishness, while the better side was simply a stage Santa Claus, as in the last act of a play with George Arliss. A portrayer of the actual Woolcott would have had to show how his arrogance and venom arose from the vulnerability of an excessively sensitive man rather badly favored by nature and afflicted by glandular disorders. When Woolcott addressed his friends as "repulsive," it was like his greeting me when I visited him by telling me how fat I was: he was afraid you were going to find him so. And a real portrait of Woolcott would have had to show the part played in his whole career by the Fourierist background of the Phalanx.

His interest in communism, so far as I know, did not have any practical upshot; but a certain queer moral authority which he exerted throughout his career was based on a reckless idealism that derived from the idealism that had bankrupted the Phalanx; and what made him seem impossible to editors, producers whose plays he reviewed, and the arrangers of radio programs, was not so much his fits of bad temper as a boldness and independence, learned in the same school, which made him contemptuous of other people's policies when they conflicted with his own judgment, and prevented him from hesitating a moment, when the issue demanded a choice, about throwing up any job, no matter how magnificently paid and no matter how fraught with prestige. The idea that "social betterment" and the "elevating" effects of the arts were the most important things in the world and causes to be served gratuitously was always alive in his mind; and one might be very far from sharing most of his enthusiasms and very much dislike his way of expressing them, and yet feel that his lights were not vulgar ones and that Woolcott had never betrayed them.

He had it, moreover, in common with the older American radicalism that, in the days of totalitarian states and commercial standardization, he did not hesitate to assert himself as a single unique human being: he was not afraid to be Alexander Woolcott; and even when Alexander Woolcott was horrid, this somehow commanded respect, and, in "The Man Who Came to Dinner," made him a kind of folk hero.

The Jews of Europe

IV. THE CASE FOR ZIONISM

BY PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN

IT WAS to supply the elementary need of a homeless people for a home that the Balfour Declaration was issued on November 2, 1917, announcing that "His Majesty's government view with favor the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people." The purpose of this historic document, which was subsequently approved by fifty-two nations, including the United States, was understood and accepted by the parties most directly involved.

Winston Churchill stated the British intent when he said, "This pledge of a home of refuge, of an asylum, was not made to the Jews in Palestine but to the Jews outside Palestine, to that vast unhappy mass of scattered, persecuted, wandering Jews whose intense, unchanging, unconquerable desire has been for a National Home." Felix Frankfurter expressed the understanding of the Jews that "it was not merely a pledge to the fraction of the Jewish people who would actually settle in Palestine, but it was to be a national home for the Jewish people." The leader of the Arab delegation at the Peace Conference, Emir Feisal, also indorsed this objective. "Our deputation here in Paris is fully acquainted with the proposals submitted yesterday by the Zionist Organization to the Peace Conference, and we regard them as moderate and proper. We will do our best, in so far as we are concerned, to help them through: we will wish the Jews a most hearty welcome home."

On the basis of this promise and inspired by this hope, the Jews began their return to Palestine. The significance of their achievements can be seen in the changes wrought between the two world wars. In 1919 there were but 56,000 Jews in Palestine, chiefly elderly people dependent on charity from abroad. Only a small percentage worked the land, and the agricultural economy was so disorganized and inadequate that the population subsisted largely on food shipments from the west. Men still remember with horror the frantic mobs at the docks clamoring for something to eat as the occasional boats came in.

Today, reports the American Jewish Committee (not a Zionist organization) in "Jewish Post War Problems," "the only bright spot for Jews on the many war fronts is Palestine, with its sturdy Jewish population of nearly 600,000 souls. Jewish Palestine is today an outpost of democracy in the Near East and a great military potential for the United Nations in both men and matériel."

In the past twenty-five years more than half a million Jews have been settled in Palestine; more have been admitted there since the advent of Hitler than to all other countries of the world combined. This Jewish community is not only self-sustaining but is making substantial contributions of food, chemical, and industrial products to the armies of the United Nations in the Near East. Jewish "agricultural colonization in Palestine is the most remarkable devotion to land and reclamation of land that I have seen in any country of the New or Old World," wrote Dr. Walter Lowdermilk, assistant chief of the Soil Conservation Service of the United States Department of Agriculture, after ten weeks in the Jewish colonies.

The $500,000,000 which Jews have invested in the agriculture and industry of Palestine has resulted in the greatest proportionate increase of productivity that has occurred in any country in these decades of depression and instability. Whereas Jewish-owned land under wheat comprises only 6 per cent of the entire wheat area of Palestine, it produces 14 per cent of the country's wheat crop. Jewish land planted in barley is 4 per cent of the total barley acreage, but it has yielded 17 per cent of the country's total output. More than 2,000 Jewish industries and more than 5,000 handicraft establishments are now at work in Palestine supplying every basic human need. The new industries set up since the outbreak of the war manufacture glass containers, cardboard and paper, pharmaceuticals, crockery and household utensils, wool and cotton yarns, upper leathers for footwear, plate glass, plastics, heavy and fine chemicals, rubber hose and canvas, optical and scientific instruments, calcium carbide, steel and alloy steel, copper wire, bone buttons, and tire retreads. Sulphuric fertilizers are also being turned out. A useful rubber-regeneration plant has been built.

Under the impact of Jewish need, ingenuity, and capital, Palestine has become the most thriving country of the Near East. Its flourishing cities have had a phenomenal growth. Where only yesterday the sands shifted restlessly on the dunes north of Jaffa, there stands today an all-Jewish city of 200,000 souls—Tel Aviv with its brilliant culture, its youthful vigor, its gleaming new buildings. The rivers have been harnessed for electric power; cheap light and power are now available all over the land. Minerals extracted from the Dead Sea sustain mammoth chemical establishments, and the surrounding soil is being leached to renew its fertility. Busy fishing villages of European youth have sprung up on the inland lakes. A people who for centuries have known ships only as instruments of flight are now building and manning them.

Some of the perennial scourges of the East have been conquered. Professor I. J. Kligler, American-trained expert, recently reported:

The contrast between malaria incidence among the troops stationed in Palestine during the last war, or among those stationed now in Syria, and that among the forces at present in Palestine is striking. Twenty years of malaria control have rendered Palestine the only country in this part of the world in which this infectious disease is of minor significance as a factor in troop morbidity.

Another major accomplishment reflects the underlying motive of the Zionist program, namely, to give Jews a normal life. To do this, it was necessary, according to the Zionist leaders, to change not only the political but the economic status of the Jewish people. That Jews must become farmers and manual laborers was an article of faith that revolutionized the economic habits of the European Jews who came to Palestine. Of the 104,000 agricultural and industrial workers listed in the census of 1937, 36,000 had been without definite occupation in the land of their origin, 8,000 had been merchants, and 17,000 had been students—the typical Jewish disproportion in Europe. Less than one-tenth of the 25,000 persons then engaged in agriculture in Palestine had worked the soil in Europe, and only 1,800 of the 13,000 workers in the building industry had done similar manual labor.

The results can be seen in new Jewish types—strong, self-respecting, unafraid. Psychologically and physically, they have much in common with the frontiersmen who cleared the wilderness and built the first settlements on the North American continent. The Palestinian Jews are the only Jewish community which under attack in this war has sunk its roots deeper into the earth, stood its ground resolutely, and demanded the right and the weapons to fight back blow for blow. It is not that they are heroes, but something in their attachment to their own soil gives them a quiet strength and courage denied to the harried, rootless Jews in Europe.

Most of the Jews who came to Palestine were determined not to reproduce there the inequitable economic order which had made life so insecure in Europe. Since they came to a backward, sparsely settled country, they were able to create new social institutions. They established a National Fund which purchased land not for private profit but in perpetuity for the Jewish people. Within the framework of capitalism Palestine developed the strongest free labor movement and the largest network of cooperatives and collectives in proportion to population to be found in any free country in the world. The General Federation of Jewish Labor (Histadruth) has 126,000 members, constituting with their families 40 per cent of the Jewish community of Palestine and dominating its political life. The federation's activities include the creation and direction of collective agricultural settlements, industrial and transport cooperatives, building guilds, educational institutions, cooperative finance institutions, maritime projects, health insurance, and unemployment relief. It has fought for and obtained working conditions and wages incomparably better than are to be found anywhere else in the Near East. The collective colonies have been so successful that Sir Arthur Waichope, former High Commissioner of Palestine, regards them as a pattern which the post-war world may well follow. He writes:

We are all interested not only in the war but also in any social or economic changes that may take place after the war, especially those needed to bring about a more equal distribution of wealth. . . . If changes in our social or economic structure are to be discussed, then it is worth while to consider the one example of such a system where people actually do live on an equal economic basis. And this example is of a people who can be judged by their deeds rather than by their theories, and who have made a success of their life for more than a generation.

Since these people are heirs of a long tradition of culture, they cherish the arts too in this new life. The richest Hebraic culture known in centuries now flourishes in Palestine. There is no more beloved orchestra in the world than the Palestine Symphony; Toscanini, among others, has conducted it. The schools are modern and progressive, and they are crowned by the Hebrew University on Scopus, which is already one of the foremost institutions of higher learning in the world. There has been such a renewal and enhancement of historical religious forms that for many Judaism has become vital again.

These cultural and spiritual developments are already fructifying Jewish life in America. This is likely to be the primary relationship of American Jews to Palestine, for it is not expected that many from this country will settle there. The settlement in Palestine will strengthen, not weaken, their position here. To the extent that it solves the Jewish problem in Europe and relieves refugee pressure, it buttresses their security, for it was the echoes of Hitler's answer to the Jewish problem in Europe which more than any other factor threatened them here. Further, there is something so sympathetic to the free spirit of the West in this heroic effort of an ancient people to emancipate itself by its own labor and bravery that a new respect for Jews is born in all Americans who come in contact with it—the enthusiastic American soldiers recently stationed there among others.

What of the future? The answer depends on economic and political factors which are not unrelated. For in the final reckoning the absorptive capacity of Palestine will determine whether the Jews can live in peace with the Arabs. An overcrowded country with all elements fiercely competing for a meager livelihood holds no promise. But a land being redeemed from ancient ignorance and poverty to the fullest modern productivity offers real hope.

Since 1919 over 500,000 Jews have been absorbed in an area of 1,500,000 dunam (a dunam is one-fourth of an acre)—less than one-seventeenth of the total land of Palestine. The Arabs inhabit about 7,000,000 dunam out of a total of 27,000,000, leaving practically two-thirds of the country uncultivated. Since much of this is the kind of "wasteland" which the Jews redeemed by irrigation or drainage for their present settlements, there is no reason why a substantial portion of it could not be used for the colonization of European Jews. Through irrigation and intensive cultivation the amount of land required to support a Jewish family has been steadily reduced from 250 to 20 dunam. Without any displacement of the existing population, according to reliable experts, there is room in the hill country and the maritime plains for 750,000 new settlers.

But the part of Palestine which challenges the imagination is the Negev, or southern Palestine, which is nearly equal in size to the entire settled north. This large region is inhabited today by a handful of Bedouins who barely eke a living from its parched and neglected soil. An irrigation project which experts regard as feasible can make this land fertile. Dr. Lowdermilk has written:

The Valley of the Jordan River offers a combination of natural features and a concentration of resources which set the stage for one of the greatest and most far-reaching reclamation projects of the earth. . . . After seeing the great conduits pouring water from the Colorado River into Southern California after crossing deserts and boring through mountains for 250 miles, such things on a smaller scale are also a possibility for Palestine. . . . The Holy Land can be reclaimed from the desolation of long neglect and wastage and can be made to provide farms, industry, and security for possibly five million refugees fleeing the persecutions and hatreds of Europe.

Dr. Bernard Joseph, chief legal adviser to the Jewish Agency for Palestine, believes that there is room for six million Jews. Whichever estimate is correct, it is clear that with a dynamic, imaginative program a large part of the surviving Jewish masses of Europe can find a home and a livelihood in Palestine. Their activities, it should be remembered, need not be entirely or mainly agricultural. Jewish Palestine can become the industrial and commercial center of the Near East. Jews have brought there the skills, trades, and industries of Europe. The future of Palestine should be conceived not in terms of the backward countries of the Levant but in the image of such small, progressive industrial and commercial countries as Belgium and Holland. The Jews are also experienced and skilful in trade. Situated at the crossroads of several civilizations and having access to two seas, the Mediterranean and the Red, the Jewish National Home might be developed into one of the great commercial centers of the world. It might find immense new markets for its merchandise in Russia, India, and the Middle East. The possibilities of modern agriculture, industry, and commerce are so great that there is no foreseeable limit to the absorptive capacity of Palestine. Millions of Jews can be settled in it without displacing a single Arab.

But even if some displacement of the Arabs were necessary, this would ultimately be justified in the face of the desperate Jewish need. For there is no Arab problem in the sense that there is a Jewish problem. Fifteen million Arabs inhabit a region nearly half the size of Europe. A recent Prime Minister of Iraq admitted:

The size of the country is 150,000 square miles, about three times that of England and Wales, while the population is only three million. . . . What Iraq wants above everything else is more population.

Actually, as all observers have agreed, the Arabs have benefited from Jewish immigration. The Royal Commission reported in 1937:

Up till now the Arab cultivator has benefited . . . from the presence of Jews in the country. Wages have gone up, the standard of living has improved; work on roads and buildings has been plentiful. . . . The general beneficial effect of Jewish immigration on Arab welfare is illustrated by the fact that the increase in the Arab population is most marked in urban areas affected by Jewish development.

The Arabs, it was shown, have chosen to live in greatest numbers in the neighborhood of Jewish settlements; and the increase of the Arab population has closely paralleled the Jewish increase, not only through the lowered death rate but also because large numbers of non-Palestinian Arabs have seeped into the country to enjoy the highest standard of living in the Near East. It would be a calamity for the Arabs if the Jewish settlement in Palestine were to be liquidated, as is proved by the miserable state of the Arabs in Trans-Jordan, where Jews have not been permitted to settle. In fact, it is my conviction that the best hope for the emancipation of the Arabs lies in the example offered them by the Jews—the example of modern techniques in agriculture and industry, of education and public health, of cooperative enterprise and social progress.

The Arab opposition is political, not economic. It was fomented by the land-owning Effendis, who resented the intrusion of higher Western standards into their feudal economy. It was directed and financed by the Nazis and the Italian Fascists. The moment the war broke out and the British severed Arab connections with the Axis, the terror ceased completely. This is not to deny the existence of a genuine opposition on the part of some Arab elements. But since Palestine is so largely undeveloped and the Arab lands are so sparsely populated, and since for the Jews of Europe it is literally Palestine or death, the justice and the necessity of the Jewish National Home must be reaffirmed in spite of this opposition. If there is to be some equitable redistribution of the earth's resources after the war, shall not this apply also to the

ADOLF IS A GREAT LITTLE DICKER

Jews? Shall the Arabs, whose lands are so extensive that they cannot completely settle them for generations, be permitted to deny homeless Jews the right to settle on a part of the smallest of them?

When the war ends, there should be in Palestine, as apparently there will be elsewhere, a period of transition before the final political settlement is determined. In this period large numbers of homeless Jews should be settled in Palestine. Wendell Willkie has stated the correct formula: "The extent of that immigration must be measured by the needs of the Jewish people." This mass migration will cause least stress if done quickly. The Arab problem took shape from the British colonial policy, which made Jewish immigration a slow incessant stream of irritants. Swift large-scale Jewish immigration after the last war, in accordance with the purpose of the Balfour Declaration, would have established immediately a strong Jewish community in Palestine and have shown the Arabs that the British meant to keep their promise to the Jews. In the interest of peace in Palestine, let not the same mistake be made again.

While this swift immigration is taking place, large-scale reclamation, irrigation, industrial, and building projects should be begun. Since these will be far beyond the means of private Jewish funds, they should have international financial support, perhaps on a lease-lend basis. It will prove more economical to invest in constructive self-liquidating projects in Palestine than to dole out relief to Jews in Europe.

The political forms that should follow this interim period will depend on the entire world settlement. After the necessary period of large-scale immigration and economic development, Palestine should be set up as a self-governing commonwealth in a world of free commonwealths, with full equality of rights—civil, economic, religious, and cultural—for all the inhabitants of the land. Great numbers of the surviving Jews of Europe, it is hoped, will thus be emancipated from their homelessness. They will, for the first time in nineteen centuries, be the molders, not the victims, of their destiny. In this one place they will at last have freed themselves from the insecure minority status under which they have suffered and will be able to develop normally as a free people among the free peoples of the earth. They can thus play their rightful part in the building of the free world of tomorrow and make their distinctive contribution to it.

If the United Nations determine that this shall be, it will be. Here is their opportunity to solve the world's most persistent problem and to enable a gifted people, once more on their ancient sacred soil, to enrich man's spiritual life.

[This is the last of a series of four articles by Dr. Bernstein.]

In the Wind

FRANCES SWEENEY, founder of Boston's original rumor clinic and editor of the Boston City Reporter, reports that the largest chain of newsstands in greater Boston has stopped handling the anti-Semitic Catholic International because it didn't sell. Its editorial policy is thus summed up on its cover: "No Quick-Culture, No Psychology, No Social-Gospel, No Free-Love, No Free-Thought, No Art-Appreciation, No Sophistication, No Vitamins, No Advertising. No Fawning upon Christ's Enemies."

GOLD is now listed by the War Production Board among "materials that are available in significant quantities as substitutes for scarcer materials."

WORKING ON THE RAILROAD: The Czecho-Slovak National Council of America reports that special detectives have been placed in all railroad stations in Bohemia and Moravia to spot travelers who may deliberately delay and hamper traffic. . . . In Norway, says the Norwegian Information Service, the sensitive Nazis have put Quisling guards on all trains to prevent Norwegians from leaving their seats when German or native Nazis sit beside them.

A ONE-MAN CRUSADE against price-ceiling violators is being conducted by G. C. Terry, an ex-sailor, of Hollywood. On the first day of the crusade he haled three egg dealers into court and won $50 from each. He now has scores of cases pending.

WELL, HARDLY ANYTHING: Last February the Nazi-controlled Radio Alpen broadcast the following military intelligence to Spain: "Very few of the Russian army are experienced soldiers. Others are reservists recently recruited with only very slight military training. Naturally, these untrained men cannot do anything against the well-trained, well-equipped German soldiers."

STUDENTS at the University of Michigan have organized a Man-Power Mobilization Corps, supplying student workers to farms, factories, and business firms. It is run without assistance from the faculty.

BOOK NOTES: Joe McWilliams, who ran for Congress with the support of the Christian Front in 1940, has written a book, "The Serviceman's Reconstruction Plan." It is being distributed by the Barrington Rand Press, Barrington, Illinois. . . . Subscriptions are now being solicited for "Hollywood Reds," a book to be written by Allan W. Wells. Advance circulars say it will give "a complete exposé of the Communist control of motion pictures made in Hollywood."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

The Führer-Makers

BY ALFRED KANTOROWICZ

IN THE elections to the German Reichstag of November 6, 1932, the Nazis suffered a remarkable defeat. In comparison with the last previous general elections they lost about two million votes, and instead of 230 deputies—two-fifths of the Reichstag—they returned only 197. A mere one-third of the German electorate had given them their vote. This setback was emphasized by even more decisive defeats at municipal and local elections in the following December. In Thuringia, for instance, the Nazi Party lost 40 per cent of the votes it had polled six months earlier; in Saxony and northern Germany it lost 50 per cent. Goebbels noted in his diary on December 6: "The situation in the Reich is disastrous."

The finances of the party were in a desperate condition. Under date of November 11 Goebbels wrote in his diary: "Received a report on the financial situation of the Berlin organization. It is hopeless. Nothing but debts and obligations, together with the complete impossibility of obtaining any reasonable sum of money after this defeat."

The great intriguer Franz von Papen yielded his post of Chancellor of the Reich to the great intriguer Kurt von Schleicher, a Reichswehr general. Schleicher planned to rely upon the Reichswehr on one side and the Democratic and Christian unions on the other, and to avoid open dictatorship. He succeeded in seducing the second man of the Nazi Party, its most brilliant organizer, Gregor Strasser, whose defection almost broke up the movement. "Deep depression throughout the organization," notes Goebbels on December 8. "In the evening the leader comes to us. It is difficult to be cheerful. We are all downcast, especially in view of the danger of the whole party's falling to pieces, and all our work in vain." On December 9, after a Reichstag session, he exclaims: "Wild excitement in the Reichstag. Everywhere rats flee from the sinking ship." And on Christmas Eve: "A sad Christmas. My heart is full of grief."

Then, on December 28, he makes a seemingly harmless entry which deserves close attention: "There is a chance of the leader having a discussion with von Papen in a few days' time. That would offer us a new opportunity." The expected conference took place in the first days of January, 1933, at the villa of Herr von Schroeder, a Cologne banker and representative of the big industrialists. It did indeed offer Hitler a new opportunity and thereby perhaps changed the course of history.

Von Papen, the gambler, wanted his revenge.

Schleicher had intrigued against him when he was in power; now Papen turned the tables against the new chancellor, whose tendencies had become a little obscure to the all-powerful iron and steel magnates. Of course, the events that led to the final catastrophe were determined rather by general social and economic conditions than by personal animosities, but there is no doubt that intrigue played a big part in raising Hitler to power. One of the most reliable chroniclers of those days, the late Rudolf Olden, at that time foreign editor of the Berliner Tageblatt, wrote of that fateful meeting in the house of the Cologne banker: "Politics as the conflict of Welanschauungen had dropped out of German public life. The battle was fought in the salons and antechambers between embittered gamblers. Everything turned on ambition, vanity, and personal advancement, not on principles or the good of the country."

Goebbels's diary contains the following under date of January 5: "The conference between the Leader and Herr von Papen has taken place at Cologne. It was meant to be secret, but through indiscretion news of it has got abroad. . . . The press is full of misrepresentations." Papen at once issued a vehement and categorical denial. But the two had been photographed together, and Schleicher laughingly passed the pictures around. He underestimated the strength of an alliance between Hitler, who still had a considerable mass following, and Papen, who had great influence with Hindenburg and was supported by the Rhenish industrialists.

Twelve days after the conference, on January 17, Goebbels wrote cynically: "The financial situation has improved all of a sudden." And added: "Now we must be prudent. There must be no mistake now, otherwise our great plan will again miscarry."

The "great plan" was helped to final success by another gigantic intrigue which paralleled the machinations of the iron magnates—the Osthilfe scandal. The Reich had granted subsidies running into hundreds of millions of marks to the great landowners of East Prussia, but the Junkers had spent the money not on the land but on luxuries and gambling. Many of the noblest Prussian families were involved, including the son of the President, Oskar von Hindenburg. The situation that developed is described by Olden as follows: "When Schleicher took over the plans of his predecessors [to settle peasants on the enormous estates of the Prussian Junkers] the agrarian magnates joined Papen and Oskar von Hindenburg in opposing him. Schleicher then boldly threatened to expose the whole Osthilfe affair."

[This cartoon by Georges Schreiber was published in The Nation on April 5, 1933, scarcely more than two months after Hitler had seized power in Germany. In the same issue the leading editorial carried the title The Nazis Against the World. Then as now The Nation saw in fascism and Hitlerism what the cartoon symbolizes—tyranny, devastation, and war. The world today is testimony to the accuracy of that vision and to the tragic failure of all the contradictory hopes with which the leaders of the democracies deluded themselves and their followers between 1933 and 1939]

The alliance of the Junkers with the Rhenish industrialists sealed the fate of the Schleicher government. Advised by his favorite, Papen, and pressed by his son, who feared that his own and his father's connection with the scandal might become known, Hindenburg dismissed Schleicher and began negotiations with Hitler. On January 30, 1933, the corrupt Junker who happened to be President of the Reich made Hitler Chancellor.

Goebbels chronicles the events of those days. "January 27: Conference with the gentlemen of the Reichslandbund [modestly translated in Goebbels' book 'Farmers' Federation' but actually the Junkers]. All of them have taken their stand against Schleicher." "January 28: Herr von Papen has received instructions to approach cautiously the other parties with a view to exploring possibilities." "January 29: The great hour has struck." "January 30: It seems like a dream. The Wilhelmstrasse is ours!"

In two months the Nazis had been raised from near-ruin to supreme power. On December 8, 1932, Goebbels had written: "For hours the leader paces up and down the room in the hotel. Suddenly he stops and says, 'If the party falls to pieces, I shall shoot myself without more ado.'" Hitler and Goebbels have been reminding the German people of those days, laying stress on the fact that the Nazis have been in difficult situations before and come out triumphant. Even Hitler's threat to commit suicide has been quoted, their purpose is perhaps not only to reassure the German people but to suggest that the Nazis might be ready to accept the services of a Papen in the international field. Will they find one?

Japan's Racial War

BY SELDEN C. MENEFEE

JAPAN is fighting a racial war. Race riots and other instances of race prejudice in the United States are highlighted in Japanese broadcasts to Asia and the Americas. Even before Pearl Harbor, Radio Tokyo campaigned for "Asia for the Asiatics" by narrating the story of the lynching of Cleo Wright at Sikeston, Missouri. Every scrap of evidence that the colored races of this country are subject to discrimination is grist to the Japanese propaganda mill. Our immigration laws are held up before the Chinese and Indians to prove our dishonesty in claiming to fight for a free world. The evacuation of West Coast Japanese Americans is frequently referred to—India has heard wild tales of Japanese Americans hacked to pieces by white mobs, their houses entered, and their women attacked.

A Manchurian broadcast beamed to Asia sums up the Japanese propaganda line: "Democracy as preached by the Anglo-Americans may be an ideal and noble system of life, but democracy as practiced by Anglo-Americans is stained with the bloody guilt of racial persecution and exploitation."

One aspect of Japan's racial war is the attempt to incite Negroes in this country against the government. It is estimated that agitation of this kind has affected in some degree at least 50,000 American Negroes. In Chicago three pro-Japanese Negro organizations were recently uncovered, and eighty of their members were arrested for draft evasion. In New York, in December, four leaders of the "Ethiopian Pacific movement" were convicted of sedition and conspiracy to commit sedition. The ringleader, Robert O. Jordan, was quoted as saying, "The war Japan is fighting is one of divine order, and Negroes should tie up with Japan."

There are several ways in which we can deal with Japan's racial propaganda. We can ignore it, which would be an easy way but a dangerous one. The racial problem will not solve itself. Or we can emphasize in our own propaganda the part the colored races are playing in the United Nations war effort. General MacArthur recently decorated three Southern Negroes for plunging through gasoline flames to save an injured pilot, and the fact might well be widely publicized. Or, thirdly, we can expose the intolerance and cruelty of the Japanese themselves. This is obvious enough in their attitude toward the Koreans and Chinese and in their treatment of their own etas, or untouchables. But propaganda of this kind leaves us vulnerable to counter-charges such as that made by the Japanese-operated Hsinking radio last summer: "The American propaganda machine has recently spread stories of Japanese mistreatment of Koreans. They should look at home first. Their Negroes do not enjoy the life of citizens."

The best propaganda anywhere and always is that of the deed; in this case, it would be to give greater equality of opportunity to Negroes. The President's prohibition of any discrimination based on race, creed, color, or national origin, which has been written into all war contracts, is one long step, and the work of the Committee on Fair Employment Practices is another. But many large defense plants still refuse to hire Negroes except for unskilled or custodial work because of union barriers, employer prejudices, or local tradition.

The admission of Negroes to the regular ranks of the navy, marines, air corps, and Waacs, and their admission to the army in numbers proportioned to the size of the Negro population are admirable moves. But Negroes are still segregated in the army, navy, and Waacs. In the marines they are accepted only as privates for the duration of the war. And they are excluded from the Waves.

We must have cleaner hands if we hope to convince the people of occupied Asia that they have something to gain by a United Nations victory.

The Problem Remains

A week has elapsed since the Casablanca conference, and in that time everything that could be said for or against it has been said. It is not incomprehensible that the average democratic citizen should fail to take a stand on the issues of the conference, greeted as he has been by a barrage of contradictory interpretations, and that he should prefer to leave the resolution of those issues to the "higher wisdom" of his rulers. This section, however, cannot take refuge in caution. For as the Casablanca conference—however important and encouraging may have been the military decisions reached—was from the point of view of political warfare a failure. It was worse than that. Until the Casablanca meeting one could hope that the developments of the war would one day convince the Allied leaders of the need to coordinate their political strategy and wage this war as a People's War against fascism. Casablanca has reduced that hope to a miserable minimum. If there in North Africa, in the midst of the appalling mess produced by the lack of a democratic war policy, the arguments for a United Nations Political Council were ignored, how can we expect a change in the official attitude that led to the situation in North Africa and will lead to dozens of similar situations when the Allied armies move into Europe?

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IT HAS been noticed lately that an extremely dark picture of the war is being presented to the German people. About the Russian front especially the communiqués and even more the commentators seem to be telling the truth regardless of consequences. Of course they never fail to mention the certainty of ultimate victory, but they describe the situation as being temporarily both distressing and dangerous. For the first time the enemy is admitted to have had important successes. He has "superiority in numbers and material." And according to General Kurt Dittmar, speaking on January 18, "quantitatively," Germany "will be unable to attain even equality except locally."

Never before in this war have the Germans been addressed in such gloomy accents. Incidentally the official propagandists are making use of this seeming brutal frankness to improve their credit. "See how honest we are," they say. The star commentator, Hans Fritzsche, underlined it on January 23:

The enemy has always charged that we do not give a frank account of military operations. But the charge is undeserved. No communiqués are more trustworthy than ours. We do not play down the gravity of the conflict or the extent of the danger.

However, it is possible to lie by stating the facts, and we should not draw too far-reaching conclusions from this new "line" of the Nazis. Actually it is all part of a carefully planned campaign.

This is proved by the fact that every particularly gloomy report is followed by a stereotyped demand for extraordinary efforts on the home front. As one example the same speech of Herr Fritzsche's may be cited:

We can only imagine with what heroism the German soldier is giving his all to parry the latest Bolshevik blow. Those for whom this sacrifice is offered can well be proud. But their very pride creates the obligation to be worthy of the sacrifice. The German people, a part of whom have remained almost untouched by the war, must now mobilize all their strength and throw it into the balance. There still exists in Germany a great reserve of workers. Only when all hands, men and women, are doing vital war work, intelligently and according to plan, will the mobilization be complete. Out of the bitter struggle comes the challenge: "Stake everything!"

In short, the alarming military situation is being exploited to bring about a further, all-out "mobilization of labor reserves." "In many respects," Goebbels wrote in his weekly article of January 23, "we are living lives not suited to a time of war. Many businesses now being carried on profit nobody, or at least very few; they use up labor and materials but contribute nothing to the result we are striving for." It is apparently on the agenda to strangle all business using labor and materials for purely civilian purposes. The prospect is made clearer by Goebbels' demagogic illustrations.

We all know [his article went on] that there are many shops in which practically nothing can be bought. They are worthless for the war effort. Let them go out of business and their employees transfer to more useful occupations. . . . I have been informed that the bars of the great cities offer no comfort to anyone. Scarcely anything to drink can be obtained in them. An aging pianist pounds a weary instrument. The patrons face each other in blank silence. . . . Why should this go on? Let the pianist provide recreation for the troops. Let the waiters get work in a war industry.

Evidently there is to be a new and bigger drive, first, to draw the rest of the women into production, and, second, to close all allegedly superfluous shops, firms, restaurants, etc. The recent "brutally frank" announcements about the situation at the front end invariably with the exhortation: now at last let us mobilize all labor reserves. The conclusion can be drawn that the tone of alarm is cultivated expressly to get the people to swallow the new regulations. That does not mean, however, that the situation is not really alarming.

File and Remember

[Each week on this page we shall print items, short and long, taken from the British press or, less frequently, from that of other countries.]

"From Expediency to Forgery"

VARIOUS American newspapers carried a story on December 8 purporting to show that, contrary to reports, the French underground movement was not unanimous in condemning the Allied deal with Darlan. The story quoted Franc-Tireur as welcoming the arrival of Allied armies in North Africa and accepting the arrangement with Darlan as a strategic necessity. This indorsement from one of the boldest illegal papers in France was good propaganda for the policy adopted by the State Department and followed, however reluctantly, by Whitehall. But in the light of De Gaulle's open opposition, it was hard to credit. Now the facts have come out, and they throw a rather unpleasant light on this attempt to push an organ of the French underground into the Darlan camp. Tribune (London) has published an article entitled From Expediency to Forgery in which it accuses an unnamed "American diplomatic source" in London of planting a garbled version of the Franc-Tireur statement on the American correspondents. Tribune sums up the facts as follows:

It so happens that a copy of this underground journal is in our hands, and we say quite bluntly that the full text of the article quoted by the "American diplomatic source" bears no resemblance to the text handed here to American journalists. All the quotations are correct, of course, but in their context they convey the exact opposite of the sense given by the American spokesman.

Read these quotations from this sheet printed by the obscure but true men of France. They welcome the Allied move into North Africa. "But we forget nothing," they go on, and recount the infamies of Pétain and his men.

"Today," they ask, "is a mere word, a bargain, or a mere smile to suffice the people of France to blot out this record? Oh, no, a thousand times no! . . . We shall not allow our victory—the victory of all free peoples—of all the glorious and obscure soldiers to be sullied. It will be, before and above all things, the victory of liberty, of world democracy, of anti-fascism, and of the Social Republic."

Here it is. It does not sound like three cheers for Papa Darlan. And there we have it. To sustain expediency its backers have to descend to political forgery.

Invade Europe Soon!

Last week I emphasized the increasing importance of establishing in the shortest possible time a second front in Europe. Since then many other British newspapers, including the Times, have returned to the same theme. . . .

The urgency of this strategic operation has been intensified by the unexpected delay in clearing the enemy out of North Africa and using the Tunisian sea bases as a springboard—to quote Mr. Churchill—for a direct assault on Italy or on some other part of the mainland of Europe.

The situation in North Africa has not improved in recent weeks. The Germans have been heavily reinforced in spite of the gallantry of British submarines; and it is evident that the weight of Allied armaments, on land and in the air, is not yet sufficient for the decisive blow. . . .

But whether the Axis countries are to be invaded by way of the Mediterranean, or by the shorter and far less vulnerable route of the English Channel, or—as one hopes—by both routes at the same time, Anglo-American armies must have obtained a firm foothold in Europe before the great Russian offensives have worn themselves out—above all, before the German armies have had time to recuperate. . . .

I confess my uneasiness when I hear so many once-cautious people now lightly proclaiming a clear-cut victory in 1943. What reasonable ground is there for expecting so early a German collapse? In the last war there was a great Allied army in Western Europe from the word go. With the exception of a stretch of the Belgian coast the enemy's only outlet to the western seas was from German ports. The Allies controlled the Mediterranean and all North Africa; and Italy, now one of our European targets, was fighting on our side. . . .

It is unwise, therefore, to ignore or gloss over the fact that whereas in the last war the Allies were never driven out of Europe, our greatest task in this war, in the fourth year, is to force our way back into Europe. For the Anglo-Americans the bloodiest battles will begin when that decisive phase occurs.—A. J. CUMMINGS in the News Chronicle (London).

Warning from the Balkans

Hitler and his Quislings are finding the Balkans growing hot under their feet. The recent anti-Nazi activity among the peoples of Rumania, Hungary, and Bulgaria, coupled with the continued success of the partisan armies in Yugoslavia, all point the same story. Millions of peasants are on the move. They have been oppressed and starved for generations. They are land-hungry. They see in the liberating armies of the United Nations the hope of destroying not only the Fascist invaders but their own brutal ruling classes. . . .

Because of these facts, the Darlan episode in North Africa has struck a heavy blow at the cause of freedom in the Balkans. There are plenty of would-be Darlans in these countries. Some like Eckhardt and Otto Hapsburg are busy in America trying to secure nomination as the Hungarian Darlan. In the Balkan countries now are plenty of men who would willingly throw over Hitler if they could be sure that the Allies would back them against their own people. That way lies disaster.

The Allies have got to choose whether in this war for freedom they are going to secure the support of millions of peasants and industrial workers or whether, like Hitler, they are going to attempt to rely on a few thousand landlords and capitalists. If they want the support of the Balkan peoples, they must change their propaganda. . . .—COUNT MICHAEL KAROLYI, President of the first Hungarian Republic, in Reynolds' News (London).

BOOKS and the ARTS

LITERATURE OF THE THIRD REICH

BY ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY

"Soll es zu Tod, zu Leben sein:
O nimm uns, Führer, Wir sind dein."

A NAZI POET

THE Nazis began getting rid of their literary enemies the moment they came to power. In May, 1933, they publicly burned all the books which good Nazis are not supposed to read. This event is thus described in an official history of literature: "The fire of the pyres which flared up in German lands in May, 1933, is to us a sign and symbol of an inflexible will to purity. . . ." On June 7, 1933, there took place the first meeting of the purged Writers' Section of the Prussian Academy of Arts, of which Heinrich Mann had been president. It seems that Goebbels hoped that Stefan George would accept the presidency, but George declined. Unabashed, the Nazis appointed Hanns Johst, a much safer choice, and changed the name of the section to the "German Academy of Literature." Kulturminister Bernhard Rust was present at the inaugural session to congratulate the academy on its "inviolable independence and freedom of action."

A decree of September 22, 1933, set up the necessary machinery for the state control of literature. And not literature only. Literature, the press, radio, theater, music, painting, and the movies became the seven illiberal arts of Nazism. Each of the seven was incorporated in a division under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Enlightenment and Propaganda. The German writer had become a civil servant.

The servant did not lack a master. Goebbels reigned. As head of the ministry, the author of "Michael" had at last got the better of his professional rivals. Let them submit or flee. A board of censorship, handsomely named the Office for the Promotion of German Writing, was set up under the direction of Alfred Rosenberg, editor of the Nationalsozialistische Monatshefte and the Völkischer Beobachter, author of "Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhundert" and ex-tsarist spy. A black list of books which might not be published, sold, bought, or lent was issued. Most of the names which Weimar had celebrated were on it, for no man, the New Order proclaimed, could be a good writer if he was the least bit liberal or if even his grandmother was Jewish.

Yet the Nazis did not abolish literature. Hitler and Goebbels are both frustrated artists; they do not wish to eliminate the arts but to canalize them along their own dirty, narrow, and sinuous channels. There are many novelists, poets, and dramatists in Germany today. I shall try to explain what they are like.

The older writers fall into two classes: those who keep their mouths shut except on indifferent subjects; and those who, since they have spent their lives attacking positivism, science, reason, or Marx and defending Kultur, race, heroism, or nationalism, now feel that they have come into their own and might as well collect the dividends. Among the former, Gerhart Hauptmann is the best known. He was for some time ignored by the Nazis—had he not been a radical?

—but in 1937 Goebbels attended a performance of "Michael Kramer" at which the poet received an ovation: Hauptmann was part of the New Order. Some writers of the first class attack the Nazis under cover of apparently harmless historical narratives of distant times and places. Ernst Wiechert is one of these. Ernst Jünger, who originally belonged to the second class, has also used this trick. Among the orthodox members of this class are Ernst Bertram, an Aryan member of the George circle who writes about Norns and explains that our conception of free speech is outmoded; Rudolph G. Binding (1867-1938), who defended the Nazi revolution against Romain Rolland's indictment in 1933; Ina Seidel and Agnes Miegel, both elected to the Nazi academy; and, above all, Erwin Guido Kolbenheyer, whom the literary magazines make more of than any other living author. Kolbenheyer is not a great artist, but he writes for the "high brow" and without prompting from the Nazi Party worked out for himself—before 1933—a philosophy of race and Kultur. The Nazis are doubtless amazed at such disinterestedness.

So much for the older generation. They patronize Nazism and are patronized by it. They are still somewhat pre-Nazi. The real Nazi tone is found chiefly in younger writers, though there is one older man who cannot be ignored. This is Hans Grimm, author of "Volk ohne Raum" (1926), a best-selling novel which sentimentally champions German imperialism in Africa. Grimm had lived in England without liking it: "The Germans," he says in his novel, "must be the allies of every nation that chooses freedom and defies England." This vulgar book is treated as serious literature.

Of the host of younger writers none, I believe, is of much merit. Their work frequently exemplifies the theories of Walther Darré, whose motto Blut und Boden led to a school of writers known, apparently in all seriousness, as Blubos. Those who emphasize Boden—Josef Ponten is a name for those who want one—write sentimental bucolics with the correct anti-rationalist attitudes. Germany is divided into regions, and the critics tell you just who celebrates each Heimat: Bavaria has its Billinger, East Prussia its Menzel, and the like. Literature is thus tied to the half-quaint, half-crazy Nazi theories of what will probably soon be called meta-geography. The literary histories link meta-geography with meta-ethnology. The Nordic race is subdivided into a number of Stämme, of which the Germans are one. A standard history is "Literaturgeschichte der deutschen Stämme."

The writers who emphasize Blut are not so harmless as the Cook's-tour rhymesters of the soil. They celebrate joy of battle; they recall the tribal dawn of the Teutonic race; they appeal to the Volks; they praise the Führer. The most famous of these poets is the leader of the Hitler Youth, Baldur von Schirach. Here is one of his poems:

Ihr sollt brennen!
Nicht wie Asketen die in Gebeten sich bekennen,

nein! Wie Soldaten
die tief in Gräben
Gebete leben
durch ihre Taten!

(You should be on fire! Not like ascetics who confess their sins in prayers, no! Like soldiers who, deep in trenches live prayers through their deeds.)

A whole volume of poems in praise of Hitler has been published. It is edited by a Nazi named Bühner, and among the contributors are several writers known before 1933, such as Agnes Miegel and the inevitable Kolbenheyer. Here are some extracts:

Er war die Antwort, wenn der Zweifel kam
Mit seinen hundert klugen, feigen Fragen;
Er war der Antrieb, der, was matt und lahm,
Stets wieder vorwärts riss zu neuem Wagen. . . .

(He was the answer when doubt came with its hundred clever, cowardly questions. He was the power which always rushed forward to new daring, whatever was tired and lame. . . .)

Die Augen leuchten bergseetief und klar.
Es strömt aus ihnen unsagbare Güte.
Es droht in ihnen Schicksal und Gefahr,
Das eine Kraft die andre stumm behüte.

Die schmale Hand, die Kinder zärtlich hält . . .

(The eyes gleam clear and deep as a mountain pool. Ineffable geniality streams from them. Danger and destiny threaten in them, so that one power may keep the other quiet. The small hand which tenderly holds children . . .)

The pseudo-saga literature of Hans Friedrich Blunck, first president of the Reichsschrifttumskammer, and Will Vesper, editor of Die neue Literatur, is not on a much higher level. Nor are the dramas of President Hanns Johst. The latter's play about Tom Paine is chiefly interesting because of the extraordinary message Johst contrives to extract from Paine's life—that the individual is to be sacrificed to national greatness. Another play, which Johst published in 1933, is a brutal account of the occupation of the Ruhr. Johst is a philistine, and one of several to whom the aphorism is attributed: "When I hear the word 'culture' I reach for my revolver."

Since the outbreak of war in 1939 German writers have been, in F. C. Weiskopf's phrase, either sergeants or sleepwalkers. Dream novels, fantasies, and the 'like have been written by Max Kommerell, Ina Seidel, Waldemar Bonsels, Gerhart Pohl, Werner Bergengrün, and others, as well as by Ernst Jünger, and these books have sold well. The sergeants include the old Nazi hacks—Johst, for instance, published a volume of poems on the Polish campaign—and a number of younger zealots. What they are zealous about is chiefly war and victory, but the Nazi emphasis upon death and its gruesome splendor is now replacing the anti-plutocratic pseudo-socialism of "blood against gold." A "Songbook for Our Soldiers" opens with the lines:

Auf der Trommel liegt mein Herz,
Tambour schlage drein,
Morgen geht es todeswärts. . . .

(My heart rests on the drum, drummer keep on beating, tomorrow we move toward death. . . .)

Poetry, the Nazis know, is a weapon. Volumes have been published about each phase of the war—Norway, France, Britain, and the rest. About Russia, H. F. Blunck writes:

The eastern clouds burn red over Russian plains,
Where crows cry mournfully and somewhere death
Stands quietly awaiting you. . . .

The official Nazi publishers (Franz Eher Verlag) put out cheap editions for the troops. A special military functionary called Bibliotheks-Feldwebel makes it his business to provide the soldiers with "suitable" reading matter. One cannot know whether these methods are successful. The only concrete result I have heard of is that when one German soldier picked up a broadsheet on the Russian front he promptly gave himself up to the Russians, among whom he met the author of the poem which converted him—Erich Weinert, the German Communist. But so far this example is unrepresentative.

Yet there is abundant evidence that Nazi literature is not popular; the public's preference for escapist mediocrity is proof in itself. Even Goebbels can see that the quality of his writers is not high, and only a month or two ago he was berating them for not playing an adequate role in the New Order. He said they had ample opportunities. And indeed in what other country does the chief executive give an annual speech wholly devoted to culture? For lack of new Nazi writers the party was obliged to hunt through the histories for proto-Nazis. Books appeared with such titles as "Goethe's Mission in the Third Reich," "Schiller as Hitler's Buddy" (Kampfgenosse), "Heinrich von Kleist, Poet of the Folk," "Nietzsche and National Socialism." Probably every classic German writer except Heine has been exploited in this way.

Lists are issued of writers who are specially volkhaft. Once again the twentieth-century list is not impressive. The Nazis are not sure of their one great name—Stefan George, who as late as 1938 was applauded by one Nazi and condemned by another. They are on safer ground with Hans Carossa, Max Mell, Hans Franck, Friedrich Schnack, Hermann Stehr, Friedrich Griesse, Wilhelm Schäfer, and Paul Ernst, but who, aside from specialists, has heard of these gentlemen? It is obviously better strategy to "interpret" Hölderlin, Kleist, Nietzsche, even Schiller, Goethe, and Lessing. And there is this much justification for Rohan D'O. Butler's "The Roots of National Socialism," the best of the books against German culture: Germany has produced more fascistic literary men than any other country—what other land could produce such queer creatures as Julius Langbehn or Möller van den Bruck? The list of proto-Nazis is therefore very long, and is stretched by the Nationalsozialistische Monatshefte to include Kierkegaard and Emerson.

The histories have been, quite literally, rewritten. Hans Naumann's "Die deutsche Dichtung der Gegenwart" is a classic example. Everything was altered in the 1933 edition. For example: the 1931 edition contains an appraisal of Thomas Mann consisting of some strictures followed by a eulogy. In 1933 the eulogy is omitted. In 1931 a sentence began, "And therefore Heinrich and Thomas Mann rendered a higher service. . . ." In 1933 Naumann deleted the words "Heinrich and Thomas Mann" and substituted "they," "they" being a number of other writers. He also changed the following comment on a poem by Fritz von Unruh to the version indicated in parentheses: "Ethically it stands in the service of pure humanity (in the service of the cosmopolitan revolution) as one of the earliest monuments of that revolution from war which later became so general in our whole literature (in this literature)." The 1933 edition is dedicated to Our Leaders, Hitler and Stefan George.

Revaluation meant praising everything volkstümlich and denouncing or ignoring every Jewish writer, every liberal, and every Communist. Literary criticism degenerates to this sort of thing:

He [R. Göring] too seemed to me to have Jewish blood, for in his Seeschlacht he makes a sailor addressed as "you Jew" answer "you Christian." His speech melody too seemed to me Jewish.

Or this:

Max Dauthendey's father was twice married, to a German and to a Jewess. The poet has been described as the son of the first and also as the son of the second. The birth certificate affords for has not been forthcoming.

Both these quotations are from a standard work, Adolf Bartels's "Geschichte der deutschen Literatur."

This reconsidered historiography is not a mere catalogue of authors in two columns, approved and forbidden. There are also ideas, absurd ideas, huge, ugly, sprawling, Germanic generalities. For instance, the whole of cultural history is interpreted as a struggle between the Germanic and the Western, categories that have been passed on by the Nazis to Aurel Kolnai, Lord Vansittart, Butler, and Peter Viereck. But the Nazis differ from these latter about the dominance of the Germanic in Germany. According to the Nazis, Germany has too often been dominated by foreign Western thought. One historian, Walter Linden, declares that this domination lasted about a thousand years (800-1800 A. D.) and that only now are the Germans coming out from under.

Every principle advanced in Franz Neumann's "Behe-moth" is horribly confirmed by a study of the German literary scene. On the one hand, regimentation and a purely negative order; on the other, neurotic fantasy, either feeble or febrile, a terrifying chaos. Consider what happened to such literary periodicals as were not banned. Enphorion was one of the best. Before 1933 Nazi nonsense was only mentioned in its columns to be ridiculed. In 1933, however, it changed its name to Dichtung und Volkstum, announced that the Volk was the source of all value, and proceeded to devote more and more space to the meta-sciences. First the name of the magazine changes; next the names of editors and old contributors disappear; in 1938 only one editorial name is left out of half a dozen; in 1939 the magazine ceases publication. Comment is superfluous.

William James

IN COMMEMORATION OF WILLIAM JAMES: 1842-1942. Columbia University Press. $2.75.

WILLIAM JAMES is very much alive. It is not wholly because chronology forced us a year ago to celebrate the centenary of his birth that the tone of printed remarks about him has notably changed. Nor is it that proprio motu the critical mind has turned over a new leaf. It is the world which has changed its outward form since the late twenties, when even John Dewey could write that "an impassable chasm" separated him from James's epoch.

Superficially, of course, the chasm is always there. No one understands his own father or his own son, and there is some puzzle about making out the kind of creature one was ten years ago. But the only chasm worth discussing with reference to James is that which results from a difference of caliber between ourselves and him, and fortunately this difference has the double virtue of keeping him ever near and of yielding to the right kind of study. It is this sort of study which has become more frequent within the last five years, stimulated, no doubt, by Perry's great biography. Since then, a volume of selections, ably edited by Mrs. Aldrich, two volumes of commemorative essays, and a quantity of periodical articles mark the change of attitude I have noted. And in the offing is a reissue of James's most important philosophical essays in a three-volume set, with new introductions by his biographer.

The present collection of articles is remarkable for several reasons. It contains what is to my knowledge the first account of a European's conversion away from the Continental view of James. Arnold Metzger is this European, and his excellent article is a reinforcement, or even better a filling out, of Whitehead's formula about the Jamesian revolution in philosophy. When I say conversion, I do not imply that Mr. Metzger has become a disciple of the letter; there would be no virtue in it. I mean simply that the reading and study of James have turned him away from the monistic abstractions of German phenomenology and shown him a way around Kant.

The fact that Mr. Metzger restates with apparent gusto much of what James says about struggle, risk, and the open universe should give pause to those critics who see in this nothing but another encouragement to Mussolini and Hitler. For it is clear that the renewed interest in James, the closing up of the "chasm," have something to do with our world's being now so open that even philosophers fear to fall through it. Hence the attraction of one who was able to see chaos even when it was cloaked by convention, and to face it with courage and hope while rejecting the delusive aid of home-made certainty.

Two or three other papers in this series deserve longer mention than I can give them. Henry James's introductory remarks about his father have the same assurance blended with modesty that characterizes his previous editorial performances; and the anecdotes he tells are well worth adding to the collection—particularly Lowell's quick retort to the "hot-ai" complaint about philosophy: "Philosophy is no good unless it is hot. James always made it hot."

Excepting his references to the genteel tradition, which is either a myth or a poor name for a reality, Professor Schneider's paper on James the Moralist is an admirable example of the manner in which "influence" should be treated in the history of a man's ideas. Influence is a fact, but its astrological meaning is sounder than its later scholarly meaning: a thinker rains down ideas upon another, but these only help something to grow that was there; they are not picked up by the later man like hailstones off the barren ground. Another historical point of great importance is that made by Professor Walker H. Hill in his lucid essay on James and Peirce. He shows beyond possibility of doubt the difference in the meanings the two friends attached to pragmatism, and he restores to James the priority of its use and elaboration as a test of truth.

Twelve other essays deal with James in his various avatars—psychologist, metaphysician, and social philosopher. Some consist mainly of reexposition, like Professor Brett's superb transfixing of one theme from the "Psychology." Others—of which Mr. Bixler's on The Moral Equivalent of War is perhaps the best—offer important doctrinal criticism. Two more, Horace Kallen's and John Dewey's, indicate obvious verbal traps into which would-be critics have fallen, shouting from the bottom of the pit that they had caught their man. Possibly as an example of this sort of error, an essay by Professor Donald C. Williams is included, though shorn of some of the arrogance and frivolity it wore at the Poughkeepsie meeting of the American Philosophical Association last year.

JACQUES BARZUN

The Poetry of Mark Van Doren

OUR LADY PEACE AND OTHER WAR POEMS. By Mark Van Doren. New Directions. $1.

AS THE bulk of Mark Van Doren's poetic product has steadily increased, it has proposed to the reader, in a form progressively acute, a rather special problem. The problem is similar to that proposed by the work of Hardy or Robinson. In all of these cases there is a large body of poetry which, taken in the large, seems to sink under its own weight when it is subjected to close scrutiny. If the reader turns the pages fast enough, there is the constant illusion of poetry, but if he lingers to inspect the individual page—unless he has happened to stumble on the right page—the illusion may vanish in a puff. The reader is like a skater on thin ice: as long as he is skating fast he is safe, but if he slackens his stride he hears the creaking and splitting of the ice which may drop him through at any moment into the very cold water. Or to change the figure, many of the poems by these writers are like hoops of painted paper. You can jump right through them and be none the worse. (If you try to jump through a real poem, you will probably crack your head in the process.) In other words, the total impression is rather poor.

But so to judge these poets (in contrast, on the one hand, to a poet like Whitman, Swinburne, or Sandburg, whose value lies primarily in the total impression, and on the other hand to a poet like the Blake of the short poems, Hopkins, or Eliot, who overtly stake their case on the solidity of the individual item) is to make the wrong approach and to do

Announcing the publication of Human Destiny the Second and Concluding Volume of The Nature and Destiny of Man

by

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

W. H. Auden, in the New Republic, called HUMAN NATURE, the first volume of Gifford Lectures that make up this work, "The most lucid and balanced statement of orthodox Protestantism that we are likely to see for a long time."

329 pages

$2.75

at all bookstores

Scribners

SPECIAL Class Room Rate only 25¢ monthly per Student for orders of ten or more copies to be sent to one address.

Desk Copy Is Free!

ADDRESS YOUR ORDERS TO

THE Nation

55 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK CITY

the poets considerable injustice. They offer their readers a special problem—though one special in matter of degree rather than of kind, for these distinctions are intended as provisional and not absolute: how can one tell the good poems from the bad? This is, of course, a constant problem of criticism, but it is complicated in these instances by the fact that, in so many ways, the good poems look so much like the bad poems, and that the large proportion of bad poems tends to swallow up the relatively small proportion of good poems.

But the reader knows that the achievement of a poet is not to be determined basically in terms of such ratios in a given body of work, for many poets do their thinking, as it were, on paper. He knows that, to some degree in the case of any poet and to a high degree in the type of poet now under discussion, he must isolate the particular items in which the poet's true achievement appears. He knows that the other poems, however interesting as exhibiting the matrix of the poet's achievement, the climate in which it matured, or an index to the elements involved in the achievement, are not to be taken as part of that achievement, and are certainly not to be allowed to prejudice the poet's final claim. But the problem of isolating the poems on which that claim is to be based is peculiarly difficult in the case of a poet such as Van Doren. There are several reasons for this. First, such a poet is traditional—in the more obvious and less philosophical sense of the word—and not revolutionary or experimental in either attitude or method. He may assimilate a great deal, as Van Doren has done, from the revolutionary and experimental forces of his time, but he tends to tone down and domesticate into his own context these recalcitrant elements rather than to exploit their inherent logic to its fullest extent, as does the revolutionary poet. When the revolutionary poet fails, his failure is usually more obvious than that of the traditional poet because he tends to succeed, or fail, in terms of the logic of his extreme premise; but the traditional poet, being less specialized, receives the benefit, even in his failures, of some support from the conventions in which he is working. That is, his bad poems look more like good poems than do those of the revolutionary poet, because they tend, superficially at least, to be more balanced and coherent. Second, when such a poet is, like Van Doren, a man of taste, intelligence, and broad literary experience, even the bad poems are saved from the distortions, gaucheries, sinkings, and eccentricities which may characterize the failures of writers of a more specialized bent—writers such as Whitman on the one hand or Eliot on the other. Where the failures of Whitman are characterized by puerility and sentimentality and those of Eliot by frigidity and eccentricity, the failures of the type of poet represented by Van Doren are characterized by insipidity. And it is more difficult, at first glance at least, to define the grounds of the failure of the insipid than to define the grounds of the failure of the sentimental or the eccentric. The poetry of Whitman or Eliot carries within itself a definition of the terms of the failure, when such failure occurs.

Even the reader who admires Van Doren's achievement, and the present reviewer is one, may be forced to admit, however reluctantly, that "Our Lady Peace and Other War Poems" exhibits the poet's characteristic defects rather than his characteristic virtues; that is, with one or two exceptions, such as perhaps the title piece or Pond in Wartime, the poems are insipid. You can jump through the paper on the hoop. The poems look like poems until you break the surface. They look like poems because the conventions in which the writer is working are intelligently maintained: argument is well proportioned; the rhythms are fluent, agreeable, and discreetly various; the imagery definitely communicates its ideas. But it may be said that the trouble is that one is forced to comment upon the poems in these terms, item by item, each item in isolation from the others. The argument is too easily isolated as argument; the rhythms too readily lull us, are too free from dramatic crux and emphasis; an image too readily and precisely concedes its "idea" at the appropriate point in the argument, as it were—the precision is simply a precision in terms of the immediate idea, with little reference beyond itself, illuminating the argument but not the poem. That is, there is rarely a threat that a seam in the convention is about to burst. It is as though the poems conformed too scrupulously to an abstract definition of poetry based on the conventions in which the writer is working.

By way of example, we may examine the following lines:

Now that the land is warm
For the due rain, the seed,
But war birds, dropping sulphur,
Drone, and the borders bleed.

Why does the poet say "war birds"? Why does he say "sulphur"? He means bombers and he means bombs, but apparently he feels that the realism would too much strain the convention assumed, a convention involving at the moment a kind of pastoral poeticity. (Birds fly over farm land in spring, but bombers are not associated with the scene; therefore the bombers become birds, which drop sulphur, which, in turn, makes the borders bleed.) But the original impulse to say "birds" in deference to the convention has involved the poet in a confused and illogical image, which will scarcely stand inspection as a whole. And why "borders"? The word has a faintly romantic and martial association derived from wars of long ago, but it is a very inaccurate word in the context: modern bombing isn't a matter of borders. In the passage the poet has, because of an instinct not to strain his convention, wound up with a kind of poetic diction which reminds one of the forester's tobacco pipe in Cowper:

The short tube
That fumes beneath his nose.

The same arbitrariness is sometimes found not only in the incidental imagery of a poem but in the basic image on which it is built, as in The Lacing and The Little Wars. Or it may be found in the handling of an idea, as in Armistice.

Rumors of peace, rush elsewhere if policy
Sinks in your breath, if someone's advantage blows
Still so straight and so strong, so headed for somewhere . . .

This paraphrase of the idea, "Don't be taken in by a Nazi peace offensive," is expanded to eighteen lines. The poem is probably as good as it could possibly be, as a poem of mere commentary, as an occasional piece. The good occasional piece, like Milton's Late Massacre or Marvell's Cromwell, is good because it strikes below subject to theme, so that the subject, the occasion, comes to us in the function of symbol; when that doesn't occur, all that can be done to give the illusion of a poem is to "dress up" the subject, as subject, and this is bound to be an arbitrary business, the business of decorum within a convention. The present poem got its start as subject. It has a bad heredity, and all the genteel and cultivated environment which the poet provides doesn't compensate for its bad start in life.

February 6, 1943

This may be the trouble with most of the work in this book—as it has been with so much of the poetry of our present crisis. It is a poetry of subject, of commentary, poetry of intellectual immediacy. And when that is the case, all the poet can do is to dress up the job—like a landscape artist called in to drape the ivy over the fine, expensive brickwork of the suburban residence.

ROBERT PENN WARREN

"Heroic Historian"

FRANCIS PARKMAN. By Mason Wade. The Viking Press. $4.50.

M^R. WADE has felt some need for justifying a new life of Parkman, even one which for the first time treats him adequately. This "last" of the Boston Brahmins—as Mr. Wade will have it—is no sympathetic figure. Like many of the other formulators of the "genteel tradition," he was marked by his anti-democratic bias, lack of interest in the great events and popular movements of his time, and smug satisfaction with a circle and town which became less and less the country's hub.

Something, however, remains for the general reader: Parkman's fascinating youth. This fills the greater portion of Mr. Wade's biography. At the age of eighteen Parkman had already made up his mind to be a historian and knew exactly what he intended to write. He undertook the strenuous travels and studies which culminated, when he was twenty-three years old, in his famous trek over the Oregon trail. Parkman's voluminous journals give lucid pictures of the places he visited in Canada, upper New York, and elsewhere, the people he interviewed, his own not inconsiderable adventures—anything and everything that might shed light on a past America. As Mr. Wade says, Parkman brought a new pair of eyes to the national scene. At a time when American history was still being written with a Purpose, no one but Parkman held it in quite the same intimate regard.

The long entries in Parkman's journals relating to his Western trip make better reading than does the famous "Oregon Trail" (1849), which established Parkman with the reading public and which is still his most popular work. In his zeal to become a woodsman, an explorer, a traveler, and in short a historian who could tell vividly as well as correctly the story of the rise and fall of the French regime in America, Parkman destroyed his health. "The Oregon Trail" was written while he was beginning his lifelong struggle with what he termed The Enemy—blindness and neurosis. At this time Parkman had not yet reconciled himself to a life of dark rooms, combinations of illness which several times brought him to the verge of death, and personal tragedy; and in consequence his first book suffered in the writing.

ENTERTAINMENT

"The most effective and the most satisfactory play about the war yet to reach our stage." —Joseph Wood Krutch, Nation.

THE PLAYWRIGHTS' COMPANY Presents

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A new play by Maxwell HARRISON. Cast of 25, incl. Aline MacMAHON
CORT 49th St. E. of B'WAY, Eve. 8:40, $1.10 to $3.30. 281 seats $1.10.
Nats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40, $1.10-$2.75. Seats selling for next 2 weeks.
MAIL ORDERS PROMPTLY FILLED

HUGO GELLERT

Exhibition of 24 silk-screen prints, illustrating Vice-President Wallace's "Century of the Common Man" speech. A. C. A. GALLERY, 26 W. 8th St. Opening Sunday, February 7 at 3 P. M. Through Wednesday, February 24.

Sponsor: INTERNATIONAL WORKERS ORDER

Publishers, ATTENTION!

The Nation's Midwinter Book
Number Will Be Published on February 27th

Publishers and critics agree that the 1943 Spring book lists are the strongest in years. The many worth-while books now appearing should and will be of particular interest to the 32,000 wide-awake and discriminating readers who receive The Nation every week.

Tell Nation readers about your books. Week after week, The Nation carries comments on important new books, written by reviewers who are acknowledged experts in their several fields. Nation readers rely on these experts when selecting books. They also want to know what you have to say about your own books.

NOW is the time to start the ball rolling.

The Midwinter Book number of The Nation is scheduled for publication on Feb. 27. Deadline for space reservations and copy to be set is Tuesday, Feb. 16, but please allow as much time as possible for final OK's, required by Friday night, Feb. 19. An early space reservation will assure efficient handling of your notice in this feature issue.

THE Nation

55 FIFTH AVENUE

NEW YORK, N. Y.

Mr. Wade thinks of Parkman as a "heroic historian." Considering the countless and rather well-known trials that he endured in order to write his many-volumed masterpiece, it is easy to accept this view of the man. If history were a more popular American study, Parkman's fortitude would doubtless attract more admiration than it generally does. As it is, we tend to find so utter a snob as Parkman poor company, particularly when he is miserable. The historian, despite unusual advantages, managed to miss almost everything that was significant in his lifetime, from Daniel Boone's grandsons (during his Western trip) to the woman's-rights movement, which he exorcised in a pamphlet. A passage in his journal tells why. His company had met some wagons, whose drivers hailed them:

"What are ye from, Californy?" "No." "Santy Fee?" "No—the mountains." "What yer been doing thar? Tradin'?" "No." "Trappin'?" "No." "Huntin'?" "No." "Emigratin'?" "No." "What have you been doing, then, God damn ye?" (very loud, as we were by this time almost out of hearing).

Parkman unbent only to the American past. He could weigh the right and wrong of French, Indian, and English action so scrupulously as to call forth chidings from scholars who thought a note of uplift or moral indignation was never out of place. The result was a series of books which captured as truly as it was possible to capture the story of the Jesuits in North America, of La Salle, Frontenac, and the struggle for supremacy between the English and the French which reached its climax in "Montcalm and Wolfe."

His journals—it is somewhat remarkable that they have not been used before—form the base, and in fact the substance, of Mr. Wade's study. On his part, Mr. Wade sees Parkman steadily and whole; and he has gone over the ground covered by the historian's travels and career with such care that he is able to correct Parkman's own slips of the pen relating to far-off things.

LOUIS FILLER

Dali's Autobiography

THE SECRET LIFE OF SALVADOR DALI. By Salvador Dali. Translated by Haakon M. Chevalier. Dial Press. $6.

MY MAIN impression of Dali's autobiography is that it is not the story of his life. He calls his book his "secret life" because he has created a substitute for his real life, from which he divorced himself on grounds of incompatibility. His secret life lacks reality. He has turned the whole world into himself in what is perhaps the greatest feat of willed obscurantism of the times. He begins and ends with himself. Nothing ever happens except what he calls his "pathological flashes." One reads his 400 pages vainly searching through reel after reel of falsification for some evidence of simple human truth. It is a work of supererogation, reading Dali, for if one can stomach his self-obfuscation one has also to swallow his attempts to bamboozle the reader.

Dali conceals his real life by covering it over with psychoanalytical labels in that strange modern form of exorcism. He is constantly setting himself up by means of such homeopathic terms as his "social fixation" or his "fetishistic verification." Writing of his childhood, he refers to "the neurotic program of my intense spring days." Or there is this kind of double-talk: "I have always had a precise consciousness of the advantage of my infirmities. In deficiencies, as a consequence of the laws of compensation, of disequilibrium, and of heterogeneity, there are created breaks out of which new hierarchies of the normal coefficients of elasticity are created." The fact that he needs to falsify himself is understandable, but his pride in doing it, the very objectivity he gains by speaking of himself as a case history, is disagreeable. And his manner of telling his stories is shocking. In the scene of his first long talk with Gala, for instance, at a time when he claims he was on the verge of insanity, he uses all the tricks of suspense found in a detective thriller. The long anecdotes of his erotic reveries—the prologues to the swelling act of his imperial theme—are not shocking. They are simply unreal. The details are exquisite, but nothing ever comes off. It's all very childish.

Although he enjoyed his intra-uterine life very much—it was good as long as it lasted—he longs to grow old. That longing is sincere. He remained infantile long after infancy, and he is still struggling to advance from adolescence to maturity. He is also sincere in the expression of his debt to his wife Gala, without whom he would have gone mad. Through her love she taught him a measure of reality and self-confidence. Now and then one catches a glimpse of the terror of his early life, of the fear and timidity, the loneliness and guilt, that all but consumed him. One wonders at the process of attrition by which he sophisticated all the life out of himself. He sought life in painting, and the real tragedy is that by making painting take the place of life his painting became lifeless. Even more than his autobiography, his paintings reveal his need of impersonal approbation to authenticate his life. His extreme preoccupation with the technique of painting and his love of texture and detail are his way of pinning down the world. He is naturally a realistic painter, but since modern painting has abandoned realism for something more like Dali's own imaginary life, Dali has had to prostitute his talents by surrealist advertisement in order to insure an audience and gain the social assent he cannot do without. He painted his watches soft, but hard or soft, they still remain as realistic as a Big Ben. It is a curious fact that his pictures are often considered poetic, whereas Dali's intention is anything but poetic. That may be because their meaning is in the common domain—Dali himself speculates over their meaning—or it may be that their loneliness and desolation, as well as the feeling of destruction they convey, comfort and gratify. Then they become mirrors, and any exchange between spectator and picture is illusory.

There are good things in the book—descriptions of the Catalan countryside, of Gala, and, in spite of the symbolism, a wonderful skating scene. But just as he has distorted his natural ability as a painter, so he has written of himself—in crapulous prose—as if he had never lived. The result, if not something still-born, is without emotion, and really without personality, "sin bajar a la boca ni al corazón del hombre"—to quote from Lorca's beautiful "Oda a Salvador Dali," which I recommend to those who would like a more sympathetic understanding of Dali than mine.

H. P. LAZARUS

IN BRIEF

SOME ODES OF PINDAR. Translated by Richard Lattimore. New Directions. $1.

Mr. Laughlin's Poet of the Month series continues its eccentric, eclectic way; and here we have one of the loftier items, certain odes of Pindar, metrically translated by a member of the Bryn Mawr faculty. In Mr. Lattimore's rendering Pindar quotes Homer as saying that "a noble messenger brought highest honor to all things done," and the dignity, resonance, and firm tone of these translations will be doubly appreciated after the reader has looked at the gawky and tasteless introductory paragraph on the inside flap of the jacket. The Metrolite and Lydian typography in which the Overbrook Press has printed the book might be much worse, but Zeus the Thunderer has his work cut out for him if he thinks one mantic peal is going to stop Mr. Laughlin from being arty.

DANSE MACABRE. By Frans Masereel. Pantheon Books. $6.

This is the second war whose horrors Masereel has expressed pictorially. He does it even less well now than the first time. There are skeletons, cannon, explosions, masses of tortured people—the obvious made more so in black and white. Masereel's line has become thick, straight, and coarse, devoid of inflection, unable to note anything that does not leap up at a casual glance. Every pictorial idea is reduced to its most banal version. Any one drawing gives only too correct an indication of what all the others are like.

RECORDS

VICTOR has issued a recording of Sibelius's Symphony No. 7 performed by Golschmann with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra (Set 922, $3.68), and one of Smetana's "Moldau" performed by Kindler with the National Symphony (Set 921, $2.63).

The Seventh is for me the best of Sibelius's symphonies. I say the best, not the greatest, because greatness, which some claim for his music, is a quality I find it lacks, and the Seventh is merely the best in the ways that Sibelius's good music is good—in the characteristic themes, patterns of thought, turns of phrase, uses of the orchestra that are attractive, catchy, effective, and that in this instance are produced with particular refinement of method. Part of the to-do about the Seventh has been made about its "gigantic" single-movement form; actually the weakness of the work is the lack of organic development and coherence in the progression in which the bits of substance are pieced together. Most of the piecing together is managed very skillfully; but there is no concealing the break at the point where the crescendo is introduced to build up to the last proclamation of the brass.

The new set offers a good performance of the work, recorded with the astoundingly lifelike fidelity to timbre and sharpness of definition, the spaciousness, warmth, and richness of the sound of the St. Louis Symphony's performance of Couperin's "La Sultane" on the record issued last summer. In that recording one heard an extraordinary balancing and placing of individual sounds in their orchestral space which one does not hear this time; and I suspect that this time it was Golschmann who simply did not achieve the balance in his performance of the more complex score of Sibelius. The recorded sound of Koussevitzky's 1930 performance with the B. B. C. Symphony is dim and drab; but twice when the proclamation of the brass that I mentioned earlier occurs—on the fourth and sixth sides in both sets—one can hear that in the Koussevitzky performance itself the line of the brass is kept continuous and clear above the flood of sound from the rest of the orchestra, as it is not in the Golschmann performance. And even though they are dimly and drably reproduced one can hear characteristic refinements of sonority, execution, and style in the Koussevitzky performance that are not in the Golschmann—for example in the chatter of strings and woodwinds immediately after the passage for brass on the fourth side. Koussevitzky's performance of this work happens to be one of his outstanding achievements; and now that the Boston Symphony has signed a new contract with Victor one hopes that his 1930 recording will be replaced by a new one, along with present-day recordings of Koussevitzky's other marvelous performances—of Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes" and "Après-midi d'un faune," Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" Suite.

Kindler's performance of Smetana's beautiful work with the National Symphony is over-deliberate and over-empathic, but is reproduced with the extraordinary fidelity, spaciousness, and richness of Victor's recently made orchestral recordings.

Among the letters in response to my recent article on records for military centers is one concerned with my suggestion that machinery be set up for the circulation of records among a number of such centers in one region. It comes from the Librarian of the Charleston, S. C., Free Library, who writes: "In the Charleston area are located units of every type of military service, and the problem of recreation for service men is acute. Service men are very appreciative of the opportunities that have been offered them to hear the better music. This Library held a series of recorded music concerts in November and December, 1942, and I enclose a newspaper picture of one of these"—a picture which shows officers and men of the army, navy, and army air corps, and two seamen of the British navy. For these concerts the library used its "small but much worn collection of records"; and it is now applying to Armed Forces Master Records, Inc., for a collection with which it can "circulate, through its regular circulation files, a succession of programs to the special service officers of military units in this region." I don't know why libraries did not occur to me before; but they obviously constitute the machinery for the purpose.

As for the question raised by Mr. Futterman's letter on page 215, I have found it difficult to think of any great symphonic or chamber music which does not involve the listener's mind and emotions in a way that may be too exciting for nervously tense aviation cadets. But it occurs to me that they might be relaxed by Mozart's delightful translation of the humor of "The Marriage of Figaro" into vocal line and orchestral commentary.

B. H. HAGGIN

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

62c a line (six words)

Minimum 3 lines
$6.16 an inch

THE NATION

55 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.

ALgonquin 4-3311

Letters to the Editors

"Suggested Merits . . .

Dear Sirs: In The Nation of November 21 there was an article by Mr. Lionel Trilling with the caption: M., W., F. at 10. The article purported to be a review of the "Survey-History of English Literature" by William Bradley Otis and Morris H. Needleman, first published in 1937. Many of our friends both at City College and elsewhere have spoken or written to us expressing their indignation over this unwarranted attack and offering to write a reply. We have, of course, no objection to honest and legitimate criticism, but we do object to wilful and malicious misrepresentation. This attack in The Nation is the first adverse criticism the book has had, with one exception, and that exception of unusual interest. Dr. Samuel A. Tannenbaum, the Shakespearean scholar and editor of the Shakespeare Association Bulletin, said that the "Survey-History" is "a dangerous book because it is so well done." He thought that the student might be tempted to stop with the Survey, and not study the literature of which the book is an outline. We have on file scores of letters praising the "Survey-History." These letters come, many of them, from men well known in the field of English, scholars like Osgood of Princeton, Bushnell of Williams, Karl Young of Yale, Havens of Johns Hopkins, Chandler of Cincinnati, Scully Bradley of Pennsylvania, and Ogburn of Leland Stanford.

And now comes Mr. Lionel Trilling, several years after the book was published, and informs a deluded public that the book is "pornographic," is "pawky," "lacks taste," lacks "simple, intellectual decency," is "silly," "making a negation of common sense and meaning," and that the authors have thrust upon the student "every shabby, fusty, third-rate vulgarity of opinion that has ever attached itself to a work of English literature." These are strong words, and in view of the almost unanimous favorable opinion of the book expressed by others, the article in The Nation might possibly be interpreted as being actually libelous.

The book is simply a compendium of literary fact and opinion, many opinions, "shabby" opinions, "fusty" opinions, at times "vulgar" opinions perhaps, but nevertheless opinions that from time to time have had recognition and hence should be recorded in any compendium of fact and opinion dealing with these matters. Mr. Trilling rages at the "Survey-History" like an incompetent instructor who lacks both the knowledge and the skill to inspire his pupils to pick the best and not the worst from the encyclopedic offering. In his attempt to invalidate the "Suggested Merits and Defects" which we have added to the study of a few of the authors, Mr. Trilling goes through some highly complex and amusing contortions. The opinions recorded under "Suggested Merits and Defects" are not the opinions of the compilers of the "Survey-History" necessarily, but they are the opinions, often at variance, of course, of the admirers or detractors of this, that, or the other author. To castigate the "Survey-History," as Mr. Trilling does, on the ground that the book is subject to abuse, is no more reasonable than to blame the compilers of the telephone directory because crooks use it, or to blame the authors of a dictionary because some people are profane. Graduate students of English at Columbia say that the "Survey-History" has been recommended there for preparation for masters' and doctors' orals. Evidently Mr. Trilling had no part in such recommendation.

The atrocious bathroom pun with which Mr. Trilling brought his criticism to a close is a fair index of the tone of the article as a whole. The humor is simply offensive as all humor is offensive that is based on the writer's overweening sense of superiority. Such sophomoric straining after wit is indicative of literary exhibitionism unworthy both of the author and of the periodical that prints it. WILLIAM BRADLEY OTIS
New York, January 15

P. S.: A detailed refutation of the article by Mr. Lionel Trilling is available gratis upon request from the publishers, Barnes and Noble, Inc., 105 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

. . . and Defects"

Dear Sirs: I am quite aware of the considerable praise the "Survey-History" has received; indeed, if it had not been praised, I wouldn't have been moved to write about it. For some years I have thought the "Survey-History" a remarkably bad book; it scarcely seemed to ask for critical notice until it acquired the reputation of being a good book. Then I thought that literate people ought to be told that it is a danger to the right study of literature.

Although Mr. Otis admits the inclusion in his book of shabby, fusty, and vulgar opinions, he justifies their inclusion by saying that these opinions have at some time had recognition. But what Mr. Otis does not explain is that all opinions are represented in his volume as equally valid opinions, and that some of the very shabbiest of them are clearly the opinions of Mr. Otis and Mr. Needleman themselves. For Mr. Otis to justify himself by putting upon the teacher the job of guiding students "to pick the best and not the worst" from his "encyclopedic offering" is surely a little as if a chef, in support of his reputation as a maker of plum-puddings, were to explain that in the interest of completeness he naturally included tacks as well as plums, depending on the waiters to warn the diners.

I think that I stated in my article the matter of principle on which Mr. Otis and I seem to disagree. But perhaps I should state it again. It is my conviction that the study of literature is serious and important. It requires intelligence, respect, and—need it be said?—the actual experience of literature itself. Mr. Otis's book defeats intelligence by offering inexperienced students a mess of ready-made opinions, and diminishes respect for the written word by implying that one opinion about literature is as good as another; perhaps worst of all, it treats literature as if it were a subject only for examinations.

As for my atrocious humor about De-foe's "no plumbing of the soul," Mr. Otis and Mr. Needleman had already put that pun on the table; I only buttered it.

LIONEL TRILLING

New York, January 25

A Student Speaks Up

Dear Sirs: I am a recent graduate of an American university with my major in English Literature who wishes to report having made extensive use of the Otis and Needleman "Survey-History of English Literature" about which Lionel Trilling wrote so entertainingly in The Nation of November 21. We graduate students hated the book and were well aware of its defects, but were obliged to use it to get through the examinations with which we were faced. Professor Trilling says he is not trying to indict a profession when he suggests that this book fills a real need in our present educational picture; but he should have done so and I for one wish he had. I have heard noted scholars say much more foolish things than that Defoe had "no plumbing of the soul."

America, these days, is straining every muscle to help European lovers of freedom throw off the bondage of tyranny. It is a good time to do something about our own tyrants. The dictatorship of stupid facts in American higher education is one of the most ominous aspects of our present civilization.

LEE ELBERT HOLT

Schenectady, N. Y., December 15

Music as Therapy

Dear Sirs: In an issue or two ago your valued writer on music, Mr. Haggin, devoted practically a whole page to the activities of our organization, Armed Forces Master Records, Inc., in placing Master Record libraries in military posts. He expressed a wish that we had included more of a certain type of music.

We shall not go into a discussion of what constitutes an "ideal" basic library of 100 records, which is the size of the units we send to the larger posts. We are perfectly willing to permit any donor to make his own selection—in fact, we encourage this. We have gone over these lists and find an agreement on about 70 per cent of the repertoire anyhow. Yesterday, however, came an exceptionally interesting letter from Chaplain Chase of Maxwell Field, Alabama, which raises a vital question: Are our records to be selected on the basis of an aesthetic principle or on one of therapy? We quote from his letter:

I wonder if you or some other interested committee would consider helping us on this matter—an answer to this question: What kind of music would assist pilots, and aviation cadets similarly nervously tense, to relax? I believe that music can actually play a psychologically therapeutic role here, if we can select the right music. Can you suggest a dozen or fifteen titles? Beethoven's Fifth and Eighth for example, however marvelous, are not what we need. They leave one more keyed up and unresolvedly tense than before. So many of the longer major symphonies are but partially helpful in this direction. Music of exaltation is good, but perhaps not music of triumph in the bombastic sense. I should really very much value your help.

And we do ask The Nation's readers to give us their opinions. The library we sent to Maxwell Field was a donation of the National Orchestral Association of New York—Leon Barzin, Musical Director.

HARRY FUTTERMAN,
For the New York Committee of Armed Forces Master Records, Inc.
New York, January 20

Efficiency Ratings

Dear Sirs: To improve the federal service and the morale among federal employees, I would suggest the abolition of so-called efficiency ratings, as it only gives a chance to petty chiefs to kill more time, to vent personal grudges, and to play favorites, causing thereby many heartbreaks and nervous breakdowns. As most of the government work does not require any high degree of intelligence or unusual ability, and as the ability to perform one's duties has already been established by examination prior to appointment, there is no sense or purpose to efficiency ratings, which have nothing objective about them, but are merely the subjective expression of personal likes and dislikes, a mere childish juggling with arbitrary plus and minus signs.

But until this silly efficiency-rating system is abolished, safeguards should be established to prevent its evil effects by depriving the Board of Review of its power to lower the rating of the appellant, by giving the latter the right to appeal against unfair decisions, and by making it legally punishable for chiefs or heads of bureaus to concoct false testimony and underhandedly to influence the Board of Review against appellants.

OSIAS L. SCHWARTZ

Washington, D. C., January 20

Hindus and Moslems

Dear Sirs: In his review of Shridharani's book, "Warning to the West," Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr made the following comment in your issue of January 2 about the Hindu-Moslem relationship: "For the deep chasm between Hindu and Moslem is racial as well as cultural and religious."

Obviously there is tension between the Hindus and the Moslems today. But this tension has very little to do with racial, cultural, or religious differences. It is largely political. Whatever other differences there may be between the two groups, the racial is the least that separates them. More than 90 per cent of the Moslems of India today are converts from Hinduism. There are only

LANGUAGES

LANGUAGE IS A WEAPON

• • • Forge ahead, win special assignments, in global war and the ultimate peace, through ability to speak a foreign language.

MASTER ANOTHER LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone EAR-EYE Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. In English is spoken. You learn the new language by LISTENING.
Home-Study Courses in 29 Languages: RUSSIAN JAPANESE SPANISH PORTUGUESE CHINESE NORWEGIAN and 23 others

Send for FREE book
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
3 RCA Building, New York • Circles 7-0830

FORUMS

THE BEVERIDGE PLAN

A CHALLENGE to the Social Planners of the U. S. A. I

- 1) What is it?
Dr. Oskar Lange, Professor of Economics at the University of Chicago.
- 2) Can we get it?
Hon. Thomas R. Amle, former Congressman from Wisconsin.
- 3) What does Big Business think of it?
Mr. M. S. Rubeys, Financial writer for the Hearst Publications.

LABOR STATE, 106 West 39th Street
Tues. Eve. February 9, 1943

AT 8:15 P. M.
Send check for tickets or call
UNION FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION
(Educational Fund, Inc.)
9 East 46th Street Plaza 8-0703
Admission: 50c

ADOLESCENTS IN NEED OF PSYCHOTHERAPY: Discussion forum of Association for the Advancement of Psychotherapy; Steinway Hall, Wednesday, Feb. 10, 8:15. Speakers: Drs. Theodora Abel (Letchworth Village), DeAlton Partridge, Ernest Harms, Elaine F. Kinder (Rockland State Hospital), Joseph S. A. Miller (Rockland State Hospital).

ART AUCTION

RUSSIAN WAR RELIEF ART AUCTION

Paintings, Sculpture, Water Color, Silk Screens, Prints, Drawings
SUNDAY, FEB. 7, 2-7 P.M.
(Showing from 11 A.M.)
HALL OF ART • 24 West 40th Street

WANTED TO PURCHASE

LINGUAPHONE. Any language. Indicate condition, number of records and books, LANGUAGE, Room 804, 18 E. 41st St., N. Y. C.

ORANGES FOR SALE

NATURAL, tree-ripened Oranges, Tangerines, Grapefruit. Delivered Express prepaid. Bushel $4.00. Half-Bushel $2.35. A. H. Burkett, Sebring, Florida.

SIMPLIFIED ECONOMICS

If you believe in "Production-for-Use," Write for free copy of SIMPLIFIED ECONOMICS, 712 Chambers Bldg., Kansas City, Mo. You will like it.

Rest Advertising appears on Inside Back Cover a handful of Moslem families who can trace their ancestry to any place outside of India. For centuries there has been a free mixing and intermingling of the two groups since they first came into contact. As to the cultural differences, I think it should be noted that modern India is the product of the joint endeavors of both the Hindus and the Moslems. On everything—art, literature, music, philosophy, language, architecture, customs, and habits—both groups have left their indelible mark. Even in religion they have borrowed from one another freely.

I thought it necessary to comment upon this because the Hindu-Moslem differences are so often exaggerated and played up for partisan purposes.

ANUP SINGH, Research Director,
India League of America

New York, January 7

Wheels within Wheelers

Dear Sirs: An Associated Press story released on January 20 in connection with the Senate investigation of the rubber situation carried the following account of remarks made by Senator Wheeler.

Senator Wheeler said that he had read reports intimating that Russia was trading iron with Japan in exchange for rubber, while part of our rubber was going to Russia. "If we are allocating rubber to Russia and, if, as is intimated, Russia is shipping this to Japan, the American public should know about it."

As a private citizen I should like to ask Senator Wheeler if he believes it's in keeping with his high office to spread a slur upon a good ally without seriously investigating these so-called reports.

I think in all fairness that Senator Wheeler should cite the source of his information and that he owes it to the American public, whom he is so concerned about, to give all details he can supporting his assertion, or at least admit his lack of responsibility in passing on rumors, which are so much psychological sabotage.

It is curious that Senator Wheeler should mention reports which nobody else has heard about, while overlooking the good job Russia has been doing.

If some of our legislators feel that they can publicize rumors tending toward disunity, unchallenged, they may continue to use their office to do so. In the vernacular, I say, "Let 'em either put up or shut up."

H. H. BURNSTINE

New York, January 22

Refugees Wanted

Dear Sirs: I read with a great amount of interest the recent Nation article by Kurt R. Grossmann, telling of the contributions made by refugees in the development of a number of small industries in this country.

It occurred to me that some refugees, with special talents and ideas for new products and manufacturing processes, would like to settle down in some small city, like Escanaba (population 15,000), and start life anew, thereby securing contentment and work for themselves and contributing to the economic and social betterment of the community. What prompts me to say this is that a certain Polish refugee, with thirty years of experience in potato processing in Europe, settled in British Columbia a couple of years ago, and with the aid of the Canadian government has done some remarkable work in aiding potato farmers of that province.

We have a diversified economy in our community—lumbering, paper manufacturing, veneer factories, and agriculture. Perhaps there are some refugees with experience and ideas for new enterprises in this field which could be launched with local encouragement.

Maybe the idea won't work in practice, but I should be pleased to hear from anyone who might be interested.

WM. J. DUCHAINE, Managing Editor,
Escanaba Daily Press
Escanaba, Mich., January 25

A Definite Assignment

Dear Sirs: Congratulations on your excellent article, What Next in Africa? in this week's Nation, and in general on your approach to the North African matter.

You refer in your article to another article you published in The Nation of December 26, The Men Behind Darlan. I have the feeling that the puzzle of Peyrouton's appointment can very well be solved in the light of the facts related in that article. It is clear that the "German-French" economic group described there, in which the French are junior partners, is extremely eager to have one or several of its most trustworthy men in power in Africa.

The transaction with Darlan did not succeed because of his past. They looked about for another candidate from the group which The Nation described. Peyrouton seemed to be the best bet because he was responsible for Laval's removal in December, 1940, and the Allied authorities fell for the bait.

What you said in your issue of December 26 cannot be repeated often enough: Peyrouton cannot be regarded as a rat fleeing the sinking ship. He has been assigned to his present post—where he is in readiness for higher assignments as the Herald Tribune correspondent points out in a cable published today—in order to insure, as outlined in the article you published: (1) acceptance by the Allies of a French government which would keep intact the economic empire that the Germans with their French associates have established in France—with ramifications all over Europe; (2) peace proposals emanating from the same German group which would lead to a definite stabilization throughout Europe of the German economic empire—with or without Hitler. MIRIAM STUART
New York, January 21

CONTRIBUTORS

DONALD W. MITCHELL, avid student of naval and military history, analyzes the current military situation every other week in The Nation.

EDMUND WILSON is the author of "The Wound and the Bow," "Note-Books of Night," and other volumes.

PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN, now on leave from his congregation in Rochester, is executive director of the Committee on Army and Navy Religious Activities of the Jewish Welfare Board.

ALFRED KANTOROWICZ, before Hitler came to power, was foreign correspondent for the Vossische Zeitung. He founded the League of German Writers in Exile.

SELDEN C. MENEFFEE is a regular contributor to the Washington Post and the Christian Science Monitor.

ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY is teaching at Black Mountain College in North Carolina.

JACQUES BARZUN, assistant professor of history at Columbia, is delivering the Lowell lectures in Boston this winter. The title of the series is "Romanticism and the Modern Ego."

LOUIS FILLER is the author of "Crusaders for American Liberalism."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 16 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Affairs, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 13, 1943

NUMBER 7

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

217

EDITORIALS

- Why Not Pay Our Taxes? 219
What About China? 220
The New Expediency by Freda Kirchwey 221

ARTICLES

- Dies and the Backbone Shortage by I. F. Stone 223
The Truth About the A. P. II. A Private News
Preserve by Keith Hutchison 224
Men, Jobs, and Politics by Dero A. Saunders 228
Washington Metternichs by Lucien Vogel 231
What Your Money Won't Buy by William H. Jordy 233
In the Wind 235

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- Survey of Latin America
by Vicente Lombardo Toledano 236
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 239
File and Remember 240

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- The Vichy Men by Albert Guérard 241
The Measure of Man by Morton Dauwen Zabel 242
Sir Stafford by Ralph Bates 243
Mann Speaks to Germany by Reinhold Niebuhr 244
Swamp-Grass Roots by Betsy Hutchison 244
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 245
Pioneer and Philistine by Clement Greenberg 247
Drama: The Russian Front by Joseph Wood Krutch 248
Art Note by C. G. 248
Music by B. H. Haggin 249

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

250

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

OSBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Music Critic Drama Critic

B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL · JONATHAN DANIELS · LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR · J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1943, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 5 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

THE CAPTURE OF KURSK IS PERHAPS THE most significant of the recent series of great Russian victories, for this city of 120,000 inhabitants was one of the chief bastions of the line which the Germans had been expected to defend at all costs. The fact that it has fallen, after being outflanked on the north, without a siege suggests that the German High Command felt unable to risk another Stalingrad. But more than this it indicates lack of confidence in retaining a grip on the eastern Ukraine and probably foreshadows a retreat to the Dnieper. Such a retreat will no doubt prove less costly in man-power than an attempt to hold the present line, but in view of the tremendous momentum of the triumphant Red Army it will be carried out under the kind of pressure that insures heavy losses of men and material. After the catastrophe at Stalingrad, however, and the cutting off of a large part of their Caucasus army the German generals probably feel they have no alternative but to exchange space for time and a chance to reorganize. We can be sure that the Russians will make this task difficult. It might be rendered impossible if Russia's allies were able in the next few weeks to strike in the west.

✱

SINCE THE WAR BROKE OUT TURKEY HAS loyally adhered to its obligations as a "non-belligerent ally" of Britain. But there have been times when the Turks were painfully conscious of the exposure of their position and felt it necessary to avoid any move that Hitler could interpret as provocative. Against this background of diplomatic caution the recent meeting between President Inonu of Turkey and Premier Churchill stands out all the more sharply. For it constitutes a political slap in the face for the Axis—a gesture which eight months ago would have seemed suicidal to the shrewd statesmen of Ankara. Then Germany was thrusting through the Caucasus toward Turkey's eastern frontiers and hammering at the gates of Alexandria, and all Asia Minor seemed likely to be inclosed by giant pincers. Now the arms of the pincers have been melted in the furnace of war, and Turkey feels secure enough not only to hold military conversations with the British but to advertise the fact. Nothing could better illustrate the waning mesmeric powers of the Nazi cobra. The military significance of the conference at Adana is harder to assess. We are told that Turkey is to remain neutral, but the array of British and Turkish generals attending the meeting suggests that certain military contingencies were under discussion. It is possible, for instance, that arrangements were perfected for immediate Allied support in case Germany decided on a desperate attempt to overwhelm Turkey. Such an attempt might be a counter-stroke to an Anglo-American offensive in the Aegean preparatory to invasion of the Balkans—now more important than ever as a German supply base. Mr. Churchill, however, has warned against speculations of this nature, and it may be wise to leave the riddle to the Nazis, who are evidently feverishly anxious to find out what it all means.

✱

SOME CONFUSION HAS BEEN CAUSED BY THE announcement that a North African theater of operations has been created under the supreme command of Lieutenant-General Dwight D. Eisenhower. According to the War Department, the new theater will comprise all northwestern Africa but will not affect the commands of the British generals Alexander and Montgomery. But since Montgomery's forces are now crossing the borders of Tripoli into Tunisia, which is in Eisenhower's sphere, it is difficult to see how they can continue to operate under a separate command. The situation may be clarified when protocol has been satisfied by the promotion of Eisenhower to full general, thus making him the equal in rank of Montgomery. But in any case it is clear that Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill agreed at Casablanca that the American general would continue to command the Allied forces in North Africa. This is a political decision and one which logically follows the determination of Washington to control North African policy—a determination which the British have preferred not to challenge. From a military point of view the naming as commander of either General Alexander or General Montgomery would have seemed more logical since they have both proved their brilliance in the field. General Eisenhower commands the respect of professional soldiers, and he demonstrated his gifts as an organizer in the launching of the North African expedition. His ability as a strategist, however, has yet to be tested.

✱

IS MUSSOLINI ATTEMPTING TO MAKE CIANO and his dismissed associates scapegoats for his own failure, or are these discarded gentlemen seeking to disassociate themselves from Il Duce? If the latter is the case, then it implies that somebody in Italy is dreaming of a Darlan maneuver. Credible rumors of divisions within the ruling classes of Italy have recently been circulated. It is known, for instance, that the bankers and industrialists of the Fascist Party have been approaching the monarchs, not to overthrow Mussolini but to replace him when he falls. Whatever may be the set-up, it is evident that the total military collapse of Italy in the field, the dissolution of its empire, and the misery of its extorted legions on the Russian front were the immediate causes of the crisis. After Tripoli the war became all too visibly and exclusively a German war. To fight on was to send more peasant lads to their death on the far-off steppes and perhaps to face the invasion of the patria itself. To make demands for greater sacrifices without endangering his control, Mussolini probably felt that he must apply even sterner measures of repression. Continental report has it that the would-be Darlans of Italy would not consent. What were these measures? Since Italy is virtually an occupied country, Mussolini may have proposed to stiffen the Italian garrisons with still more German troops.

✱

ONE OF THE FOULEST BLOWS IN THE WAR against labor, which some newspapers regard as more important than the struggle against the Axis, was the recent publicity given to a story that merchant seamen had refused to unload a ship at Guadalcanal, claiming that their union agreements forbade Sunday work. This fable first appeared in the Akron Beacon-Journal, which ascribed it to reports by unidentified marines and navy men on leave from the Solomons. It was avidly seized upon by the Hearst press and the McCormick-Patterson group of papers, which displayed it under flaring headlines and sauced it with indignant comments from mercurial Senator Tydings and Representative Howard Smith. Denials by Joseph Curran, president of the National Maritime Union, who pointed out that none of the union's agreements prohibited Sunday work, and by Lieutenant Colonel Lewis B. Puller, a marine veteran of Guadalcanal, were ignored or buried by these papers. So too were subsequent emphatic contradictions of the story by Major General Alexander A. Vandergrift, in command at Guadalcanal until December 9, and Admiral William F. Halsey, who added that "the merchant seamen's cooperation, efficiency, and courage, on some occasions in the face of enemy attack, have won high praise. Now members of a House naval subcommittee, after investigating the case, have declared the accusations to be untrue. Clearly the seamen have been outrageously libeled, and the offense is the more cruel because, of all Americans, they at the moment are the most exposed to death and injury. An OWI report just published states that the number of merchant seamen dead and missing during the first year of the war totaled 3,200, or 3.8 per cent of their numbers, compared with a rate of three quarters of 1 per cent for the armed forces. The men who volunteer to sail our freighters, in defiance of the U-boats, need no lessons in patriotism from Messrs McCormick and Hearst.

HOPE FOR A SUCCESSFUL FIGHT ON DIES still flickered as we went to press. Conservatives of both parties in the House, as indicated in I. F. Stone's letter this week, seem more and more convinced of the Texan's unfairness and supported a resolution by Representative Cannon of Missouri for a special committee to hear the evidence against the thirty-eight men and women smeared by Dies. This may save William Pickens, of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, from loss of his job at the Treasury. Pickens, an able and progressive Negro leader, was one of the thirty-eight, and a motion to forbid use of Treasury funds to pay his salary was passed by the House last week. But passage was by the House sitting as a committee of the whole, and another vote was necessary to purge him from the federal pay roll. The immediate consideration sought by Dies last Monday was headed off by the Cannon resolution, which was supported by Taber (Rep.) of New York and McCormack (Dem.) of Massachusetts. The debate drew the extraordinary admission from Dies that while he could not prove Pickens to be a Communist, the suspicion against him was sufficient to warrant dismissal—an interesting sidelight on Dies's conceptions of jurisprudence. *

SHOE RATIONING WAS INAUGURATED BY the Office of Economic Stabilization with a finesse that was sadly lacking at the start of previous rationing schemes. Except for the few radio listeners, who were unwittingly tipped off by Mayor LaGuardia, the public was taken wholly by surprise. There had been no rush to stock up and no hoarding. As a consequence there is a sufficient supply of shoes on hand, and the allowance of three pairs a person a year is generous enough to meet all legitimate needs. Families with a number of small children may be handicapped, but we presume that special provisions will be made for such cases. It is to be hoped that the success of this venture in "snap rationing" will strengthen the hand of the group within the OPA which has long advocated it as a safeguard against hoarding. *

THE DEMAND OF THE SOFT-COAL MINERS for a wage increase of $2 a day and the action of both the C. I. O. and A. F. of L. in urging a revision of the Little Steel formula has raised a major threat not only to the wage-stabilization scheme but to labor's no-strike pledge. While the C. I. O. is officially committed to the Administration's stabilization program and has announced that it will continue to submit its grievances to the War Labor Board, Lewis's United Mine Workers' Union threatens to go on a rampage if its demands are not granted. The case for some revision of the Little Steel formula is, of course, a compelling one. Living costs have risen more than 5 per cent since the formula was first agreed on. But if the WLB adjusts the formula to allow for increased living costs, Congress is almost certain to pass legislation increasing farm prices, thus further boosting the cost of living. And a Congressional bloc also threatens to remove that part of the stabilization program that limits earned income to $25,000 after taxes. Under the circumstances, Byrnes must try to resist all three pressures simultaneously. The best that can be hoped for is probably an orderly retreat that makes some concessions to both labor and the farm bloc, but there can be no granting of such demands as those presented by John L. Lewis. Labor must be made to see that although inflation brings higher money wages it is bound to bring a substantial cut in real wages.

Why not Pay our Taxes?

TAX prospects for 1943 have become no clearer as a result of a week's hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee. It is still fairly certain that some pay-as-you-go plan will ultimately be adopted, but the committee seems bewildered by the half-dozen or so plans that have been proposed for dealing with the 1942 taxes due this year. There seems to be little chance that the Ruml plan, which calls for canceling the 1942 levy, will meet House approval. But it begins to look as if the high-pressure campaign behind the Ruml plan would be effective in obtaining a partial cancellation of these taxes; the Treasury has intimated that it might be willing to collect 1942 taxes at the much lower 1941 rates. Another possibility being considered is the cancellation of the normal tax and first surtax bracket, and the spreading of the remaining payments over a number of years.

Any cancellation of tax liability at this time would of course be open to the same objections as the Ruml plan. It would be bound to have an inflationary effect. Announcement of even a partial cancellation would touch off a buying spree with the money that has been saved for the 1942 taxes, and throwing such an amount of money into circulation at this time would imperil our entire price-control system. While Congress could, as the New York Times suggests, put a check to this by doubling the 1943 tax load, it could not very well double existing rates in the higher brackets. The practical result of cancellation, by the Ruml plan or otherwise, would almost certainly be to shift a substantial part of the tax load to the lower-income groups. This, of course, explains the enthusiasm with which certain newspapers and wealthy individuals have hailed the idea.

Changing from our present tax system to a pay-as-you-go plan presents a very real problem. Obviously, most people will not be able to pay two years' taxes in one year. Persons with incomes of more than $26,000 are now required to pay out 50 per cent or more of their incomes in taxes. Paying two years' taxes in one would take 100 per cent or more of their 1943 incomes. But it happens that these same groups control a large share of the excess spending power that is the major factor in the threat of inflation. This surplus can only be wiped out by tax rates that are considerably higher than the present level. Some surplus spending power exists among all groups subject to the income tax. Since it is estimated that to prevent inflation the 1943 taxes should have been $15 billion higher than they are, it would seem that at least half of the 1942 taxes should be collected this year in addition to the 1943 taxes on a pay-as-you-go basis. The remaining half might be deferred to 1944.

Such a proposal will hardly have either the organized or the popular support enjoyed by the Ruml plan. But the "sacrifices" it would impose are more nominal than real. The limiting factor in consumption this year is not lack of buying power but lack of goods. This will not be affected one way or another by our tax policies. It is to the interest of a vast majority of Americans—wage-earners, white-collar workers, farmers, and professional men—to head off a disastrous inflation. It is also to their interest to keep the costs of the war from being saddled primarily on the lower and middle income groups. Both of these objectives can best be served by insistence that a large part of the last year's taxes be paid while we are changing to a pay-as-you-go basis.

What About China?

MME WELLINGTON KOO'S suggestion that Chinese resistance might collapse unless more aid was received was, as she herself later pointed out, intended as a dramatic warning to the United Nations rather than as a statement of sober fact. Nevertheless, there can be no question that the Chinese are becoming increasingly restive over our failure to send substantial assistance to them. Mme Koo declared that China is receiving only about 2 per cent of American lend-lease supplies. Despite widespread famine and near-starvation, China is not getting any food from the United Nations.

As a result of being cut off from the outside world, China's economic position has deteriorated seriously in the past two years. Writing from Chungking, Brooks Atkinson recently described in the New York Times the extent to which inflation had impoverished the professional and technically skilled groups upon which China's future depends. But although Mme Koo did not say it in so many words, there is reason to believe that the economic distress resulting from our failure to send sufficient aid looms less important in the Chinese mind than the feeling that they have been treated as poor relations among the United Nations. President Roosevelt did not help the situation when he suggested that Chiang Kai-shek was not invited to Casablanca because China was not in a position to strike against Germany. The fact that Stalin was urgently invited to be present but refused, while Chiang was not even asked, probably rankled, even though it is highly unlikely that the Chinese generalissimo could have been persuaded to make the trip. The failure to invite Chiang was particularly irritating because the Chinese are profoundly upset by the whole trend of United Nations strategy in the Far East. They cannot see why a determined attack is not launched against Burma in preparation for an ultimate crushing attack upon Japan from prepared bases in China. Their view is supported by no less a person than General Chennault himself, who was quoted the other day as saying that with five hundred more combat planes he could run every Japanese out of China and short-circuit Japanese shipping to the Solomons.

Unfortunately, the remedy for this situation is not as simple as it seems. Some Washington dispatches have stressed both the demands of other fronts and the physical difficulty of getting supplies to China. These are real problems, but they are by no means the only ones. The Chinese are right in saying that the amount of assistance they desire is small, and in insisting that if we really want to deliver supplies we should step up the attack on Burma. But although Washington says very little about them, there appear to be political as well as transport complications. It is difficult to get any very precise information on the political situation within China today, but there are disquieting signs of disunity. While Chiang Kai-shek's position is still strong, he seems to have lost ground during the past year. The breach between the powerful Chinese Red Army and right-wing factions in the Kuomintang which led to the liquidation of the Chinese Fourth Army two years ago has never been healed. Several of China's most powerful and best-trained and -equipped armies have been held in a position to oppose the Red Army rather than the Japanese. This is only one of the signs of a disintegration in Chinese political unity which the Japanese have been seeking to exploit to the utmost. Washington has said virtually nothing about the situation, but some officials are known to have been concerned lest our assistance either disturb the equilibrium or aid the pro-fascist elements within the Chungking government. In sharp contrast to its policies in North Africa, the State Department seems to have recognized the danger of strengthening the hand of reactionary groups in China at the expense of popular forces. It is not likely that ideology enters into its considerations, but merely the potential danger that China's reactionaries will turn their weapons against domestic opponents and force a peace with the national enemy.

Despite these political considerations, Mme Koo's warning must not be ignored. If China collapses, the United Nations may, as she says, "lose the war." China should be given a place on the supreme United Nations board of strategy. If there is any sound reason why our Pacific war strategy should emphasize the Solomons rather than an offensive through Burma, it should be thrashed out in a United Nations council where the Chinese have a full voice. General Chennault's request for five hundred combat planes should be given fully as much consideration as a similar request from General Doolittle in Africa. Moreover, we should strip our own commercial airlines to the bone, if necessary, to make sure that enough transport planes are sent to carry in the food, medical supplies, and other articles needed to save the Chinese economy from collapse. Where Chinese internal politics enter the picture, however, there is every justification for caution. We must be sure that our influence is on the side of unity and democracy.

The New Expediency

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THIS story comes from a man who was there. He is a Spaniard who has been working aboard an American ship carrying supplies to North Africa. On the day the American troops landed, the Spanish seaman was visiting a concentration camp in Morocco where some thousands of his Loyalist compatriots are imprisoned. He says the emotion that greeted the arrival of the Americans could only be likened to the feeling in Spain when the Republic was declared in 1931. Men embraced one another and shouted and danced and wept. At last the nightmare of prison and forced labor would be ended. Now the horrors of Vichy-Nazi control would be wiped out. And even while they rejoiced, they prepared to leave their barbed-wire prison.

They are still there.

The Spanish seaman says that when they heard of the deal with Darlan and discovered that the political prisoners would not be released after all—not then—not till later—nobody knew when—the wave of disillusion was frightening. Many men risked their lives to escape. The rest relapsed into a mood of grim bitterness.

The disillusionment in that Spanish prison camp was repeated all over the world—most disastrously in underground France itself. And when the President of the United States felt the blast of disapproval that swept in from every center of Allied resistance, he issued a firm order that anti-Jewish laws in North Africa were to be repealed and anti-fascist prisoners released. His order was not obeyed.

Then came the fortunate death of Darlan, the appointment of Giraud. A second chance, a revival of hope. A few French prisoners were released, the anti-Semitic laws were said to be relaxed. But that was all. The mass of prisoners stayed in jail—Austrians, Jews, most of the anti-Vichy French, all the thousands of Spanish Loyalists.

But the cold wind of democratic resentment blew up stronger than ever. In the United States, radio commentators and editorial writers, who at first had laid all emphasis on the claims of expediency, began to realize the secondary results of this policy. Within a few weeks the press shifted from general approval of the North African political policy to nearly 100 per cent disapproval. The State Department was properly held to blame for the preparation of the fiasco. Eisenhower was considered the victim of a maneuver which had left him no choice but a bad one; Murphy's long and well-known record as friend of reactionary and defeatist elements in France was suddenly resurrected.

Things got so hot that even the State Department, usually blandly superior to public feeling, shifted to the defensive. Secretary Hull declared himself too much concerned with military affairs to be bothered with political details—a rash remark which exposed him to the obvious retort that political affairs were the chief legitimate business of his department.

Then came Casablanca—and Peyrouton. Not all the build-up and genuine drama of the Roosevelt-Churchill conference, not even the shadows of great military events to come, could compensate for the emotional revulsion that greeted the arrival from distant Argentina of the collaborationist whose one claim to democratic tolerance was his enmity with Laval (as Goebbels might one day offer us his hatred of Göring as a proof of decency).

But actually something did happen on the political front at Casablanca. The ice began to crack. After all, the President—on whom the State Department had generously tried to foist responsibility for the importation of Peyrouton—is peculiarly sensitive to political pressures. Expediency is not of one sort alone. Is it, for instance, expedient for the United States to appear indifferent to those freedoms for which the President has said we are fighting? Is it expedient to forfeit the confidence of every democrat from Chile to Norway? Is it expedient to throw almost the whole press of the United States into a mood of suspicion?

And so several improvements followed the President's visit to our North African front. Political news, for one thing, began to come through. And Americans learned for the first time that the French population of North Africa is not, as apologists for Darlanism had claimed, pro-fascist and pro-Vichy. On the contrary it is reported as overwhelmingly pro-democratic. Nor is it true, as we had heard, that only Vichyites are available for administrative posts. Republican deputies and civil servants of all degrees, ousted from their jobs to make place for men approved by the Nazis, are on hand and if used would command wide popular support. They have not been used.

Some other hopeful things happened. Nine of the men arrested on suspicion by Giraud after Darlan's assassination have been freed. Seven were De Gaullists and actively aided the American landings. A commission is investigating the cases of Freemasons and Jews dismissed from their posts under the Vichy-Nazi laws. Twenty-seven French Communist deputies have been released from prison. And the Joint Allied Commission on Political Prisoners and Refugees has announced that 903 assorted politicals—but no Spaniards—have been let out of prison camps. The anti-Jewish laws are being "relaxed"—but slowly and piecemeal. This caution is supposed to be necessary to prevent the Arabs from becoming alarmed. But when the British walked into Arab Tripoli the other day, the restrictions on Jews were immediately raised and the ghetto opened. No bad results were noted. But of course there's a difference: the British went into Tripoli as conquerors; we went into North Africa as liberators. One wonders whether it is the feelings of the Arabs that are being defended in our end of North Africa or the susceptibilities of the Vichy French who rule there.

The other political fruits of the Casablanca meeting were even smaller. Not only was no political agreement reached between De Gaulle and Giraud; no working plan of collaboration has been made. Catroux has gone to Africa to confer with Giraud, and probably some arrangement for military cooperation will be agreed upon. But the Fighting French have greeted with skepticism the sudden conversion of the Imperial Council into a War Council. They weren't consulted about the change and they don't like Giraud's statement that he has "in his hands all vital interests of the country at war." Does this indicate an ambition to grab power in French territories outside North Africa? If so, all chance of an agreement goes up in smoke. The Fighting French control a sizable empire and rule it successfully under the laws of the Republic. They are not likely to relinquish power to an upstart "War Council" run by Giraud and his Vichyite associates—not even if a couple of De Gaullists are asked to join.

So the gains on the political front boil down to the bare fact that contact has been established and military cooperation may be possible. Not much, perhaps. But it indicates that the President and Mr. Churchill recognize the claims of a new expediency at Casablanca. Having felt the pressure of democratic disapproval, they brought home, not a political victory, but at least a few modest reforms which could be carried out cautiously within the still unbroken framework of appeasement.

And this brings me back to the Spanish prisoners who so joyfully greeted our arrival in Africa. Those Spaniards are not just refugees locked up by a hard-boiled, near-fascist regime. They are a symbol. And they are political dynamite. Most of them were Loyalist soldiers, the first to resist the fascist enemy. They are hated and feared—and wanted—by the Franco government. Some of the best Republican leaders are still among them.

Correspondents in North Africa have reported that the Loyalist prisoners will be released "when arrangements can be made to ship them to Mexico." But last Friday Secretary Hull was asked in press conference about these men. A news broadcast the same afternoon reported that he said the Allied Commission on Political Prisoners would consult with representatives of General Franco before a decision was made about the disposition of the Loyalists. But next day in a "clarifying" explanation the State Department denied that Franco would be consulted.

What actually did happen? A story by I. F. Stone in PM on Sunday gives a sentence-by-sentence account of the press conference in question. It seems that Leigh White, CBS correspondent, commenting on the Spanish Republicans still in prison in North Africa, asked Secretary Hull "whether there were any discussions under way to send these men to Mexico, which had offered them asylum." The Secretary had nothing to say to that. Then White asked whether the State Department would be inclined to listen to any protest the present Spanish government might make in regard to the fate of the Loyalist prisoners. The Secretary replied that "he was sure that there would be every disposition on the part of the American and Spanish and British officials to work in harmony with each other." White pressed the point. Did this mean, he asked, that the Spanish government would be brought into the conferences of the Commission on Political Prisoners? The Spanish, Mr. Hull replied, would "be brought into any conferences pertaining to any of their citizens if and when they may desire to be brought in." It is this strange series of comments that was officially construed next morning as meaning something other than it had been taken to mean.

If the official construction is to be accepted, Mr. Hull's words were simply nonsense. But if the department, in its new awareness of public opinion, realizes the effect such dealings with Franco would have and is now trying to cover its tracks, then we had better go on asking questions till the last Spanish prisoner is safely in Mexico. The appeasement of Franco's regime goes on. That we know. The fact that the Loyalists are still in prison while others have been freed is doubtless due to our tenderness in dealing with the dictator who has butchered thousands upon thousands of their compatriots. Let the State Department follow its "clarifying" explanation with the swift release of all the Spaniards—whether they can take passage for Mexico or not. They will do less harm at large in North Africa than the turncoats who are keeping them in prison. They might even provide a battalion for the armies of liberation. At least they have never made peace with fascism.

Dies and the Backbone Shortage

BY. I. F. STONE

Washington, February 7

TWO things stand out from last week's debates in Congress on the Dies committee. One is that we have in Dies a very able demagogue who is laying the foundations for a powerful post-war fascist movement in America. The second is that there would be a good chance of defeating him if the Administration had the courage to provide the fight against him with some leadership. Unfortunately the White House seems to be as weak and half-hearted in its domestic as in its foreign policy. The same irresolution that permits a French fascist and anti-Semite to be installed as Governor General of Algeria was scandalously evident on the home front during the past week. Presumably we are engaged in a war against the Axis. Yet a group of diehard isolationists in Congress was strong enough to force the Attorney General to remove William Powers Maloney from the prosecution of the case against the thirty-three alleged seditionists, and a leading member of the President's own party was permitted unrebuked to condone anti-Semitism on the floor of the House of Representatives.

It is true that the President has named an official committee to handle "complaints of subversive activity" by federal employees, and this will be of some puny help in combating Dies. But it is essentially defensive action, and it meets Dies on his own well-chosen ground. To pretend that this is all a serious hunt for Communists is to play into the hands of Dies; even the bitterly anti-Communist New Leader maintains that only eight of the thirty-eight officials named by Dies are really Communists. Recent utterances from Berlin show that fear of communism is still the Nazis' chief hope of a negotiated peace. To allow the Dies committee to go on operating is to give Goebbels a sounding board in our midst and to permit American fascism to organize itself at home while we fight the fascist Axis abroad.

The new theme song of the anti-democratic forces in this country is "bureaucracy." Suddenly one hears it echoed on every side as though some smart publicity man had arranged the chorus. When Dies spoke of "a new philosophy which in one country is communism, in another fascism, in another country Nazi-ism, and in another country bureaucracy," he was hitting straight at the New Deal. When Dies said on the floor that the fight against this new philosophy was "more important than the conflict between rival armies" and then changed it in the Congressional Record to "of almost equal importance with the conflict between rival armies," he was making a confession. He was afraid of his own little slip of the tongue, of the revelation that the war Martin Dies is really interested in fighting is the war against democracy at home.

Unlike the Administration, Dies is rarely on the defensive. One of the few instances in which he has been forced into this position occurred last week when the Texan remarked on the floor of the House: "There have come repeated demands that this person or that person be branded as pro-fascist or pro-Nazi simply because he expressed anti-Jewish views." This is the nearest Dies has come to explaining why some of his committee's best friends are Axis agents. Hitler himself could not have surpassed the demagogic sleight-of-hand with which Dies defended himself against his accusers. "I do not hold," he said, in another passage which he himself later expurgated from the Congressional Record, "with those who condemn anyone on account of the misdeeds of some people in that [Jewish] race, but there is no law against a man's denouncing the South. God knows I have heard Southerners denounced as viciously in certain quarters of this country as I have ever heard Jews denounced." This may be a non-sequitur to intellectuals, but it was an effective appeal to wounded Southern pride. Dies went on to explain that anti-Semitism is not necessarily fascism and to identify fascism itself with "people who believe in simple, fundamental Americanism, people who believe in preserving our Constitution, people who believe that America shall not fall a victim to maudlin internationalism." One does not answer a speech of this kind by appointing another committee to investigate communism!

Despite the cheers for Dies on Monday, the debate on the floor of the House Friday indicated that he is not unbeatable. The House voted 153 to 146 Friday against a motion which would have barred from public employment the men Dies had named as communistic on Monday. The real issue in the debate was well stated by a Dies supporter, Gifford of Massachusetts. "Almost the entire membership of the House rose and cheered the gentleman from Texas the other day," Gifford said. "Certainly we seemed to have approved his findings. Am I today to be told that each case must be proved before each and every member of the Committee on Appropriations before the findings of the gentleman from Texas and his committee are accepted?" The issue was, indeed, as the exasperated Gifford saw it, a question of confidence in Dies. One conservative Congressman after another, men of both parties, from North and South, rose to attack the motion, to defend from their own knowledge one or another of the men Dies had smeared, and to declare that they would not condemn these men without evidence. But if the Dies committee, after all these years of activity and the expenditure of half a million dollars, cannot marshal enough evidence to impress anti-Communists like Dirksen of Illinois and Tarver of Georgia, it is highly vulnerable.

In this, as in other matters, the Administration underestimates the intelligence of the American people. An examination of the press, as of Friday's debate, will show there is enough sense of fair play, of devotion to basic American ideals, and of the realities of the war to overcome the red bogey even on the right. Keefe of Wisconsin, Folger of North Carolina, Ludlow of Indiana, like Hobbs of Alabama in the earlier debates over David Lasser, reflected the strength of the basic traditions we all share. "I am not willing," said Case of South Dakota, "to condemn thirty-eight men and women in thirty minutes on ex parte presentation without even a specific statement on each one of the individuals concerned. We are supposed to be fighting a war to sustain the Anglo-Saxon idea of justice." And O'Connor of Montana did not speak for himself alone when he cried, "Suppose these men have had communistic leanings? Who in the name of God today are stopping bullets that would be killing our boys? . . . Who are we fighting—Russia or Germany?"

Dies could be beaten if there were available but a little more courage and leadership. Brave young Will Rogers rose on the floor to register his dissent Monday after Dies spoke. Ickes, who has more spunk than the rest of the Cabinet put together, replied to Dies with a scorch. James L. Fly of the Federal Communications Commission stood up like a man before the House Appropriations Committee in his defense of Frederick L. Schuman and William E. Dodd, Jr., against Dies committee charges. Unfortunately, elsewhere in the New Deal the critical shortage is backbone.

The Truth About the A. P.

II. A PRIVATE NEWS PRESERVE

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

TRESPASSERS BEWARE!

IT IS peculiarly appropriate that the Associated Press should have obtained its charter in 1900 under a New York law originally enacted to facilitate the incorporation of clubs for the purpose of acquiring and holding hunting lands and fishing rights. For the A. P. is itself an exclusive club and one that is very much concerned in guarding its preserves from poachers. Its barbed-wire by-laws are designed to prevent the use by non-members both of the news it gathers through its paid staff and of that which it receives from its member papers, under covenant to supply to it, and to it alone, all local news of spontaneous origin.

Moreover, the rules give the A. P. the right to police the relations of its members with other news agencies. An application for an investigation of the A. P. made to the Federal Trade Commission in 1918 by the International News Service cited a number of examples of high-handed action which constituted gross interference with the business arrangements of member newspapers. On one occasion, for example, the New Orleans Item subscribed for the leased wire service of the I. N. S., which installed its receiving instrument in the building where this paper was published, although not in the editorial rooms. On learning this, the A. P. served notice on the publisher that he would lose his membership unless the offending wire was taken right out of the building within twenty-four hours.

Clearly the A. P.'s gamekeepers were powerfully armed. Nevertheless, Melville E. Stone, general manager from 1893 to 1918, was not satisfied with private sanctions; he wanted them reinforced by all the majesty of the law. Long before the foundation of the A. P. of Illinois, he writes in "Fifty Years a Journalist," he had dreamed of legal protection for what he called "property in news." He put the case thus:

First, that to keep pace with the progress of the world there must be a revised definition of the word "property" so that it . . . should include everything having an exchangeable value. This would take it out of the narrow place it had theretofore occupied in legal parlance, and should connote incorporeal rights. Second, there should be a revised definition of the word "publication." I took the ground that the printing of a news telegram in the columns of a newspaper which was sold for one cent a copy should not, and did not, constitute such a publication as would mean abandonment to the public for republication.

What exactly does this mean? Obviously, nobody in the news business is going to claim that any property right adheres to the historical event which makes news. For to do so would be to open the way to demands for payment from the owners of places where events having a public interest occurred—for instance, sports arenas or stock exchanges. This would, of course, be as contrary to the interests of newspapers as it would to those of the public. Mr. Stone's objective was different. He considered that when a newspaper or agency had alone developed the news of an event, not merely the form but the content of its report should be protected from use by anyone else, after as well as before publication. This was the new property right for which he sought legal recognition, and its advantages to an organization enjoying a corner in news need not be labored. It should be equally clear, however, that the granting of such a right would be entirely contrary to the public interest, for ownership of a commodity, unless specifically qualified, does not imply any obligation to dedicate it to public use. In other words, the legalization of property in news would mean the legalization of its suppression.

In our legal system news, at least on publication, has always been considered as entering the public domain, and Congress has never been persuaded to alter this situation. In 1883 the Western Associated Press, on a motion by Mr. Stone, appointed a committee to agitate for legislation, and as a result a bill was introduced into the Senate providing for eight hours' copyright protection for published news. But as Henry Watterson, the famous Louisville editor who was a member of the committee, said in his autobiography, the mission was sent on "a fool's errand." The Committee of the Library reported the bill adversely, and nothing more was ever heard of it. In 1899 the A. P. tried again, appointing a committee to investigate the chances of a bill granting property rights in news. It was soon forced to admit defeat.

Mr. Stone stuck to his dream, however, and in 1916 charges that the International News Service was pirating A. P. dispatches gave him an opportunity to apply legal tests to his theory. Curiously enough, in his memoirs he is extremely reticent about the ensuing cause célèbre. He allots to it but two-thirds of a page, and his account ignores all the elementary rules of reporting. He does not say who the A. P.'s opponent was, what form the case took, or what was the actual outcome; he merely declares that a "most decisive victory" was won in the Supreme Court, and "thus, thirty-six years after I had settled the equities in my own mind, was the law finally revolutionized."

Oliver Gramling, an A. P. employee, in his history of the organization, is only a little more informative, although he does mention that the final judgment provided for a mutual permanent injunction against the appropriation of each other's news by either the I. N. S. or the A. P. But neither of these supposedly authoritative sources gives any inkling of the fact that Justice

Pitney, who delivered the opinion of the majority of the court, very definitely did not indorse the principle of property rights in news. On the contrary he said:

But the news element—the information respecting current events contained in the literary production—is not the creation of the writer but is a report of matters that ordinarily are publici juris; it is the history of the day. It is not to be supposed that the framers of the Constitution, when they empowered Congress "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, by securing for a limited time to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries," intended to confer upon one who might happen to be the first to report a historic event the exclusive right for any period to spread the knowledge of it.

We need spend no time, however, upon the general question of property in news matter at common law . . . since it seems to us the case must turn upon the question of unfair competition in business. . . . Besides, except for matters improperly disclosed, or published in breach of trust or confidence, or in violation of law, none of which is involved in this branch of the case, the news of current events may be regarded as common property [italics added].

It is to be observed that the view we adopt does not result in giving to the complainant the right to monopolize either the gathering or the distribution of the news, or, without complying with the copyright act, to prevent the reproduction of its news articles; but only postpones participation by complainant's competitor in the processes of distribution and reproduction of news that it has not gathered, and only to the extent necessary to prevent that competitor from reaping the fruits of complainant's efforts and expenditure, to the partial exclusion of complainant.

THE A. P. CREATES A "LAW"

The effect of this judgment was to enjoin unfair practices as between competitors, whether by interception of each other's dispatches, bribery of each other's employees, or persistent copying of each other's published news. But it emphatically did not establish any absolute property right in news. Yet for twenty-two years the A. P., trading on its self-advertised reputation for reliability, has persistently spread the idea that in 1918 the Supreme Court declared that news was property. And by so doing it has given additional proof of Hitler's theory that a lie told often enough and loud enough can be made to stick. This one has stuck so long that most newspapermen firmly believe it.

The arrogant persistence with which the A. P. has spread its own version of this Supreme Court decision is best illustrated by the efforts of Kent Cooper, the present general manager, to gain for it the impress of international authority. In August, 1927, at a Conference of Press Experts held at Geneva under the auspices of the League of Nations, Mr. Cooper proposed a resolution which included the following passage:

It is desirable that endeavors should be made to secure an international understanding for the unification of legislation in the matter of news on the basis of the following principles: all news obtained by a newspaper or news agency, whatever its form or content . . . shall be regarded as the property of such newspaper or news agency for as long as it retains its commercial value.

Mr. Cooper's recent book, "Barriers Down," conveys an impression that in sponsoring this resolution he enjoyed the support of the two other American agencies represented and that the main opposition came from Lord Riddell, one of the British delegates. Official reports of the conference, however, tell a very different story. They make it clear that the Cooper resolution was decisively blocked by a stirring speech delivered by M. Koenigsberg, representing the International News Service. Emphatically disassociating himself from the supporters of the resolution, Mr. Koenigsberg revealed to the meeting the actual content and meaning of the Supreme Court decision which Mr. Cooper had casually referred to as the legal basis of his case. And he went on to declare that:

Any law that would alienate from public ownership and confer on private ownership one iota of property rights in news would be the prelude to other laws and regulations for extending that alienation, until all property rights in news had departed from the public and were vested in private owners.

As the result of this timely intervention, all chance of passing the Cooper resolution was lost, and in the end a compromise was adopted which conceded that news organizations were entitled to the fruits of their labors after as well as before publication but pointedly excluded any mention of property rights in news. "The adoption of this resolution," wrote Dr. Manley O. Hudson in the American Journal of International Law for April, 1928, "signalizes the failure, for the time being, of efforts to secure an international recognition of property in news." Nevertheless, in its own inimitable way the A. P. succeeded in creating victory out of defeat, for its Geneva bureau filed the following story on the conference:

Protection of news against piracy was the basic idea of the resolution adopted today at the International Press Conference after two days of vigorous debate. The doctrine that news is property and must be protected, already observed among American news agencies and newspapers, becomes, by virtue of the resolution, a universal concept. . . . The question involved in the resolution was introduced yesterday by Kent Cooper and unanimously advocated by the American delegates, including Karl A. Bichel of the United Press, Moses Koenigsberg of the International News Service . . . [italics added].

I have told in detail this story of a persistent attempt to imbed a myth in the public mind for three reasons.

In the first place, it illustrates the lengths to which the A. P. has been prepared to go in order to protect the business of those established publishers who enjoy its franchise. Secondly, it helps us to evaluate the testimony of the host of newspaper character witnesses who have declared, apropos of the government anti-trust suit, that the A. P.'s reputation for accurate and impartial reporting is unblemished. Finally, it is essential to clarify this question because, in the course of its answer to the complaint filed by the Department of Justice, the A. P. declares flatly that the government claim that its by-laws constitute an unreasonable restraint upon competition "disregards the established principle of law that news is property of which the owner has the sole right of disposition."

It may be doubted whether, apart from its apparent contempt for the facts, this assertion does anything to strengthen the A. P.'s case. For, assuming for the sake of argument that news is property, would it not be a reasonable inference that it is akin to a commodity? And, in that case, is not the A. P., by restricting the sale of its news to a limited group of members, putting itself in the legal position of an association of steel manufacturers who agree to sell their specialties only to one another—an agreement which would clearly be in unlawful restraint of trade?

"NEWS OF SPONTANEOUS ORIGIN"

The case against the A. P., however, rests on a much more solid foundation—its absolute control of the domestic "news of spontaneous origin" in the morning field. This includes reports of such events as plane accidents, tornadoes, crimes, deaths of celebrities, and other unanticipated noteworthy happenings. Outside a few great cities, where the news agencies are able to maintain fully staffed bureaus, the only method of collecting such news as develops between, say, 6 p. m. and 6 a. m. is through the medium of the local morning papers. And with the exception of the Chicago Sun, every exclusively morning newspaper having a daily average circulation of over 25,000 is a member of the A. P. and under contract to supply to it exclusively all local news that might have more than local interest. Taking into account the many smaller morning newspapers in important news centers which are also members, it may be said that the A. P. has control of the news collected by publications having over 90 per cent of the total circulation in the morning field.

It is unfortunate that the complaint of the Department of Justice does not give as much prominence to this angle of the case as it deserves. In attempting to prove monopoly it relies rather on the acknowledged fact that the A. P. is by far the largest news agency in the country, employing more men and spending more money than the United Press and the International News Service combined. And in support of the claim that denial of A. P. service imposes an unfair handicap on a paper, it stresses the good-will accumulated by the agency during its long history, the over-all superiority of its service, and "the fact that in the mind of the general public the name Associated Press has long been regarded as synonymous with the highest standards of accurate, non-partisan, and comprehensive news-reporting."

A good many working newspapermen will agree that this is giving the devil altogether more than his due. The A. P. is often stodgy and sometimes slow, and when it tries to handle a story lightly its touch is usually elephantine. So far as foreign news and domestic features are concerned, it encounters real competition from the United Press and, to a lesser extent, from the International News Service. But whatever these agencies may say in their sales letters, they cannot begin to compete in the field of domestic news of spontaneous origin. And by suggesting that they are forced to eke out their reports for morning papers by the use of special correspondents and "string-men," the Department of Justice understates the extent of their disadvantage. For, in fact, there are no such "string-men," since in practically every news center of the country the journalists who might serve in this capacity are employees of A. P. newspapers and, as such, are prohibited from supplying news to other agencies. It follows that a morning newspaper which is excluded from the A. P. cannot obtain from any other source anything like a full service of domestic news. This is a severe competitive handicap.

WHOSE OX IS GORED?

Since, however, all but a handful of papers do enjoy the franchise, it may be asked: Whose ox is gored? One answer is the ox of Mr. Field and a very few other publishers, and this again has been countered by some editorial supporters of the A. P. with the question: Should the Department of Justice set in motion the engines of the law just to further the business interests of one or two publishers? It would be a new principle of law to deny relief from unfair competition on these grounds, but in any case the real victims of the A. P.'s monopoly are millions of members of the general public.

Thanks to the A. P., established publishers have been able to construct a defensive system strong enough to repel all competitors. Moreover, where competition still exists within the intrincments, it is being rapidly reduced by mergers. Thus the public is being more and more restricted in its choice of newspapers. In Chicago, prior to the advent of the Sun, readers were forced either to forgo the morning news altogether, or to swallow the highly individualistic McCormick version of it. And there are many other great cities where you can take the one morning paper or leave it. They include Cleveland, Detroit, Baltimore, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, and Milwaukee. Moreover, an increasing number of medium and small cities now have but one morning and one evening paper, both owned by the same firm, which in many instances also controls the local radio station. Such local monopolies over the sources of news and opinion are not compatible with the healthy functioning of democracy.

It would be absurd to argue that the A. P. is the sole cause of the growing concentration of control in the newspaper industry. Technological changes which have swollen the capital required to found or run a paper have served to keep out the kind of small capitalist who entered the business during the nineteenth century. But the restriction of competition by the A. P. has definitely promoted the movement toward consolidation by multiplying its financial rewards. And there is no doubt that the impossibility of breaking into the A. P.'s magic circle in any major city in the country, except by paying a monopoly price for a membership if one happens to be on the market, has discouraged new publishing ventures. Only a rich man can afford to take a chance. But when a Marshall Field invests his capital in a newspaper enterprise, he is assailed as unfair to existing enterprises on the ground that, since he can deduct losses sustained from his personal taxable income, he is, in effect, enjoying a government subsidy. Curiously enough, most of the papers which have echoed the A. P. argument are also strong supporters of the theory that high taxes discourage investment.

Robert R. McCormick

The private-enterprise system, it has always been understood in this country, depends for its health on the profit motive being subject to the monitorship of competition. For if the corrective influence of competition is removed, the entrepreneur ceases to be enterprising and seeks satisfaction of the profit motive by raising prices and reducing quality. It is not surprising, therefore, that the newspaper industry in many cities is beginning to show the flabbiness that results from a too sheltered life.

If the Department of Justice wins its suit and breaks down the fence surrounding the established newspapers, we should not expect an immediate flowering of new publications. But the knowledge that one important barrier to competition was down would serve to put every publisher on his toes and encourage him to give greater thought to the satisfaction of his readers lest some outsider should seek to entice them from him.

What would happen if the A. P. won? A legal blessing for its exclusive membership contracts would give a green light to the United Press to take the same road; in fact, it is probable that its customers would insist on contracts affording them the sole right in their fields to U. P. service. Within a strengthened fortress of monopoly we should expect the newspaper industry to grow increasingly stagnant, increasingly conservative, and increasingly out of touch with public opinion. The men in possession would remain in possession; news would become private property de facto; freedom of the press would be changed from a public right to a vested interest. [This is the last of two articles on the Associated Press.]

Men, Jobs, and Politics

BY DERO A. SAUNDERS

ON FEBRUARY 2 the War Manpower Commission announced two important steps, one immediate, the other prospective. The first, the withdrawal of deferment from all men of draft age in sixty-five occupations, stole all the headlines. But buried deep in the news stories was the information that the McNutt agency would shortly present to Congress a "national war-service act" giving the government power to order individual workers to take or keep jobs considered essential to the war effort.

The withdrawal of draft deferment from men engaged in certain superfluous activities is a welcome step, and public thanks are due to General Hershey of Selective Service, John Corson of the United States Employment Service, and a few others, who pushed it through the Manpower Commission's inner councils against considerable opposition. But a compulsory war-service act is something quite different, and the introduction of such a bill in Congress will precipitate a general brawl. Already Congressmen and Senators are clearing their throats; labor leaders have the light of battle in their eyes; editorial writers and columnists are choosing sides and warming up.

Those going forth to battle against compulsion have taken for their text the lofty statement of Bernard Baruch, written back in 1917, castigating the idea of any kind of industrial conscription: "As long as the present industrial organization obtains, industry is in the hands of millions of private employers. It is operated for profit to them. The employee therefore serves in private industry operating for gain. Enforced and involuntary servitude for a private master has been repeatedly and clearly defined by our Supreme Court as slavery prohibited by the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States." The opposition replies heatedly that Britain has a national war-service act, and isn't Britain a democracy? If Britain had to use compulsory methods, why shouldn't we? (The argument strongly resembles a wet-dry debate of the '20's: one side argues from principle, the other from expediency, and neither's arguments have the slightest effect on the other.)

Mr. Baruch's statement so disregards present realities that it is doubtful whether he himself would defend it today. Industry may be "in the hands of millions of private employers," but it certainly is not at present "operated for profit to them." In war time the employer produces what the government tells him to produce; his profits, his collective-bargaining contracts, and his maximum wages are rigidly supervised by the government. Part or all of his plant may be government property, and if he wilfully fails to produce the materials expected of him, the government can, and does, take over his plant and operate it in the interest of the war effort. If you think industry is free to follow its own whim in war time, just try to imagine General Motors canceling its war contracts!

Nor would compulsory war work represent "enforced and involuntary servitude for a private master." Servitude implies that the master has the right to give any orders he chooses, but no manufacturer would have that power over a draft of industrial workers. Shortsighted employers, dreaming of a national war-service act as a kind of industrial paradise, had better wake up: the moment the worker loses his right to quit, the employer will lose the right to hire or fire whom he chooses, or to use the labor of his employees as he sees fit. That is true in Britain, Canada, and every other country which authorizes compulsory assignment of industrial workers.

The futile quarrel over compulsory or voluntary manpower mobilization results from the failure to understand that no single bold stroke is going to solve the problem. In fact, nothing is going to solve it; the manpower shortage is here for the duration. But by attacking the problem in a dozen ways at once, we can manage, despite the shortage, to build up the vast armed force, grow the food, and turn out the weapons we need.

To meet the need for man-power, millions of gardeners and jewelers and beauticians and clerks will have to be transferred to war jobs; in fact, that was the commission's main object in refusing them further draft deferment. Other millions, chiefly housewives and students, must be trained for their first regular jobs. Employers will be obliged to swallow their prejudices and hire Negroes and aliens; plants will have to stop hoarding and wasting labor; in many civilian industries production must be "concentrated" in a few plants to release labor and equipment for war work. All these measures must be employed, and at the same time there must be a vigorous approach to the problems of housing, transportation, day nurseries, industrial accidents, labor turnover, absenteeism, better scheduling of production, and so on.

A realistic man-power program will not depend on purely voluntary or purely compulsory methods but on a mixture of persuasion and pressure. Other things being equal, it is not difficult to persuade the average American workman to take the job that best supports the war effort. The man-power administrator therefore must strive to keep those other things equal, so that the worker can follow his desire to support the war he believes in. The chief inducement to enter war work is found in the pay; high wages have played a tremendous part in building a corps of war workers now numbering about 18,000,000. However, there are jobs—in mining and farming, for instance—whose wage levels can't be raised high enough to attract labor without endangering economic stability. And for countless individuals high wages alone are not enough to make them give up home, seniority rights, and other privileges, and move to some overcrowded war-industry town a thousand miles away.

Thus not only inducement but pressure is necessary—pressure on the worker to go where he is most needed and stay there. The most common form of pressure is draft deferment, which now operates in two ways: key industrial and farm workers are deferred; workers in superfluous industries and occupations are not—regardless of their dependents. (And the Manpower Commission is in earnest when it announces that the list of superfluous occupations is "preliminary" and "will be added to from time to time.") Another form of pressure is economic aid, as in the recent concentration of the gold-mining industry. Late in 1942 most of the gold mines were shut down to conserve vital materials and release skilled miners for the copper and other non-ferrous mines. To make sure that the ex-gold miners went to work in such mines, the War Manpower Commission paid the travel and moving expenses of miners and their families to the places where they were needed.

A cynic might say it makes little difference whether you use compulsion or pressure, so long as the result is the same. But isn't democracy largely a question of how things are done? It makes a good deal of difference whether a man is forced to do something or whether that something is made to appear simple, logical, and possible. Americans are familiar with economic and social pressures; in this case the pressures are merely harnessed to a desirable national goal.

The controls of a man-power program can usually be exerted either on the worker or on the employer, but with the obvious exception of draft deferment they should wherever possible be applied via the employer rather than directly on the employee. Most industrial plants today are working on war contracts, and the government obviously has the right to determine how those contracts shall be filled. If the man-power regulations

NO FRANKENSTEIN'S PLEASE

(Copyright in All Countries.)

injure the employer, then the government can repay the damages. But compulsion of the individual worker nibbles away at his civil rights—a serious loss that can't be repaid in dollars and cents. Our man-power program has to direct the labor of more than 60,000,000 Americans. That is a lot of people. Most of them, however, work for a few thousand employers who have the say about who shall work and what they shall do. Therefore giving directions to the employer is the simplest way of dealing with large groups of workers.

A couple of examples will make this clear. One important step in the man-power program will be "controlled hiring," that is, all hiring in certain critical industries and areas will be done through some agency like the United States Employment Service. Which is simpler: to demand that thousands of individual workers take jobs through the Employment Service, or to regulate and supervise the hiring practices of a few dozen employers? Or suppose it became necessary to require fifty hours of training on the job for every worker in a certain industry. It would be difficult to hound every individual in the industry until he took the necessary training. But it would be entirely practical to make a few employers require the designated training as a condition of further employment.

The soundest measures are those which make it possible for the individual worker to do the job necessary to the war effort. Today many persons stay in jobs of no value to the war because they have no other skill. But provision of training facilities is not enough: the average worker can't afford to quit his job and take a training course of several weeks or months. He can fit himself for war work only if he is paid wages while he is training. This fact is going to haunt the Manpower Commission as the number of non-deferrable occupations grows, for the real purpose of listing these occupations is not to sluice men into the armed forces but to push them toward essential occupations.

Other workers badly needed in war industries hang on to non-essential jobs because they can't afford to give up seniority and other rights. They would be willing to make the change if those rights were protected, and if the government paid their travel and moving expenses. This is done in Britain and Canada when a worker is officially asked to take a new job. A housewife with young children is in the same situation. She can't be asked to take a factory job unless a satisfactory day nursery makes it possible for her to do so.

In terms of an effective man-power program, the question of "voluntary" versus "compulsory" methods is pretty unimportant. By itself, a national war-service act is only so many words on a piece of paper. The man-power boss can't order workers to do impossible things; if he does, he will just get a million noses thumbed at him. A war-service act has some value when applied to the recalcitrant worker, but it will solve the really important man-power problems only after solid progress has been made along other lines.

Take training, for example. The War Manpower Commission is proud of having trained some 300,000 foremen and crew chiefs as "job instructors"; it estimates optimistically that these 300,000 men have given some kind of on-the-job training to "more than 4,000,000" other war workers. But there are already 18,000,000 war workers, most of whom could profit from on-the-job training; in fact, a worker needs new training every time he moves up one grade in skill. How can we manage to multiply our on-the-job training program ten or twenty times? "Preemployment training," which prepares a worker for his first war job, must also be greatly expanded. So far preemployment courses have usually trained workers from other jobs who had some sense of work discipline and factory practice. Future courses will be filled with housewives and young girls, most of whom never saw the inside of a factory. Our preemployment training program will have to be adjusted to their needs.

Absenteeism must be cut down. Sickness, accidents, irresponsibility, tiredness, and the like are costing some of our war plants 10 or 15 per cent of their possible man-hours. Labor hoarding must be stopped—employers' wasting of skilled workers at a time when our few skilled men must be spread around as thin as frost on a window-pane. The community problems must be tackled—housing, overcrowded schools, transportation near the breaking-point, too few doctors, inadequate water supply. And if he solves all these, the man-power boss can still go crazy trying to allocate our total man-power among industry, agriculture, and the armed forces.

One approach to the man-power problem guaranteed to fail is the political approach. The compulsory war-service act advanced by Grenville Clark, the New York lawyer who drafted the Selective Service Act, contains a provision that "no person shall be obliged to join any union or organization of employees as a condition of employment under this act." This innocent-sounding clause in effect sets aside all closed-shop, maintenance-of-membership, and preferential-shop contracts for workers ordered into jobs by authority of the act. Mr. Clark maintains that it would be unfair to require union membership of anyone compelled to take a certain job—a touching concern for individual rights on the part of a man proposing that we allow the man-power administrator to order workers from job to job at will. The astute Paul McNutt is unlikely to include any such provision in his commission's national-service proposal. One thing is certain: any bill containing such a clause will be vehemently opposed by organized labor and ardently supported by groups hostile to labor, without the slightest regard for the bill's intrinsic merits.

Political strife will also be aroused by the proposal to attack the man-power problem by repealing the Wage-Hour Act—usually called with calculated inaccuracy "the forty-hour-week law." The truth is that in October, 1942 (the latest month for which figures are available), war workers were putting in much more than forty hours a week. In the durable-goods industries as a whole, which include most war industries but also a number of others whose production has been sharply curtailed, employees worked on the average 45.7 hours a week. Key war industries had a still longer work week: in firearms, it was 49.0; in electrical equipment, 47.0; in engines and turbines, 49.7; in machine tools, 52.5; in aircraft and parts, 40.3; in aircraft engines, 48.0; in shipbuilding, 47.6. These figures do not include time off for sickness, accidents, or other causes; if this were reckoned in, the scheduled work week would be two to six hours longer. In a number of war industries the work week is probably too long, not too short. As Britain found after Dunkirk, the point can easily be reached where longer hours actually diminish production instead of increasing it. This point has probably been passed by the machine-tool industry, which must work on a schedule approaching sixty hours per shift in order to get an average of 52.5 hours per employee.

The real purpose of the campaign against the Wage-Hour Act is to cut wages, not increase hours. Since a hundred billion dollars' worth of war contracts, as well as all price ceilings, have been calculated on the basis of overtime pay after forty hours, a revision of that basis would bring a profit windfall to employers. The resultant angry demands for wage increases are not pleasant to anticipate.

Another piece of calculated nonsense is the claim that the man-power shortage could be solved in a jiffy by firing government employees. The latest figures (for October, 1942) show 2,687,000 civilian employees in the executive branch of the government. About two-thirds of these are working for the War and Navy departments, chiefly in arsenals, docks, navy yards, proving grounds, supply depots, and construction work. More than seven-eighths of the increase in federal employment since October, 1941, has been in these two departments. Since even Senator Byrd is unlikely to tamper with army and navy requirements, any sweeping claim about the man-power to be gained by firing government employees can be ignored for what it is—political tub-thumping born of the desire to hamper some agency a particular legislator doesn't like.

There is no law that says we have to be sensible about the man-power shortage. We can go on bickering about government employees and union privileges and the Wage-Hour Act. We can spend months in a futile free-for-all over a war-service act. But while we waste time on panaceas, steadily refusing to see the problem as a whole, let us remember one thing: every tick of the clock brings us closer to next September, when the harvest peak is going to bring a genuine, Grade-A, total man-power shortage.

Washington Metternichs

BY LUCIEN VOGEL

SLOWLY but surely a pattern is beginning to emerge out of the seemingly inexplicable policies of the American State Department. The deal with Admiral Darlan, the installation of the so-called Council of the French Empire to assist General Giraud, the flirtation with "Otto of Austria," the continued benevolence toward General Franco—all these point to an over-all policy which can no longer be thought of merely in terms of "appeasement." They constitute what might better be termed a "policy of legitimacy."

This principle of legitimacy reaches far back into diplomatic history. It was perhaps most clearly demonstrated at the Congress of Vienna, when Metternich, representing the conquerors, and Talleyrand, representing the defeated French Empire, together restored Europe's most discredited dynasties. In its contemporary manifestations legitimacy is supported by representatives of the conservative upper classes of all the United Nations, in the governments, the general staffs, business, and of course the drawing-rooms. Though they no longer say, as they did in every country until September, 1939, "Rather Hitler than Stalin," the protagonists of this policy are still hypnotized by the fear of revolution, either during or after the war.

There is of course no question, as there was in 1814, of restoring dynasties. The object is merely to build a bridge between the state of war and the state of peace, between the present and the future, in all the countries which are to be freed by the United Nations. These administrative bridges, or interim regimes, are to be composed of elements now in power or those connected with them; only those will be discarded whose presence would jeopardize the success of the whole operation by clearly inviting revolution.

Legitimacy fits in with the aims of the Vatican, which has in fact through its ambassadors and dignitaries played a considerable part in the direction of this policy in all countries; its role is that of liaison agent, testing the ground and preparing various solutions for individual cases within the framework of the general principle.

A policy of legitimacy is based on the following tenets:

1. The aggressor states can be defeated by force of arms alone; it is unnecessary to depend on popular revolt either in these states or in the countries they have invaded.

2. On the contrary, such revolt is undesirable, since it would involve civil disorder and would carry a threat to the traditional pre-fascist types of government.

Archduke Otto

3. Therefore all solutions, however they may vary to fit individual situations, must have one purpose: to forestall revolution in nations now dominated by fascism.

4. The preparation of these solutions will in itself contribute to a more rapid victory than would encouragement to revolution, since they envisage dealing with certain persons already in positions of power, who would merely have to replace the officially responsible leaders. It makes no difference whether or not these elements are fascist in sympathy, provided they can be passed off as moderate.

5. If the continuation of legitimacy cannot be assured in advance by shifts within the established government, it will be necessary to canalize revolutionary sentiment behind a picked team of well-known men whose attitude toward the traditional order can be depended on.

6. In this case it is not necessarily the former democratic leaders who are to be designated to succeed the fascists. Quite the contrary. In certain instances these leaders or parties do not give sufficient assurance of their inclination to uphold the traditional pre-fascist order, and it will be necessary to seek legitimacy farther in the past, and to smooth the way for the return of more dependable conservative elements.

7. Such solutions must be prepared not only for enemy and enemy-dominated countries but also for such neutral countries as Spain, which, because they are fascist, are likely to be drawn into any revolutionary upheaval in Europe.

8. The development and application of these solutions can be assured only by the cooperation of the traditional pre-fascist elements of order in all countries, enemy and Allied alike: that is, the diplomatic corps, the army, the high clergy, finance and big industry, and in some cases the large landowners.

9. Once such regimes are established, it will be left to them to restore the traditional order in their own way.

The purposes of legitimacy, in short, can be summed up thus: Win the war—yes; unleash revolution—no; risk communism—never.

Let me say here that I am not one of those who can look forward without misgivings to the prospect of a wave of even justifiable revenge sweeping over Europe, with the continuing atrocities it would involve. Passionately eager as I am to see human progress, I do not believe violent revolution is the only way it can be promoted. But I should like to call the attention of our modern Metternichs and Talleyrands to some of the possible consequences of their policy. Let us consider an example from recent history.

In 1918 a French general, Franchet d'Espérey, ascending the Vardar River, broke the power of Austria-Hungary. After the flight of the Emperor Charles, Count Michael Karolyi, a member of the Hungarian Chamber, who alone during the entire war protested to the chamber against Hungary's alliance with Germany, assumed leadership of the government. The Hungarian people were sure that Karolyi, a friend of France and a heroic rebel against his own landowner class, whose fortunes were bound up with Germany's, would be welcomed as an ally by the French soldiers of liberty—it was not yet called democracy in Europe. But in the eyes of General d'Espérey, Count Karolyi was not "legitimate." Because he had given his lands to his peasants on the first day of the revolution, his peers had become his most implacable enemies. In a very few days they organized a white army and won the favor of General d'Espérey. Instead of recognizing Karolyi's government and making efforts to get food to the famished population of Hungary, d'Espérey collaborated with the white army in establishing a cordon sanitaire around Karolyi and refused to establish diplomatic contact with his government.

In Budapest there was not as yet a single Communist union; all the labor groups were Social Democratic. Overnight, faced with the fact that Karolyi was totally unable to negotiate with the French government, all the unions yielded to the arguments of a handful of Communist agitators. Karolyi, realizing that he was powerless, released from prison the Communist leader, Bela Kun, and turned the government over to him. Then followed the short-lived Communist regime and after it the terrible white repression—which probably did not displease the legitimist General d'Espérey.

If in this war similar efforts on a grand scale are made to maintain or restore outmoded social, economic, and political arrangements, is there not great risk of unleashing a Continent-wide revolution of despair? Is there not danger that the suffering peoples may see in revolution their only chance of punishing the fascist executioners and their collaborators, the traitors to democracy? Is there not, specifically, the danger that the people may see in communism their only hope and in Moscow their only ally? Further, is it not possible that the U. S. S. R. may see in the policies of the neo-legitimists a revival of the old anti-Soviet front, under the guise of an anti-revolutionary one? Many keen observers are convinced that Moscow does not have the slightest intention of meddling in European affairs after the war. But in view of the neo-legitimist machinations, may not Moscow think its counter-intervention necessary for the defense of the national interests of the Russian people? This counter-intervention could take only one form—aid to revolutionary elements in proportion to their Communist tendencies.

What Your Money Won't Buy

BY WILLIAM H. JORDY

IMAGINE a European standing in front of one of our department-store windows in this winter of 1943. He would stare unbelievably at the abundance remaining after a year of total war. For another indication of just how little the American consumer has felt the war, a European might be interested in leafing through the current Sears, Roebuck catalogue, which omits only 103 of the thousands of articles included in previous editions. The principal items lacking are metal products; three textile, two lumber, and four rubber products complete the list. Sales of a few other articles are restricted; stocks of some have been depleted since the catalogue's publication.

The magic behind the abundance still visible in this country is found in our merchants' huge 1942 inventories. As the following table shows, the big firms had on hand last year a quantity of goods twice or more as large, in proportion to their sales, as they had in 1939, the year preceding the war.

STOCKS OF DEPARTMENT STORES DOING AN ANNUAL BUSINESS OF $500,000 AND OVER*

	1939 average supply	June 30, 1942 average supply
Furs	3.2	33.21
Blankets, linens	3.5	7.62
Household appliances	2.8	7.31
Furniture	4.1	6.22
Men's clothing	4.8	5.98
Main store (ground floor)	3.2	4.82
Women's and children's hose	2.0	4.37
Basement store	2.3	3.41

* Figures represent stocks on hand, or supply, by months, in relation to sales, and were obtained from the Federal Reserve Board and the National Dry Goods Association through the WPB.

After war broke out in 1939, the department stores led all merchants in frantically stuffing their warehouses. At the end of June, 1942, their inventories had reached a peak. Since June a lot of money has gone into the till, and a lot of goods have been handed over the counter. Christmas shopping, 20 per cent higher than the year before, with prices up only 5 per cent, eroded the stock mountain to a foothill. Probably a large part of the consumers' goods displayed so lavishly in store windows through the fall and advertised by the mail-order houses was stacked under Christmas trees in December. In almost all commodities what remains of the inventories of last June, plus all subsequent buying, will not stretch beyond the next few months. The only thing which can upset this prediction—and the business and trade journals are beginning to anticipate it—will be compromises in favor of something less than all-out civilian sacrifices. Barring this, what is the outlook for the consumer?

One thing is certain: no one need fear shortages of food, shelter, or clothing that will jeopardize health. As early as the middle of November, James F. Byrnes, director of the Office of Economic Stabilization, requested the Office of Civilian Supply to "undertake a study to determine what are our bedrock minimum civilian needs consistent with fullest war production." While this inquiry indicated that the government was sternly bent on eliminating the tinsel from American buying, it also showed that genuine needs would be considered. Of the three essentials, food and shelter need not be discussed here, for they have been separated from the rest of the consumer market. Food is being rationed whenever a shortage appears, and construction, except for necessary repairs, is limited to war factories and housing. The suddenness with which shoe rationing was announced, surprising even the manufacturers, who had predicted no rationing before next fall, has protected inventories and thus assured the average civilian of being as well shod as normally. The announcement makes point rationing of all clothing virtually certain as soon as the new ration books are issued; without rationing the impending shortages of cotton work clothes and woolen underwear can scarcely be forestalled. Although linens, silks, and most synthetic fibres are off the market, and rayon supplies will dwindle, the cotton and woolen industries have now reached a high point in war production which is expected neither to increase nor decrease in the immediate future. Some excess supplies of wool, frozen early last year for war demands, have already been released for civilian use. And the government is so certain that there is enough cotton to meet both military and civilian needs that it plans to reduce the cotton acreage.

The immediate future also looks bright in a few other commodities in which exceptionally large inventories will counterbalance expected man-power and raw-material shortages. Enough of most drugs, cosmetics, and paints can be promised, and the consumer can spend his dollars as usual on whiskey and furs, of both of which there is a two or three years' supply on hand. Of course, if the views of many small business men prevail, Brown will remove all price ceilings on luxuries and semi-luxuries. Under-the-counter supplies will then allow us to buy these products a little longer—but we shall pay heavily for the privilege.

Except for the three basic essentials and a few commodities with exceptionally high inventories, the consumer's dollar may buy him nothing. The reason, of course, is the shortage of man-power and raw materials. No industry unessential to both civilian and war production expects to keep its man-power. Most industries took steps to convert to war production before government controls caught up with them; WPB spokesmen are now turning the heat on the stragglers. Specifically, the furniture, toy, and mattress industries face a reduction in man-power of 80 per cent, carpets of 90 per cent, and the luxury industries, such as furs, cosmetics, and amusements, fully as much.

But even a small amount of man-power could produce a considerable quantity of goods for the consumer market if the materials were obtainable. Nothing reveals the tremendous supply of materials required for global war more strikingly than a case study of those industries which only a year ago buoyantly expected to crash the consumers' durable-goods field. Now, they thought, while the metal industries were off to the Crusades, was a chance to redesign products and poach on this richest of all preserves. The four industries most hopeful of trespassing were lumber, paper, glass, and plastics.

Take lumber. A year ago the lumber industry predicted a boom market in substitutes for metals in civilian construction, furniture, and novelties. But steadily increasing metal shortages soon pressed lumber into hundreds of unforeseen military uses. In 1918 the government spent $28,000,000 for wooden housing, but last year it spent nearly eight and a half billion. Makers of truck trailers, mine-sweepers, and sub-chasers for the armed forces, once large metal users, now depend upon lumber. Plywoods impregnated with plastics are substituting for light metals in airplanes and patrol boats.

As a result, the lumber industry has fallen six billion board feet short of meeting essential requirements, despite increased production.

The next question is: What materials can replace lumber? Chemicals and lubricating oils, shipped in steel drums before the war, were subsequently packed in wooden barrels, then shifted to heavy laminated-paper drums. Now the government wants the paper industry to develop new fiber compounds which will divert from lumber the demands of crating and boxing, which ordinarily take 15 per cent of total yearly lumber production. If paper does free this lumber for other uses, a product condemned a year ago as a luxury becomes as essential as lumber. The paper industry is now neatly balanced between civilian and war needs, with wrappings and containers for the armed forces and writing paper for official Washington slightly tipping the scales for war production. This new load will take a good deal of paper away from the consumer. Meanwhile, the National Housing Administration is frantically redesigning construction to make more use of the brick and gypsum industries, which last year operated at only 30 per cent of capacity. By progressive substitution, therefore, one industry after another is drafted out of the consumer market.

Glass is in the category with brick and gypsum to the extent that it could expand production if more purposes for which it could be used were discovered. Its most extensive use as a substitute has been in packaging numerous products which traditionally went into tin. Glassware for cooking, developed during the last war, is again replacing aluminum. The same sturdy, heat-proof glass developed for cooking ware makes excellent stove and washing-machine tops, but such tops will not be needed unless metal for other parts is released. Glass grates for fireplaces are advertised in New York newspapers. Glass brick may be increasingly used in housing projects; glass sinks and even glass plumbing seem quite likely. But structural glass is not a low-cost material, and low-cost housing is all that is being built now. Glass and china will be as plentiful as man-power controls permit.

What about plastics? Here the government is choosing for the consumer. Plastics are extensively used in war production. The toughest of them, the phenolics, go into electrical apparatus and into impregnated plywood for airplane and torpedo-boat construction; the transparent acrylics go into inclosed cockpits and bomber noses; the ureas into buttons, dials, and casings; and so on down to the synthetic fiber, polyvinyl chloride, which is used for cable coverings and self-sealing gasoline-tank linings. Three plastics are left for consumers, and of these the war will probably soon take two. One, a new compound of non-priority wood paste and ligno-cellulose, will probably be added to the ureas; another, polystyrene, requires the same styrene that is already reserved for Buna S.

rubber. The third, the acetates, could be made available for the consumer in limited amounts. Acetates could be manufactured into costume jewelry, combs, toilet articles, lighting equipment, pen and pencil barrels, and similar novelties. Also the government hopes that an acetate bottle cap can be developed strong enough to withstand carbonization and thus free enough metal now affixed to the nation's soft-drink and beer bottles to build ten destroyers a year. But there is only enough acetate for the bottle tops. If they are perfected, there will be no acetate novelties for the duration.

Thus industries which expected to produce largely for the consumer have been forced into war work. From the manufacturers' point of view there is little doubt that the Office of Civilian Supply's "bedrock minimum" for the civilian will not look very promising. But once the basic requirements for civilian consumption have been determined, scientific redistribution of man-power can begin, and the soundest combination of taxation and compulsory savings can be applied to restrict purchases. Upon this minimum, too, depends the proportional distribution of consumers' goods. The inventory control to be inaugurated this March, which provides that wholesalers and retailers can replace stocks in accordance with their inventory-to-sales ratio for "normal" years, is meaningless unless the total production of every commodity in relation to its production during "normal" years is known. Only then can replacement buying be reduced by the same percentage by which production is curtailed, thus assuring a fair share of whatever is produced to the smallest retailers. Finally, only when the civilian minimum is known can civilian production be geared to war production. As long as bulging inventories acted as a cushion against the overnight disappearance of materials to meet new projects in war production, long-range planning for civilian production was less necessary. Haphazard planning, however, must cease when inventories are exhausted, or consumer goods will fluctuate between unhealthful scarcity and unnecessary abundance. If the war lasts long enough, really efficient planning of production will mean, as in England, that the manufacture of every commodity must be concentrated in a few factories in each industry. It will mean standardization.

So far our government has gone only part way along this road. It has allocated raw materials. It has threatened to restrict man-power. It has cut 12,200 manufactured items to 3,400, thus saving 1,500,000 tons of metal and 135,000,000 yards of cloth. Although concentration of manufacture is opposed by business interests, Donald Nelson has mentioned it as a strong possibility. Thus, slowly, the satisfied citizen of the richest country in the world gets a tiny taste of total war. His shop windows will be emptier, his Sears, Roebuck catalogue thinner. But he will still get away cheaply compared to the citizens of any other country on the globe.

In the Wind

NORWEGIAN SOURCES report that the Nazis have commandeered 25 per cent of the 150,000 reindeer in Lapland and are shipping them to the northern Russian front. The deer are noted for their speed in running over snow.

JOHN BRACKEN, new leader of Canada's Progressive Conservative Party, is now promoting the Ruml plan in that country.

THE CZECHO-SLOVAK National Council reports that two hundred camps have been established in Bohemia and Moravia for children evacuated from western Germany and Berlin.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE of the United States is sending its members a questionnaire to find out how much man-power could be saved if employers didn't have to pay "penalty overtime" for work in excess of forty hours a week. The bulletin announcing the questionnaire says, "The company need not sign its name. In fact, anonymity is requested."

FROM POLISH UNDERGROUND sources comes word of a new game played by Poland's children when Germans are not in sight. The children divide into two groups; half of them line up against a wall, and the other half, using sticks for guns, shoot them down. Everybody wants to be a victim, nobody a Nazi.

THE JAPANESE NEWSPAPER Asahi comments thus on the difficulty of taking over Australia: "As this race enjoys complete freedom, great obstacles must be overcome to make it cooperate with Japan as a member of the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere, and to make it grasp peacefully the significance of our new order."

SONS OR BUTTER?—A New Hampshire woman writes to the editor of the Boston Post: "I think Senator La Follette is right—our butter should be kept for our people here at home. I have five brothers in the service. I am willing to do my share, but there is such a thing as going too far."

A SURVEY by the National Opinion Research Center of the University of Denver shows that last March 57 per cent of the people interviewed believed factory workers were doing all they could do to help win the war; in July the figure was 63 per cent; this month it is 69 per cent.

TRAFFIC NOTES: The ban on pleasure driving, according to an OPA ruling, does not cover driving to union meetings. . . . The Baltimore Union News (not a union paper) says the ban will have a bad effect on the marriage rate in rural areas.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Survey of Latin America

BY VICENTE LOMBARDO TOLEDANO

[The impressions described in this article were gained in the course of a visit to most of the Latin American countries made by the author in his capacity as president of the C. T. A. L. (Confederation of Workers of Latin America). Señor Lombardo Toledano has just come to the United States to confer with the leaders of the C. I. O and A. F. of L. on the results of his trip.]

Mexico, January 30

I HAVE lately returned from a journey through Latin America in the course of which I visited eleven countries—actually, I might say, twelve, for on returning to Mexico I saw my own country with fresh eyes. Since I was also in direct touch with eight other countries, I feel that I am now in a position to express myself with some authority on the desires and aims of the Latin American people.

For in spite of local diversities it is not incorrect to speak of a single people, a people with the same faith and the same hope. Whether they are Indian, mulatto, black, or white, their passion for freedom has swept away racial differences. Peasants chained to serfdom, miners whose lot is a black page in the history of Latin America, a middle class which marks the transition from a feudal economy to the new industrialism, youth in universities, in trade unions, and in farm groups—all are tense and expectant. All sense the oncoming of a new spring, the beginning of an era of humanity and justice.

Of course, each country has its particular problems which have been aggravated by the war. Take Cuba as an example. Its ports, empty of ships, teem with jobless sailors and workers. A large part of the 1940 and 1941 sugar crops is piled in warehouses. The government is attempting to meet the social and economic problems arising from these conditions by providing unemployment compensation, mobilizing the country's resources, and raising wages. Social reform, however, runs up against the obstacle of the latifundios, the vast estates owned by a few wealthy families who keep the land unproductive while masses of poverty-stricken peasants have no work.

Colombia, which I covered from the Caribbean coast to the frontier of Ecuador, is full of local color for the tourist, but from the social point of view it is far from attractive. Here modern history dates from only ten years ago, at which time a liberal regime was inaugurated by the present President, Alfonso Lopez. Colombia is trying to extricate itself from feudalism, but the old forms do not die easily. In the rural areas you see rich landowners surrounded by peasants barely able to subsist. In more remote corners you come upon forgotten Indians paying their feudal tribute—diezmos and oncenos—just as they did in the seventeenth century. On the coast mulattos and blacks, though they do their share of the country's work, are not considered part of the proletariat and enjoy none of the benefits of social legislation. They form a backwash of people unincorporated in the economic life of the country. Scattered through the entire picture is the clergy, rich, dominant, and militant—a clergy so powerful that it can afford the luxury of a "right wing" accepting no discipline but its own and able to ignore papal nuncios. Its publication, El Siglo, a political relic of a bygone age, is unique in the modern world. Against this medieval Colombia are ranged the liberals, the intellectuals, and the proletariat of the younger generation.

Crossing into Ecuador, one gets the impression of a dismembered body. The dissatisfaction, the despair, of the people is evident everywhere. Physically the most beautiful in all South America, they are human material for a potentially happy country. But in the face of a class economy which permits ownership of the land to remain in the hands of a very few, there are no real political parties and up to now no group with a program designed to meet the national need. The hope for the future rests with the Confederación de Trabajadores, now in formation, which is attempting to bring together the most important labor groups of the country.

Peru can be thought of as three countries in one: the cities, of Spanish origin; the region of the Andes, with its native population; and the Amazon country, with a deadly climate, almost uninhabited, but possessing enormous potential wealth. In Peru the Indian has met his classic fate. Pushed first toward the coast, then toward the mountains, he has finally landed in the Amazon region. A few progressive villages are evidence of what could be done with these people were a farsighted and constructive social program adopted. But for ten years the country has been in a state of civil war, even if no shot has been fired. An oligarchy dominates a people which has so far failed to develop effective popular parties. And as in the other countries of Latin America not yet free from feudalism, the middle class makes the table, and must be given something more tangible to hope for than has yet been suggested in rhetorical declarations of brotherhood.

What the Latin American people want to see incorporated in the peace can be summed up as the liquidation of feudalism; the raising of the standard of living of the peasant masses, a standard so low that it has chained Latin American countries to a primitive economy and kept them subject to foreign capital; industrialization running parallel to agricultural development; a system of exchange of goods that will compensate the Latin American countries for the possible loss of European markets.

The end of the war will bring a cry for the revision of political constitutions, for the end of oligarchic dictatorship, and for the introduction of social and economic democracy. Such a transformation will require new political instruments. Only new progressive parties supported by strong labor movements can inspire the masses with a new faith—a positive democratic faith to supplant the negative mysticism of fascism which threatens to pull them back through the centuries to the old Spanish colonial system.

As a step toward the realization of the aims summarized above, the Confederation of Workers of Latin America has formulated a program which it will present to representative organizations of the Western Hemisphere for consideration. To help solve the region's immediate social and economic problems it makes the following proposals:

1. The economy of every Latin American country should be placed at once on a war footing. Production, distribution, and consumption of all goods vital to the needs of the people or suitable for export should be under the control of the state.

2. For every commodity produced for export, a tripartite commission representing producers, workers, and the state should be created. The commission should fix prices for sales abroad, bearing in mind the need for obtaining a better living standard for the workers, legitimate profits for producers, and taxes which will enable the state to enter upon a program of general national improvement.

3. The government of the United States, which is the chief buyer of strategic materials from Latin America, should in its contracts incorporate a clause whereby the seller is obliged not only to increase the workers' wages and improve their standards of health and housing, but also to devote a part of the profits accruing from the sales to furthering the production of war materials.

4. In every country a committee for the regulation of imports should be established, in order to coordinate the needs of the consumer with the demands of the war effort.

5. A more equitable distribution among the various countries of certain products, notably oil, should be secured in the interest of intensified production for inter-American defense.

6. Latin American countries must learn to develop their productive capacity without depending entirely upon machinery from the United States, which cannot always be obtained in the desired quantities.

7. It is essential that wherever native hand labor is employed in war production, a special law be passed protecting the natives against abuse and exploitation, and calling for a tax levy to provide them with better living conditions.

The post-war program of the Confederation includes the following points:

1. The twenty nations of Latin America must take advantage of this unique opportunity which history offers them and present a united front at the peace conference. Backed by the United States and the other signatories of the Atlantic Charter, they must insist upon their right as quasi-colonial countries to be given an opportunity for self-development.

2. The living standard of the great masses of the working population must be raised.

3. The quasi-feudal structure of certain Latin American countries must be altered by means of agrarian reforms which will give land to the peasants and guarantee them the necessary credit to begin its cultivation. This should be under state direction or control.

4. The democratic principles voiced in the several constitutions must be honestly applied. Individual and collective rights must be guaranteed—the right to work, the right to be educated, the right to participate in civil and political life. A planned economy for the South American continent should be instituted. An educational system should be set up that will insure the teaching of certain common ideals and educate the new generation in the principles of democracy.

5. Latin American problems must be considered in their interrelated aspect. Each nation should be ready and obliged to defend the security of the continent as part of its own security, and to come to the help of the other nations not only in international crises but when assistance is needed in solving social and economic problems. There must be cooperation in the settlement of such urgent problems as (a) the Ecuador-Peru territorial dispute; (b) the freedom of Puerto Rico; (c) a seaport for Bolivia.

These are some of the ideals and objectives for which people are clamoring throughout Latin America. But to achieve them it is necessary first to win the war, and to win it truly. The people of Latin America stand opposed to peace without victory, to a negotiated peace, to a peace with fascism. They want a victory of democracy in its deepest sense. They want a people's victory "everywhere in the world."

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

TWICE in succession this column has announced that a levée en masse was being prepared in Germany. The signs were not deceiving: what has been hinted for weeks is now on the table. Officially it is called total mobilization. Goebbels gives it a more dramatic name. "We answer the impudent and overbearing victory claims of bolshevism and plutocracy," he said on January 30, "with a great popular upsurge of national effort." "From all strata of the population the cry for a total war effort has besieged the ear of the leadership."

Actually Germany was already to an enormous extent "totally mobilized." One wonders how it will be possible to make people believe that "after three years of war many Germans still enjoy their comforts undisturbed" (Göring); that they "have withdrawn into a false peace" (Goebbels); that the home front "has not supported the war with its last ounce of strength and in spite of the war retains a semblance of peace" (radio commentator Joachim Schieferdecker). The gentlemen who paint this distorted picture must have boundless trust in the tendency of people to think others much better off than themselves. However that may be; total mobilization can of course always be made a degree more total. It is only a question of how completely civilian activities are to be throttled. The new measures give the screw another big turn, as one can see plainly enough through the euphemistic veils of official phraseology. "Farewell must now be said to many amenities which have lent life the appearance of undisturbed peacefulness" (Herr Schieferdecker). "Many comforts which deluded us with a sense of being at peace will disappear, and there must be no further talk of them" (Goebbels).

What does the great step consist of? For the present only of a new registration. All men from sixteen to sixty-five and all women from seventeen to forty-five who are not working for the war must register. Later they will be compelled to take war jobs. The purpose, of course, is to sweep up the last bit of human chaff out of every crack and corner. Examination of the measure reveals that of more considerable reservoirs only two are expected to give results.

First, there are the remaining women. Although many million women are already in industry, agriculture, and the civil service, some are still housewives. These are doomed by the decree. Only women with a child under seven or with at least two under fourteen may continue to be merely housewives. All others must take war jobs. The second category is a more important one and comprises those against whom the decree was chiefly directed. These are the owners and employees of small businesses. Obviously the intention is to close every tiny industry in the country—all those with one boss and at most five employees. It should be understood that all able-bodied employers and employees of such businesses have long since been in the armed services; only the old and the unfit are left in them. It is they who will now find themselves barred from their store or workshop. For the rest of the population life will be a great deal less comfortable in consequence; the tailor, the cobbler, the clock-maker, the optician, the grocer, the stationer, and the hotel-keeper had their function in society. From one to two million persons, however—most of them, it is true, of slight industrial value—can now be forced into war work.

Thus the people's upsurge amounts to sweeping up a few leavings. Strong pressure will undoubtedly be exerted, but the supply of workers has already been squeezed too dry to yield an appreciable number now. It is simply not true that "millions upon millions of unused energy units are waiting to be thrown into the tremendous war processes of our civil life" (Goebbels). One asks, therefore, why the Nazi leadership ever chose to sound the trumpets for these sorry sweepings as if they were giants going to war. It could just as well have sucked them in quietly, without any fuss, without even a new law. That would have seemed the natural thing to do inasmuch as the same propaganda continually emphasizes that Germany's foes, especially the Russians, are only ruining themselves by carrying mobilization so far. "Russia," said Göring on January 30, "is making this winter, for the last time, a colossal effort. It has now scraped the bottom of its masses of human material. I am convinced that this is the last levy that can be squeezed out; for such severity is no longer severity but barbarism." It is hardly consistent with these assertions to hail the total mobilization in Germany as a fabulous proof of strength and to say of it, "Though the enemy would like to construe it that way, it does not mean that we are at the end of our resources."

Nevertheless, it is easy to see why this relatively limited and rather alarming move was advertised so sensationally. If we wish to make a person believe that things will get better soon, we must be able to explain to him in a halfway rational manner how the change will be brought about. We must show him that certain factors at present inactive, will soon exert a controlling influence. In recent weeks the only factor of this kind that German propaganda could point to was the submarine war. Of this it was possible to say with some plausibility, "Just wait till the strangling effect of the sinkings begins to be felt." But no similar hope could be held out for the war on land. No good reason for expecting a great change in the way things were going could be discovered. It was necessary, therefore, to invent one, and this is it: "Only wait till our total mobilization gets in its effect. That will change everything."

File and Remember

De Gaullist Magic

WE WANTED unity. We always wanted unity and we want it today. We want to see all the French fighting in the same army, all the French Empire building a single war bloc. But the people of France do not want an equivocal situation. Europe, which has endured so much blood and suffering, does not want an equivocal situation. This people's war will not allow an equivocal situation.

It is not enough to tell Frenchmen: "Fight the war and afterward we shall see." Frenchmen want to be sure that while they are fighting the war, their fathers, their brothers, their mothers will not be put in concentration camps. Peyrouton does not offer them that guaranty. They want to be sure of their leaders. . . .

What they [the Allied leaders] want from us is that we make Vichy appear good. They think that when we approach a traitor he will become, simply through contact with us, loyal. They think that by this means Peyrouton will become an exemplary democratic administrator and the Marshal will again find his Verdun and become a real patriarchal popular leader until he reaches his hundredth year. They exaggerate our power of magic. We want unity of Frenchmen, but we are not ready to pay too high a price for artificial unity.—F. QUILLIC in La Marseillaise, French underground newspaper.

A New Disraeli?

I wonder why there is an undercurrent of anti-American talk in certain right-wing circles? I hear it whispered and I see it said that, after all, Roosevelt is nearing the end of his record reign. The Republicans and the right-wing Democrats, they point out, are getting stronger.

The isolationists, they rightly say, feel confident enough to express themselves freely once again. It is not at all unlikely, they add, that when the war ends America will reject Rooseveltian idealism just as she rejected Wilson's policy. Therefore, don't bank too much on American cooperation after the war.

It is a very clever way of countering the effect of Roosevelt's speeches. And doubly suspicious because it comes from precisely those quarters which have been making excuses for the less "idealist" manifestations of United States State Department foreign policy in North Africa.

What with Roosevelt's "idealism" on the one hand and Russia's sky-high prestige on the other, some of the Tories are anxious about where they are to come in after the war.

Indicating how their minds are running is the latest "Review of World Affairs," published by the select Imperial Political Group. Discussing the respective merits of possible future Prime Ministers, it picks on two names: Eden and (would you believe it!) newly promoted W. S. Morrison.*

But the Imperial Policy Group, which also, on occasions,

* Mr. Morrison has for twenty years been considered a "coming man" by the right-wing Tories, but he has never managed to arrive. In the early days of the war he was Minister of Food, but when Britain began to feel the pinch of the U-boats he was relegated to the comparatively routine Postmaster Generalship. At present he is Minister of Town and Country Planning.

means the 1922 Committee, has no liking for Eden. It regards his rise to the position of natural heir to Conservative leadership as a sad business. There are "very many" in the Conservative Party who deplore Mr. Eden's leadership," it says. Reason why?

Because he "gives the impression of standing for something approaching rationalist continentalism." I can only discover the meaning of this phrase by posing its opposite.

Opposite of continentalism in foreign policy is imperial isolationism. To "rationalist," the "Review" provides its own opposite . . . a "mystic patriotism" which is associated with the "Toryism of Mr. Morrison" and which possesses the additional advantage of being "suspicious of foreign political influence over English affairs."

Moreover, Mr. Morrison's Toryism is "radical." It is "the Toryism which has opposed vested interests" (sic) and "fought for the great reforms" and is against all forms of Continental regimentation. Regimentation is the Tory boggy word for planning.

The Tory formula therefore emerges: imperial isolationism plus mystical patriotism plus Tory radicalism minus socialism.—"SPARTACUS" in Reynolds' News (London).

Franco's Intentions

The connections between the Franco government and the Vichyites in North Africa are well known, and it is now being gradually admitted in British circles that the Iberian bloc, whose formation was at first presented as in effect a victory for the policy of Sir Samuel Hoare and a blow to Axis ambitions, is nothing of the kind.

I have seldom seen a reversal of attitude so complete as has occurred in London circles on this issue during the past couple of weeks. It seems pretty clear that the first information on the meaning of the Iberian bloc was based exclusively on information from Sir Samuel Hoare himself, and was of course used by the extreme right in Washington and London as a political weapon in support of the pro-Franco, pro-Vichy policy hitherto pursued.

Later, however, the true facts of the situation forced themselves into the open. . . . The Iberian bloc is recognized as being directed not against the Axis but, above all, against the possibility of a second front on the Iberian Peninsula in the event of a German "skeleton" occupation of Spain.—FRANK PITCAIRN in the Daily Worker (London).

Soldiers Must Speak

I am told that plans for demobilization are now under serious consideration, and that it is proposed to consult the defense forces, military and civilian, about the scheme. . . .

I hope the consultation will be real. A wise government would set out deliberately to build institutions through which the men and women involved can freely discuss and seriously influence the final proposals. I should like to see each battalion allowed to elect, grade by grade, a committee to consider the plans, and from such battalion committees there ought to be divisional and corps committees, again of all ranks, which would ultimately culminate in an advisory committee in Whitehall for each of the departments concerned.

—HAROLD LASKI in Reynolds' News.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Vichy Men

VICHY: TWO YEARS OF DECEPTION. By Léon Marchal. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THE interest of this solid and sober book does not lie on the surface. It contains few personal touches and few picturesque passages. The rare "inside stories" cannot be accepted as historical evidence, since their source is not divulged. What we find in these pages is the now familiar story—dismal, unadorned, unrelieved even by a burst of indignation. If it is passion you want, read "Français, Voici la Vérité!" by Henri de Kérillis. If you seek the significance of the contest within the French soul, go to Jacques Maritain. M. Marchal is an expert in trade and finance, and writes like one. This implies great assets, with a few liabilities.

But this quiet book is an honest, an intelligent document. Intended as a denunciation of Vichy, it helps us to understand why so many people accepted, at first, the Marshal and his nondescript "French State," and why our own diplomats find it so hard even now to purge their minds of the Vichy delusion. The regime was partly a "deception" in the English sense; it was perhaps even more une déception in the French meaning—a frustrated hope, a deepening disappointment.

Accepting Vichy was an almost instinctive misstep, like the leap that carried Lord Jim into the lifeboat. Once committed, all hope had to be left behind. Timidity disguised as punctilious loyalty, self-interest in the garb of sacrifice, senile flabbiness under the mask of stubborn pride prevented the men in power from acknowledging their original error. They had always considered themselves the good people, the social élite, the military experts, the born leaders, defrauded of their rights by the democratic mob. So they ascribed the catastrophe to the inefficiency and corruption of the Republic. Assured of their own rectitude, they could not admit that it was they, the fossils of the old war, who were responsible for the antiquated equipment and methods of the army; they who had sabotaged the alliances of France; they who had destroyed national unity by declaring, "Rather Hitler than Blum!" and by declining to form as in 1914 a genuine Sacred Union. They refused to see that in their eagerness to seize power they had to welcome defeat, to hope for the immediate downfall of England, to paralyze the resistance of the empire. No price was too high if only they could "strangle the old whore." It is their condemnation that their party interests coincided so exactly with the deepest humiliation of their country.

They dreamed of restoring an economy of yeomen and artisans under a paternal squirearchy. Vanity, of course; but not so foolish as the hope that they could, by accepting a heavy sacrifice, free themselves from their victors, as a trapped animal gnaws its leg free from the jaws of steel. They thought in terms of a vanished world. War was once a princely game; you lost a battle, you paid with a province, and you shook hands with your opponents. Hitler's aim was not to defeat but to enslave and destroy. The armistice was not as in former wars the end of martyrdom, the first step toward recovery and liberation; it was the beginning of an ever-tightening servitude—from Rethondes to Montoire, from pseudo-collaboration to complete subjection. The Vichy men had bartered their souls for a show of power, and now even the last bauble is taken away from them.

The weakness of M. Marchal's book, as of most books about France, is that it presents Laval as the ideal, and therefore conventional, villain. Do not tempt me to put in a good word for him! The man himself is beneath contempt; the scathing indictment by Henri Torrès stands. His professed policy, however, reconciliation, collaboration, New Order, would be defensible—if Hitler were not Hitler. Hitler never wanted collaboration with France any more than with Poland. Laval may give as an alibi that the resistance of the French people, or Pétain's hopeless shilly-shallying, sabotaged his policy. But had the French been a nation of Lavals and groveled at Hitler's feet, they would not have been accepted as true collaborators. They would have been treated like so many Lavals, insulted, browbeaten, tossed aside. Yes, a new order is needed, a federal, fraternal Europe; but only when Hitler and his parasites have been destroyed.

M. Marchal, who knows this country well, alludes to our foreign policy with diplomatic reticence. But his verdict is plain. We worked for two years on the hypothesis that we had to appease Vichy so as to prevent the fleet and the empire from falling into Hitler's hands. But they were not within his reach. His only hope of keeping them neutral was to have them under the sway of the puppet regime at Vichy. Had that regime collapsed earlier, the fleet and the colonies would have been on our side.

"Thus," says M. Marchal, "a great price was paid for something that did not require buying. The maintenance of diplomatic relations between Washington and Vichy contributed to Marshal Pétain's government, especially in the period immediately following the armistice, an appearance of legality it needed in order to consolidate its authority and its prestige. Moreover, it was this prestige alone that caused the fleet and the colonies to remain faithful to Vichy." In other words, we sedulously played Hitler's game. Had Vichy not been recognized, France would not be rent asunder today any more than Norway is; and North Africa would not be infested with fascist-minded officials. We have much to atone for.

Laval's return to power, marking the utter dissolution of Pétain, his power and his legend, was a heaven-sent opportunity to break with Vichy. M. Marchal seized it. No one could have been more righteously vehement about "the Laval-Darlan clique" than Mr. Hull; Sumner Welles uttered words which should have meant an irreparable breach. But matters were patched up somehow. We kept recognizing Vichy while pouring scorn on the man whom Pétain had proclaimed his alter ego. It is passing strange.

Now we are told by the best possible authority that we should put our trust in the infinite knowledge and wisdom of our diplomats. The facts, as recorded in this book, speak for themselves. I have been a student of history for well over forty years, and it is my belief that the final truth in these matters was spoken by Oxenstierna some three hundred years ago.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

The Measure of Man

SCULPTURE THROUGH THE AGES. By Lincoln Rothchild. Whittlesey House. $5.

CURIOSLY—since it is perhaps the most heroic, emblematic, historically concentrated, and humanly dramatic of the arts—sculpture has been the most slighted by critics, the most scanted by general appreciation, of them all. Intelligent books on it are few, skilful interpreters fewer. For this the inferior social standing and declining practice of the art in the past three centuries are only partly accountable. ("Perhaps it has been a lost art in Europe generally," says Herbert Read, "for it is possible to argue that the whole Renaissance conception of sculpture was a false one.") Sculpture shares little of the pragmatic and political appeal of painting; it lends itself far less to literary and moral exploitation; it is as inaccessible to popular use as it is intractable to craftsmen; it has elicited a comparatively meager tradition of critical analysis and thought. Rebellious in its discipline, it may repel where painting flatters or enchants. Self-betrayed when it compromises with pictorial or homiletic uses, it reproves the vulgarizer or the eclectic, and recedes stubbornly to its own standard of isolated freedom and integrity. Having lost its old alliance with architecture, it has usually failed in its later treaties with social utility and decoration. When, descending from principle through the facility of clay or lesser mediums, it finds its identity imperiled, it recoils to the stone's intransigence, discouraging the experimentation that would enlarge its scope and attraction.

Statuaire, repousse
L'argile que pétrit
Le pouce
Quand flotte ailleurs l'esprit.

Sculpture is jealous of the authority and rigor that have made it, with music, the most independent and absolute of arts—one whose law and nature provide a standard to which more intuitive, impressionable, and humane modes of expression perpetually recur. When Valéry made his aphorism on the "indecisiveness" of painting, he implied an authority in sculpture which no repudiation or skepticism of its discipline—not even Leonardo's scorn of its arte meccanicissima—has shaken.

The recent output of large art books, stimulated to the point of much indiscriminate editing and sales promotion by the example of the Phaidon editions, had not yet provided a general survey of sculpture, and Mr. Rothschild here essays to fill the gap. His book is the first conspectus of its subject since A. M. Rindge's "Sculpture" of 1929. (The studies of Maryon, Wilenski, Post, Eric Gill, Sirén, and Rhys Carpenter are critically, historically, or academically specialized; the average guide for laymen rests at the effusively sentimental level of Lorado Taft's popular volume of a quarter-century ago.) Miss Rindge's book suffered from an immature sketchiness of composition, a vexatious set of postage stamp-size plates, a defeatingly high-toned exertion in matters of style and taste, and a consequent stage fright in its expository and speculative efforts. It was, however, critically serious, had a sharp sense of plastic and formal conditions, was informed on theory, and proposed if it did not settle the problems of the sculptor's mediums, their evolution through cultures and technical resources, and the status of sculpture in modern art. One would like to see the book revised under the advantages of its author's matured abilities.

There is nothing high-toned or specialized about Mr. Rothschild's expansive approach to his task. Giving short shrift to the rigors and selectivity of aesthetic method, he aims to balance the social and economic values of sculpture against its formal and stylistic development through the major periods of culture. His chapter headings are indicative: Egypt: Why Change?; Greece and Rome: Man's Image; Romanesque: Heaven on Earth; French Renaissance, Rococo, and Neoclassicism: The Gilded Cage, etc. These catchpenny accents—deriving from Thomas Craven?—recur throughout his preface, chapters, and program notes. The reader is advised to have no fear of encountering "the terminology and petty vanities of cultural writing." Analysis has been kept "as simple, obvious, and untechnical as possible." "Human meaning" is set above "formal qualities." Excesses of religious purpose, visionary individualism, social artifice, and abstraction are held under peremptory suspicion and reproof. Connoisseurship is scouted as a prevailing evil from the Renaissance downward. Humanistic and economic values are justified against creative specialization, extra-social purposes, and "the fallacies of rationalization." A general air of no-nonsense realism prevails. All this is to the good in rescuing the vitality, historical meaning, and practical conditions of sculpture from airless academic or aesthetic confinement. Mr. Rothschild has a vigorous, almost physical, enthusiasm for his subject, has steeped himself in its liveliest appeals, sketches boldly and skilfully, often dramatizes his facts with striking effect and emphasis, and writes, though without style, with zest and honesty. Whether he popularizes intelligently or not is another question.

The test of value in any survey is the degree to which it makes a critical continuity of its facts, finds the terms to qualify and evaluate them, clarifies by comparison, shows derivations and relations without falsifying or blunting differences, and so carries the reader through to an illumination not only of history but of values and of sensibility. Mr. Rothschild's results on these scores are rough and in the end fairly elusive. He is sound in his handling of facts—if at times pardonably elementary; but his vividness has its complement in superficiality, his skepticism in impatience, his dramatic sense in verbal insensitiveness, his humanism in a shortness of sympathy with aesthetic values and processes that often arrives at grossness and facile sensationalism. Ideas or motives of formal purity and autonomy are thus brought through to little soundness of definition in his expositions. The fear of aesthetic independence entails a sacrifice of any consistent sense of essential creative purposes and methods. The suspicion of spiritual provincialism induces—as so often in recent books on art or literature—a corresponding fear and incomprehension of the artist's special integrity and personality. If space permitted, examples of these hindrances might be quoted from his treatment of Greek styles, of Michelangelo, of the varying orders of Gothic, of the exaggerated claims advanced for African art, of the problems of twentieth-century work, here greatly minimized and scanted. All of which means that the ideal simplification demanded by a short survey of an immense field has not been found and that the book must be read, if seriously, with continuous reservations of the sort we have come to find indissociable from the excessively humanistic and social approach to art in our time.

But it must be added that on the level of this approach the volume is more a stimulus to active appreciation than to dissent, and that it gives admirable value for its cost. Its 123 large plates are richly varied, its examples well and unconventionally chosen, its photographs as good as any miscellany of plates uncontrolled by ideal conditions of lighting and arrangement could arrive at, and their reproduction excellent. I know of no finer compact anthology in its field. Familiar monuments spring out with fresh appeal and suggestion. The panorama of sculpture expands with the full force of its prodigies and marvels: the superbly sophisticated rhythmic vitality of the Egyptian steles and reliefs, the inexhaustible imagery of Greece, the overwhelming beauty of the Ludovisi Throne, the dynamic historiation of the Romanesque capitals, the breath-taking syntheses of the Gothic tympani, the lavish yet integrated invention of Tilman Riemenschneider and its baroque counterpart in Bernini, the spiritual and psychic intensity that nerves the monumentality of Michelangelo, the psychic penetration of Donatello, the modern appeal—connecting not only with Rodin but with Maillol, Meunier, and Moore—of the Uffizi "Arrotino," the ripe charm of Houdon, the redeeming coherence of passion in Rodin. In the presence of all this one may easily be compelled to the belief that sculpture is supreme and central among the mediums of art; that all else pales by comparison with its force and unity; that every other plastic order must appeal to its morality, eloquence, and integrity; and that—before the claims of more spontaneous, freely creative, treacherous, yet more comprehensive and exploring mediums reassert themselves—all other expression is by comparison a path of peril and a concession to time's corruptions:

Lutte avec le carraire,
Avec le paros dur
Et rare,
Gardiens du contour pur;
Emprunte à Syracuse
Son bronze où fermement
S'accuse
Le trait fier et fermeant.
Tout passe. — L'art robuste
Seul a l'éternité.

Sculpture is a measure and glory of our humanity; it may also be its humiliation. It declares its supremacy when it defines and limits that humanity most severely. Yet there its supremacy also lapses, and the other languages of man enter to voice his imperfection, his scope of mind and spirit, his capacities for a larger hope and mystery. Without sculpture these languages would lack what is conceivably the severest preceptor and example they have ever known—an absolute of probity that drives them to scale, beyond it, their own summits of desire, vision, and revelation.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Sir Stafford

CRIPPS: ADVOCATE EXTRAORDINARY. By Patricia Strauss. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.

WHEN Sir Stafford Cripps entered the Churchill government, there were many who believed that the progressive cause would gain thereby. To this reviewer it was rather a pathetic belief, for it seemed even then that Sir Stafford was falling for a characteristic conservative maneuver. "The devil was sick, the devil a monk would be." The British Conservatives, lacking the sustenance of military victories, confronted at home and abroad by formidable problems, were ready to admit Sir Stafford, around whom a dangerously large body of protesting opinion was gathering, and later they were willing to send him upon the most difficult of all missions. If he succeeded, then his success would redound to the credit of the government and not of the opposition. If he went too far in his idealism or in his enthusiasm, then it would be easy to check or overthrow him when the inevitable victories came. Probably Mrs. Strauss would not describe what has befallen Sir Stafford in such simple terms. There is enough material in her extremely valuable book to support the intransigent view of Tory Machiavellianism.

How did Cripps come to fall for such a maneuver? Or, if one takes a kindly view of the matter, how did he ever persuade himself that a government headed by that arch anti-India man, Mr. Churchill, would let him solve the problem? This reviewer, despite all that Norman Angell and Kingsley Martin have written, believes that Louis Fischer made his point in The Nation that Sir Stafford actually offered what Congress leaders have repeatedly declared he did. If this is so, it was surely something in the nature of egotism on Sir Stafford's part to believe he could bilk the Tory machine. If, on the other hand, Sir Stafford offered no more than his secretary declares he did, then it was a strange self-contradiction that allowed him to make that unacceptable offer.

Mrs. Strauss does not confront this problem as squarely as she ought. We have a right to a much more serious analysis of his character than she has given. The fact is that Sir Stafford, for all his apparent clarity of spirit and logical rigor, is a difficult man to understand.

Together with his steadily burning idealism, political inconsistencies and weaknesses have been apparent all through his short career. He so much distrusted the Baldwin government that when the Labor Party announced that it would support sanctions against Italy, Sir Stafford resigned from the National Executive Committee of the party, and with respect to this incident Mrs. Strauss quotes him thus: "To me the central factor in our decision must turn not so much upon what we as a country should or should not do but upon who is in control of our actions." A quite orthodox idea is contained in these words. Had Sir Stafford posed the question of Indian freedom thus in 1942, would he have gone to India? Yet even in that earlier crisis Sir Stafford was not consistent, for he thought the League of Nations would have been justified in declaring war on Japan over the Sino-Japanese dispute.

"Cripps's tendency to overstress his personal role in public events is heightened by his own unusual history of leadership," Mrs. Strauss says. That tendency, at times amounting to something like arrogance, has been noted by others. It was not the cause of his acceptance of the Indian mission of course, though in other matters his "unusual history of leadership" probably does explain his political naïvete. For in the upshot Sir Stafford has shown himself repeatedly to be as politically naïve as a child. The British public, Mrs. Strauss thinks, wants him to be that way. Naïvete is somehow considered a proof of idealism. Cripps's naïvete, however, does not spring from his unquestionable sincerity but from two other things—his sheer inexperience and, oddly enough, his legalistic outlook. This latter Mrs. Strauss herself recognizes. Sir Stafford has never gone through the arduous school of party work; he believes a logical argument, however restricted its base, must necessarily win over opponents. Take, for instance, his expulsion from the Labor Party, described in detail in this book. Cripps's political good sense told him that a popular front was necessary if Chamberlain was to be driven from office. His professional training told him that the Labor Party constitution permitted him to agitate for the front until a convention had decided the issue. Sir Stafford's legal opinion was doubtless correct, but it was an excessive innocence to suppose that the party bosses would take a legal view of the matter. It was a proof of sheer inexperience in him to persist to the point of expulsion before a convention had decided to reject popular fronts. Again, how completely he misunderstood the moment, when, already expelled, he was allowed to address the 1939 convention of the Labor Party! In place of delivering a hard-driving political appeal on the great issue, he read to a profoundly anxious membership a lawyer's opinion of his own case. There is Sir Stafford's weakness. His own beliefs rest quite firmly upon cold logic. Logic is more important to him than feeling. Therefore he misjudges both men and history. In 1942 he must have supposed that the British imperialists would surrender on India rather than lose the war. He did not understand that for the imperialists to lose the empire is to lose the war.

Has Sir Stafford a great political future? We all hope that he has, but on the strength of this book it is to be doubted. He is still a symbol of aspiration, still the only real figure to express the deep and aching hope of the British masses. So much Mrs. Strauss compels one to believe, but he is a man without party in an age where effective action is impossible without party. Mrs. Strauss, whose book constantly illuminates wide areas of British political life in a way that should make her American readers deeply grateful to her, should at once write a long personal appeal to Sir Stafford. She might be able to convince him that he must get back into the party at once. A one-man party, even if millions admire that man, cannot save Britain from the Tories.

RALPH BATES

Mann Speaks to Germany

LISTEN, GERMANY! By Thomas Mann. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.50.

THE recent publication of Mann's "Order of the Day" has given us the opportunity to understand and appreciate his political thought. His new volume, embodying his radio addresses to Germany, is not therefore of special significance. The addresses convey the eloquent scorn of a great humanist for the Nazis and all their works. But this attitude of contempt pervades the addresses with a consistency which may prompt boredom. Even the most appreciative reader may also become slightly impatient with the author's rather frequent references to his own part in the struggle between the German humanist tradition and Nazism.

One wonders how effective as propaganda these addresses really were. Though he tries to appeal to what is best in German nature against its Nazi corruption, Dr. Mann frequently allows himself to taunt the German people for their political ineptness and docility. His taunts may be justified, but that does not make them helpful to a people facing such desperate alternatives.

Furthermore, Dr. Mann is frequently naive in his grasp of political realities. Sometimes he assures the Germans that "if you are defeated the vindictiveness of the whole world will break loose against you." Since Dr. Goebbels strikes the same note, one may question its value as propaganda against Nazism. At other times the Germans are reassured and are told that Hitler's threat "that they are to be annihilated if they fail to win this war" is a "gross lie" and that "Hitler and his gang are the only obstacles to a just peace." The tragic realities of history may conform neither to the threat nor to the reassurance. There are undoubtedly millions of anti-Nazis in Germany whose hearts are torn when they contemplate the consequences of German defeat. The most stout-hearted among them still find defeat preferable to victory and continued enslavement. But it is idle to regard this choice as an easy one, or to deny the reality of the dilemma in which they find themselves.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Swamp-Grass Roots

DUST TRACKS ON THE ROAD. By Zora Neale Hurston. J. B. Lippincott. $3.

THE first half of this book makes delightful reading. Zora Neale Hurston's childhood in the all-Negro village of Eatonville, Florida, contains more tall tales than you have believed since you were six, and the chances are that you did not believe them then. But you will believe these, even the visions which she had as a child foretelling the dark episodes through which she was to pass, and which were all fulfilled in the order in which they had appeared to her. You will believe that she really did try to kill her stepmother when she was thirteen, and came very near to doing it. Most wonderful of all, you will believe that there really was such a community as Eatonville, where little Zora heard stories in the grocery store which would be shocking in the toughest poolroom, and where the most intimate and unprintable details of the neighbors' lives were discussed over the back fence or even on the front porch. In short, a community where nothing could surprise you except an inhibition.

One passes on to the success story of the Negro waif who managed to win an education, the esteem and patronage of Franz Boas, a fellowship for anthropological research, and eventually some fame and security as an author. But adventure still dogged Miss Hurston's footsteps. In the course of her research work in the field of Negro folklore she discovered the native songs and dances of the Haitian Negroes, and organized a concert troupe to bring them to Broadway. Her investigations took her back to the stranger-than-fiction world from which she had come, and a violent episode there nearly cost her her life. And for good measure she throws in the story of an African-born Negro who was brought to America in 1859 in the last slave ship to disgorge its fateful cargo on these shores.

If Miss Hurston had only stuck to telling stories, this book would be pure gold. Unfortunately she found it necessary to tack on a few chapters on love, religion, and race. Her remarks on the race problem are soured by the resentment of the rampant individualist who dislikes being identified with any group whatever. Her shoulder-shrugging cynicism contrasts forcibly with the realism of her master Boas, who acknowledged his own race as a cultural entity even though he knew as an anthropologist that the biological basis of racial differences was far too flimsy a foundation to support such a huge superstructure. But then a giant has no need to protect his individuality!

However, Miss Hurston's story should not be read for its direct contribution to the race problem, though its torrent of anecdote is undeniably revealing. It should rather be savored as first-rate narration, spiced with a rare talent for phrase.

BETSY HUTCHISON

Fiction in Review

IN THE interest of good neighborliness it would be pleasant to concur in the publishers' opinion that Erico Verissimo, author of "Crossroads" (Macmillan, $2.75), is the Brazilian Dreiser, just as in the interest of quiet sincerity it would be pleasant to notice, for more than its effort, Jonreed Lauritzen's "Arrows into the Sun" (Knopf, $2.50). But in any language Mr. Verissimo is closer to the Elmer Rice of "Street Scene" than he is to the author of "An American Tragedy," and as for Mr. Lauritzen's story of a half-breed Navajo, although it is decent and earnest, it is dull. Also dull and earnest, but not at all decent, is a novel called "Memo to a Firing Squad" by Frederick Hazlitt Brennan (Knopf, $2.50). A thriller with a message, it revolves around a sell-out peace conference held in Lisbon, and its action is an account of how the machinations of the appeasers are circumvented by the local underground. It is a muddled, pretentious, and vulgar book, to be noticed, in fact, only for its indecency.

It appears that Mr. Brennan is one of those "wise," disillusioned, and tough descendants of Hemingway who are doubtless rather embarrassing to Hemingway himself. An ex-newspaperman turned political brooder, he is another of our popular authors (Collier's, the Saturday Evening Post,

?

If you want to be puzzled

Just Turn to PAGE 288

in the next issue of

THE Nation

The BEVERIDGE REPORT

A blue print for the future

The first complete and practical plan
TO ABOLISH WANT

You should own a copy of this historic document, "the economic Magna Carta of our times". Widely discussed and hailed everywhere as "the first symptoms of a reshaped world".

This book of 300 pages is published at only $1 to enable every thinking American to have a copy for himself.

Pin a $1 bill to this ad and rush it to your bookstore, or to The Macmillan Company, 60 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Write your name here

.....

Your address

.....

Red Book, Cosmopolitan) for whom the typewriter bell tolls. He may be writing only a thriller, but he has a serious purpose: he must warn us against a negotiated peace. He also has a serious hobby: the study of comparative methods of killing. This is a typical passage of dialogue:

"One should be judged on how he hates—on that alone," Dutch said.

"It is no time for watery guts."

"Or for laughter."

"Liberalism got us into this."

"They and the pacifists."

"A liberal is worse. I have heard such a one make excuses for Judas."

"They said 'Live and let live'—of Germans, they said it!"

"They talked—blah, blah, blah—while the Germans built tanks and bombers."

This is not an isolated passage; it is a fair example of any page in the book turned to at random. The speakers are members of Mr. Brennan's underground. These are the people who are going to save us from the evils of Nazism. Each is fanatically devoted to murder, and in Mr. Brennan's world murder becomes a fine art. So whether you line yourself up with Spigo, Mr. Brennan's blood-drunk refugee from Franco, with Dutch, his blood-drunk refugee from Holland, with Jules, the French chef who is leader of the movement, or with Karen, the heroine and blood-drunk refugee from Poland, you can have your choice of dagger, pistol, strangling with the bare hands, or strangling with the garrote. Killing is not only the whole of Mr. Brennan's plot; it is the whole of his political philosophy, whatever the embroidery.

One would like to dismiss such books by simply calling them "corny," "corny" being one of Mr. Brennan's own favorite words. Surely if there is anything cornier than a newspaperman being virtuous about love, it is a newspaperman being "realistic" about political morality. But I'm afraid that sentiments like Mr. Brennan's find too much support among presumably decent people, these days, to be dismissed with a laugh. For instance, reviewing "Memo to a Firing Squad" in the New York Times of Sunday, January 31, William du Bois says of Mr. Brennan's "colorful characters": "And yet they carry out all these tasks [their killings] with such nonchalance that one's heart warms to them. . . ."

Whose heart, and what's going on here? In war—and we are at war—you kill because you have to, because that is your job, but it has never been my impression that you kill with nonchalance. Or perhaps Mr. du Bois means not nonchalance so much as finesse: certainly Mr. Brennan has a Hemingway-like interest in the techniques of death. But at least in the way of literature, it is a far cry from "Death in the Afternoon" to the day when the author of every third-rate book for the rental libraries has to boast a degree from the best-methods-of-finishin'-them-up school.

Hemingway is a good writer; false notions may be started by good writers, they are turned into folk myths by bad writers. Thus Hemingway—again—created the male hero so superlatively manly that he has to go around killing bulls or socking people in the nearest bistro in order to confirm his virility. Mr. Brennan picks up this unhealthy confusion of manliness with brutality and assures us that the sexual prowess of Jules, his leader of the underground, is quite all that might be expected of such a prodigious killer; in the words of Reba, his wife, Jules is "much man, much man." But if the first object of manliness is woman, women might perhaps be allowed to speak for themselves on the subject of their heroes, instead of through the mouths of their male authors? I have yet to see the novel by a woman that supports this foolish and dangerous notion of masculinity.

And it seems to me—as I expect it does to most Americans—that one of the reasons we are at war is because the Nazis find slaughter so heart-warming. Yet ironically enough, at the same time that we are fighting to outlaw the murder and violence that are synonymous with Nazism, we are busy creating a literature that glorifies murder and violence. Evidently we can leave it to our writers to be the first to stumble blindly into the grave named for them by Huey Long when he said that in this country we'd call fascism anti-fascism.

To return to quiet and decency, however, Helen Howe has written a first novel called "The Whole Heart" (Simon and Schuster, $2.50). Concerned with the moral-emotional struggles of a writer, it has the same theme as "Circle in the Water" by Helen Hull, published a few weeks ago, but it is infinitely the better book—cleaner, firmer, more perceptive. Indeed, having made the comparison, I withdraw it immediately in favor of a comparison with "The Late George Apley," to which it bears a more flattering resemblance. For like Mr. Marquand's novel, Miss Howe's story is in large part a study in Boston conscience, the kind that is more protection and self-delusion than duty.

ENTERTAINMENT

"A tense melodrama . . . the best of the series of dramas about the Russian people." —Nichols, N. Y. Times.

COUNTERATTACK

Morris CARNOVSKY • Barbara O'NEIL • Martin WOLFSON
WINDSOR THEATRE, 48th Street East of Broadway, WATS. Friday & Saturday

"The most effective and the most satisfactory play about the war yet to reach our stage." —Joseph Sand Krutch, Nation.

THE PLAYWRIGHTS' COMPANY Presents

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A new play by Maxwell ERESMAN. Cast of 25, incl. Aline MacMAHON
CORT 48th St. E. of B'WAY. Eve. 8:40, $1.10 to $2.30. 281 seats $1.10
Mat. Wed. & Sat. 2:30, $1.10-$2.75. Seats selling fast next 2 weeks.
Special Matinee Washington's Birthday, February 22. MAIL ORDERS FILLED

NIGHT OF THE AMERICAS

PRINCIPAL SPEAKERS

Vicente LOMBARDO TOLEDANO

President, Confederation Latin American Workers

Chairman MARGO

Pablo NERUDA

Great Chilean Poet, Consul General to Mexico

Chairman of the Evening DONALD OGDEN STEWART

Program of Song, Dance and Music by Celebrated American and Latin American Artists

Martin Rank Thea., Sun. Eve. FEB. 14, at 8:30
ALL SEATS RESERVED $3.50, $2.50, $1.45 at Box Office or Council for Pan American Democracy, 112 E. 19 St., GR 3-2709

BUY YOUR BOOKS THROUGH THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C.O.D.

Readers' Service Division

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK

Of the two writers, Mr. Marquand may have the sharper eye and intelligence, but Miss Howe, in her non-literary life a monologist, has the sharper ear. By a device tailored in heaven for a monologist turned novelist, the hero of "The Whole Heart" is shown to us only through the diaries and letters of the four women who love him, and this, in fact, is the most interesting thing about Miss Howe's book—its proof of just how much, and then how little, can be told by inflection, by rhythm of speech, by what is really no more than dialogue. For in "The Whole Heart," as in most writing for the contemporary stage, what you eventually feel is that either the author should have used more intelligent and articulate characters to speak for her, or she should herself be a poet, in order to give another dimension to simple speech.

— DIANA TRILLING

Pioneer and Philistine

AMERICAN PIONEER ARTS AND ARTISTS. By Carl W. Drepperd. Foreword by Rockwell Kent. The Pond-Ekberg Company. $4.75.

BETWEEN 1750 and 1850 there was much amateur, professional, and semi-professional activity in this country in the figurative arts. A surprising quantity of paintings, miniatures, drawings, carvings, castings, stencil-work, and sundry decoration and ornament has been uncovered lately. Mr. Drepperd rightly objects to "primitive" as an inclusive term for all this work, the quality of which varies so much. He would prefer "pioneer." "Pioneer" is all right as a historical denominator, but it is valueless as a generic one, and rather inaccurate too. Most of the art which Mr. Drepperd calls pioneer was made in places already settled for generations. But then Mr. Drepperd claims that everything good about this country is the work of the "pioneering mind"—time-saving, railroads, and the popularity of tomatoes. But just what in this early American art distinguishes it as pioneer by contrast to similar work done in Europe at the same time? He does not say. As a matter of fact, Mr. Drepperd could have showed—but he would have had to think, and multiply distinctions—that a certain amount of American applied art is specifically pioneer in that its workmanship and conception were conditioned by its remoteness from places where the professional division of labor obtained.

Mr. Drepperd himself is a kind of primitive in art history. He inveighs against the "twaddle" of theory and appreciation and assures us that to understand and enjoy pioneer art it is only necessary to come to it with a full heart and empty mind. Writing in that homespun style which consists in stepping up close and shouting confidentially in your ear, sometimes he is almost illiterate. It is the price he has to pay for avoiding highfaluting flapdoodle. And because he has no theory he cannot organize his material. His book does contain, however, a lot of facts, names, dates, and reproductions.

It is startling to find Comrade Rockwell Kent writing the foreword to a book in which you read that "American pioneer art has nothing in common with such aberrations as cubism, surrealism, and kindred expressions . . . which derive from decadent strains of European and Near East peoples."

CLEMENT GREENBERG

Can America's NEGRO PROBLEM Be Solved?

PATTERNS OF NEGRO SEGREGATION*

By CHARLES S. JOHNSON
Dean of Social Sciences, Fisk University

A revealing study of disturbing facts about the Negro's relation to the American scene, including commercial and professional opportunities and other occupational discrimination, transportation, housing and recreation facilities, opportunities in the public service, opportunities for education and for the exercise of civil rights and citizenship responsibilities. Price $3.50

THE NEGRO'S SHARE

A Study of Income, Consumption, Housing and Public Assistance

By RICHARD D. STERNER

An exhaustive and definitive consideration of the Negro's relation to the whole federal social security program. The book throws a flood of light upon the whole problem of the extent to which the Negro shares in our American standard of living. Price $5.00

*The above volumes are the latest in a series of studies of the Negro in American life, sponsored by the Carnegie Corporation. Volume 1 in this series is "The Myth of the Negro Past," by Melville J. Herskovits, published in 1941 at $4.00.

Order these books at your bookstore or direct from
HARPER & BROTHERS • 49 E. 33 St., New York

SPECIAL Class Room Rate only 25¢ monthly per Student for orders of ten or more copies

to be sent to one address.

Desk Copy Is Free!

ADDRESS YOUR ORDERS TO

THE Nation

55 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK CITY

IN BRIEF

MATHEMATICAL RECREATIONS.

By Maurice Kraitchik. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.75.

This is a revised edition in English of the same author's "La Mathématique des Jeux" published some years ago. Part of it is devoted to a popular discussion of the laws of chance as they affect various games, the rest to a great variety of problems and puzzles involving mathematical reasoning but mostly outside the routine processes taught in academic courses. For the enjoyment of most of it no great acquaintance with formal mathematics is required, but some gift for mathematical reasoning is. In fact, it might serve as a very useful supplement to the various books now popular which sometimes tend to give the reader a false idea of his competence by dealing in generalities and not requiring him to perform many mathematical operations.

THE LINCOLN LYRICS. By John Malcolm Brinnin. New Directions. $1.

Mr. Brinnin, who appears to be establishing himself as one of the most competent of the younger poets, does nothing to detract from or to contribute to such a judgment in this collection of thirty-six lyrics. It is perfectly apparent that he has a natural gift for versification, a natural eye for the image, and a natural interest in everything around and about him. This cycle of lyrics on the life and times of Lincoln does its best to erect a kind of Lincolnian symbology; it fails largely because Mr. Brinnin declines to recognize the processes that elevate the image into the symbol. Nevertheless, several of these poems have a dignity and a simplicity that are noticeably absent from the work of too many young poets. Mr. Brinnin, like the one-eyed cripple in the country of the blind, has certain advantages: he seems to be a potential poet.

Art Note

FROM PARIS TO THE SEA DOWN

THE RIVER SEINE. Landscape Painting, French and some English.

At Wildenstein's, until February 27.

The course of the Seine as illustrated by some of the greatest painters of the nineteenth century. This is a magnificent show, containing an unbelievable russet and orange landscape by Renoir,

"Argenteuil," Bonington's view of the Tuileries, and masterpieces, too numerous to take in on one visit, by Sisley, Boudin, Corot, Monet, and Seurat. But why is Corot the only one of the Barbizon School to be represented? Did they never stir outside their forest, or is it that their stock has fallen too low?

C. G.

DRAMA

The Russian Front

THE Russo-German war is being fought again, this time on the stage of the Windsor Theater and in a play called "Counterattack." The program calls it "a drama by Janet and Philip Stevenson based on a Russian play by Ilya Vershinin and Mikhail Ruderman," but just what that means I have no way of knowing, and I suspect that neither the Russian nor the American contribution to the evening is as important as the fact that Margaret Webster directs the piece and that Morris Carnovsky acts the part of the hero. Mr. Carnovsky lends impressiveness and humanity to a role which does not seem to be written with much distinction, and the very theater-wise Miss Webster manages to impart, intermittently at least, a good deal of suspense to proceedings that otherwise would probably seem dragged out to intolerable length.

A few weeks ago I complained mildly that "The Russian People," the Theater Guild's version of the war, tried to get almost too much of everything into one play. "Counterattack" goes to the other extreme by making one scene and a single not very complicated incident serve as the basis for a whole evening. As the curtain goes up, a group of Nazi soldiers are taking refuge from the barrage outside in the bowels of a stone cellar. A few minutes after that they are taken prisoner by a group of Russians, who leave two men in charge. Only a few seconds later a bomb closes the one exit, and the play concerns itself with the trapped men, who spend something like thirty-six hours together before they are finally dug out, a few minutes before the final curtain falls, by a party which the audience knows is going to turn out to be Russian but which the trapped men think may be German. This, no doubt, sounds mildly ingenious, but nothing very unexpected is done with the situation. There are a few moments near the beginning when it rather looks as though the thing were about to turn into an allegory with the two groups trapped in an underground version of the desert island practicing as well as discussing their respective philosophies and finally proving to everybody's satisfaction that communism is better. But little is made of this; it soon seems to have been forgotten; and the play settles down into a melodrama wherein the numerically superior Nazis try various dodges in an effort to catch their captors off guard and, whenever a little excitement is needed, almost succeed in getting hold of a gun or putting out the light. On the whole, and as I previously suggested, there is rather more suspense than this outline would suggest. In fact, there is frequently a good deal of suspense of a fairly elementary theatrical sort. But even the best playing and the best directing cannot make of the material so very much more than what it is in itself—rather conventionally contrived melodrama. To those who would like to see a melodrama with a Russian setting the play can be recommended. Upon those who would rather not see another war play unless it is quite a bit better than the other war plays, "Counterattack" had better not be urged very strongly.

Sidney Kingsley is a playwright with a conspicuous gift for "good theater" of a different sort. He likes to start with an idea rather than a situation, with something which suggests a thesis play, and then to build around it a sturdy actable piece in which intellectuals may discover some lack but in which the general theatergoing public finds something which it likes very much—namely, a message conveyed in simple dramatic terms. This is exactly what he has done again in "The Patriots," the play about Jefferson and Hamilton which now shows signs of turning into a real hit at the National Theater. It is, quite frankly, a tract for the times. The two protagonists are made to stand, respectively, for the democratic and the tory temperaments as well as for the democratic and tory philosophies. The action centers, first, around the controversy over the redemption of paper money, second, around the election of Jefferson, and it is everywhere made abundantly clear that the author expects us to be thinking quite as much about current events as about history, since he assumes a very close parallel—namely, the existence of the same struggle between those who trust the people and those who, because they do not, want to put on the brakes and to nullify as far as possible the results of popular action. Opposition critics—and it is no doubt inevitable that even drama criticism should now be tending to become pro or anti-Administration—grumble that to them Hamilton, the believer in centralized authority, looks more like Mr. Roosevelt than Jefferson does; but I do not think that Mr. Kingsley intended any personal identification. He merely wants to insist that the struggle between tory ideas and democratic ideas has again arisen in connection with a new crisis and that he is on the side Jefferson was on. The fact that I agree with him may have something to do with it, but I found the play both interesting as argument and quite unexpectedly vivid and entertaining as theater.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

EACH time I hear Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" after an interval I am struck all over again by its marvels—the ones I had remembered, the ones I had forgotten, the ones I had not noticed before. Recently I played the Glyndebourne recording again; and this time, as I listened with new delight to details of the vocal line that made the points of the text with such ease and such force, I was struck as never before by the activity of the orchestra. From what is said on the subject you may have the idea that expressive orchestral comment in opera was born with Wagner; if you have, just listen to the orchestra in "Figaro": listen to it, for one thing in that unique marvel, the Overture; listen, of course, to the running fire of gay, mocking, witty comment that it keeps up in the great ensembles like the "Cosa sento" trio of Act 1, the finale of Act 2; and listen also to such miraculous details as the change in harmony embodied in the sustained chords of the few winds with poignant figures in violins just before the words parlo d'amor vegliando and again before parlo d'amor sognando in Cherubino's aria "Non so più cosa son."

Shortly afterward I attended a performance of the work at the Metropolitan. The audience seemed to enjoy the music that was sung, and to be vastly amused by the things that happened on the stage; but the humor in the figures of violins or woodwinds didn't get a chuckle. True, the audience wasn't listening for them; but even if it had been it would have found them difficult to hear; for on the scale on which they were produced from the orchestra by Bruno Walter they were almost inaudible in the huge auditorium. In a smaller place it would have been an excellently conducted performance; it was also well-staged, well-acted, and for the most part well-sung. Pinza's superb Figaro was an old story, as was Brownlee's adequate but unimpressive Count. New to me was the Countess of Eleonore Steber, who brought to the part a fine stage presence and a voice that is fresh, agreeable, and used with good musical taste; new also was the Susanna of Bidu Sayao, whose singing was admirable though her voice is small for the Metropolitan's vast space, and who would be an even more effective Susanna if she could get herself to put her hands on her hips only half as many times as she does; and new, finally, was the Cherubino of Risé Stevens, who acted the part quite well though without the charm of Novotna, but who expressed emotion in her singing not by suitable inflection of phrase but by huge gulps and gasps and wrenchings of her voice away from the ends of the phrases.

The Metropolitan performance of Verdi's "Forza del Destino" that I heard over the air was transmitted by the engineers with faulty balance between solo voices and orchestra—with the voices, that is, made to sound very near and loud while the orchestra sounded distant and not sufficiently strong or clear. It seemed to me, despite its lack of physical volume, that the orchestra's playing under Walter's direction was powerful in style; on the other hand, disregarding the volume which the voices acquired through electrical amplification, I found that Stella Roman was singing with more ease, more fullness and beauty of voice, and less tremolo than when I heard her a couple of years ago, that Tibbett was driving a voice which already was hoarsely threadbare, and that Jagel's brassy bleat was something which should not be heard in Verdi's music.

The quiz and the victory rally in the intermissions left the announcer only enough time for the bare outline of the story of the opera; and this I found to be an inadequate guide through the long stretches of dialogue and action. Those who argue for opera in English as the way to interest the public are wrong about the English but right in their contention that the listener must know what the opera is about. In the opera house the intermissions provide time for him to find out by reading a libretto; and the time they provide could be used by the announcer to read passages of the text to the radio listeners. Better still would be the publication and distribution of cheap librettos that would make it possible for these listeners to follow every word and action. I believe the British Broadcasting Corporation does this; and two or three years ago a project for a new series of librettos with new and good English translations was brought to N. B. C. The man who acted as intermediary got as far as N. B. C.'s musical counsel, Samuel Chotzinoff, and was disposed of with a couple of characteristic sneers—the question what the man expected to get out of the project for himself, and the comment that the suggestion had already been made forty times before. It got no further at N. B. C.; but it was a good suggestion all forty-one times; and perhaps the Metropolitan Opera Guild will see that and act on it.

Relevant to the use of the intermissions for quizzes and operatic gossip columns is a passage I happen to have read only the other day in an article by Roger Sessions in "Modern Music": "Musical life today is theory-ridden and musicology-ridden. The radio and the publishing houses swarm with well-intentioned words about music, and the attitude of the music-lover is more and more replaced in our musical life by that of the musical student. Everything possible is done to deter the layman from listening to Bach's work spontaneously as the glorious and timeless music that it is; instead, he is never allowed to forget Bach's exact historical position, the number of his wives and children . . . his place in the society of his time, or a thousand interesting but—as far as the essential impact of his music is concerned—irrelevant and even disturbing particulars." The tendency produced an absurd episode years ago, when the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, to economize, stopped issuing Lawrence Gilman's program-notes, and Mr. Downes proceeded to make a commotion from which one gathered that there was no point in a concert at which all that happened was that an orchestra played music. As for broadcasting, it is run by people with no real interest in music themselves, who therefore cannot believe it interests anyone else. What they believe in is the prestige-value of names like "Toscanini" and "Metropolitan Opera"; and even then they think they must use quizzes and gossip columns to get people to listen.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Letter from Paris

[The author of the following letter from Paris, written at the end of October, is a young French university student whose husband left France to continue the struggle against the enemy. She is active in the underground movement in Paris. Her letter did not pass through the hands of the Nazi or Vichy censors.]

The letter you sent me through the regular channels was literally cut to pieces by the censor. I am grateful to him none the less for the care with which he cut out the "dangerous" passages in such a way as to leave the inoffensive lines intact. He even pasted in some of the loose pieces. I find that quite touching even though there isn't much left of the letter. Freedom of speech, as you understand it, exists only inside your happy country. As for us, I think we shall soon forget the uses of speech.

Your letter, which came across the demarcation line in the pocket of a tramp, raised my spirits not so much by its contents as by the feeling it communicated of a life different from ours. I realize that somewhere there are living active forces, people who breathe freely, people who think—a real life, that!

I should like to say there is "nothing new." Unhappily that is not the case. You are probably familiar with the situation. It goes badly, and immediate prospects grow darker and darker. You must know, surely, that thousands and thousands of people have been arrested, deported, executed. The "resisters" are tracked down by our Nazi masters and their "valets de Vichy."

Our turn will come soon. There's no doubt of that. Personally, I am very calm because I have the rare privilege of being all alone in Paris, and one never worries much about oneself. I am absolutely cool, at least now. Perhaps when the decisive moment comes I shall be less steady because physically I am very little prepared for that type of adventure—I who can't sleep when my neighbor snores, who stifles in a room when the windows are closed. Morally I am ready for anything, and nothing can take me unawares.

The Parisians are stirring—and awaiting a "miracle." But I have not yet lost my sense of reality. All this business, despite the immense human distress it represents, is only a small link in the history we are living through. Naturally human misery seen at such close range and in its most poignant aspects cannot but affect me. But I do not attach to this problem more importance than it merits. I tell myself that after all there is truly no reason why I should escape all the risks. It is not fatalism, but I recognize what is inevitable, and since I do not wish to better my personal situation by giving up the struggle, it seems wiser to look at the future calmly and await developments.

But between ourselves, it is hard to feel one's youth condemned in advance. I hoped that I would some day have my revenge in one form or another. But today I no longer believe that is possible for me. As a friend wrote me recently, "We are a generation that faded even before it had a chance to bloom." He is right. I actually feel as if I had been crushed by a wheel of history.

The difference between me and so many others is that they feel themselves crushed, and nothing more. I have the bitter privilege of understanding the complicated laws, the intricate machinery, and the learned maneuvers which have brought about this "traffic accident." Is that a consolation? Perhaps. Sometimes, just the same, I can't help thinking that it is hard to have dreamed of driving the "chariot of history" and then to find oneself suddenly under its wheels. . . . But on the whole, so far, I have kept my equilibrium.

I even believe that I shall survive all this because I just can't imagine this story unrolling itself without me. That would be too unjust. In spite of all our disillusionments and the slaps in the face that life has distributed so generously, most of us—and I in particular—always seek instinctively an "immanent" justice in the chain of events. That's why I can't imagine dying without seeing my husband again, and you; that would be too absurd, too unjust. Besides I couldn't die before I knew the final chapter. Is that what we call optimism? I wonder.

I am in good health despite the restrictions, the hunger, and the cold that threaten us this winter. Our morale is good, thanks to the wonderful news that reaches us from Russia, and the hope which comes to us from Africa. You can scarcely realize the place that Stalingrad occupies in our life. That distant city has become a symbol. Our Stalingrad is still holding out. . . . What an example for us all. I still go to work every day. My semi-official position is a good camouflage for the underground work I am doing. But I don't know how long it will last. . . . The Fritzes, exasperated by their failures in the east, are becoming more fiendish than ever.

Take care of my husband's address. If anything happens to me our friends will find a way of letting you know. If you have any bad news for him, first tell N. This is my whole "will and testament."

For the last few months I have been corresponding with —. He is very pessimistic and must be unhappy. His visa for — was canceled as you know. That was a terrible blow; he hoped that once out of the country he could become an artilleryman again. He's a wonderful friend. From time to time he sends me some eggs in the mail. Do you know what an egg means to us? I can tell you very simply: when I bite into a hard-boiled egg I close my eyes and find myself transported to heaven.

One last word: It's not enough to liberate us "some day"; by then we shall all be dead and buried. You must come soon, or it will be too late. It's a question of life and death for our country, for Europe.

When shall we see the landing of Allied forces in France?

Paris, October, 1942

Mr Wolfert Gains a Reader

Dear Sirs: I read with interest the New York Times editorial quoting Rickenbacker and Ira Wolfert, and considered it thought-provoking material. When I read Mr. Wolfert's letter in today's Times and learned that his material had been arbitrarily cut to pattern I resented it more than Mr. Wolfert. But when he stuck his chin out and dug in his heels, toward the end of his letter, concerning the Times's attitude toward the Popular Front, I decided any article he wrote would prove interesting.

So—will you enter a one-year subscription to The Nation for me and begin it with the issue which contains Mr. Wolfert's article on Guadaicanal. And if you see him tell him that tempest in the Times won him a new audience.

A. V. REID

Fairfield, Conn., January 27

Those Secrets

Dear Sirs: Miss Kirchwey's editorials on the North African affair have expressed my own feelings so well that I wish to register my gratitude. I was so disappointed when PM and Raymond Gram Swing let me down.

Mr. Bendiner is sound, too. He couldn't have written that book about the State Department and then go over to the Quislings. Why more liberals are not able to make the necessary integration I cannot see. Everybody from the State Department down makes it all so complicated that the man in the street seems to think—just as he did when we were sending scrap to Japan—that the State Department must have good reasons, that we don't know enough to judge, etc. Whereas the truth is that there are a few fundamental judgments that the people should make, and no secrets the State Department has, whatever they are, can possibly change the simple right and wrong of those few fundamentals.

HELEN F. GIBB

Berkeley, Cal., January 15

Very Interesting

Dear Sirs: In the course of a speech before several hundred federal appointees and recruiting officers here the other day Harry J. Kranz, who was described in the San Francisco Chronicle as regional director of civil service, made this statement: "So acute is the present labor situation that governmental agencies, including the military, will have to adjust themselves to employing older women, Negroes, and the physically handicapped." Mr. Kranz's direct admission of the status of the Negro in government work is interesting.

A SUBSCRIBER

San Francisco, Cal., January 26

For a Vegetarian Future

Dear Sirs: Now that meat is scarce it is timely as well as patriotic to point to the fact that we have many vegetarians here, and all over the world. They not only enjoy health, but satisfaction in the knowledge of not contributing to the cruelty that goes with eating meat.

When Isadora Duncan crossed on a cattleboat to England, the plaintive moo's of the cattle were constantly in her ears, and her brother became a vegetarian from then on.

Tolstoy, whose "War and Peace" is in great demand just now, also wrote a little book "The First Step" in which he says that the future belongs to the vegetarians.

Many believe that they will die if they cannot eat meat. It is true that it requires some will power, but nothing worth while in this world becomes ours without effort.

C. JACOBS

Berkeley, Cal., January 29

Is This a System?

Dear Sirs: It burned me up to read on the front page of the New York Times of January 28, 1943, of the elevation of one Ernst Hanfstaengl to the counsels of the State Department. We know enough to put in jail any poor halfwit who from sheer stupidity joined the Bund and heiled Hitler a little too enthusiastically. But here is a man who had the benefit of an American mother, a Harvard education, an American wife and native-born son; a man who lived in this country during the First World War, and on whom the eloquent Wilsonian exposition of democracy made so little impression that he found it in himself to use his brilliant mind in behalf of Hitler gangsterism for fully fifteen years, and even then quit, not from long overdue nausea, but because he was kicked out.

This man, tired obviously of Canadian prison fare, suddenly discovers a great love of the U. S. A., and our State Department, able to call on thousands of refugees, martyred in spirit and racked in body, for information about Germany, thrills to the acquisition of a Hanfstaengl.

ALBERT STRAUSS

New York, January 31

Taxes and Spending

Dear Sirs: Lord knows we will have plenty of distortion and misinformation from the press when Congress shortly begins to grapple with legislation to control inflation. Must The Nation add to the confusion?

I refer to Mr. Sturmthal's article in your issue of January 9 touching upon the respective plans of Keynes, Wallis, Weinstein, and Kalecki, each designed to sterilize excess purchasing power. Keynes's plan for compulsory saving is alleged to have "psychological advan-

NEW BOOKS

from

1943 LISTS

Will be stressed in The Nation's Midwinter Book Number, dated February 27.

A number of representative publishers have already reserved space in this literary issue for announcements of meritorious new books. There is still time for you to order your own advertising in this issue.

Rate, $160 per page for publishers' copy. Deadline for space reservations and copy to be set is February 16; for final OK's Friday night, February 19.

For information, phone AL 4-3311 or write

Advertising Department

THE Nation

55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

OUR MEN WANT BOOKS ★

SEND
ALL YOU CAN SPARE

That book you've enjoyed—pass it along to a man in uniform. Leave it at the nearest collection center or public library for the 1943 VICTORY BOOK CAMPAIGN.

tages." But what of it if forced saving will not do the job, as England and Canada have already learned. In this country, forced saving would immediately become a substitute for present defense-bond and other voluntary savings ($25 billion in 1942) and the net result would be zero.

The Treasury's spending-tax plan of last year is dusted off and served up by Sturmthal as the Wallis plan. But that plan was promptly rejected when the Treasury last offered it. Its fatal deficiencies were pointed out by The Nation itself in the issue of September 12. The Treasury plan is no more a "modification" of the Weinstein plan than a carbine is a modification of a Tommy gun. Both have a common objective, but that is as much as can be said. Nor would an "extended" Weinstein plan "come close" to the Kalecki plan, which it resembles only in so far as both envisage the use of coupons. The Kalecki plan proposes to ration spending as we ration commodities—that is, a government-fixed quantity for everyone. It is naive politically. On the other hand, the Weinstein plan proposes to control inflation by a progressive tax on excess inflationary spending, which is quite another matter. Incidentally, the Kalecki plan, as described by Sturmthal, does not represent Kalecki's current thinking on the subject, for he revised it materially shortly after it was originally published.

The inflation thunderhead is gathering too rapidly these days to afford The Nation's readers the doubtful luxury of discussion on utopian or stale solutions. Unless cracked quickly, inflation will crack us. Time cannot be wasted on a politically impossible plan like that of Kalecki or a politically dead one like that of Wallis.

It is plain that the only feasible plan will be one capable of stopping harmful spending at the point of expenditure, realistic enough to use our existing price mechanism as a control device, flexible enough to permit spending in non-inflationary fields, and adaptable enough to deal effectively with the vagaries of a varying inflationary gap. By all means, let us have informative discussion along these lines.

BERNARD ALPERT

New York, January 14

Mr. Sturmthal Replies

Dear Sirs: Mr. Alpert seems to believe that discussing and criticizing three or four alternative and mutually exclusive plans means to advocate them. Of course I do nothing of the sort. Must Mr. Alpert create confusion where there is none?

I have pointed out that the Keynes plan could be defeated "by reducing . . . normal voluntary savings." Mr. Alpert's criticism thus merely repeats mine. I have not "dusted off" any plan at all. The Wallis plan was presented by its own author in the September issue of the American Economic Review and is by no means identical with the Treasury proposals as I pointed out at length in my article. Whether the spending tax is "politically dead" is an open question. I do know that various types are being discussed right now in Washington.

Again, so far as the Kalecki plan is concerned, Mr. Alpert merely repeats my own criticism, but he does it as if he were arguing against me. I called it "unacceptable"; he calls it "naïve politically." I am aware of Kalecki's revision, and I suggested some further modifications to make the plan politically possible.

Mr. Alpert, I fear, is a bit confused so far as the relationship of the various plans is concerned, but I shall make a further effort to clarify the issues. The Wallis plan is as different from the Treasury sales tax as a protective tariff from a fiscal tariff. The first is primarily designed to prevent excess buying, and its rates are deliberately made so stiff as to bring minimum revenue. The Treasury plan, on the other hand, is a fiscal measure. In other words, Mr. Wallis hopes to prevent spending beyond the minimum, while the Treasury is looking forward to revenues from excess spending.

I did not say that the Treasury plan was a modification of the Weinstein plan, but that the "Wallis plan represents a modification of Jerome Weinstein's suggestions." Finally, both the Weinstein plan and the Kalecki plan operate with a government-allocated spending allowance. Mr. Weinstein prevents spending beyond this minimum by steeply progressive taxes, while the Kalecki plan in its original form tends to achieve the same end by a coupon system.

I agree, as probably everyone else would, with all but one of the generalities with which Mr. Alpert concludes. Disagreements as usual arise only when one tries to implement these principles in a concrete measure. I am not sure that I would accept one of Mr. Alpert's principles, that of using the price mechanism as a control device. This may mean depending upon rising prices to curtail consumption—which is inflation. It may also mean allowing for changes in relative prices as I suggested in my article. Since I am not certain which of these Mr. Alpert has in mind, and I for one do not wish to confuse the reader, I shall not elaborate on this point.

ADOLF F. STURMTHAL

Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y., Jan. 28

CONTRIBUTORS

DERO A. SAUNDERS has done considerable research, writing, and lecturing in the field of public opinion and propaganda.

LUCIEN VOGEL was founder and director of Vu and Lu in Paris, director of the Petit Journal, and creator in 1938 of Messidor, published by the French Confederation of Labor. He is a member of the executive committee of France Forever and of the administrative committee of the Free World Association.

WILLIAM H. JORDY is a young freelance writer.

ALBERT GUERARD is professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University. He is the author of "The France of Tomorrow."

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL, author of "Literary Opinion in America," is professor of English at Loyola University. He has long been a close student of sculpture and painting, and his discriminating comments on these subjects have appeared frequently in The Nation.

RALPH BATES is the author of "Rainbow Fish," "The Fields of Paradise," and other novels. He has also written extensively on political and social subjects.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary, has just published "Human Destiny," the second volume of "The Nature and Destiny of Man: A Christian Interpretation." He is a contributing editor of The Nation.

DIANA TRILLING reviews fiction regularly for The Nation.

CLEMENT GREENBERG is an editor of the Partisan Review.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 65 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 20, 1943

NUMBER 8

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- Freedom of the Skies
The Anti-Roosevelt Axis
The President's Pledge by Freda Kirchwey

254

255

256

257

ARTICLES

- Crumbs for Small Business by I. F. Stone
U-Boats and the Second Front
by Donald W. Mitchell
How to Pay as You Go by Jerome Weinstein
Battle of the Factories by Fritz Sternberg
The Novel Case of Winfred Lynn
by Dwight Macdonald
In the Wind

259

260

262

265

268

270

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- Beveridge and the Bourbons by S. K. Ratcliffe
De Gaulle's Program
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus
File and Remember

271

272

274

275

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Charles Péguy by Paul Rosenfeld
"Git or Git Got" by Marcus Duffield
First Fruits, Mostly Sour by Frank Jones
Underground Germany by Karl Billinger
Law-Abiding Italy by Paolo Milano
Politics and the Pursuit of "Goodness"
by Reinhold Niebuhr
Films by James Agee
Drama Note by Joseph Wood Krutch
Art by Clement Greenberg
Music by B. H. Haggin

276

277

278

279

280

281

283

283

284

284

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

285

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 1 by Jack Barrett

288

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Music Critic

Drama Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARK

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Notice to Our Readers

FROM the time it began publication in 1865, The Nation has been owned and controlled by a business corporation, organized ostensibly for profit. But like most other crusading journals The Nation has been stubbornly unprofitable. During most of its long career it has had to rely on contributions to supplement its income from circulation and advertising. That such help has always been available is a tribute to the journal itself and to the generosity of its friends.

Since I took over The Nation in 1937, its financial fortunes have shifted with the changing times. For almost three years The Nation was able to pay its own way, and we had good reason to hope that it had at least moved out of what was politely referred to in publishing circles as the "deficit group." But the beginning of the war brought a rapid rise in costs of operation, particularly in paper and printing costs, which no measures of economy were able to overcome. And The Nation has again been meeting deficits which continue in spite of the fact that our circulation has been growing this winter faster than for several years past.

Under these circumstances it has seemed to me neither dignified nor sensible to continue the paper as an individually-owned business, dependent on the generosity of a few interested persons. I have therefore turned over the ownership of The Nation to a non-profit membership corporation: The Nation, Inc., becomes Nation Associates, Inc. In this form The Nation can legitimately appeal for support to a wider circle of friends, and those who contribute will know that their dollars can never be translated into profit for anyone.

The Nation itself remains unchanged by the change in ownership; neither the editorial direction nor the business management is affected. Our policy will be what it has always been—to fight for a world freed from tyranny and war and from the economic misery that gives rise to both. And surely The Nation's services in that fight were never more sorely needed than they are today.

Very soon our subscribers will receive a letter telling more about the new form of organization and inviting them to become members of Nation Associates. We count on their interest and support.

FREDA KIRCHWEY

The Shape of Things

THE GIGANTIC RUSSIAN OFFENSIVE GOES from strength to strength, overshadowing all other military operations against the Axis. It is now clear that the German army is involuntarily shortening its line, seeking desperately to fall back as nearly as possible intact behind the Dnieper, hoping that lengthening communications will eventually slow up the triumphant Red Army. We should be prepared to see this negative strategy meet with some success when the spring thaw sets in toward the end of next month. That makes all the more imperative the early fulfillment of Mr. Roosevelt's pledge, given in his Lincoln's Birthday address, to hit the enemy hard "from so many directions that he never knows which is his bow and which is his stern." At present the Nazis know well enough where they are most dangerously threatened, and Moscow reports that the flow of German reserves is still from west to east. We must reverse that flow if the Russian victories are to be fully exploited this year, and the task will call for the determined taking of "calculated risks" by the Anglo-American commanders. North Africa is a beginning but only a beginning, and while strategically we remain on the offensive there, tactically we have been compelled to assume the defensive temporarily.

✕

A SHARP INCREASE IN AID TO CHINA IS promised both by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill in their reports on the Casablanca conference. Of the two the President is much the most positive. "Great and decisive actions against the Japanese will be taken," he declares, "to drive the invader from the soil of China. Important actions will be taken in the skies over China—and over Japan itself." Mr. Churchill limited himself to an intimation that a real effort will be made to reopen the Burma road, but he revealed for the first time that General Arnold and Field Marshal Dill had gone to Chungking to consult with Chiang Kai-shek. On the surface, at least, these statements seem like a complete answer to China's repeated complaint that its interests are being ignored in the shaping of United Nations strategy. The Chinese, however, must be forgiven if they remain a little skeptical until the promises are translated into action. The United States has pledged full assistance to China on several occasions in the past, and the results to date are very unimpressive. The President's assertion on January 7 that the United States was flying as much lend-lease equipment to China as was moved over the Burma road has turned out to be a mere quibble. In a report to the House Foreign Affairs Committee, J. Franklin Ray, chief of the Chinese branch of lend-lease, pointed out that much of our lend-lease aid over the Burma road took the form of materials and supplies for improving the road itself and "was at the expense of goods intended for use within China." Increase of air-line deliveries, he declared, has thus meant more "lend-lease" goods "for actual use in China."

✕

MOHANDAS K. GANDHI'S TWENTY-ONE-DAY fast appears to be politically a confession of weakness and personally a token of strength. With the turn in the tide of the war and the checking of Japan's advance, India unquestionably lost a good measure of its bargaining power vis-à-vis the British. Strikes and demonstrations undoubtedly had more effect than a drastic censorship permitted the world to know, but at no time was there any serious possibility that the British would relax their grip. The stalemate that developed gave every promise of enduring throughout the war. Gandhi's latest move may be looked upon as a desperate and dramatic effort to break the deadlock. His specific demand for unconditional release would appear to be more of a pretext than a genuine hope, since he can hardly expect so clear-cut a surrender on the part of the Viceroy. We believe that it was a serious mistake for the British to arrest the Congress leaders in the first place, but Gandhi's "coercion," as the Viceroy smugly describes it—as though coercion had never crossed the minds of the British in India—can only serve to stiffen the Churchill government, "face" being a concept that is not confined to the Japanese. What, then, can Gandhi hope to gain from his current maneuver? A chance, perhaps, to reopen negotiations, to find a formula which will enable India to return at least to the status that prevailed at the time of the abortive Cripps mission. Hope that the British will invite an opportunity for mediation may be found in the reports that Gandhi has been given freedom to receive Mr. Rajagopalachari, who is believed to be working toward this end.

✕

TO MUCH HEAT, WE BELIEVE, HAS BEEN generated by the promotion of William Power Maloney, the special prosecutor who over the past year has obtained the indictment of 33 alleged seditionists. Rumor has it that Maloney's sudden elevation was designed to prevent him from prosecuting these cases, and that the whole move is a gesture of appeasement by Attorney General Biddle in the direction of certain isolationist Congressmen whose names have been linked with some of the defendants as a result of mail-frank abuses and platform associations. Senators Wheeler and Nye and Representative Hoffman have in fact denounced Maloney and threatened an "investigation" of the Department of Justice, and we have little doubt that they would be happy to see the indictments quietly quashed. Nevertheless, we don't believe Biddle is acting under this sordid kind of pressure. In the first place, he has nothing to fear from Congressional investigators. Secondly, we know that as long ago as last October, months before Wheeler and Hoffman sounded off on the subject, Biddle was on the hunt for a special prosecutor to handle the cases. Finally, if any Congressman has cause to worry in the matter, the last development he can relish is the appointment of O. John Rogge to assume the prosecution. Maloney's successor is the man who broke up the Huey Long machine, and his reputation is such as to bring no comfort to those who have something to conceal. It is true that trial of the cases will now be postponed for months, but what of it? If the defendants are ultimately convicted of conspiracy, they will be punished. If not, their only loss of liberty will have been a suspension of the vicious propaganda in which, conspiracy or no conspiracy, they were individually engaged.

✱

THURMAN ARNOLD'S NOMINATION TO THE Circuit Court is, we suspect, a tribute to the power of the press rather than to a distinguished public servant. We do not mean, of course, that his zealous enforcement of the anti-trust laws has won him much editorial approval. On the contrary his activities have been generally condemned except on the occasions when he has prosecuted labor monopolists. And when he filed a complaint against the Associated Press he brought all the leading publishers buzzing around his head like a swarm of hornets. After hundreds of stinging leading articles failed to bring about a withdrawal of the prosecution, a move was started in Congress to investigate the background of the case—in other words, to harass the Department of Justice. These tactics appear to have succeeded. Mr. Arnold is not being kicked out—that would be hardly decent—but he is being kicked upstairs to a position where many of his talents will be wasted. No doubt the publishers are rubbing their hands. We can only hope that the public will rub its eyes and wake up to what is happening.

✱

THE EXECUTIVE ORDER FOR A 48-HOUR WEEK in "labor-shortage" areas appears to have encountered more opposition from management than from organized labor. In general, labor's interests have been well protected in the order. The principle of the 40-hour week has been preserved for the post-war period by the retention of the Wages and Hours Act, and the workers normally covered by that act are to receive time-and-a-half pay for all work above 40 hours. Moreover, the order applies only in 32 areas where the vast majority of war workers are already working 48 hours or longer. Labor has never challenged the accuracy of the various investigations which have shown that, with certain exceptions, the 48-hour week is optimum in most industries. It has, however, been concerned lest the need for longer hours be taken as an excuse for cutting the wages of the millions of war workers who have been receiving time-and-a-half pay. Management has centered its criticism of the executive order on the overtime provisions. It contends that in forcing employers to increase their pay rolls 30 per cent for 20 per cent more work the order is inflationary. This is, of course, true to a moderate extent. But the benefits of the extra work obviously outweigh the dangers inherent in creation of additional purchasing power. There was no other realistic choice open to the War Manpower Commission. It could not eliminate the time-and-a-half pay for the millions now working more than 40 hours without inviting serious labor disputes; nor could it ask the workers whose hours are now being increased to accept less favorable terms than those already receiving overtime pay. Taking the urgencies of war production into account, the commission appears to have followed the only course open to it.

Freedom of the Skies

CLARE LUCE is right about one thing. The air age is at hand, and with the advent of peace we must be prepared to deal with the problems posed by an enormous extension of international air traffic. What international rules are to be adopted for the control and regulation of this traffic? What changes in international law are desirable to facilitate its flow and to promote the maximum intercourse and trade between nations? Can our conquest of the air be used to bring the peoples of the earth closer together spiritually as well as physically? Or will it become the basis of commercial rivalries leading to new and more terrible wars?

By raising these questions in her maiden speech, Mrs. Luce could have performed a great public service. She chose instead to deliver a mélange of emotionalism and misinformation, spiced with second-rate wisecracks. And by so doing she has stirred up her fellow-jingoes at home and abroad, sown new weeds in the struggling victory garden of United Nations' cooperation, and cemented a new stretch of road leading to World War III.

The post-war policy of young America, Mrs. Luce declares, is simply: "We want to fly everywhere. Period." Correct! And we may safely add that it is the policy of young Britain, Russia, China, Holland; in short, of the young of all industrialized nations. But if this desire is to be fulfilled we cannot cut up the air into national segments with absolute sovereign rights extending from the earth to beyond the stratosphere. There must be freedom of the skies.

Mrs. Luce, however, emphatically repudiates the idea and takes Vice-President Wallace to task for suggesting that freedom of the air is as essential in the future as freedom of the seas has been in the past. Freedom of the seas, she argues, crippled the American merchant marine, leaving it at the mercy of foreign subsidized lines. Mrs.

Luce should study American economic history and discover that there is a close correspondence between the decline of American shipping and the rise of the American tariff. Moreover, we seem to remember that this country set the pace in shipping subsidies after 1918. However, history is something which happened before Mrs. Luce's time, and we have no wish to put her at a disadvantage.

Returning, therefore, to the present, we find that Mrs. Luce is greatly concerned by alleged British demands for a policy of freedom of the air. Once established, she contends, it would enable Britain and other countries with comparatively low wage costs to push America out of leadership in the air. Under these circumstances, Mrs. Luce insists, it would be fatal to give up the "historic American air policy of sovereignty of the skies."

We have, then, two propositions: Americans must be able to fly everywhere; foreigners must not be allowed to fly at will over America. Does Mrs. Luce really imagine that the world can arrive at a friendly agreement for international air traffic on this basis? Can she believe that the air everywhere can be made free to Americans while leaving American skies as a closed preserve? Mrs. Luce complains that her speech has been misunderstood "to mean that I felt America must dominate the skies." We have studied the text in the Congressional Record and we can see no other possible meaning. Moreover, Mrs. Luce appears to suggest that we should gain world consent for American super-sovereignty now while we can capitalize best our economic and military power. "There is not a shadow of doubt," she said in the course of her speech, "that this country, claiming complete sovereignty of its own skies, and behaving with decency and dignity like the great creditor nation it is, by cooperating to the utmost with the United Nations to liberalize world air policy could keep the air supremacy it now has and take henceforth in the skies the position of enlightened democratic leadership that Britain held and still holds on the seas." This seems to us sufficiently plain even if it is not quite so blunt as Republican Leader Joseph Martin's statement on January 5: "America must rule the air."

What does freedom of the air mean? According to an article in the British magazine the Aeroplane, it would include "the right of innocent passage" together with "the right of free landing" subject only to conformity with domestic regulations. It would not mean, however, that a foreign plane could participate in domestic traffic. That is to say, a British plane flying from London to Australia could pass over American territory, making the necessary stops for refueling or for landing passengers or freight originating outside the United States; it could not pick up a cargo in New York for delivery in San Francisco.

Such arrangements do not seem a very formidable encroachment on national sovereignty. Their absence, however, in pre-war days involved, according to the Aeroplane, "over 100 reciprocity agreements between European states, strictly balancing the grant of facilities between pairs of nations and hindering free development." Is it really to America's interest to encourage a return after the war to this kind of aerial nationalism? Yet that seems to be the alternative to freedom of the skies, since Mrs. Luce's plan for unilateral freedom for American planes must be dismissed as imperialist fantasy.

Actually this country has more to gain from freedom of the skies than most. Geographically, the United States is not the air center of the world, and few other nations would be absolutely compelled to seek the use of "our" air. On the other hand, if we wish to girdle the globe with air routes we must constantly fly over the territory of other powers and use their airfields. If we had to depend on reciprocity agreements balancing facilities we should be in a poor bargaining position, while the British Commonwealth, with its far-flung dominions and colonies, would be well fixed. Unless, therefore, we are prepared to back our claims to air supremacy by force of arms, we had better listen to the "idealistic" Mr. Wallace rather than the too, too realistic Mrs. Luce.

The Anti-Roosevelt Axis

A COALITION of irresponsible Republicans and disgruntled Democrats seems intent on creating an intolerable situation in Congress. They have launched three investigations calculated, in the midst of a great war, to disrupt the workings of government, to harass the President, and to demoralize public officials. There is some reason to believe that the White House is deliberately standing aside and letting this coalition demonstrate, unchecked, just how mischievous and unscrupulous some opponents of the New Deal have become. We say "some" because an encouraging minority of Republicans and a handful of conservative Democrats have shown that their patriotism and good sense outweigh their partisanship and their political differences with the President.

One of these inquisitorial committees is that of Dies, which has been extended for two more years and may now hope to survive into the fruitful period of the post-war reaction. Many an official with important war work will be spending nights of worry and many days of precious time on the problem of answering charges against himself or his subordinates by as unfair and inaccurate a body as ever disgraced the Congressional power of investigation. The second committee is that headed by Congressman Cox of Georgia, who will devote himself to smearing the Federal Communications Commission. This inquiry should serve as a warning to other administrative bodies that decline to do favors for the constituents of Congressmen and that have the temerity to inquire into whether payments made to Congressmen for legal services are violations of the law. Cox received $2,500 from a radio broadcasting station which he helped to obtain a license from the commission.

Decent people of many different political complexions have grown sick of Dies-committee methods; the Cox inquiry is limited, though it will certainly be noisy. More dangerous than either is the committee set up under the sweeping resolution introduced by Smith of Virginia. Readers will recall the damage Smith did the National Labor Relations Board by his investigation of some years back. This new resolution will permit him to do a similar job on every executive department or agency in the government. Congress has never before in its history passed so broad a resolution. There is hardly an officer of the government who cannot be harassed by this new Smith committee, and it will be in a position to review every order issued by every one of the emergency war agencies.

A committee of this kind, if it operates on lines indicated in the debate, should be a big help to the Axis. It can interfere with the efficient conduct of the war abroad and demonstrate the kind of politics which will discredit democratic policies at home. Every disgruntled interest can make the committee its forum. Representative Hope of Kansas has already asked that it investigate OPA ceilings on corn and flour. Representative Boren of Oklahoma wants it to cut down the powers of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Representative Fish would have it review the $25,000-a-year salary limitation, already marked for slaughter by the House Ways and Means Committee. There never was a committee with greater potentialities for evil, fewer possibilities for good.

Some newspapers seemed to feel that the Administration woke up too late to the dangers in the Smith resolution. This runs counter to our own information from the capital. The dangers in the Smith bill were obvious at once, and the Administration was apprised of them. Other reasons must be found for its failure to fight the bill in the House. Most of the Democrats, including Ramspeck, the party whip, voted for the resolution. McCormack, the House leader, ignominiously cast no vote at all. (The most extraordinary vote for it was that of Voorhis of California, who finally made up his mind to vote against the Dies committee, only to make a speech the next day in favor of the Smith resolution.) Either the Administration has completely lost control of the party in the House or thinks its only hope lies in letting Congress overplay its hand, or both. These dismal prospects can only be rectified if every American citizen makes it his business to let his Congressman know that he is supposed to be engaged in a war against Hitler, not Roosevelt.

The President's Pledge

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

THE President made some promises the other night—resounding, confident promises of victory over the whole fascist conspiracy. On the military side of the struggle, he complemented the review made by Churchill the previous day—pledging the total defeat of the Axis and predicting early invasions of Europe and more intensive attacks, particularly air attacks, on Japan. On the political side, he promised that no "Quislings or Laval's" would be kept in power "anywhere on this earth."

The military plans put forward by the Allied leaders are discussed elsewhere in this issue. The political promises of Mr. Roosevelt will be examined here.

No one with any knowledge of the President's natural sympathies and make-up could doubt that he meant every word he said. Of course he wants the establishment of democracy throughout the world. His desire is written into the Atlantic Charter; it was eloquently expressed in the Four Freedoms speech. Long before Hitler brought his war against civilization into the military field, the President had attacked the practices of terror, discrimination, and threat that constitute the fascist method of government.

Now that we are in the war, it is not likely that the President's antipathy for fascism has diminished. On the contrary it must have increased with every hour of death and destruction. We didn't need his pledge to convince us of his desire to supplant tyranny with freedom. But the pledge is useful for other reasons. At this critical hour it is just as well to remind the world and ourselves of the meaning of the war and of our intentions as a belligerent. The President's words should be short- and long-waved around the world. They should be translated and printed in millions of copies and sent into every occupied country of Europe. They should be framed and hung in every private office in the State Department.

For the pledge made by Mr. Roosevelt cannot be carried out by executive order. It can become a reality only if the forces of democratic resistance here and abroad are strong enough to defeat a reaction which grows more ugly and determined with each day that passes. The President is not Commander-in-Chief of the Allied world. He is not even dictator of the United States. His will is constantly opposed and thwarted by men of conflicting views, by hostile interests, by elements in other nations who owe no allegiance to his word. He is engaged in deadly battle with an enemy he has so far been reluctant even to recognize as dangerous. For Mr. Roosevelt is also thwarted by his own too sanguine temperament. The confidence and happy nonchalance that have carried him triumphantly over physical disability—over oceans and continents—over hatred and petty attack—over mountains of work—have also, too often, encouraged him to ignore obstacles which must be faced and patiently cleared away if the ends he desires are to be reached. The President by nature minimizes difficulties, brushes aside objections, ignores unpleasant facts. To him a hypothesis is an enemy.

"But Mr. President," inquires an imaginary correspondent, "how are you going to get rid of Quislings if you once set them up in power and give them arms and cooperate with them as allies and friends?" The President smiles with humorous tolerance. "Let's stick to facts," he says. "That sounds to me like one of those 'iffy' questions. We're busy killing Germans in North Africa—all of us together. That's the job we're interested in now, isn't it?"

The President is satisfied. He has enough concrete, immediate problems to solve. Why on earth do some people always want to look for trouble? When he gets round to the political problem of post-war Europe, he'll find some way to solve that, too—and to solve it right. Meantime we can use those fellows, those near-fascists on the spot out there.

Can the rest of us afford to relax and trust the President as he trusts himself? I'm afraid not. Indeed, I'll go so far as to say that his best chance of winning a final victory in the political war lies in the existence of a strong, vocal, unintimidated body of "pettifoggers" filling the air with protests and irritating questions. The improvements so far registered on the North African political front are certainly to be put down to the clamor of outraged democrats in England, in America, in the occupied countries, in North Africa itself. They were the result of pressure, and only continued and stronger pressure will bring further improvements. The President's pledge is useful as a wall-motto—as a constant reminder to his friends and a warning to his enemies. To treat it as an accomplished fact would be to betray the last, best hope of a democratic future.

Instead we must go on fighting. For the only accomplished facts we see before us are those which militate against the President and his desire.

It is not, for instance, a pettifogging invention that the set-up in North Africa gives little promise of melting into a normal form of French self-government after victory. A peaceful change of this sort is unlikely unless it happens now by the elimination of men universally looked upon in France as traitors and by the reestablishment of republican institutions. Such a proposal is made by General de Gaulle on another page of this issue. To keep things as they are in French North Africa is to insure civil war later on in France. When Mr. Churchill in his speech to the Commons referred hopefully to the French army commanded by General Giraud—"an army which is being raised by American and British equipment to a very powerful force, an army which will play its part later on in liberating the French motherland"—he quite naturally ignored the fact that, with the exception of Giraud, the chief officers of that army are for the most part notorious collaborationists and fascists. And Giraud himself is anti-democratic. How is Mr. Roosevelt going to insure that "Frenchmen will be represented by a government of their own choice" once the legions of Nogues and Juin are safely established in continental France? Does he plan to encourage popular revolution against fascist-led French colonial troops? Would he use American soldiers to prevent a fascist coup?

And how about Spain? The President has addressed the Spanish dictator as his "good friend." The American Ambassador in Madrid has assured Franco that under no circumstances will a change of government in Spain be brought about by Spanish political exiles or by any efforts from outside Spain. Does this promise jibe with the President's assurance that the "right of self-determination included in the Atlantic Charter does not carry with it the right of any government anywhere in the world to commit wholesale murder or the right to make slaves of its own people . . . ?" Is this not, word for word, a description of what Franco has been doing ever since he was started on the bloody road to power by Hitler and Mussolini? For reasons of "expediency," the President has permitted the constant appeasement of this crumbling dictatorship and has even pledged the United States to the post-war support of Franco's tyranny. By what device does he plan to free us of our shameful commitments to this super-Quisling? It is not easy to believe that the recent visit of Archbishop Spellman to Madrid is a step toward the overturn of Spanish fascism.

Less compromising but equally disturbing overtures have been made to reactionary elements in other countries or to reactionary representatives of other countries in the United States. Does the President think that his State Department's flirtations with Hungarian revisionists, Austrian monarchists, Italian generals improve the hope of the sort of world he has promised us? Does he think that the State Department itself is a useful instrument through which to create a democratic post-war world order? It is no secret that some of the leading officials of that department are more concerned with the danger of popular uprisings than with the establishment of popular governments once the war is won.

The plain fact is that the President's hopes are already being undermined at home as well as abroad and that he has given aid and comfort to the saboteurs of his expressed aims. This fact cannot be conjured out of existence by wishes or promises; it can only be ended by a courageous and uncompromising policy, initiated by the President and carried out by men who can be trusted.

Crumbs for Small Business

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 14

TWENTY great corporations held 46 per cent of all war-supply contracts over $50,000 at the end of last November. The dollar-a-year crowd prefers, for obvious reasons, to keep this sort of thing a military secret at a time when many Congressmen are aroused by the plight of small business. Here are the twenty corporations and the total contracts held by each of them at the end of November. The figures are in millions of dollars:

General Motors	$7,251.1	Aviation Corp.	$1,347.6
Curtiss Wright	4,613.1	Glenn L. Martin	1,328.7
Bethlehem Steel	2,953.6	Newport News
Douglas Aircraft	2,373.1	Shipbuilding	1,165.0
United Aircraft	2,342.6	General Electric	1,128.8
Ford	2,036.1	Todd Shipyard	1,037.8
Boeing Aircraft	1,826.1	North American
Consolidated	1,758.5	Aviation	978.3
U. S. Steel	1,682.5	A. T. & T.	881.2
Chrysler	1,562.0	Du Pont	867.0
Lockheed	1,372.5	Sperry Gyroscope	849.3

At the end of last November the volume of war contracts over $50,000 was almost $85,000,000,000. Of that amount these 20 corporations held almost $40,000,000,000. The 25 corporations with $600,000,000 or more each in war contracts held 50 per cent of the total volume of contracts, and 100 corporations held 70 per cent. While much of this work is no doubt being subcontracted, the OWI survey—which contained no names—admitted that "a considerable portion of subcontracts awarded by all other prime contractors goes to the 100 corporations."

The latest report of the Smaller War Plants Corporation, dated February 11, makes interesting reading beside these huge monopolistic totals. The act establishing the SWPC was passed by Congress last June 11, but the figures on the war-production loans it has made to small business men indicate how slow it was in getting started. In the first six months of its existence the SWPC made twelve loans to small business totaling $605,500. In the last two months it made thirty-eight more loans totaling $2,568,770. By February 6, the SWPC had made a total of fifty loans aggregating $3,174,270. Compare this with the total of loan applications received during the eight months—$22,458,523.57.

In addition to making loans to facilitate war production by small business, the SWPC may purchase production facilities, including machinery, and lease them to small business. In eight months it arranged such leases with fourteen concerns. The total amount involved was little more than half a million dollars. The SWPC may recommend small business for prime contracts. In eight months "1,191 firms recommended by the division had received prime contracts totaling $195,400,000." The only figure given on subcontracts is found in the statement that "during the past sixty days the placement of more than $75,000,000 in subcontracts has been reported to our Washington office." No indication is given as to how much of this went to small business.

The SWPC was set up to act as a prime contractor, to take war contracts from the armed services and subcontract these to small business. This was the principal purpose of the agency. Yesterday announcement was made of the SWPC's first prime contracting job in eight months. The contract involved is only for $10,000,000. It is significant that even this first small prime contract does not come from army or navy but from the Federal Public Housing Administration and that it calls, not for war material, but for furniture. The contract was arranged after Mayor George W. Welsh of Grand Rapids, Michigan, called WPB Chairman Nelson's attention to the frightful unemployment in that great furniture center. Its metal- and wood-working establishments could make many parts for armament. Employment there is 21 per cent of normal. No war contracts could be obtained for it. Responsibility for this rests squarely on Nelson, who was given full power by Congress in the SWPC act to take prime contracts from army and navy to subcontract among small business firms. Nelson, for all his fine speeches about little business, has the big-business point of view. The Congressional compromise that won Nelson's support for the SWPC bill has proved its fatal weakness. The compromise put Nelson in charge of the SWPC.

Nelson has quietly sabotaged the Smaller War Plants Corporation. Last Thursday Senator Truman of Missouri rose to the defense of his friend and constituent, Lou E. Holland, who has been deputy chairman of the War Production Board in charge of the Smaller War Plants Corporation. Holland, a dynamo in his native Kansas City, proved a dud in Washington. The big-business tides at the WPB were too powerful for him. Senator Truman put a memorandum into the Congressional Record which showed how long Nelson diddled and dawdled in setting up the SWPC. The SWPC, under the act, was supposed to have field offices. Over Holland's objections Nelson approved an odd set-up under which the SWPC did not control its own field offices. This situation was not changed until January 7. Not until January 11 was the SWPC given representation on the board of appeals for critical labor areas. It still has no voice on the board which formulates policies governing the controlled-materials plan. No wonder the SWPC has so far proved a failure.

The State Department has executed a successful encirclement of former Governor Herbert H. Lehman and will control his Office of Foreign Relief and Rehabilitation Operations. Those who recall how relief activities were sometimes used for political purposes after the last war know that this is a fact of key importance in the shaping of the post-war world. Not only is Lehman subject to Hull, but it now appears that his field representatives will be subordinate to diplomatic officers. The State Department, in announcing that Fred K. Hoehler had arrived in Algeria to serve as director of relief in North Africa, says he "will report to and serve under the general direction of the Honorable Robert D. Murphy." This may have its effect on the diet of anti-fascists in North Africa.

Major General Alexander Surles, in charge of press relations for the army, deserves a public spanking. His attempt to get the Blue Network to drop or gag Drew Pearson and Walter Winchell is not his first try at interfering with free discussion. Shortly after the invasion of North Africa, he sent out a confidential memorandum to editors and radio commentators asking them not to comment on the political aspects of the invasion. Cal Tinney had the courage to refer to the order on the air, but General Surles talked me out of printing it at that time. "It was all a mistake . . ." It looks as though the mistake was mine.

U-Boats and the Second Front

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

MUCH of the current optimism regarding the war in Europe is due to incomplete acquaintance with the facts. The Russian and African campaigns have been, as they deserve to be, widely acclaimed. They point to a steady disintegration of German military strength and to an eventual Allied victory. But much less well advertised has been the steady gain of German submarines in the Atlantic, the mounting sinkings whose cumulative effect can well postpone indefinitely the day of victory. Germany has apparently lost its chance of winning the war. But unless the U-boat threat is speedily overcome, it does not necessarily follow that we are on the verge of winning it.

In the three years of war the fortunes of submarine warfare have ebbed and flowed. At the outbreak of hostilities the anti-submarine measures evolved in 1918 were quickly applied and the U-boats held in check. Then came the conquest of France, and German submarines, no longer operating under the geographical limitations of earlier days when the English Channel and North Sea exits could very largely be blocked, threatened for a time in early 1941 to win the war. At this point the United States came to the aid of the British. Our navy helped to clear the waters immediately around the British Isles and has kept them a perilous zone for U-boats. But immediately after we entered the war the Germans set up a combat zone off our Atlantic Coast and for months scored a phenomenal number of kills. Then more force became available, a better defense organization was set up, and the undersea raiders sought other, less perilous hunting grounds. From July to November the United States enjoyed a respite from heavy losses. During this period our shipbuilding made some replacements but failed to build up a tonnage capable of supporting a genuine invasion. The African campaign demonstrated very accurately the limitations as well as the achievements of our military position.

At present we are facing for the third time a very great threat from the U-boats. And it is one of the gravest conceivable reflections on the information policies of our armed services that few Americans are even aware of the magnitude of the danger and that possibly no one outside of a small group in the government has the specific figures. The facts that we have indicate a most serious situation. Until several months ago, when the navy no longer dared reveal the facts, it had admitted over 500 sinkings in the Atlantic. Its figures did not include losses in the Mediterranean or in the Pacific and Indian oceans or along the convoy lines to Russia, or reveal the number of vessels damaged but not sunk. Sometimes when the Germans claimed the destruction of virtually a whole convoy on the basis of observations on the spot, the Navy Department or the British Admiralty contented itself with terming the German estimates "exaggerations."

The Germans have frequently made exaggerated claims in the war, but they have seldom done so during highly successful campaigns. Berlin's report of 1,208 vessels of 7,586,000 tons sunk by submarines in 1942 and of enough other ships sunk by bombers and surface raiders to bring the grand total to just under nine million tons is therefore extremely sobering. It may be an overstatement by 20 up to 40 per cent—during the period when losses were published the German claims often exceeded British admissions by 40 per cent—but it undoubtedly comes closer to being an accurate statement of the current situation than anything else we have. In fact, the conservative Christian Science Monitor recently put sinkings at a million tons a month, with tankers in particular suffering heavily. And in addition there is the tonnage that has been damaged and is now laid up for repairs—not to speak of the cargoes, in many cases more vital than the ships themselves. To offset these losses we placed slightly more than eight million tons of shipping in service in the past year, and the British may possibly have built as much as two million tons, a total of ten million in all. If we view these two sets of figures dispassionately, it appears that 70 per cent as a minimum, 100 per cent as a maximum, of last year's United Nations ship production rests at the bottom of the Atlantic. We have also suffered some unrevealed losses of merchant tonnage in the Pacific, but these have probably been fairly small.

We do not know with any greater degree of accuracy the number of submarines which Germany now has available or will be able to put to work soon. British source place the number at 500 to 700, a sufficiently generous estimate in all likelihood. But the current German building rate is put at twenty to thirty a month, fully twice the rate of destruction. In one recent month, according to the New York Times, the ratio of completion of new U-boats to those sunk was seventeen to one.

Improvements in design have made today's submarines more formidable customers than those encountered in the First World War. Enough oil can be carried for long cruises, and the hull has been toughened to the point where depth bombs have to explode within a radius of a few yards to be fatal. The submarine can also dive to a much greater depth than formerly. Less commonly noted improvements are the surface speed of modern boats, which permits them to escape corvettes and most other types of patrol vessels and to overtake nine out of ten merchant ships, and the use of larger torpedoes—the explosion now generally destroys instead of merely damaging the target. The time during which an injured vessel can be expected to remain afloat has been drastically cut, and the loss of life among the crew has soared. In turn this has created a shortage of trained merchant seamen willing to run such enormous risks.

Few few U-boats are now operating within 200 miles of the British Isles or along our Atlantic Coast, but their destructive influence is still felt there, for pinned down in these areas are an enormous number of men and ships which destroy no submarines but must keep watch against their return. Meanwhile the hunting grounds have been moved to the convoy routes to Britain and North Africa, to the northeast coast of South America, the mid-Atlantic, and even the south coast of Africa, where German blockade runners have doubtless refueled the U-boats. A concentration of anti-submarine forces in an area lowers the losses there, but the U-boat then shifts its activities elsewhere.

Our principal approach to this problem up to now has been to "build ships faster than the Germans can sink them," and we have achieved wonders in rapid shipbuilding. But the method represents no real solution, and it is certainly the hardest possible way to win a war. Other anti-submarine methods are of varying effectiveness. The R. A. F. has laid mines in German coastal waters, but this merely forces the Germans to use some of their time and material in sweeping them up. The large-scale air raids on U-boat bases such as Lorient have not accomplished much except to force the Germans to build the huge bomb-proof "garages" in which old submarines can be repaired and new ones assembled. Since modern submarines are fabricated in large sections, air attacks on the plants which furnish the Diesel engines and other parts have been employed on a considerable scale. The degree of success here has certainly not been great, and it has of course no effect on the enormous number of U-boats in operation.

The small converted plane carrier was at one time hailed as the answer to the problem of protecting convoys, and its scouting and air protection have been enormously valuable. But in its turn it requires naval protection, and planes are frequently forced to remain aboard in the very kind of nasty, rough weather that affords the submarine its greatest opportunity.

As the African expedition showed, convoys can be guarded with nearly 100 per cent success against attack. The difficulty is simply that too few converted plane carriers, destroyers, and patrol boats are now available. As recently as three weeks ago not a single patrol vessel of a new and approved type was in service. Nor is there any likelihood that this situation will be greatly different in the immediate future.

Two possible answers remain. The first is action on land, either commando raids on a huge scale with the object of destroying U-boat facilities on the European coast or else an invasion of northern France by as large a force as the British and Americans can muster, in other words, the "second front." Either one of these moves would mean huge losses; commando raids would have to be extremely extensive to be effective. On the other hand, since most U-boats now proceed to sea from French ports or through the English Channel, the conquest of the French coast would hinder the operation of submarines based farther east. The invasion of France by troops now in the British Isles would not demand much greater transportation than their supply in Britain. Thus we may have to change from a military policy of defeating the U-boat in order to open a "second front" and open a second front in order to make the defeat of the U-boat certain.

There is one other conceivable solution, and that is the discovery of some weapon or method more effective and economical of force than any we are employing at present. The finding of defensive "answers" to improvements in offensive weapons is one of the oldest laws of military history; a list of such cases would cover pages. The submarine threat was answered in 1917, and it can be in 1943. But at the moment the development of the U-boat as an offensive weapon is slightly in advance of the defenses against it.

In meeting this threat our navy has had far too little force at its disposal. Both men and equipment have been greatly overworked. But the navy has also been tardy in recognizing its problem and in coordinating all agencies dealing with it, and it has displayed little imagination in tackling the solution. If there is any officer with the critical, original turn of mind of the late Admiral Sims, he has yet to make an appearance; with so few competent civilian critics of the navy, he is desperately needed today.

The policy of withholding adequate information about the submarine situation from the American public has been thoroughly bad. A censorship asserted to be designed to "keep the facts from the enemy" has merely withheld facts which our people have every right to know and which the Germans have shown repeatedly that they possess. It has concealed blunders and weaknesses which might have been corrected if sufficient publicity had been given to them. And it has likewise deprived us of valuable aid. For most of the great historical improvements in weapons have been initiated by military amateurs or civilians, not by professional military men. An aroused America will find the answer or demand men who can show results.

How to Pay as You Go

BY JEROME WEINSTEIN

WHETHER or not we adopt the Ruml plan, or any other plan for dropping, skipping, or postponing the whole or any part of the tax liability on 1942 income, there will still remain the basic problem of a practical method for collecting taxes by deductions at the source of income. It will still be necessary for the taxpayer to have funds available to discharge his tax liability to the government when it is due. And whether the taxpayer's liability to be met on March 15, 1943, and quarterly thereafter is based on his 1942 income or on his 1943 income is a distinction without a difference if the taxpayer is unable to discharge it. In either case the taxpayer is in default, and the government is without its anticipated revenues.

With more than thirty million taxpayers under present income-tax schedules, the problem of collection is acute. The present schedules dip down into low-income brackets never before subject to any tax and impose rates which make the tax a severe financial burden. Even the smallest amount of taxable income is now subject to a surtax of 13 per cent added to a normal tax of 6 per cent. A single person with an income of $2,500 or less a year must meet an income-tax liability which, when paid in quarterly instalments, will absorb nearly two weeks' salary for each payment.

Those in the lower income brackets are not accustomed to budgeting their incomes to provide for taxes.

And a very large part of them lived until recently on a bare subsistence level and have not accumulated savings to meet this recurring financial emergency. Unless some practical method is adopted for accumulating out of income, as earned, the substantial sums required to meet income-tax liabilities, widespread default is certain to occur in the lower and lower-middle income brackets. In income groups above $3,500, the problem is not serious, for these groups normally accumulate savings to which they may resort on tax-payment dates and which they can replenish in the intervals.

If widespread involuntary default does occur it will bring our entire tax system into disrepute, encouraging those who can pay to neglect their obligations. It will also put a heavier tax burden than was contemplated upon the backs of those who pay promptly. For if one group of income-tax payers does not contribute its share, the other groups must carry the load for them.

The only way in which this problem of involuntary default under high tax rates can be solved is by withholding or deducting at source a part of wages and salaries, as earned, to be applied in discharge of income-tax liability. This is recognized by the Treasury Department, the Congressional committees which deal with taxes, and all authorities in the field. Perhaps the chief obstacle to its enactment is the objection to doubling the taxpayers' burdens during the first year of operation.

It is the apparent dilemma of putting deduction at source into effect without doubling the taxpayers' burden that has given interest to the Ruml plan, the Doughton plan, the Carlson plan, and numerous other proposals for dropping or deferring the whole or part of tax liability on 1942 incomes. It is for this reason, primarily, that very serious consideration is now being given to wiping out as much as $10 billion owed to the government for taxes on income earned last year at the moment when we are faced with the problem of raising an additional $16 billion of tax revenues. The Treasury has offered partial forgiveness as a compromise.

The apparent dilemma is based on the assumption that deductions from 1943 income must be applied to taxes on 1943 income. That assumption is true only if we adopt the Treasury's proposed mechanism for source deductions. There is, however, no good reason why 1943 deductions cannot be used to discharge 1943 obligations on 1942 incomes, provided a satisfactory mechanism exists. That is the procedure which has always been followed by the lower- and middle-bracket taxpayer.

The proposal made by the Treasury last year provided for regular deductions from pay envelopes in accordance with fixed schedules. The employer would keep detailed records of such deductions for each employee, remitting the amount due to the government every three months. At the end of the year the employer would file a detailed report of source deductions for the entire year as to each of his employees. The employee, in his income-tax return, would claim credit for the amount withheld at source by his employer, and the claim would be verified by matching it against the employer's annual report. If source deductions were more or less than the liability indicated on the return, the taxpayer would pay the difference or claim a refund.

The Treasury Department's proposal met with criticism not only from members of the Congressional committees but also from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The latter questioned the ability of his department to check adequately the hundreds of thousands of employers who would be making deductions from workers' envelopes running into billions of dollars. Even if only 1 per cent of such deductions were unaccounted for, the loss to the government would run into millions of dollars. Moreover, it was estimated that an additional staff of more than 10,000 qualified persons, at a cost of over $20 million, would be required, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue doubted whether he could obtain any such staff under existing conditions.

From private business came the objection that preparation and filing of the various reports and the maintenance of the detailed records required would not only impose a very substantial expense but would also present a serious man-power problem.

Another highly significant criticism of source deductions in the form proposed by the Treasury is based on the effect of such deductions on demands for compensating increases in wages and salaries. The validity of this criticism is apparent from the common reaction of workers to the 5 per cent deduction for the Victory tax. When to the Victory tax is added a 20 per cent withholding tax, the single worker whose wages are $40 a week will find only $35 or less in his pay envelope. Regardless of all the explanations which the government may make about the $5 which is missing, the worker will regard it as a wage cut, and the employer will face demands for an increase. This has been the experience in England, where, according to the reports of the Select Committee on National Expenditures, widespread resentment of pay-envelope deductions has seriously impaired the incentive and efficiency of workers.

These criticisms establish the tests which must be applied to any system for deduction at source. To assume that all of these objections may be fully and adequately met by any system that can be devised is to assume a capacity for social invention not justified by past experience. There is, however, a feasible method for deduction at source which I believe goes far toward meeting these various objections.

The plan is simply this: that the government issue tax money which shall be paid to the worker in the amount of his source deductions, and which shall be applied by the worker to the payment of his taxes when due. The tax money could be distributed among banks through the Federal Reserve System in the same way that ordinary paper currency is now distributed. The employer would get it at his bank on payment of the face amount. This tax money might well be the size and form of existing paper currency, printed on blue or yellow paper with the superstamp "tax money" or other appropriate legend, and could be issued in $1, $2, $5, and $10 denominations.

Assume that the employer has a weekly pay roll which, under the schedules for deduction at source, requires him to deduct $300. When he obtains from his bank the amount in cash required for wages, he will also obtain, in appropriate denominations, $300 of tax money for distribution among his workers in lieu of the cash deducted. The worker will make sure that each pay envelope contains his full weekly salary in cash and in tax money. If his salary is $40 and his deductions amount to $5, he will receive $5 in tax money from his employer. By this device the government can collect without three months' delay every penny of the billions of dollars which will be deducted at source by the hundreds of thousands of employers scattered throughout the United States. And no staff of government employees will be required to verify the collection.

The recipient of the tax money will accumulate it and use it to discharge his tax obligations when due. He will make out his income-tax return as at present and inclose a sufficient amount of tax money to discharge his debt—in the way some people now use tax-anticipation notes. If his taxes are more than his tax money, he will inclose a check for the difference. If his taxes are less, he may retain the balance for future tax payments or obtain a refund.

When the Internal Revenue Department receives the taxpayer's return, it will not have to check his employer's return to be sure that the taxpayer is entitled to the credit claimed. Either the taxpayer presents the visible evidence of such deductions in the form of tax money or his claim is disallowed.

The use of tax money will also free employers from the substantial burden and expense of maintaining records and filing reports. The government will not require proof that it has received the full amount deducted from pay envelopes, for it will have been paid in advance. Nor does the employer have to keep records to prove that he is actually making source deductions. Since there is nothing to be gained thereby, he has no incentive to default. If, however, a government check is desired, the present records are adequate to verify the employer's deductions at source except in one respect—the dates and amounts of the employer's tax-money purchases. Such records can readily be kept by the employer and by his bank.

There would be no problem of a black market in tax money sold at a discount by holders who are pressed for cash or intend to avoid the payment of any taxes, for tax money so acquired would be of no possible use to the purchaser. On his return the taxpayer must declare the name of his employer and the amount of salary received during the tax period. On the basis of the declared salary and under the uniform schedules of deduction applicable to it, the taxpayer should possess a certain amount of tax money. If he presents more, he has either understated his earned income or else has acquired the surplus illegitimately. Since any discrepancy will be readily apparent on the face of the taxpayer's return, it would be foolish for anyone to pay for tax money which he could not possibly use in the payment of his own income tax. It follows, therefore, that tax money is non-negotiable merely by virtue of the effective limitations on its possible use.

In the interest of simplicity the use of tax money contemplates a schedule of deductions computed in dollar amounts on a wage-bracket basis. For example, for single persons without dependents $1 would be deducted in the $14 to $18 wage bracket, $2 in the $19 to $23 wage bracket, $3 in the $24 to $28 wage bracket, and so on. Exact correspondence between the amount deducted and the actual tax liability of the individual is not possible. No practical system of deduction at source can take into

THE PURCHASING POWER OF THE DOLLAR

AS MEASURED BY	SEPTEMBER 1939 BEGINNING OF WORLD WAR II	DECEMBER 1941 PEARL HARBOR	NOW
 WHOLESALE PRICES	 100¢	 85¢	 67¢
 RETAIL FOOD PRICES	 100¢	 87¢	 74¢
 FARM PRODUCTS PRICES	 100¢	 69¢	 55¢

SOURCE: U. S. DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

GRAPHIC BY PICK-S

account regularity of employment, income currently received from other employers, the employment of husband and wife, or deductible items of expense which will vary with different types of employment.

Nor is exact correspondence required. The deduction at source is not a tax in itself, but merely an interim payment on account of a tax liability. Since the source deductions are subject to adjustment when the exact amount of tax liability is finally determined, neither the taxpayer nor the government is seriously prejudiced.

If the basic purpose of deduction at source is to enable the low-income taxpayer to meet his tax liability when due, that purpose is substantially achieved by a system of deduction credits which should normally suffice to discharge 80 per cent or more of such liabilities. Allowing for a possible variance of 20 per cent between the actual tax liability and the amount of deductions at source, it should be possible to effect, under a bracket system of deductions, a scale which will very closely approximate 80 to 100 per cent of the taxpayer's liability.

Nor does the use of tax money require the employee to retain a mass of $1, $2, and $5 bills in tax money collected over the period of thirteen weeks preceding each quarterly tax payment. Tax money would be exchangeable at banks for registered tax-anticipation notes in denominations of $20 and upward. These tax-anticipation notes would be stamped in some distinctive manner to indicate their issuance for tax money instead of cash. The exchange of tax money for registered tax-money anticipation certificates, which is desirable, could be compelled by the refusal of the government to accept more than $10 or $20 in tax money in payment of taxes. The reissue of tax money so exchanged would eliminate the printing of billions of dollars of tax money.

Psychologically there will be a material difference in the worker's attitude toward source deductions if such deductions are evidenced in the visible form of tax money. For every dollar that he does not receive in cash, he receives a tangible and usable substitute. His pay envelope contains his full wages, of which a part is paid in government certificates resembling dollar bills that can be used for taxes. Under the circumstances, it becomes difficult to use pay-envelope deductions as the basis for increased wage demands.

This proposal for withholding taxes at the source is not dependent on the adoption of the Ruml plan or any other scheme for dropping or deferring tax liability on last year's income; it is applicable whether or not any such scheme is adopted. On the other hand, it makes it wholly unnecessary to drop or postpone the tax on last year's income in order to put source deduction into effect without the doubling up of two years' taxes in a single year. There is no reason why the tax money received in 1943 cannot be applied to the discharge of tax obligations on 1942 income. With the adoption of this method of deduction at source, it becomes possible to consider all plans for skipping taxes on 1942 incomes on their merits.

Battle of the Factories

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

IN 1942, for the first time in this war, the United Nations' production of war materials surpassed that of the Axis. Such superiority is a prerequisite for victory, but it is not victory itself. Victory presupposes that it be transformed into superiority on the battlefield, and further that this military superiority be utilized for a complete political victory over the Axis, National Socialism, and fascism.

One of the gravest errors of the European democracies before the outbreak of the Second World War was to mistake their industrial potential for actual military strength. Combined, they surpassed Hitler's Germany in resources, but before they could fully exploit these resources Hitler had beaten them and conquered almost the whole Continent; France's "latent resources" were then used to strengthen the German war machine.

Again, before the United States entered the war, the resources of the United Nations far exceeded those of the Axis, but it took the attack on Pearl Harbor and America's declaration of war to transform these latent resources into war materials. The United States can turn out almost twice as much steel as the Axis countries combined, but victory requires that the steel be converted into tanks, machine-guns, and other implements of war. Vital progress in this direction was made in 1942, as a few figures will prove.

The American aircraft factories, whose production had been stepped up considerably before the war broke out, turned out 2,000 planes a month in 1941; in December, 1942—according to the text of President Roosevelt's message to Congress—the figure had jumped to 5,500 a month. In 1941, 50,000 machine-guns were produced in twelve months; in 1942, 670,000. Last year the war production of the United States alone equaled that of all the Axis countries combined and in some fields even exceeded it. If the British and Russian production is added to the American figures, it can be seen how far the United Nations out-produced the Axis.

OUTSTRIPPING THE AXIS IN PRODUCTION

All signs indicate that in 1943 Allied superiority will increase. The reasons are to be found, first, in the further expansion of American production and, second, in the effects of the Russian campaign on Germany. Even now American production has by no means reached its peak; it is estimated that in 1943 arms output will be two-thirds above the 1942 figures. The American armament industry, if it reaches its goals, will have turned out twice as much by the end of this year as the Axis, and the United Nations combined will have produced three times as much as the enemy.

What is said here about America's entire industry is most impressively demonstrated in the case of steel. Already out-producing the Axis countries by a wide margin, the United States by the middle of 1943 will approach a steel-production rate twice that of Germany, Italy, and Japan, according to the report of Donald M. Nelson, chairman of the War Production Board. "Steel is the backbone of war," Mr. Nelson said, "and we are now producing it in the shapes and types to whip the Axis. Both industry and the steel division of the WPB can justly be proud of the record to date." The three Axis nations, he said, have an estimated production of 50,000,000 to 55,000,000 ingot tons annually, whereas this country already is producing at the rate of more than 89,000,000 tons a year, and on completion of the expansion program next summer the figure will rise to about 97,000,000 tons. When the expected rate is achieved next year, the country's steel industry will have increased its output 30,000,000 tons over 1940.

It is not merely the gigantic growth of American production that will permit us so greatly to outstrip the Axis in 1943. Another factor will be the stagnation, or rather the decline, of production in Germany, which is the decisive Axis partner. The effects of the Russian campaign on Germany's industrial as on its military strength are becoming more and more visible. The German military and economic general staffs learned from the experience of the First World War how to utilize German man-power as efficiently as possible. The overwhelming majority of skilled workers remained in the factories from the outbreak of war up to the fall of 1941, and thus war production was maintained at a high level. But after the bloody losses of the Russian campaigns this was no longer possible. The major task facing the German general staff became the defense of the eastern front and, simultaneously, of Fortress Europe. Despite the heavy loss suffered, it seeks to maintain its effective forces at about 8,000,000 men. That means that millions of skilled workers have had to be taken from industry for the army; and of course women, youths, and foreign workers are not adequate substitutes for the men pressed into uniform. The German war machine continues to force all Europe to work for it, but it is unlikely that it can drain more out of Western and Central Europe than it did in 1941 and 1942, especially since the food difficulties in the occupied regions are constantly growing. There remains for the Nazis as the only source of additional strength the more extensive use of whatever Russian regions they may be able to hold.

It must be stressed that the Russian counter-offensive and the United Nations' African campaign have deprived the German military machine of an advantage which it enjoyed in all previous phases of the war—the chance to regroup and reorganize its forces undisturbed. After the Polish campaign in the fall of 1939 Germany had plenty of time to gather its strength for the campaign against France in 1940; after the victory in the west it was again able, in the winter of 1940-41, to concentrate its attention on the offensive against Russia. And even in the fall of 1941 Germany had so strengthened its position against Russia—the defense of Europe was a simple matter at that stage—that it could prepare for the 1942 offensive without much interference.

Today the situation has changed. For the first time since the Second World War started, the initiative has been wrested from the German general staff. All plans for the further industrial exploitation of Europe have been completely upset by the extraordinary offensive power of the Red Army. The defeats in Russia, coupled with the African campaign, are giving Hitler no respite in the winter of 1942-43; he is getting no chance to reorganize his armies or his war production. Thus it is safe to say that during the period in which the United States will increase its production by another two-thirds, German production will at best be maintained at its 1942 level—if it does not sink below it.

Now that the Russians have regained the Maikop oil fields, the German situation will further deteriorate. In addition, the German transportation difficulties will become more serious as Hitler is forced to wage war not only in the east but also for the defense of Fortress Europe, wherever the Anglo-Saxons may attack.

But if Germany's industrial war machine has reached the peak of production, the same cannot be said of Japan. So far Japan has been able to harness to its war machine only a small part of the industries in the immense areas conquered last year; it is just beginning to utilize their resources. The obstacles to their exploitation are tremendous while Japan is at war, for its losses in cargo vessels and warships have been heavy, and communication routes have become extremely tenuous. Thus one may risk the conclusion, without being over-optimistic, that in spite of its military successes, Japan in 1943 will be so heavily engaged that no major increase of its industrial potential through greater exploitation of the conquered regions is likely.

STRENGTH ON THE BATTLEFIELD

I have estimated that in 1943 the war production of the United Nations will become three times that of the Axis. This means not only that the United Nations will have a wide margin in production but also that they are already accumulating much greater arms reserves, although the Axis powers started to produce and store arms so much earlier. Victory, however, while it is prepared in the factories, must be won on the battlefield, and a considerable part of our productive capacity must be used to build the cargo ships to carry arms and troops and the warships to escort the convoys. In 1942 merchant shipping was turned out faster than the goals set by Roosevelt required. On the other hand, the Germans have concentrated on submarine construction in recent months, and our losses remain heavy. The American shipping program for 1943 again calls for a doubling of construction, with a goal of 17,000,000 tons. With a better utilization of tonnage and an increased number of small escort warships, it looks as if the transport problem in 1943 would offer no insurmountable obstacles to the use of American forces in the fight against Hitler.

The number of Americans serving outside the borders of the United States was estimated at 1,500,000 by the President in his last speech, and the speed with which they are being sent abroad is increasing.

The United Nations have clear-cut naval superiority over the Axis. They are beginning to acquire air superiority also, and as American plane production mounts, this air superiority will grow from month to month. But it has been proved in North Africa, and it will be proved again in future operations, that the German armies can be beaten only by an all-out combined attack from the sea, from the air, and on the ground. The task is tremendous, but it can be done. We have learned that "latent" industrial resources do not count while a war is on, and we are therefore converting our reserves into war materials—planes, tanks, and guns. But these same planes, tanks, and guns must be skilfully used in battle. That skill must be acquired, and it can be acquired only by experience. We have overcome the enemy's lead in war production, but the Germans still have the edge on us in military operations because they have had years of practice in coordinating the movements of ships, planes, tanks, and artillery. They will meet the coming attacks by the Allied powers with the knowledge which they have acquired in the fighting in Spain, in Poland, in France, in the Balkans, and in Russia. We shall have to gain our experience in the fighting to come. It is true, of course, that our huge and ever-growing superiority in equipment is a tremendously important factor, but let us realize that we still have to follow a long and bloody path before our superiority in arms production is paralleled by superiority on the battlefield.

LOOK WHAT OUR FELLOWS BROUGHT IN TODAY

A military victory for the United Nations is practically certain. If Hitler could not win in 1942, when the American army was only in the process of formation, when less than a million Americans had been sent abroad and hardly more than 100,000 were at the fronts; if he could not win when America's gigantic industrial plant was still engaged in the shift to war production, then he certainly will not win in 1943, when the American army will number more than 10,000,000, when about 3,000,000 American soldiers will be ready for service outside the United States, and when America's plane production will be twice that of the Axis.

In 1942 the German armies could wage only a limited offensive compared to 1941; they are now on the defensive on all fronts. The African campaign of the Allies can probably be brought to a successful conclusion during the coming spring. After that the concentrated power of America and England will be hurled against Hitler in Europe. Reverses are to be expected at certain points, but they will not influence the general trend.

The Novel Case of Winfred Lynn

BY DWIGHT MACDONALD

LAST June a Negro gardener named Winfred William Lynn was notified by his draft board—Local Board 261 of Jamaica, Long Island—that he had been put into 1-a. He sat down and wrote this letter:

Gentlemen: I am in receipt of my draft-reclassification notice. Please be informed that I am ready to serve in any unit of the armed forces of my country which is not segregated by race. Unless I am assured that I can serve in a mixed regiment and that I will not be compelled to serve in a unit undemocratically selected as a Negro group, I will refuse to report for induction.

Yours respectfully,

WINFRED W. LYNN

This was the beginning of a case which has received almost no publicity, but which is the only legal test that has yet been made of the Jim Crow practices by which the military authorities are violating the spirit if not the letter of the basic law under which the present army is being selected and trained. It is also a case that will raise most important constitutional issues when it comes before the Supreme Court later this year.

That this test is being made at all is entirely due to the fact that Winfred Lynn, in a quiet way, is a very determined person, and that he has a brother, Conrad, not so quiet but equally determined, who happens to be a capable lawyer. Until last December, when Arthur Garfield Hays came into the case as trial lawyer, the Lynn brothers carried on their fight practically alone. Winfred Lynn is, or was, a landscape gardener. For the past twelve years—he is now thirty-six—he has been building up a nice little business putting in trees and shrubbery on Long Island estates. He wasn't much interested in politics, and he had no great quarrel with the economic system—"I'll always get by," he used to say. But he did feel very strongly about one thing—racial discrimination. When war came, he couldn't make any sense out of the contradiction between the theory of a war for democracy and the fact of a Jim Crow army being raised to fight it. Long before he got his 1-a notice, he used to tell Conrad that, regardless of what happened to him, he wasn't going to be a party to such a practice. Many Negroes talked like that. The Lynns are unusual in that they did something about it, and something effective.

The legal basis of Lynn's case is to be found in Section 4(a) of the 1940 Draft Act: "... in the selection and training of men under this act, and in the interpretation and execution of the provisions of this act, there shall be no discrimination against any person on account of race or color." To the layman this would seem explicitly to outlaw Jim Crow in the army. Actually, as everyone knows, Negroes are segregated in all-colored units in this war as they were in the last. The only relaxation of the color line is in the case of officers of Negro units, whom the army permits to be white—in fact, rather insists on it. General Hershey, director of Selective Service, has summed it up:

The act says there is to be no discrimination. But the act also says that no man may come into the army who is not acceptable to the army. The navy, of course, is worse, and the marines will not accept Negro applicants. I regret this state, but unfortunately the army gets the final say. What we are doing, of course, is simply transferring discrimination from everyday life into the army. Men who make up the army staff have the same ideas as they had before they went into the army.

The Lynn case does not directly raise the question of discrimination in training, but only of discrimination in the selection of draftees. The two are, of course, closely intertwined, both in the wording of the Draft Act itself and in actual practice. In all draft districts with a sizable Negro population, including Local 261 of Jamaica, there are separate quotas for Negroes and whites, despite Section 4(a) and despite the official Selective Service Regulations, which direct that "in classifying a registrant there shall be no discrimination for or against him because of his race, creed, or color." But separate quotas are obviously necessary if the army has separate training facilities, since otherwise too many or too few of one or the other race would constantly be arriving at the camps. Therefore, the New York Selective Service Headquarters begins its periodic calls for men: "(1) Your quota for this call is the first — white men and the first — Negro men who are in Class 1-a." Since it is in practice rarely possible to draw on the two racial quotas in exactly equal ratios, the Lynns contend that discrimination exists, the speed with which a man is called up depending on his race as well as on his draft number.

The history of the Lynn case may be told briefly. Three months after receiving his 1-a classification, and after the local board had failed to persuade him to change his stand, Winfred Lynn was notified to report for induction on September 18. He failed to do so, and two months later he was indicted by a federal grand jury on charges of draft evasion. (Conrad believes the long delays were due to the fact that Washington was not entirely certain how to deal with the case and hoped that Winfred could somehow be persuaded to "listen to reason.") On November 16 Winfred appeared before Judge Abruzzo, pleaded not guilty, and was held in $2,500 bail. The next day Conrad asked for a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that his brother was being illegally detained, since the method of his induction was contrary to Section 4(a) of the Draft Act. Judge Abruzzo granted the writ, and the date of the hearing was set—after more postponements—for December 4. The day before the hearing Colonel Campbell Johnson, a Negro aide on General Hershey's staff, came up from Washington and spent an afternoon trying to get Conrad to drop the case. The hearing was held before Federal Judge Mortimer Byers, who took his seat on the bench, read part of the petition, and then said: "I have here the writ of habeas corpus, the return to the writ, and the traverse. Writ dismissed." When Mr. Hays, who had entered the case the day before, expressed surprise that the judge should dismiss the writ before any arguments had been heard—apparently an almost unprecedented action—Judge Byers replied he would hear no man who had refused induction into the army. Hays went on talking and made quite a long and spirited speech, all of which was in flagrant contempt of court. The judge refrained from making an issue of it, however, and adjourned court after Hays stopped talking. The importance the army attaches to the case, incidentally, was shown by the fact that the prosecution's table was crowded with officers attending as observers.

In order to get a court test on the main issue rather than on the tangential question of whether a draftee could bring habeas corpus action while resisting induction, Hays and Conrad Lynn persuaded the extremely reluctant Winfred to submit to induction. The fact that he is now in the army does not change the case, since habeas corpus has jurisdiction even over the armed forces; it is the one area of civil law that applies there. The only difference is that it is now Winfred Lynn's colonel, instead of his jailer, who is being charged with illegal restraint of his freedom. On January 4 there was another hearing, before a more sympathetic judge, but with the same upshot: writ dismissed. The judge pointed out that although Colonel McDermott, draft director for New York City, had shown by his testimony that separate Negro and white quotas did exist, this was not proof that Lynn had been called out of his turn or, in fact, that he had not been called later than his turn. To which Hays retorted that the Draft Act is based on the theory that it is a privilege, not a penalty, to serve one's country, and that if Lynn was called up late, he was still being discriminated against. This argument did not impress the judge.

The case now goes to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, where it is expected to land early in March, and after that to the Supreme Court. Since habeas corpus cases must be specially expedited, it will probably reach the highest court before the end of the year. Conrad Lynn was recently drafted himself, and his brother's case is now being handled by Mr. Hays and the American Civil Liberties Union.

The Lynn case may turn out to be one of the most important ever argued before the Supreme Court. It raises two big issues:

1. Is segregation in itself discrimination? Webster defines "segregation" as "a separation from others" and quotes in illustration William Wetmore Story's judgment: "The very name of ghetto, signifying segregation and disjunction, is opprobrious." The United States Supreme Court thinks otherwise, however. The line of its decisions in all the classic Jim Crow cases, beginning with Plessy v. Ferguson in 1895 and continuing through Mitchell v. United States in 1941, has been that segregation is not in itself discriminatory so long as equivalent facilities, whether in transportation or schools, are provided for Negroes and whites. Writing the majority opinion in Gaines v. Canada (1938), a case erroneously hailed by liberals at the time as a gain, Chief Justice Hughes summarized the traditional doctrine: "The admissibility of laws separating the races in the enjoyment of privileges afforded by the state rests wholly upon the equality of the privileges which the laws give to the separated groups within the state." The novelty of the Lynn case is that it brings up to the court for the first time the question of segregation practiced not by Southern states but by the federal government itself. Jim Crow is integrated so closely into the present social system of the South that it is not surprising that the court, even in its current liberalist phase, has not ventured to disturb it. But it will be quite a different thing to sanction the practice when it is applied by the federal government itself on a national scale to an army drawn mostly from areas where legalized Jim Crow has never existed. "Our Constitution is color-blind," wrote Justice Harlan in his great dissent in the Plessy case. Whether this was a hope or a statement of fact will become clearer when the court decides the Lynn case.

2. Is a Jim Crow army compatible with a war alleged to be fought for democratic aims? The fact that nothing was said in the last war's draft laws about racial discrimination, while this time Congress voted Section 4(a) into the law, indicates both a general awareness of the paradox of a Jim Crow army fighting against Nazi racialism and also the gains the Negroes have made since 1917. There are plenty of legalistic ways in which the court can decide against Lynn: it can reaffirm the doctrine that segregation is not discrimination; it can hold that his interests have not been injured by separate draft quotas, since when he was finally inducted he naturally had a lower draft number than whites inducted at the same time; it can even declare Section 4(a) unconstitutional because it interferes with the control the military authorities must have over civilian rights in training a war-time army (that is, it would interfere if it were respected). On the other hand, even the most legalistic jurist must be concerned with the army's present policy of spreading the poison of racial discrimination among millions of draftees from outside the South. When the veterans of our Jim Crow army come back after the war, Negroes and whites alike indoctrinated with mutual hostility by the very conditions of their military life, the effects on our society will not be pretty.

Furthermore, an adverse decision will be politically inexpedient in view of the present state of mind of Negroes. It is significant that although the Lynn case has hardly been mentioned in the national press, it has been front-page news in Negro papers all over the country. When Winfred Lynn went to Camp Upton, his fellow-soldiers knew all about the case and insisted on doing his military chores for him. Another Lynn brother, in training down South, was asked by his white captain whether he was related to "this fellow Lynn that's making so much trouble"—which shows that those on the other side of the fence know about the case too. According to Conrad Lynn, at least six Negroes in his brother's draft district have followed his example, without having the means to make a legal test or to do much of anything, in fact, except go to jail when it comes to that. He also asserts that a large number of Negroes just don't show up when summoned for induction, and that the authorities usually prefer not to do anything about it. The whole question has been smoldering beneath the surface. The Lynn case brings it out into the open and forces a showdown on whether the 1940 Draft Act means what it says.

In the Wind

VANCE MUSE of Houston, Texas, secretary-treasurer of the Christian American Association, reports that the purpose of Senator O'Daniel's recent speech before the Arkansas legislature was to force passage of anti-strike legislation patterned after that of Texas. "We have to our credit the forcing through of this bill in the Mississippi legislature," he said. "We are trying to do the same thing in Arkansas, and will go to bat on it until we get called down for it."

POLITICAL FORECAST: The Cross and the Flag, magazine of Gerald L. K. Smith's America First Party, is worried about the next Republican candidate for the Presidency. "Governor Harold Stassen associates with the most brazen internationalists in America," it says. "Stassen is the man who led the Willkie stampede at Philadelphia, and it is generally believed the internationalists will turn to him in case they're unable to nominate Willkie in 1944."

FLORIDA FRUIT GROWERS are doing their bit to promote racial harmony by refusing to hire white farm workers, according to the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union. The union charges that plans are under way to import Bahamians for the harvest, on the theory that they can be more easily exploited than either white or Negro Americans.

THE BELGIAN CREW of a merchant steamer was not allowed to go ashore when the ship recently docked at an American port, because a case of para-typoid was said to have occurred among the passengers. However, all the passengers were allowed to leave the ship.

THE OHIO Farm Bureau Federation reports that farmers in that state are divided on the question of hiring village youth as farm workers. About half of them favor the idea; the other half believe more would be lost than gained.

JOHN A. ROHAN, an Irish Catholic, was presented with a scroll by the congregation of Temple Israel in St. Louis on his resignation after forty-seven years as baritone soloist with its choir.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Beveridge and the Bourbons

BY S. K. RATCLIFFE

London, January

THE Beveridge Report has made a remarkable difference in the outlook of England. Whatever may be the situation as regards government policy or effort after the social-security scheme has undergone a first test in Parliament, one thing at least seems clear—that the people are now provided with a national plan which must be everywhere eagerly debated. Political warfare as conducted in the past has not sufficiently taken into account the demagogic totalitarian charge that the "pluto-democracies" are unable to end unemployment and other social injustices. The Beveridge plan provides a new and sharper weapon. In reply to the question, What are we fighting for? some millions of people have already begun to say, Well, at any rate we mean to get security of life and work, and this looks like the real thing! What Sir William Beveridge offers is "a plan to win freedom from want by maintaining incomes." So much the simplest citizen can comprehend.

The plan has had an extraordinary press. The newspapers, long starved of inspiring material, were prepared for a resounding send-off, and Beveridge for several days was accorded a place from which not even the retreat of Rommel could dislodge him. No small part of this triumph, of course, was due to sheer merit. The Report is not unique among government papers on account of literary quality, for many of our bluebooks are uncommonly well written. But it stands alone by a combination of excellences—intellectual grasp, fine temper, and sound and animated writing which is blessed by freedom from jargon. They are saying in London that Winston Churchill was captured by the document, and a large public is thoroughly in accord with him.

For this surprising enterprise a new technique was devised. The government did not appoint a commission of inquiry on the usual pattern: that is, a group of acceptable men and women such as, in the past, were too often made use of for the burial of an insistent problem. Instead of that, we had Sir William Beveridge (on the initiative of Arthur Greenwood, when a member of the War Cabinet two years ago) intrusted with the task of going over the established social services—admittedly an amazing jungle—and shaping a new scheme, with the aid of certain departmental experts whose functions were no more than advisory. Hence the Report is the work of one man, and it bears his signature alone. He is not in the government or in Parliament. At one time a member of the civil service, he is now the head of an Oxford college. Over thirty years ago he became known through a pioneer analysis of unemployment, and then made a distinguished record in food control during the last war. If nominations for the work he has just completed had been invited from, let us say, a dozen recognized authorities in the field, Beveridge would have been assured of the top place; and this estimate of his qualifications has now been justified to the world.

"A revolutionary moment in the world's history is a time for revolutions, not for patching." So says Sir William, and his plan is certainly not a patch. But then, neither is it in any sense revolutionary. It is a spacious and ably proportioned remodeling of the social fabric which in Britain has been a-building for more than thirty years. There is no break with the recent past, even in the important matter of form. Every principle of the existing social services is maintained, with unmistakable emphasis upon one characteristic feature. "The capacity and the desire of British people," we read, "to contribute for security are among the most certain and most impressive social facts of today." That is incontestable; and therefore contributions from the citizen are an integral part of all the benefits proposed—unemployment pay, workers' compensation, medical aid, pensions. (There is, however, one exception—family allowances; these, being new, are to come out of general taxation.) The primary aim is unification and comprehensiveness, and to that end a single weekly contribution out of earnings is enjoined. The proposed size of this contribution has caused surprise. It is, of course, inseparable from a higher minimum-wage standard.

The plan is altogether for social security, not for national reconstruction. Sir William Beveridge was not instructed to produce a blueprint for the new Britain. It was, for instance, no part of his duty to discover the cure for mass unemployment. His terms of reference were strictly limited to the social services; and he interpreted these first of all in relation to the abolition of want; in other words, the removal of the great evil and scandal which every great modern country ought to have been able to remove in the years of peace. England, he holds, might have done it before the present war, and will be able to allow it when peace returns.

The acceptance of the Report throughout the country is a phenomenon no less striking than the initial acclaim. The representatives of the welfare agencies are unanimous. Church leaders are eloquent in praise. Progressive organizations on all sides are of like mind. The Liberal Party, small though still influential, is wholehearted. The Trades Union Congress is hardly less unqualified in approval—a fact, by the way, which throws light upon the essential character of the political party which is built upon, and directed by, the great labor unions. The Labor daily paper says in effect: Of course the Beveridge plan is not socialism, or near-socialism, but it is an indispensable measure of benefit for all which must be taken with gratitude. Left-wing antagonism is negligible. The British people are resolved upon social security; and increasingly they view the attack upon want as a first step toward that national minimum of work, income, and welfare which is now deemed to be the right common aim of a civilized society.

But will the scheme be opposed, variously and perhaps with cumulative energy? Undoubtedly it will. The political Bourbons and their allies, the powerful reactionary elements, are holding themselves in for the present. They could not afford to go on record as resisting the will of the nation as a whole. But needless to say, a general assault is being quietly organized. G. D. H. Cole, who with his customary skill and speed has written a brief popular exposition of the plan, is among the first to sound the note of warning. We must expect, he says, a renewal of the tactics of delay and frustration, in Parliament and elsewhere. And here, as in so many other theaters of war, 1943 is the crucial year. The political intelligence and practical sense of the British people are about to be tested, and that in relation to a project of public welfare which, in the judgment of our ablest and wisest, can be built into the national system, with incalculable benefit to the rest of the world. The central query, of course, has to do with our Tories, the extreme right wing which hitherto has so effectually prevented their party from being transformed into a progressive conservative force. We may take it for granted that these people will mobilize in force. And yet there can be no difficulty in arguing that if they had taken in the governing facts of their own situation and destiny, they would welcome Beveridge with both hands. But when have the Bourbons been able to see and comprehend?

Meanwhile, there are a few things that can be stated without qualification. Parliament in the near future will carry a measure of social security, Beveridge's or another. As the work must be done by the present House of Commons, since we may not indulge in the luxury of a wartime election, the danger is that the Cabinet may seek to get by with a limited device of extension and departmental adjustment. There is to be a nation-wide movement of public education, and pro-Beveridge opinion will be steadily organized. But the advocates of the plan will not underrate the central obstacle—a coalition government still crushed down by the burden of the war.

De Gaulle's Program

[In the first press conference he has held for nine months General de Gaulle on February 9 came out for the immediate restoration of the laws of the Republic in North Africa. We publish herewith the greater part of the interview as it was cabled from London by the French National Committee.]

DE GAULLE: It has seemed to me that, in the present circumstances, it was desirable for us to make contact, for the serious matters under way concerning France give rise to many interpretations, not always very exact, and sometimes a bit misleading. . . .

Rather than give weighty statements prepared in advance, I prefer that you ask me questions. I shall answer them to the best of my ability and, I assure you, very frankly.

Question: What will be General Catroux's first task on his arrival in Algiers?

De Gaulle: General Catroux has been sent to Algiers by the French National Committee to establish contact, on the one hand, with General Giraud and, on the other, with the French and the natives of North Africa. General Catroux will examine the possibilities of establishing a satisfactory liaison between the National Committee and the existing organization in French North Africa. The published reports of his mission are an example of the false news of which I just spoke—in certain papers one has read that General Catroux was going to accept a position in the present administration of North Africa. I am convinced that common sense will have given the lie to this.

Question: What do you think of General Giraud's last statement announcing that he was assuming complete control over all French Africa?

De Gaulle: We have read his statement very attentively. The opinion of the National Committee is that in one respect it satisfies the demands of Fighting France. That is in the fact that for the first time in three months a few effective provisions for liberty are made in that unhappy country. We can greet this accomplishment with some satisfaction. As to the basic point, that is, the structure of the North African set-up, we think, as we have always said, that it can only be considered temporary and artificial. French business, French administration, French authority need a legitimate basis—well, there exist two legitimate bases. One is guilty and detested Vichy. The other is the Republic. In General Giraud's declaration and the decree which followed it we hoped to discover what the basis was to be. We were unable to. Is it Vichy, or is it the Republic?

Question: When you saw General Giraud and spoke to him of repudiating Vichy, is it true that Giraud refused to do so for the present and in time to come?

De Gaulle: I regret to say that the conversation which I had with General Giraud was not explicit enough for this point to be really clarified. . . . I believe that in the minds of the great majority of Frenchmen liberation means both to drive out the enemy and to reestablish the Republic. . . . You are not unaware that Fighting France has been able to bring into the war a considerable part of the French empire. We have reestablished there the laws of the Republic, purely and simply. I do not think that anyone has heard of disturbance or confusion in the French empire governed by Fighting France. . . .

Question: On what basis could you reach an agreement with General Giraud?

De Gaulle: What we wish and what France wishes is not an agreement between two generals. That does not count. The serious matter of North Africa has often been represented as having become a personal rivalry between two generals. I think that is ridiculous. The question is infinitely more serious. It is a question of the union of the empire belonging to France, a union pledged to liberate France and achieve the aims it has chosen. These aims have been established by the nation's will since September 3, 1939. . . . I tell you very frankly that one of the facts which has most complicated this North African affair is the exclusion of Fighting France from the conception, preparation, and execution of this "union." I am convinced that people in France have been very much surprised by this.

Question: On what basis could the union of the empire be realized?

De Gaulle: I believe that if in North Africa, as in the rest of the empire, the laws of the Republic were applied, if, in particular, liberties were restored there—the liberty of the press, of the individual, of assembly, and of opinion—very little time would pass before those very liberties and the public opinion engendered by them would effect a union. . . .

Question: Were you able to lay your program before General Giraud, Mr. Churchill, and President Roosevelt?

De Gaulle: I did not fail to make known these truths to General Giraud. I had the opportunity to speak of them to President Roosevelt, and I wish to say here that in him I recognized a very great statesman and a man who has a higher aim in this war, finally, may I add, a man who is something of a mystic; I think that is a very valuable quality in this war of ideals. As for Mr. Churchill, we have been waging this war side by side for two and a half years, and I do not think that it would have served any purpose to tell him what he knew already.

Question: What plan of union was proposed by General Giraud?

De Gaulle: I think that General Giraud's entourage first had the opinion that it would be fitting for Fighting France to merge into the system that has been set up in North Africa. . . . We are told, "Let us unite and eschew politics." Gentlemen, is there a single state in the world today which is waging war for anything but a political purpose? Why do you suppose the French people are making war, fighting and suffering, if not for a politique? This includes, as I said, liberation—that is, the defeat of the enemy—the Republic, and the aims common to the United Nations.

Question: If the reestablishment of the laws of the Republic were accepted for North Africa, should you see a means of uniting Fighting France and the North African administration?

De Gaulle: If the laws of the Republic are accepted, there remains simply the matter of putting them into execution. For example, in Algeria the general councils are qualified, in a situation like today's, to decide on the general administration of Algeria. This is a very important first point. Eventually, in the absence of any Parliament, it will be easy to set up an Advisory National Council, including the representatives elected to the general councils, deputies and senators, elected representatives of the economic interests, the Chambers of Commerce, agriculture, etc., elected representatives of the trade unions, and elected representatives of Frenchmen in foreign countries. This Advisory National Council could serve as a temporary central power; I myself have proposed it since the first day. In a democracy authority derives from suffrage or, at least, from the consent of the people subject to this authority, and I do not believe that the Algiers set-up has taken that into account. The authority of the French National Committee is applied to people who have rallied to it. . . .

Question: Will the names of the members of the Giraud mission be submitted beforehand to the French National Committee?

De Gaulle: I do not know. . . . The principle of the liaison has been adopted by both parties. We desire it equally, and this liaison will be established. It is now a matter of studying how it will function, and that is one of the purposes of General Catroux's mission. . . .

De Gaulle: . . . Gentlemen, there is a last word which I should like to say to you, a word of optimism. I believe that this entire question of North Africa is very important, not only from a military point of view but from the point of view of public opinion everywhere. It is a sort of test of how the United Nations are going to apply the principles for which they are united and are waging war. The confusion in North Africa has given to the Allied operations there a tragi-comic aspect, made them appear a sort of vaudeville, vaudeville spattered with blood. I believe, on the whole—and you perhaps share my impression—that all this will not be very serious provided that from now on proper emphasis is placed on the dignity of France and the ideals for which the United Nations are fighting. In any case, whatever the vicissitudes, everyone knows that France will continue to fight as long as she can.

STOP AT KIEV!

Until now it has been wonderful. It was both inspiring and comforting to watch the Russians fight with an efficiency that gave the other powers a chance to devote to the creation of a North African front the careful thought such a major enterprise required. There was no need to put any limit on the general applause. Of course the people of the left, the anti-fascists of twenty years' standing, had to be restrained in their enthusiasm over Russia's victories; any excess on their part would deliver them into the hands of Mr. Dies. But bankers, conservative columnists, and other respectable people might carry their Russophilia as far as they liked.

Now things have changed. The Russians are going too fast. These same respectable people begin to wonder whether there is not at least a shadow of truth in Hitler's warning of the threatened bolshevization of the Continent. Let the Russians go on dying for freedom—but not too near the frontiers of Western Europe. If Stalin duly appreciates the good opinion of the best people, he must now exhibit a talent for moderation. He must know where to stop. Kiev would seem to be the indicated point. There he should wait modestly until the opening of a European second front can reestablish a decent balance of power.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

AS THE final catastrophe at Stalingrad drew nearer and nearer, Goebbels's department seemed to develop a kind of schizophrenia. For weeks it has strained after two directly opposite results—to whip up the people and at the same time to calm them. The orders given to the propaganda office must have been something like this:

1. Dwell with brutal emphasis on the defeat at Stalingrad. Forestall the enemy's celebration of it and demonstrate our own honesty.

2. Play down other defeats on the Russian front. Use vague circumlocutions such as "strategic movements according to plan."

3. Distil the utmost national pride and illusion of superiority out of the "heroes of Stalingrad." Never in history was there such a glorious struggle. Only the Nazi army among the armies of all countries and all times has been able to create such an "immortal myth for future ages." Thermopylae and even the Nibelungenlied pale by comparison.

4. Make the situation appear extremely alarming. The "storm from Asia" cannot be held back unless there is total mobilization and the prevailing "comfortableness and laziness" are throttled. Advertise the new throttling measures furiously. The people themselves "cry out" for them, and they cry for greater haste.

5. Do not go into the reasons for the military crisis. The Russians, quite simply, are colossally strong. Why their strength was not reckoned with is not to be discussed.

6. Give two simple reasons why a change for the better is certain. The Russians have already thrown in their last reserves. Germany, however, is only now, with the start of total mobilization, putting forth its gigantic strength.

In a hectic furioso this mixture of themes has been elaborated for weeks, almost to the exclusion of any other. The effect has undoubtedly not corresponded to the expenditure of effort. We know from various sources that defeatism, or at least apathy, is spreading rapidly.

The anti-Bolshevik line is worked to the limit not only for foreign consumption but for the home audience as well. It was Germany that Herr Fritzsche—in a medium-wave broadcast on February 2—warned of the Soviet lust, "as in the time of the great migrations and the Mongol hordes, to overrun Europe, to destroy its civilization, to root up its people in order to obtain slave labor for the Siberian tundras." It may be that in evoking the fear of bolshevism the Nazis count on awakening an inclination for peace abroad. But at home they seek to whip up the war spirit. Without doubt Dr. Goebbels believes the Germans have a sharp distaste for bolshevism.

And that has led him to a slight shift that is worth noting. The objection must have been raised that the conquest of Germany by the Bolsheviks is not to be seriously feared since the Allies would never permit Stalin to establish himself in Germany. So you think they would not permit it? answered Herr Fritzsche of the Propaganda Ministry, and came forward with a new story. "We have always doubted," he said, "that England and the United States were in any position to save Germany and Europe from bolshevism. After England declared war, we knew that the plutocracies lacked not only the power but the will to do so. . . . And now we have received new proof of the intention of the plutocracies to deliver Europe over to bolshevism. In a number of North American newspapers, among others in the New York Herald Tribune and also in the Washington Tribune (sic), there appeared yesterday an article by Constantine Brown. From it we learn that the Americans now believe Soviet rule over all Europe to be the best solution obtainable. Mr. Brown declares he would not be surprised if the Soviets pushed on to the Atlantic and the Mediterranean and extended their rule as far as the Persian Gulf. This Constantine Brown of Washington belongs to Mr. Roosevelt's circle of friends and does not think up these things by himself. . . ."

This fearful story was invented, we must remember, to stiffen the resistance of the Germans.

File and Remember

The Choice Before Labor

MR. MORRISON, before he entered the War Cabinet, spoke some brave words about the need for audacity. Will he and his fellow-ministers make Mr. Churchill realize that the need is for audacity today? Will they realize that the politics of reconstruction are not an elegant minuet in which the forms are composed by the Central Office of the Conservative Party but a grim fight for mass well-being in which the forces of privilege, as always, will forget the duty to be magnanimous in the degree that they emerge from danger? Above all, perhaps, will the Labor Party and its leaders understand in time that if they cannot prove before hostilities have ceased the capacity of parliamentary democracy to make great changes by consent, they will have lost the peace before the victory itself is attained?

It is essential for the Labor Party to realize two things: it is important to Mr. Churchill to have its support only until the enemy is beaten; after that, as the Prime Minister who has won the victory, he will be able to make his own majority unless the country is convinced that Labor has the courage of its convictions—and that courage the Labor Party can only prove itself to possess by insisting that the decisions of these next months are not the quarter-measures the 1922 Committee desires, but are born of a policy proportionate to the revolutionary position in which we find ourselves. That is the way to win the confidence of the electorate. It is also the way to win the respect of Mr. Churchill.

It was intelligible that Labor should make the maintenance of the Churchill government its first consideration when the life of the nation was at stake. It is not intelligible, and it is not intelligent, for the Labor Party to make this maintenance its first consideration if the price of its maintenance is a refusal to consider that renovation of the basis of our social and economic life which the party itself, in each annual conference since the war, has declared the indispensable condition for the survival of British democracy after the war. It is not the theorists of the party, not its extremists, but its National Executive, which has won the approval of all sections of the party for the view that this renovation must be set on foot during the war itself, and that it must be a wholesale renovation. In these months, when vital decisions are to be taken, the rank and file of the party, and the electorate at large, have a criterion by which to test the sincerity of its leaders. Either they really meant what they asked the conference to affirm, or their recommendations were an empty gesture akin to that rhetoric of the last war which bred the cynicism of the inter-war years.—HAROLD LASKI in the Tribune (London).

Defeat in Victory

It would be a crushing defeat for all the United Nations if, after victory in war, they found themselves defeated by post-war problems. The year 1943 must see steps taken to insure the continued cooperation of the United Nations after the war, for without that the war will have been lost, as mankind will be the prey of any future aggressor, and an even deadlier struggle will engulf the peoples of the world.

The peoples are entitled to demand, before the present struggle ends, that they should know how it is proposed to prevent war in the future. They are also entitled to ask how international economic cooperation, envisaged in the lend-lease agreement, is to be achieved. Without this, nations, even the greatest of them, will live in the twilight of poverty. Then, again, each nation must begin to reorder its own life, on the fundamental assumptions that it is freed from the fear of war and that it will enjoy its proper share of what the world produces.—ARTHUR GREENWOOD in Reynolds' News (London).

Cripps on Planning

It is timely to emphasize, as Sir Stafford Cripps did yesterday, the organic character of the processes by which peace must be achieved and made secure. He spoke of the way in which the United Nations had been led by the necessities of war to plan and organize the passage of vital supplies all over the world—to neutral as well as to belligerent countries. These responsibilities cannot be canceled by a stroke of the pen when hostilities cease: indeed, the re provisioning and rehabilitation of the occupied areas of Europe after their liberation have already been accepted as a joint task of the United Nations. Elsewhere such bodies as the Middle Eastern Supply Center have created a habit of economic planning for vast areas and a machinery to carry it out which can certainly not be discarded after the war, whatever forms they may ultimately assume. War-time controls of transport by sea and air on a worldwide scale and of railway communications across national frontiers may be a starting-point for those comprehensive international agreements which will be urgently required when peace comes. These and other instances are pointers to what may be achieved if the transition from war to peace is governed by a determination that war weariness shall not be allowed to blunt the keenness of common endeavor. But it will not be achieved by men who, in Sir Stafford Cripps's words, "are afraid to face the future or lack the courage to make the new sacrifices necessary for a lasting peace."—The Times (London).

The U-Boat War

Hitler's fate hangs upon the U-boat, as, in fact, does ours. We cannot possibly achieve victory unless we can keep the seas open for our shipping. . . .

Naval dockyards and all suitable merchant shipbuilding yards have been turned over to the assembly of U-boats. The German press gives great publicity to this drive, which it does not hesitate to describe as "a major and perhaps decisive campaign of the war." Doubts are sometimes expressed as to the ability of Germany to provide crews for the U-boats she is building in such numbers. It would be unwise to rest any hope on this. Training proceeds intensively. There is said to be no lack of volunteers; even if there were, the German authorities have their methods, and can produce crews with sufficient rapidity so that even if they come to grief they will first have helped to sink some ships.—LORD WINSTER in the Manchester Guardian.

BOOKS and the ARTS

CHARLES PÉGUY

BY PAUL ROSENFELD

CHARLES PÉGUY, whom many Frenchmen consider their great national poet; whom a progressive cardinal has commended by prefacing selections from his verse and prose: Pégué, the Christian Revolutionary, was a publisher, a pamphleteer, an original, often salty, and powerful writer, a prophetic spokesman of the ideal in France in the years prior to World War I. He preached the goodness of truth, justice, poverty (not destitution), the honor of work, and all which seems conformable to the dignity of man and eternal law. One of the heroic and most engaging individuals of our unluckiest epoch, he preached and practiced these ideals passionately, with joy, with irony, with a "deep, great, genuine sincerity," and practically in solitude.

The idealism he championed, the sporting, free action in the constant presence of the eternal good, Pégué called mysticism. The enemy was politics, lust for power; politics and its offspring, the exploitative, unfaithful, all-prostituting modern world. Pégué attacked its representatives with unrelenting vehemence. Prophet-like, Old Testament-wise, he even placed certain of his poetic messages of exhortation and instruction in the mouth of the divinity. Ostensibly these proclamations are delivered by an inspired character in his dramatic "Mysteries," a wandering nun. What we seem to face is none the less the godhead preaching like a peasant patriarch, with Pégué's characteristic hearty warmth.

He was a descendant of peasants and artisans in the country about Orléans, and born at Orléans in 1873. His father, who had fought in the Franco-Prussian war, died during his infancy, and two women reared him—his grandmother, an illiterate peasant who taught him the French language, and his mother, who supported the family by mending chairs. The boy learned to read sitting beside his mother while she plied her trade. He liked to work; wanted to teach; won a scholarship which took him to Paris, first to a college, then to the school for professors. Romain Rolland and Henri Bergson were among his masters, and Bergson's philosophy thrilled him and made him lifelong a fervent Bergsonian. This was not fortuitous. Pégué was immensely sanguine by nature: in all his despairs and disillusionments constantly in touch with some ground of happy expectation; convinced that what he desired was obtainable. His deepest idea—it is the content of his most original poem, the sublime "Porch of the Second Virtue"—was an image of a Creator not only the locus of hope but Himself full of expectancy. The philosopher, in depicting life as a domain of perpetual movement, uninterrupted impulsion, growth in variety, profound liberty, had rationalized an archetype in his scholar's subconscious mind.

At Orléans Pégué had become an active Socialist. Human misery assailed him. He thought a revolution abolishing destitution would relieve it, and during his university days collected money for and participated in strikes. While considering himself an atheist, in leisure hours he worked on a vast dramatization of a saint's life, that of the Maid of Orléans. He never graduated, quit the Normale to marry. At the instigation of Socialist leaders he set up a party bookshop opposite the Sorbonne. Disillusionment followed, an anguished experience of solitude. The years were those of the second, the "political," half of the Dreyfus case. The first half, a "mystic" action, had been a struggle for pure justice. Pégué had formed a friendship with Bernard Lazare, the unhappy Major's original defender. Bernard Lazare had been an incarnation of the idealism he adored. Now he found himself among leaders in the forum and university who were betraying the really revolutionary impulse in exploiting it for personal and party ends. Careerists were letting it butter their bread, converting it into a hateful anti-religious movement, striving to erect a counter-religion of the state.

For the little prophet, the revolution could not occur ethically. He withdrew to another shop to found the Fortnightly Notebooks, a periodical which appeared irregularly, and meagerly supported him and his small family. Under introductions by himself from 1900 onward it published writings for "all who are poor, cultured, free"; socially idealistic novels, dramas, essays, poems; Romain Rolland, the brothers Tharaud, the tetchy Julien Benda. Complete freedom of expression was permitted the contributors. The format was aesthetic; the proofs, which the editor carefully read and reread, flawless. But while his publication of Rolland's "Beethoven" created what Pégué called "a moral fortune" for the Notebooks, the number of subscribers never exceeded eight or nine hundred. Readers found his own prose unattractive. It was chronically digressive, and liturgical in style: obstinately iterative, massy, slowly propulsive. The closest English parallel to its style actually is that of the young Gertrude Stein, the Stein of "Three Lives" and portions of "The Making of Americans."

His spiritual evolution, moreover, cost Pégué old friends at the rate at which it gained him new ones. The splendid series of his own rhapsodic pamphlets had commenced with polemics against the tyrannies of the political modern world; a schematization of an ideal society curiously like the anarchist commune; philosophic attacks on the Sorbonne's philistine rationalistic theories. Surprisingly on the morrow of the German threat to France in 1905 there appeared his simply lyrical "Notre Patrie." It was a confession of patriotism which shocked pacifists, internationalists, socialists. Pégué had discovered mysticism at the root of the revolutionary French republic; at the basis of the hard and honestly working French common man. He demanded that the nation of the conscripts of 1793 endure. Unacceptable to pacifists, this patriotism proved equally disagreeable to nationalists. It was ethical, unfanatical. All in all, France was dear to Pégué as a representative of the unity of culture. Among the elements of that unity, with antiquity and Christianity, was Judaism.

Rumor has it that this inclusion of the Jew eventually cost him a valued alliance with old Georges Sorel. A second "conversion" alienated further allies, recent Catholic converts such as young Jacques Maritain. This was Péguy's reconciliation with Catholic Christianity, exhibited in the poetic "Mysteries" celebrating sainthood and Jeanne d'Arc. Behind humanity's ideals doubtless he had long felt the incitation of an eternally living principle; finally recognized his ancestors' God in this and in Christianity a complete expression of mysticism. The trouble was that Péguy's Catholicism, a religion of the heart, seemed less than orthodox. The outsider would appear to know why. It displayed affinities with radical Protestantism. Péguy not only rejected the idea of human damnation; liberally he stressed the doctrine of the incarnation, the doctrine of the insertion of the eternal in the temporal; and in its extension this tenet coincides with optimism. Besides, though he prayed heavily in churches, he did not go to Mass.

A criticism of his work appeared in 1909 in the lately founded Nouvelle Revue Française. It was the first he received. An article by Gide warmly commended his "Mystères." But Péguy had wished to influence young France, which flocked to other chairs—those of Maurras the royalist, Barrès the nationalist, the sadistic Claudel. Horrible professors anonymously attacked him. He was scarcely with honor in his country when he fell in the Battle of the Marne. Promptly his fame began spreading. It steadily continued growing amid the later fermentation of fascism and Marxist communism. A small literature developed around his personality and productions, and he has profited by the discipleship of a man of genius, the novelist Bernanos. His following has been recruited from all classes and persuasions, but school teachers and soldiers appear to form its core. They have been won, it is said, by Péguy's unflinching integrity and clarification of the reason beneath their loyalty to their republic. The present English-French anthology* of his prose and verse comes as a sign of his ever-waxing fame.

It is certain to extend it; it gives evidence of the fact of the complete transference of a heroic stature to the printed page. "Basic Verities," true, is handicapped by its gossipy and immaterial preface and the inexpertness of the translation. Péguy wrote in a racy, personal, but consistent idiom which he had evolved from the language of workers and peasants. Jerky in its combination of classic and colloquial English, the Greens' equivalent sometimes reads like a schoolboy Latin translation. But the selections have been thoughtfully assembled. As their center they project Péguy's opposition of mysticism to politics; and of all his feats this is the one of greatest moment. We cannot but regret the omission of certain glorious pages of his—notably those in "Notre Jeunesse," the resonant pamphlet of 1910, which portray Bernard Lazare. Still we are certain that within the given limits no fairer representation could have been achieved: through the whole there does transpire Péguy's achievement of the quality which makes writing great. One not only means that he evinced a "deep, great, genuine sincerity"; handled ideas simply; again and again attained a plenitude of sound and sense. One means even more, and even more than that he produced passage upon passage through which "the great fact of existence" becomes great to us again. One means that in his verbal matter again and again we feel, as though it really were present, the circulation of an inner and eternal life. Something like a consecration flows from it.

"Git or Git Got"

GUADALCANAL DIARY. By Richard Tregaskis. Random House. $2.50.

BATTLE FOR THE SOLOMONS. By Ira Wolfert. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

TWO American newspapermen who were assigned to cover the battle for Guadalcanal have written books oddly complementary to each other, and both valuable in that they bring into focus a far-away piece of the war which never has been made quite real in the chopped-up and censored news dispatches. Richard Tregaskis is a young man of twenty-six, covering his first major assignment; he went into Guadalcanal with the first wave of marines; they captured a foothold there, and stayed through last August and September. Ira Wolfert, who has been covering big stories for a decade, paid his visit to the island in October and November.

Mr. Tregaskis kept a diary, missing nary a day. It is never a dull diary, for he has a good reporter's eye for detail, a refreshing lack of self-consciousness or artifice, and humor. He is particularly interested in the marines who did the ground fighting through jungles and swamps. Aboard the transport, as the hour for attack approached, they tossed half-dollars over the side, saying even if you stay alive you won't be able to buy nothing; and they also crowded into religious services. In the first days on the island they talked too loud, and they nervously shot at every shadow.

Soon they realized how desperate was their task of defending a patch of land seven miles by four on an island ninety miles by thirty, with Japanese shooting at them from the jungle on the three land sides, shelling them from the sea on the fourth side, and bombing them from the air—and all this by night as well as by day. For nearly two weeks they had no air support; for the first month they had only two meals a day; they kept wondering where our navy was and when reinforcements would arrive. A very few marines, including one high-ranking officer, developed hysteria psycho-neuroses. As for the rest, their original brashness developed into genuine toughness, and they fought on.

Mr. Tregaskis doggedly sought out danger along with the troops, wishing only that the rules didn't forbid correspondents to carry guns, and that his six-foot-seven frame wasn't so difficult to conceal behind bushes when he came under fire. Each time he faced death he thought the same thing, "that I was a damned fool to get myself into such a spot as this," but he too kept right on.

Ira Wolfert, arriving in October, was interested less in the ground fighting than in the sea and air battles. He, also, had some close scrapes, notably on the occasion when the Flying Fortress in which he was a passenger fought a forty-four-minute duel, dodging in and out of thunderclouds and squalls, with a Japanese plane. It was "one of those arrangements known locally as git or git got"—and it was the most hair-raising air fight this reviewer has heard about.

* "Basic Verities: Prose and Poetry." By Charles Péguy. Translated by Ann and Julian Green. Pantheon Books. $2.75.

While Mr. Tregaskis tells his story in full and intimate detail, Mr. Wolfert paints a series of pictures in broader, more emotional strokes. His short book is made up largely of his feature dispatches as he originally filed them. The best chapter is his account of the naval battle of November 13 to 15, much of which he was able to watch from shore. In black silhouette against the glare of gunfire and explosions, he saw the American fleet plunge into the midst of the more powerful Japanese force. "The sands of the beach were shuddering so much from gunfire that they made the men standing there quiver and tingle from head to foot . . . it resembled a door to hell opening and closing, opening and closing, over and over."

Both authors note with wonder the fanatical willingness of the Japanese to fight to the death, no matter how hopeless the odds. Mr. Tregaskis reports the case of three Japanese cornered in a cave; they had one pistol which they fired until only three shots were left; then one Japanese shot the two others and killed himself. In November Mr. Wolfert wrote that American forces had not yet taken a single enemy officer alive and only a handful of shell-crazed or wounded soldiers. He attributes this to the hold of the Japanese ruling class, whence come the officers, over the masses.

Nevertheless, both correspondents agree that the Americans are outfighting the enemy in point of courage as well as intelligence. Many of the men doing the fighting, Mr. Wolfert points out, took a terrible kicking around during the depression years, and New Deal critics berated the President for pampering and softening them with WPA projects; but when they came up against a job they had to do, they turned out to be plenty tough.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

First Fruits, Mostly Sour

SING FOR YOUR SUPPER. By Sylvi Edith Mackey. The Antioch Press. $1.50.

THE NAMELESS. By Lew Williams. The Press of James A. Decker. $1.50.

PIECES OF THREE. By Meyer Liben, Paul Goodman, Edouard Roditi. The 5 x 8 Press. 35 cents.

THE TWO PERSEPHONES. By Robert Morse. Creative Age Press. $2.50.

WHITMAN strode; his progeny sprawls. The greatest American poet seems to be the worst American influence. This is seen daily now that last century's innovations are commonplaces, and anybody who cuts up flat prose into big lines can get them accepted as poetry, even printed in Life, provided they are about America. It is the more regrettable that little presses, which have done nobly in the past, should continue to present as "discoveries" epigones whose yawps are not even barbaric. Whitman was hardly ever deserted by his sense of organic rhythm, which he developed through practicing traditional meters, reading the Bible, and listening raptly to army bands and Italian tenors. Such pursuits might teach little or nothing to the new poets who keep bursting formlessly upon us, but the rising generation certainly ought to try something, if the great American music Walt let loose is not to dwindle permanently to a sound like the chewing of gum in subways.

Miss Mackey and Mr. Williams are the latest products of the "Hunk of Life, or Anything Goes" school. Miss Mackey is concerned to point out that modern American living is hard on the flowering of personality, especially female, though it stunts the men too, which makes it still worse for the women. This indisputable truth she states by way of a selective autobiography in five parts—entitled Plowing, Sowing, Germinating, Waiting, and Harvest—printed partly as verse, partly as prose. Her best quality as self-confessor—this being the root function of such writing—is a sharp sense of ironic humor, which often saves her from sounding unbearably adolescent. Also, she can describe scenes and incidents very well, in straight prose with the gloves off. But she never shapes her experience into the efficient form that would make one feel more than grateful that so live a person exists. Not even this pleasure is provided by Lew Williams's account of life among coal miners, who would like to be dead, but the mines go smoking along. It is all very gashing, and there is even a photograph of a WPA card to prove it; but the subject cannot be half so drab as the expression, which provokes no sympathy, only an irritated glumness.

Inarticulateness on the one hand and on the other an excessive artfulness showing off in a void seem to be the besetting vices of our poetry these days. Messrs. Liben, Goodman, and Roditi demonstrate the latter method of boring the audience—doubtless a freak of my fancy—that cries for poetry and sulks when given an all-day sucker. They write the kind of stuff that keeps one's mind open to Van Wyck Brooks. Their work depresses not by its decadence—an informing quality, if finely expressed—but by its refusal to communicate, to effect or even attempt the self-transcendence that is the first and last discipline of the poet. Liben feels badly about white-collar slavery, in inferior Fearingese; Goodman is solipsistically ingenious about listening to music; and Roditi feels so badly about everything except the Middle Ages that even his verse is spineless ("I dare not draw the curtains, see/Whether the world is still alive. . ."). These observers' disgust with the world comes from the brain, that of the others from the guts; none of them, however, uses words with respect for their magical entities but merely as the quickest means at hand for private answers to general questions; in a word, they are not poets.

Robert Morse is one; he can even write long poems—a singular ability, especially today. He illumines the dreary scene with two recreations of Greek myths—Demeter and Persephone, and Theseus and Ariadne. The first he treats as a symbol of instinct, the second as one of character. Of course, to use Greek legend at all—the Occident's supreme imaginative vision of human experience—gives a writer an initial advantage; but it also sets traps that only the fluency of talent can elude. Morse has that ease and grace. At times he overworks them, like the Parnassians, who seem to be his literary ancestors; but these finely portrayed figures and vivid dramatic speeches strengthen my conviction that it would greatly enrich the blood stream of poetry if at least one poet made a large-scale attempt at myth for every forty critics who talk about it.

FRANK JONES

Underground Germany

THE SILENT WAR. By John B. Jansen and Stefan Weyl.
J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.75.

UNTIL Vic Jordan and Warner Brothers took over, the underground movement in Germany was a bad flop. Even friendly people felt disappointed in their illegal protégés in Berlin, Essen, and Hamburg. In return for all the contributions and sympathy they had received, they could show nothing but arrests and executions. The German-Soviet war dealt another severe blow to the fading prestige of Hitler's enemies within. That the German workers did not rise up when their Socialist fatherland was attacked proved to one American correspondent that they were just as nationalistic as anybody else in the Third Reich. Scratch a German radical and you will find a Prussian imperialist, the man intimidated. The Western allies treat the whole problem of German internal opposition very much as the priest in one of Ludwig Thomas's stories looked at the problem of art: "Wahre Kunst geht bis zum Nabel. Was drunter ist, ist a Sauerei," the indignant shepherd said, looking at the nude form of a Greek goddess.

A full story of the underground movement in Germany can be written only after the fall of National Socialism. A wealth of documentary evidence is locked in the files of the Gestapo and may be partly or fully destroyed in the grand finale of the regime. Some things that have escaped Himmler's records are known to the secret organizations which have continued from abroad their political activities in Germany, but they too are silent on such vital matters as the numerical strength, political influence, and potential leadership of the underground groups. Jealousy between the various organizations and genuine fear of giving information to the enemy have made most of their reports vague and dull.

Undeterred by so many adverse circumstances, Jansen and Weyl, two active members of the German labor movement in its legal and illegal phases, have undertaken the job and succeeded in writing a book full of valuable information. In their presentation of the complex forces that compose the German underground they avoid the pitfalls of sensationalism and generalities. They address themselves primarily to American readers who want a sober analysis of the oppositional forces—their origin, achievements, limitations, and ultimate aims. The book contains some familiar material, but also new first-hand information about recent developments in the underground struggle. It is by no means a primer on the technique of underground work. The description of the costly, inefficient, and drab methods of illegal warfare in the Third Reich merely serves as a picture of the milieu in which the political groups must function.

Two of the authors' observations are of especial interest. The morale of those workers who form the nucleus of the underground movement, men and women of exceptional strength of character and convictions, cannot be touched by the changing fortunes of the silent war, but Hitler's phenomenal successes in his dealings with the great powers have given them a sense of frustration and futility. Munich cost the Allies more than the Czecho-Slovakian divisions; non-interference in Spain more than the difference between an enthusiastic friend and a latent enemy; and the effects of the

GENERALS AND GEOGRAPHERS

The Twilight of Geopolitics

By HANS W. WEIGERT

"The rise and fall of geopolitics is described here in a book which provides the answers to some of the pressing questions regarding Hitler's mistakes and, possibly, his future plans...a book which fills a long felt need."—Chicago Sun.

"...excellent. Geopolitics must be deflated."—Lin Yutang.

"To those who still regard geopolitics as some sort of black magic, evoked by German superscientists to enable Hitler to seize world power, Dr. Weigert's book should prove an invaluable corrective."—The Christian Century. $3.00

THE WAR

Third Year

By EDGAR McINNIS

Introduction by Walter Millis

The first book to give us the complete chronological record of America's fighting role in the war. This volume covers the war from October, 1941 through September, 1942. "Edgar McInnis' year by year record of this war has become practically indispensable."—N. Y. Sun.

THE WAR: FIRST YEAR

Up to the Battle of Britain

THE WAR: SECOND YEAR

Up through September, 1941

$2.00 each

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Avenue • New York

MEXICAN OIL

Symbol of Recent Trends in International Relations

By HARLOW S. PERSON

For everyone who wants to know the entire story behind the agreement reached between the United States and Mexican governments on the expropriated oil wells. "It is because he gets down to the concrete, and doesn't talk abstractions, that Harlow Person's book is timely. It bridges the gap between the common people of two countries and ought to reach a half a million voters. For being good neighbors is a virtue which it takes the 'advanced' as well as the 'backward' country to play."—WALTON HAMILTON, Yale School of Law. $1.60

DEMOCRACY AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT

By WILLIAM H. STEAD

A penetrating and constructive analysis of the entire problem of how to achieve full employment after the war. "It is probably the best factual study of unemployment during the last decade which has been made so far: non-technical, clear, objective, and fair-minded as well as comprehensive."—Saturday Review of Literature. "An informed and practical discussion of the problem of unemployment and of the sensible ways of meeting it."—Management Review. $3.00

Order from your bookstore or direct from
HARPER AND BROTHERS, NEW YORK, N. Y.

NEXT WEEK— Mid-Winter Books

ODELL SHEPARD will review "The Connecticut Wits" by Leon Howard

DENIS DE ROUGEMONT will review "The Nature and Destiny of Man: A Christian Interpretation. II. Human Destiny" by Reinhold Niebuhr

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL will review "W. B. Yeats, 1865-1939" by Joseph Hone

IRWIN EDMAN will review "The American Spirit" by Charles A. & Mary R. Beard and "America: The Story of a Free People" by Allan Nevins and Henry Steele Commager

KEITH HUTCHISON will review "Goals for America: A Budget of Our Needs and Resources" by Stuart Chase

SIDNEY HOOK will review "Education Between Two Worlds" by Alexander Meiklejohn

RALPH BATES will review "A New History of Music: The Middle Ages to Mozart" by Henry Prunières

DIANA TRILLING: Fiction in Review

THE Nation

Soviet-Nazi pact are not yet overcome. Every international victory was for Hitler a triumph on the home front, a further step toward unity, toward resignation of the anti-fascists and isolation of their active cadres. A beleaguered garrison needs proof that it is not forgotten if it is to keep up a seemingly hopeless battle.

The other observation has to do with a problem recurring in all discussions of a post-war Germany. What about the Nazi youth? The authors' story of the "Pack," a dissenting youth movement that broke away from Baldur von Schirach's tutelage, is an exciting piece of news. "He is a dependable reactionary," says one boy of another whom he wants to recommend as a dependable anti-Nazi. In their attempt to discredit Hitler's enemies as "reactionaries" the Nazis have given the old classification a new content. And if the boys of the "Pack" insist that they are utterly "unpolitical" they do not realize to what a high degree their defiance of the state organization is a political act.

The authors belong to the New Beginning group and base their conclusions on the experience of their political friends. But loyalty to their organization should not have led them to unqualified attacks on the Communist underground. What proof have they for the assertion: "The Communist structure was riddled with Nazis. They had spies and agents provocateurs placed throughout the party, even in the Central Committee"? The enormous losses of the Communists were not due to the activities of stool-pigeons but to a disastrously wrong evaluation of the stability of the Hitler regime which made them sacrifice their forces in fruitless attacks. One also fails to see why the part of the Communists in the silent war is systematically played down. Is it to lend respectability to the underground? In that case, nothing short of handing over the underground labor movement to dismissed generals and Catholic bishops will do.

KARL BILLINGER

Law-Abiding Italy

EULOGY OF JUDGES. By Piero Calamandrei. Princeton University Press. $2.

THIS booklet—a collection of maxims on the figure of the judge—will arouse curiosity if for no other reason than that it is written by an Italian lawyer and scholar teaching and pleading in Florence, and published in this country when the Battle of Italy may be looming ahead. In fact, this commentary on daily justice has other claims to attention than what a pedant might term its dialectical timeliness. A reviewer in Italy would probably call the quality of Mr. Calamandrei's variations upon the legal profession "Manzonian." By Manzoni he would mean that ironic wisdom and catholic good-nature (I am well aware that many would rather call it Catholic, but I insist on a small c) which give flavor to the only great novel of Italian literature, "The Betrothed," and run in rivulets through the pages of Croce, so murderously Hegelianized by English translators.

Mr. Calamandrei's witty eulogy of the processes of justice reminded me that while Fascists in Italy have made havoc of the law practically and successfully, anti-fascists too have often mistrusted it, if only from an emotional, or a doctrinal, point of view. As any reader of Silone can testify, Italian politics had been so long, before and under fascism, the hunting-ground for petty lawyers, that legality had become for too many a synonym for the defense of a fraudulent status quo. The spreading contempt for justice reached a climax in 1924, during the Matteotti crisis, when the parliamentary opposition committed suicide by staking all its chips on a shallow legal procedure.

February 20, 1943

From then on, through the Fascist decades of organized lawlessness, an opposite, healing process went on uninterruptedly in the public mind. The more the big bosses, the gerarchi, massacred the laws, the more the average Italian developed a respectful longing for law. Thus well-meaning citizens tried touchingly and vainly to enforce respect at least for the Fascist decrees; while anti-fascists, throwing overboard their recent bias, became increasingly interested in the legal problems of future Italy. "We might be ripe for a revolution," an Italian poet once said to me, "but we are unprepared to translate a revolution into just laws." However they may term it, "a compulsory democracy" is the ideal toward which the most enlightened Italians look with great hope. Its articulation and enforcement are definitely felt as a problem of legal creativeness. "Freedom only for the free," "a society of inescapable democratic processes"—such are the slogans. And their Italian worshippers know that only an imaginative jurist can teach them how to go about attaining it.

Counselor Calamandrei's essay, with its sympathetic glosses "On a Certain Immobility of Judges on the Bench" or "On Etiquette in the Court," has little to do with my own variations; and yet it belongs to a tradition whose bearings on a new Italy, let us hope, will some time be apparent.

PAOLO MILANO

Politics and the Pursuit of "Goodness"

DISCIPLINES FOR DEMOCRACY. By T. V. Smith. University of North Carolina Press. $2.

THE disciplines for democracy, according to Professor Smith, are science, the discipline of truth; art, the discipline of beauty; and politics, the discipline of goodness. The author is one of the most eloquent exponents of the democratic way of life in our country, and he does not fail in either eloquence or charm in expounding his thesis in this volume. One may be permitted to question, however, whether he has not done violence to the ancient and hallowed triad of culture. Can the pursuit of truth really be limited to science? What becomes of those larger concepts of meaning which transcend science and which nevertheless embody truth?

Professor Smith seems to fit them into the realm of art, but not altogether plausibly. In a vivid example he distinguishes between science and art by making a census-taker, visiting a farm household, the symbol of science. The cold figures which the census-taker enters in his book are what science knows about that farm family. But it requires artistic appreciation to catch the glint of affection in the eye of the

BUSINESS AS A SYSTEM OF POWER

By Robert A. Brady

A controversial book which raises the question of whether the immense power which organized business has accumulated can be reconciled with a democratic way of life. Foreword by Robert S. Lynd.

$3.00

THE IMPACT OF FEDERAL TAXES

By Roswell Magill

The former Under Secretary of the Treasury examines the present tax system, its effect on the family, upon business policies, the efficacy of the wartime excess profits tax, etc.

$3.00

RAINER MARIA RILKE: POEMS

Translated by

Jessie Lemont

Jessie Lemont has worked for thirty years to perfect these translations which, faithful to the spirit of Rilke, are in themselves poems as well as translations.

$3.00

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS
Morningside Heights • New York

PUBLICATIONS

SCIENCE & SOCIETY

Contents of the WINTER issue

Volume VII, Number 1

Papers delivered at

INSTITUTE ON PROBLEMS OF THE WAR

Crucial Problems of War Economy:

Paul M. Sweezy, Earl Browder, Lyle Dowling

Labor-Employer Relations:

J. Raymond Walsh, Jesse Friedin, Julius Emspak

Utilization of Scientists:

Harry Grundfest, Joseph Needham

Mobilization of Manpower:

J. J. Joseph

Women in Industry:

Mildred Fairchild

Problems of Discrimination:

John Beecher, Lucille Buchanan, Charles A. Collins

Single Copies: 35 cents Annual Subscription: (4 issues) $1.25

SCIENCE and SOCIETY

■ East 20th Street New York, N. Y.

A REPLY

A point by point analysis of Mr. Trilling's article entitled "M., W., F. at 10" in The Nation of November 21, 1942 has been prepared by the Authors of The Survey History of English Literature.

FREE ON REQUEST

To receive your copy of this refutation of Mr. Trilling's unwarranted article, simply mail a postal card with your name and address to EARNES & NOBLE, INC.

Fifth Ave. at 18th St., New York, N. Y.

AMUSEMENTS

"The most effective and the most satisfactory play about the war yet to reach our stage."

—Joseph Wood Krutch, Nation.

THE PLAYWRIGHTS' COMPANY Presents

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A new play by Maxwell ANDERSON. Cast of 25, incl. Aline MacMAHON

43th St. E. at B'WAY. Eve. $20, $1.10 to $3.30. 251 seats $1.10.

Mat. Sat. & Mon. 2:40, $1.10-$2.75. Seats selling for next 3 weeks.

Special Matinee Washington's Birthday, February 22. MAIL ORDERS FILLED

SPECIAL

Class Room Rate
only 25¢ monthly per Student for orders of ten or more copies

to be sent to one address.

Desk Copy Is Free!

ADDRESS YOUR ORDERS TO

THE Nation

55 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK CITY

father as he answers questions for his wife and to take in the whole scene of domestic felicity and agrarian serenity. It would be rather sad if the "truth" about the farm family were contained only in the census figures and if the beauties of nature and human nature, which the author records so charmingly, were not related in any way to the "truth." Art may seek to comprehend the truth about how facts, meanings, and values are related to each other.

One may also question whether it is possible to identify politics with the pursuit of "goodness." In one sense it is the pursuit, not of the best, but of the second-best. Democratic politics, at least, rests partly upon the art of compromise. Politics is the art of embodying the good collectively. This cannot be done without "the price of accepting compromise as the best possible in politics," according to the author's own admission. Indeed, the emphasis upon compromise as the basis of democratic politics is one of the most illuminating portions of Professor Smith's treatise. He has some very wise things to say upon the impossibility of any one individual or group securing universal consent in a community for his or its conception of the good. He would therefore have them enjoy the purity of the ideal in purely individual terms and would dissuade them from seeking to universalize their ideal in the community by the consoling reflection that "to extend the community of the ideal is always to dilute the purity of the ideal."

That is an interesting admission in the author's own words that politics cannot be identified with the pursuit of goodness. It deals rather with the difficult achievement of a measure of harmony in a community whose different members have different, sometimes utterly different, ideas of what the good is.

Professor Smith constantly draws on his own rich experience in political life in championing the principle of tolerance and in advising moderation. "If one insists," he declares, "that right convictions about economics or about religion are matters for him to determine for others, then others, when they grow strong enough, will determine these for him. The only way to preserve any bill of rights is to be abstemious in presenting the public with what one calls his own rights."

On the question of tolerance and compromise he is a more convincing statesman than philosopher. A prudent democratic statesmanship must be based upon the very principles which he expounds so eloquently. But it may be questioned whether it is possible to achieve the ends he desires merely by cherishing our highest ideal privately. Suppose the ideals are concerned with the communal good? To cherish ideals privately, if they are ideals relevant to man's social life, is to make them meaningless. How could one persuade either a Communist or an exponent of a clerical corporative state to mitigate his fanaticism by the observation that the ideal he holds is purer in contemplation than it will be in actual realization?

Tolerance is just as necessary for a democratic society as Professor Smith insists. But it is more difficult to achieve than he believes. At any rate the problem is too complex to be solved by his theory of the division between the private and the public method of expressing devotion to the good.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

FILMS

NOT counting the films I have had to miss, it has been a dull month. Certainly the most interesting show I have seen is "The Hard Way," in which, evidently, several frustrated talents have done their best to eat their cake and have it. The story—the pathetic, cheated woman who wrecks lives right and left in the effort to realize herself through a younger sister—is liable to go ham even aside from Bette Davis's virtual patent on it. The neatly sneaked-in sexual-economic explanations help, here, only a little; the show-business setting is an unlucky concession to glamor. This theme is either cruelly relevant on a grand native scale or better let alone; and a good deal even of the best of this treatment of it is coarse-grained, stagy, and sentimental.

Even so, there is a good deal in it to excite and to please. Much of the dialogue of Daniel Fuchs and Peter Viertel is a dozen times more loaded and acute than the average, and Fuchs's genius for writing quarrels (as in "Homage to Blenheim") would alone make the picture worth seeing. Vincent Sherman directed it; he holds a large cast to a pitch of diversified accuracy which is seldom even attempted, and the vaudeville and theatrical sequences are the first in years to convince me (who know little about either). A good deal of credit—how much, it is impossible to guess—must go to Jerry Wald, who wrote the original story and was the producer. I particularly liked Jack Carson as the more amorphous of two hoofers, and I thought Dennis Morgan made a good deal of his cold, complicated partner. Ida Lupino I feel sorry about. She has fine moments, especially one as Zasu Pitts in "Greed," but I felt too often that her favorite expression of strained intensity would be less quickly relieved by a merciful death than by Ex-Lax. It is good to learn that in spite of her casting as Emily Brontë, Miss Lupino still wants to play comedy, at which she is excellent. James Wong Howe's first few minutes with the camera, in a Pennsylvania mill town, all but floored me with gratitude. He goes on the list with Hitchcock as one of the few men of whom it can be hoped that, given the chance (and in Hitchcock's case travel, and still sharper advice from natives), they may yet take advantage of the $5,000 ceiling on sets to use this country as it ought to be used in films, and as it has scarcely been touched.

The well-paid shamming of forms of violence and death which millions a day are meeting in fact seems of an order more dubious than the shamming of all other forms of human activity; so I cannot be sure how I feel about "Air Force." It is loud, loose, sincere, violently masculine, and at times quite exciting. Its disasters are well arranged and, in the Coral Sea sequence, nicely cut. There is some gladdening effort to get away from movie faces and to give the men diverse and authentic speech; the success is only occasional. Bits of the music are imaginative; all of it vitiates what it is intended to enhance. The sound, if plain realism is enough, is unusually good. I think it unfortunate, since the crew of this bomber is supposed to be going night after night without sleep, that the cast was not required to. The camera work varies between competence in the air and the gummiest sort of "Rembrandt" sentimentalities on the ground. A few all but annihilating cut-ins of actual combat adequately measure the best of the fiction, and my own uneasiness about it.

Barring a few infallible bits of slapstick and one or two kitschy ingenuities with color, "Saludos Amigos" depresses me. Self-interested, belated ingratiation embarrasses me, and Disney's famous cuteness, however richly it may mirror national infantilism, is hard on my stomach. (I have not yet seen Donald Duck's income-tax film, but from what I hear, it will be worth as vicious invective as the Führer's Face.) "Journey into Fear" is disappointing, too. It is good to see so likable an entertainer as Welles making an unpretentious pleasure-picture; but to make a good one you need to be something of an artist, and Welles has little if any artistry. Since costume pictures leave me cold and oblique editorials—especially when I disagree with them—leave me colder, "Young Mr. Pitt" held nothing for me but Morley's suaveness, my lingering liking for Donat, and respect for some smooth dialogue and for Carol Reed's intelligent walk across the intrinsically hopeless flypaper of his first super-production.

Apparently "Casablanca," which I must say I liked, is working up a rather serious reputation as a fine melodrama. Why? It is obviously an improvement on one of the world's worst plays; but it is not such an improvement that that is not obvious. Any doubters should review the lines of Claude Rains. Rains, Bogart, Henried, Veidt, Lorre, Sakall, and a colored pianist whose name I forgot were a lot of fun, and Ingrid Bergman was more than that; but even so, Michael Curtiz still has a twenties director's correct feeling that everything, including the camera, should move; but the camera should move for purposes other than those of a nautch-dancer, and Mr. Curtiz's bit players and atmospheric scenes are not even alien corn. Thanks to a friend, moreover, I can now quote two lines which I snickered at and then, I blush to say, forgot. One, Miss Bergman's plea to her husband, takes the season's prize for exposition: "Oh, Victor, please don't go to the underground meeting tonight." The other, more tender, is Miss Bergman's too, just after she collapses on to a sofa with Humphrey Bogart: "From now on you'll have to do the thinking for both of us, dear."

Social psychiatrists might, I think, regard the following as sinister wartime symptoms. In two current films there are heroines named Charlie; in a third there is a heroine named Chris. In the only two films I have seen in which young men got notices from their government informing them whether they were, or were not, acceptable for armed service, the young men first trembled in agonies of suspense, next, after glancing at the notice, showed their very tonsils for joy, and next made quite sure that the audience would share in their pleasure by cavorting in a manner to fit Mickey Rooney for wheelchair roles. In the long run it became clear, in both cases, that they got the job.

JAMES AGEE

Drama Note

ASK MY FRIEND SANDY" (Biltmore Theater) got a very bad press, though everybody seemed to agree that it was nice to have Roland Young back again. Undoubtedly the piece is a bit thin, but I found a good deal of wit and a good deal of amusement in the farcical story of a bibulous publisher persuaded to give away all his money, the argument used to persuade him being this: After the war nobody will have anything, but those who have got used ahead of time to getting along without money will be in the strongest position. According to the Daily News, this is a satire on the New Deal, and maybe it is, but if so the fact escaped me at the time. If all playgoers were middle-aged and had good memories, the best title would be "Rollo Sows Another Oat." Roland Young really is fine, and the rest of the cast is also good.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ART

WILLIAM DEAN FAUSETT: Paintings and Water Colors. Kraushaar Galleries, until February 20.

FAUSETT is an utterly academic painter save for the frankness of his color—and that is unacademic only in relation to 1880. The interest of his case lies in the fact that his landscapes, remaining as they do within conventions stale by now—the sweet, smooth surface, the seductive tones, the equally sweet glazes—give valid pleasure nevertheless. Coming from Utah, Fausett has a feeling for the green of deciduous foliage and the contours of grass fields which affects every part of the picture and unifies it. This very particular emotion about a particular thing is enough by itself to transform the conventional-ity of his style and to make of some of his landscapes works of art. Apart from this Fausett is a mediocre painter. He cannot do figures or still lifes or landscapes without foliage. He cannot define and simplify large masses satisfactorily, as is witnessed by the hard, superficial treatment of the farthest distances in his landscapes. He must rely on nature's more obvious organization and what its details suggest; thus the brilliance with which he handles skies, foregrounds, and middle distances. In the end Fausett has only this one emotion and its cause, the green of our Eastern countryside, and his work at the most constitutes a pleasant minor incident in contemporary painting.

STUART DAVIS: Selected Paintings. At the Downtown Gallery, until February 27.

The total impression made by Davis's nineteen paintings hanging in their square gray-walled room is amazing, and more effective than any single picture itself. This impression defines Davis's limitations. He is a superb wall-decorator, without being either a mural-ist or a first-rate easel painter. His pictures contain a great deal; yet they do not answer sufficiently the demands made of pictures which claim to be more than decoration. Nevertheless, they are more than decorative. Davis has stayed too long inside a formula: the Dufyesque dance of line against flat areas of high, dry, acid color. It is encouraging to see the artist abandoning this formula in his 1942 paintings by using more compact shapes in new greens and blacks. "Arboretum by Flash Bulb" is particularly successful. But "Report from Rockport," painted in 1940, is, for all its echoes of Miro, even more so.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

LOTTE LEHMANN'S singing of Schumann Lieder, including the great "Dichterliebe" cycle, provided the New Friends of Music audience with a memorable experience. The generalization about opera-singers being unable to sing Lieder properly is as dangerous as any other. The most beautiful singing of these songs that I have heard—in which, that is, rich musical and poetic expressiveness was conveyed in phrases that were formed with plastic perfection—was that of an opera-singer, Elisabeth Schumann. And there was similar plastic perfection in the phrasing of the songs when Rethberg sang them. Lehmann, however, when she first sang them, did throw her voice and emotions around in them as she was accustomed to doing in opera; and it is only recently, as time has sharply reduced the once unlimited quantities of luscious tone at her disposal and compelled her to use what was left with care, restraint, and skill, that the operatic characteristics have been refined out of her phrasing of Lieder. At the New Friends concert the high register which used to be constricted and shrill was now open and agreeable. And there was very little of the explosive emotional vehemence that used to tear the phrase apart: unable to afford this easy way of expressing emotion directly, she now expressed it through subtilized inflection of the line of the phrase, which remained continuous and unbroken even at points of great emotional intensity. The result was a flow of characteristically beautiful vocal sound which charmed the ear, embodying wonderfully deep and rich poetic insights and emotions which moved the mind and heart.

For the concert a couple of weeks later the New Friends dug up the unfamiliar Lenau songs of Schumann, which ■■ for ■■ I am concerned may now be buried again for good. They were sung by Dusolina Giannini, who uses what is left of her voice with more skill and better results than when I last heard her, seven or eight years ago. The extraordinary warmth and richness of tone that were lost could not be restored; but the terrific tremolo is almost entirely eliminated, so that if the voice is cold and small it is at least steady and clear. And it is employed, as it always was, in the beautifully modeled phrasing of a first-rate musician.

At this concert the newest Roth Quartet substituted for the Galimir Quartet in performances of Haydn's Op. 50 No. 3 and Schumann's Op. 41 No. 2. I don't know how long the present group has played under the leadership of Feri Roth, or how long it had to prepare these two works; but I do know that the playing sounded like what one hears from four experienced players who get together for an evening of quartets. It sounded, that is, like experience managing to scramble through, not like finished ensemble playing.

Having devoted most of this article to singers, I will end with two records of singing which have been issued by Columbia. The first (71440-D, $1.05) offers O mio Fernando from Donizetti's "La Favorita" and Adieu, forêts from Tchaikovsky's "Jeanne d'Arc," sung by Risé Stevens. Miss Stevens uses with good musicianship a mezzo-soprano voice which is very beautiful in its lower range, especially in sustained legato, but which tends to become heavily clouded by tremolo as it goes into its higher range and to be quite shrill on climactic high notes. Her singing is well reproduced by the record; but the orchestral accompaniments conducted by Leinsdorf sound pretty thin. Leinsdorf's orchestra has more body on the second record (17354-D, $.79), which offers Du bist der Lenz from "Die Walküre and Euch Läjten from "Lohengrin," sung by Astrid Varnay. Miss Varnay's fresh and agreeable voice is afflicted with tremolo in the first piece; it sounds better at the beginning of the second one, but acquires a completely altered and unpleasant timbre in the high notes. Judging by the sounds they produce both singers have yet to perfect their technique and had better do so before they damage their voices.

B. H. HAEGIN

In Early Issues

LOUIS FISCHER will review
"Appeasement's Child"
by Thomas J. Hamilton

GAETANO SALVEMINI will review
"Italy from Within"
by Richard G. Massock

Letters to the Editors

"Let the People Know"

Dear Sirs: Mary Agnes Hamilton, in her warm-hearted review of Sir Norman Angell's "Let the People Know" in The Nation of January 23, speaks approvingly of an instrument called the "lie-detector." She considers Sir Norman such an instrument in questions of British imperialism. I suggest we go a step farther and invent an Angell-detector. Its function will be to let the people know the things Sir Norman withholds in the course of his own detecting.

Sir Norman's book is a choice of the Book of the Month Club. One of its principal aims is the bettering of Anglo-American relations. To this admirable end Sir Norman tries to prove that British imperialism is a dead pigeon. Lest we suspect such a view, Sir Norman describes both himself and the British Labor Party as "Socialist." It is his belief that "Britain is going out of the empire business"—an odd remark for a Socialist member of a Socialist Party to make when Churchill has said: "What we have we hold," and "I have not become His Majesty's First Minister to aid in the dissolution of the British Empire."

As evidence that Britain is not imperialistic, Sir Norman brings forward certain points. He emphasizes that the dominions are self-governing. He tells us that Britain has only 600 administrators in the whole of India—an ace that is becoming rather dog-eared as Sir Norman whips it out year by year. He shows that to divide up imperial territory among have-not nations would not lead to radical improvements. In arguing that the roots of this war are not capitalistic but lie in the democracies' need for self-preservation, he remarks sarcastically that "fifty obese capitalists cannot force a whole people." He shows concern over the fact that while anti-Semitism is frowned on in America, people can be as Anglophobe as they wish. Finally, to Americans who suspect British titles, Sir Norman replies that titles are just "medals" and that Soviet Russia has medals too.

I suggest that in all these arguments Sir Norman follows a method of studied omission. It is false to concentrate attention upon the dominions when defending imperial freedom, and to say nothing at all about colonial dependencies such as Malaya, the Rhodesias, etc. It is false to emphasize the free unity resulting from the Statute of Westminster without mentioning the imperialistic dangers of the Ottawa Agreement. It is false to give the impression that India's Congress Party is in revolt against nothing more substantial than 600 British administrators. It is false, particularly for a Socialist, to defend the uselessness of dividing the empire among Denmark, Switzerland, and Germany, instead of discussing the exploitation of native labor and resources in colonial areas. It is pure wool-pulling to jiggle around with such phrases as "fifty obese capitalists." Nor is it proper to set anti-Semitism and Anglophobia side by side. Both are wrong, but the victims of the former are relatively helpless minorities in many countries, not a powerful body with ample means of protection. Finally, to call titles "medals" and chummily ring in the Soviet Union to support them is totally to misstate one of the essentials of aristocracy.

NIGEL DENNIS

New York, January 25

The Emphasis Explained

Dear Sirs: The omission most likely to give us a bad peace, produce a third world war, and render certain evils of colonialism insoluble is the omission from public consideration of the very neglected facts which it was the purpose of my book to emphasize. The best chance of a peaceable solution of those evils—and only a peaceable solution can be a real one—is to utilize and extend certain tendencies of British policy which the public has all but completely overlooked or ignored.

It is certainly false to suggest that the tendencies which have given freedom to the dominions, while insuring a degree of unity without which the defeat of Hitler would never have been possible, are nevertheless imperialism, to be rejected as a basis of policy because of dark spots in Africa or in Asia; as false as to suggest that the cause of American independence in the eighteenth century was no part of the movement toward freedom because slavery existed in the revolting colonies and was to continue in the new nation for the best part of a century.

The distribution of emphasis in "Let the People Know" is in part explained by the fact that I had devoted almost a dozen books previously to exposing the fallacies, particularly the economic fallacies, of imperialism, colony owning, preferential empires, and the like; and to the faults of British policy, particularly, in the case of a recent book, to the fatuousness and cruelty of the refugee policy (closely related to this problem) of Britain and the dominions; to the evil silliness of anti-Semitism.

But the sins of British imperialism are not today the aspect of the problem most likely to be overlooked in America. The far greater risk is that those much-publicized sins will be made an alibi, a scapegoat, an excuse for disregarding truth which some of us do not like to hear. The importance of Anglophobia resides in its capacity to distort political judgment and thereby to pour sand into the machinery of necessary cooperation.

NORMAN ANGELL

New York, February 2

United Front

Dear Sirs: I have just received a letter from a friend in England—dated December 28—who says with British reticence, "Please give your attention to release of International Brigade prisoners in Algeria. I understand they are not yet freed. Surely this is the test par excellence."

DOROTHY BUTLER HOWELLS

New York, February 3

One Reader Re-Joyces

Dear Sirs: It was trilling the way Lionel gave that outlandish scurvey the needle, man. He sure gave it the dickens. I re-joyced. It was blunderhardy of him.

It burns me up the way an outlional ade in its seminartistic fashion in dismembering the mess that has been taught andread in this whirl. You begin to ask your self, what are Wordsworth, Hemingway?

I used to sophomore dryden to passos exams! I almost gave up pope, it was so ex-austen. I had to steel myself to hunt and woolf my way through age after age, johnson and hopkins up and donne on the binyons and bunyans of bards until I had new writers, playing hyde and pepys hueffer their graves in order to ghost through the gosse.

Then, with a wilde, haggard, gray, swinburned face, I would gower lamb-like before my sterne prof and he'd syng out: where's your whit, man? Are you notes? Doesn't learning sitwell with you, cur? I answered: I spender nights with a shaw around me, browning the midnight oil, butchering Homer. What do you think khayyam?

Then he noseitched my scurvey-outline. I could smollett, he cried. Otis is too much. After much doyle and treacle, manikind hazlitt a flecker of wisedumb; then arrives Noble Needleman, dowson it; he barnes his bridges behind him, tries to kyd us into brilliance. Butler no marx at all. I auden to standish. You should fry. Stowe away from class until your cabined and crib spirit can forster enough ergs to reade originals. There are ossians of good books—milnes of wide. Crane your neck. Mansfield is wide.

It was a novel idea. I said to myself, art is no trollope. You don't bring home the bacon so swift. Disraeli is a coward's trick. Yeats is Yeats and West is West and never will the twain know devoto finish, for, gibbon the wright fielding for brooks, you will be defoe of maug-hamed-over writing and will realize that you can drive a horace to an anthology but you kant make him drinkwater. I chekoved some class-sick titles from the rich lardner of the past and bruised through them. They still referberate in my mind. I'm a better mann for them. I studied them and they steadied me.

RICHARD N. KELLY

Port Chester, N. Y., February 7

What We Read in the Papers

Dear Sirs: Though recognizing the paucity of available information on the life of Dr. George W. Carver, I was nevertheless startled by statements which appeared in The Nation of January 16 a fact when there can be no possible authority for them.

"He did not learn to read and write until he was twenty." This is, on the face of it, silly, when it is followed by the statement that he graduated from Iowa State College when he was thirty. It is reasonable to suppose that Dr. Carver could have learned to read and write and prepare himself for college in six years, especially with an extra college thrown in somewhere along the way? The facts are that he was writing a "novel," which he copied after "Little Women," at the age of eight, though he did not attend school until he was ten. He had qualified to enter Highland University, a small Kansas college, when he was twenty-one. And he not merely graduated from Iowa State College but was immediately placed on the faculty. This is to correct any misapprehension as to the soundness of his education.

Such absurdities tend to discredit the work of a truly great scientist.

RACKHAM HOLT

Chicago, Ill., January 22

[Rackham Holt should know what she is talking about since she has been at work for three years on a biography of Dr. Carver shortly to be published. Our face is only a secondary red, however, because our editorial remarks were based entirely on the long obituaries published by that (assumed) repository of accurate information the New York Times.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Hate and the Peace

Dear Sirs: Quentin Reynolds, famed war correspondent and Collier's editor, has proffered the alarming advice that the Allies should "go to the peace table with hate in their hearts" and wreak vengeance, complete and indiscriminate, on the entire German nation when the war is over. They alone are responsible, Reynolds would have us believe. So far as it is possible to discover from his discussion on the American Forum of the Air, the correspondent has no blueprint for peace. He just feels that the Germans should be liquidated because the war guilt lies squarely and evenly distributed on their shoulders.

Were it not for the fact that Reynolds's expletives represent a variety of hysteria that ultimately has the power of dictating another hollow peace, it would not be necessary for the less emotional among us to take their author seriously. But exactly for this reason and because the majority of us are genuinely concerned in the matter of obtaining a peace that will stick, the disease of hate with its inevitable results must be localized and prevented from assuming epidemic proportions.

Apart from humanitarian considerations, maybe Reynolds, who finds "it easy to hate the German people," will offer us a practical scheme for annihilating tens of millions of Germans? Maybe he will tell us how many years the Allies would have to maintain a huge army of occupation in Germany, how many troops it would involve, what it would cost, and what effect it would have on our post-war economy? Maybe he will explain to us what, under his program, would happen to German industry and agriculture and how, if we decided to operate them, we could do so without German assistance? Maybe he will tell us how the total eclipse of Nazism in Germany, even by feasible means, would check the rising tide of the same concept elsewhere in the world? Maybe he will tell us how this treatment of the Germans would help to bolster the lagging faith of Asiatic peoples in Western democracy? With hate dominating Allied behavior in the occupied country and at the peace table, maybe Reynolds will tell us what possibility there would be of their even recognizing the conditions of a peace that would secure the permanent liberty of bleeding humanity, not to mention actually writing the treaty?

This groping citizen doubts it. So much so that he must turn to other sources for the answer.

WALTER RAB

North Providence, R. I., February 3

Music in Camp

Dear Sirs: In recent months I have been able to watch the army engineers of Plattsburg Barracks show an interest in music. The local USO, which is an exceptionally attractive and comfortable place, now has a regular Sunday program of recordings. The organization has actually purchased a machine especially for these concerts and has begun its own collection of master works. Thanks to the cooperation of fellow-citizens, I have been able to offer programs of great variety and of some historical and aesthetic interest, and works selected from my own and other people's collections.

My observations while conducting this series are as follows: (1) that the audience for a "classical" program is always definitely limited; (2) that men are reluctant to express themselves on what they shall have, but (3) "old hat" is not appreciably more popular than "highbrow" or unheard selections; (4) that the extant interest of the few is much alive. They like music as a specific art and interest. They—collectively—want all types of music.

To be specific, I found as large an audience attending a program of Mozart's Requiem and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms as the Tchaikovsky Fifth affair. Requests have come in for "long, solid" works, for piano, chamber, and unusual vocal music. There was attraction in Bach organ works, Monteverde songs, Mahler's "Lied von der Erde." Brahms proved universally popular. And I found in general that most men came on principle. They sought pure music, not necessarily the emotional purge of the late romantics.

In effect, the men like music, like it organized in some aesthetic pattern with historical, not sentimental, background.

So I recommend collections which follow generally aesthetic principles. This does not preclude "old hat," but it does mean balance, some eighteenth- and even seventeenth-century music, varied mediums of expression, and some moderns.

You see it is the really interested and somewhat developed music lovers who take the trouble to listen to music in the army. And it is a moral-aesthetic duty to meet this small but important group halfway. Real music, be it Beethoven's Fifth or a Mozart serenade, can be therapy when it is presented and appreciated as art. The radio can satisfy others, but recorded programs on the order of a Koussevitsky festival or a Beecham program meet the faithful "extant interest."

LUTHER A. ALLEN

Plattsburg, N. Y., February 6

Wilder's Sources, Continued

Dear Sirs: Please let me join the fray over Thornton Wilder. As to possible borrowings from "Finnegans Wake," I am not qualified to speak. James Joyce's works leave me dazed and blinking. But to come to the Bridge of San Luis Rey and cross it as those in the tale did not—who, I ask you, is the Marquesa de Montemayor, the writer of brilliant letters that "have become the textbook of schoolboys" to an adored and far-away daughter rather bored by her mother's attention? Who are these personages but our old friends Mme de Sévigné and her unappreciative child, Mme de Grignan?

Truth to tell, Captain Wilder has made some changes, his Marquesa is a grotesque figure, which the charming Frenchwoman was not, and the letters from Peru described by Wilder as "immortal" offer nothing to deserve much praise.

Perhaps Mme de Sévigné is fair game. But what shall be said of La Péricole, the actress who repents and gives herself to good works, the Viceroy of Peru, and the Archbishop of Lima, whom Captain Wilder has lifted with never so much as a "thank you" from Prosper Mérimée's famous little play, "Le Carrosse du Saint Sacrement?"

Thornton Wilder's sources and inspirations are of the best—and he has used his borrowed material deftly.

MARY WINSOR

Philadelphia, Pa., February 8

Data Wanted

Dear Sirs: Wayne University, in Detroit, has awarded two research fellowships for the study of Negro-Jewish relationships. This field is an important one, and one in which very little scientific exploration has been done. At present we are investigating the commercial contacts between these two groups, but we would be most grateful for any material which readers of The Nation might have available. All communications may be addressed to me, care of Sociology Department, Wayne University, Detroit.

ELEANOR P. WOLF

Detroit, Mich., January 26

CONTRIBUTORS

JEROME WEINSTEIN is a New York lawyer who has contributed to Taxes.

FRITZ STERNBERG, an authority on the economics of war, is the author of "Fivfold Aid to Britain."

DWIGHT MACDONALD, formerly on the editorial staff of Fortune, is now an editor of the Partisan Review.

S. K. RATCLIFFE is a well-known English author and lecturer.

PAUL ROSENFELD, well-known critic of art and literature, is the author of "By Way of Art."

MARCUS DUFFIELD is on the staff of the New York Herald Tribune.

FRANK JONES, now teaching classics at Yale, has contributed to the Partisan Review and the New Republic.

KARL BILLINGER, author of "Fatherland" and "Hitler Is No Fool," is a German refugee in this country.

PAOLO MILANO, an Italian writer and dramatic critic, is now teaching romance languages at Queens College and the history of the drama at the New School for Social Research.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new one required for change of address.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISEMENTS

62 cents a line (six words)

MINIMUM—3 lines

$6.16 per inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions.

THE NATION

55 Fifth Avenue, New York City
ALgonquin 4-3311

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION

55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us as least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8

☐ 3 Years $11

☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

☐ 13 Weeks $1

Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

Name

Address

2-20-43

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 1

By JACK BARRETT

Special Announcement to Nation Cross-Word Puzzlers

ACROSS

- 1 A ghost from Hades
- 4 This develops notwithstanding
- 6 I would turn this giant into a famous artist
- 8 A big blow (emanating from rent trouble, apparently)
- 10 Window with the top story inside
- 11 Narrate
- 14 Highly polished, but shows a loss
- 15 Obliteration is certain after a time
- 16 It sounds a proper ceremony
- 17 Covers a large part of the earth
- 19 Fish paste
- 20 Way out taken by many
- 22 He floated the first limited company
- 24 The last set, oddly enough, is the least fresh
- 26 Coin of the realm
- 27 Sounds as if it would be more hindrance than help to an oarsman.

DOWN

- 31 Left out
- 32 This lazy fellow would be younger if you changed his head
- 33 The singer opens with a well-known number
- 34 I am usually drunk at this meal
- 35 Entertaining fellows

DOWN

- 1 Those who called him a goat were only half right
- 2 To Capri for fruit
- 3 A game two can play at
- 4 Sack. Sounds like an instrument either way
- 5 Fortune made from building?
- 6 The yarn about a teetotaler is idle talk
- 7 One does it possibly for knowledge, but more often for something more refreshing
- 8 Hard up
- 12 Erin produces (and starts) this emerald-green mineral
- 13 Surface a snake can't cross

Beginning with this issue The Nation will run four consecutive cryptogrammic cross-word puzzles. If our readers like them, this puzzle page will become a regular weekly Nation feature. A word of explanation: this week's puzzle contains a number of filled-in letters to help the novices along. But as our readers get the hang of it, the puzzle will become increasingly difficult, and all hints will eventually be eliminated. The solution of this puzzle will appear in next week's issue, together with Puzzle No. 2. Meanwhile, send us your criticism, and suggestions; on the basis of them we may later print other kinds of brain-teasers on this page—political puzzles, literary quizzes, new quizzes, cryptograms on statements by outstanding statesmen. We urge you to send us your suggestions and recommendations.

Address your letters to

THE PUZZLE EDITOR
The Nation
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

- 14 Most serious item of male wedding garb?
- 16 Hard or soft in fishes
- 18 Did this tree survive the forest fire?
- 21 The beheaded Russian turns out to be Spanish!
- 23 Fruit with more than four quarters
- 24 An easy one, this
- 25 Bird or disease, but not a bird disease
- 26 An extra strong porter
- 28 Bands on wheels
- 29 The tide, it seems, has turned
- 30 It progresses by leaps and bounds

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 27, 1943

NUMBER 9

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

289

EDITORIALS

- Bombing Tactics and a Western Front 292
- Hitler's Subtle Poison 293
- The Red Star Rises by Freda Kirchwey 293

ARTICLES

- Eight Hopeful Congressmen by Richard H. Rovere 294
- The Charming Mr. Baruch by I. F. Stone 298
- Add Water and Serve by Ross L. Holman 299
- In the Wind 301

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- Platform for the Left by Harold J. Laski 302
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 303
- A People's Poland 304
- File and Remember 305

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Education for the New Order by Sidney Hook 308
- In Defense of Dante by Margaret Marshall 312
- Hoc Est Corpus. A Poem by Alex Comfort 313
- Goodby to Children. A Poem by Mark Van Doren 313
- America: Theme or Saga by Irwin Edman 314
- The Dyer's Hand by Theodore Spencer 315
- The Wicked Wits of Hartford by Odell Shepard 316
- The Cult of Innocence by William Phillips 318
- The Planning Age by Keith Hutchison 319
- Music and Society by Ralph Bates 320
- Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 320
- Drama Note by Joseph Wood Krutch 321
- Records by B. H. Haggin 322

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

323

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART
Music Critic Drama Critic
B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

SINCE THEY LOST THE EARLY RACE TO overrun the Tunis-Bizerte triangle before the Axis could organize its defense, the Allied forces have been endeavoring to hold a line roughly bisecting Tunisia from north to south. The aim was to confine the Germans and Italians in a comparatively narrow corridor where they could be constantly harassed by our fliers while the Allied command built up communications and made ready bases for a grand offensive to drive the enemy into the Mediterranean. Possibly these preparations were carried out in too leisurely a manner; more probably they sought 100 per cent perfection. At any rate, Rommel struck first with a degree of strength which came as an unpleasant surprise. Using his favorite Panzer tactics, he hit at a weak spot in our lines, where American troops had recently taken over from the French, and rolled back the entire right wing until it rested on the Algerian frontier. Now he is making a new thrust toward the Kremamsa Plateau which, if successful, would almost certainly necessitate the Allied evacuation of the important railhead of Tebessa and at the same time force a retreat in the center. Latest reports as we go to press suggest that our forces are rallying, but the situation will remain dangerous until the salient which the Germans have created north of Kasserine is eliminated.

✱

ROMMEL'S STRATEGY IS GENERALLY SEEN as an example of the defensive-offensive. He is thought to be seeking elbow room in southern Tunisia and to be intent on widening the gap between the Allied forces and General Montgomery's Eighth Army, which is pushing steadily across the border from Tripolitania. He may also hope, by means of a series of swift, hard blows, to disorganize the northern sector of General Eisenhower's command and thus free his own troops to deal with General Montgomery. But an entirely different complexion would be put on Rommel's maneuvers if reports of German concentrations on the Spanish border were confirmed. His drive would then appear as part of a gigantic pincer movement to inclose the whole of French North Africa and the Anglo-American expeditionary force, on which so many of our hopes for speedy victory are built. We should have to divert forces to protect Gibraltar, and our reserves in Morocco would be tied up to guard against any incursion by the big Nazified army of Spanish Morocco. The conquest of Tunisia would have to be indefinitely postponed.

✱

ON THE DAY THAT MME CHIANG KAI-SHEK appealed to Congress not to ignore the menace of Japan, the Japanese announced that they were launching a new series of offensives in China with the purpose of driving that country out of the war. A fairly large Japanese army has been assembled on the Burma border and is attempting to push into China's back door through Yunnan Province. Another major drive has been launched north of Shanghai toward the rich central provinces of Honan and Shensi, while a third is apparently directed against Changsha, where the Japanese have met with three previous disasters. Heavy fighting has also been reported from the Canton area, where Japanese penetration has never been deep. It is somewhat difficult to assess the strength of these new offensives. The Japanese insist that they are strong enough to crush Chiang Kai-shek entirely, but Chinese reports indicate that the Japanese may merely be seeking to gain large-scale propaganda values out of minor military maneuvers. They serve, however, to underline Mme Chiang's warning that Japan actually has far greater resources at its command than Germany. Although it is highly unlikely that Japan can muster enough strength to drive China out of the war, a successful offensive at this time would not only add greatly to China's economic difficulties but interfere materially with the possibility of an American attack upon Japan in 1943.

✱

EVERYTHING IS IN READINESS FOR THE biggest hunt Washington has known in many seasons. New Dealers are the game, and the sportsmen are divided into three bands of friendly rivals. Masters of the hunt are Martin Dies, Eugene Cox, and Howard W. Smith. Between them, Dies and Smith already have been allotted $135,000, and the personnel of their respective parties has been decided. Dies will have three of his veterans—Noah Mason, J. Parnell Thomas, and Joe Starnes, who several seasons ago tried to tree Christopher Marlowe until someone pointed out to him that Marlowe has been a dead fox for these 350 years. Of the four newcomers to the Dies team, Mundt of South Dakota and Costello of California are cut out for the sport. Courtney of Tennessee will probably go along for the ride, and Eberharter of Pennsylvania, to judge from his record, will replace Voorhis as the hunter whose heart is with the fox though he rides with the hounds. Voorhis is switching to the Smith team, where he will have a fellow-sufferer in Delaney of New York. The sympathies of these two faint-hearted huntsmen will be more than offset by the determination of a Southern Democrat, three Republicans, and Smith himself, all panting for Administration pelts. Game rules have been fixed. Cox's preserve is the Federal Communications Commission. Smith can hunt wherever he likes on the self-imposed condition that he doesn't "interfere with the war," "investigate the acts of the President," or indulge in a "labor-baiting expedition." He himself will determine when these rules are being violated. Dies, too, has a pretty free rein, but a fourth band, fitted out for another $100,000, will step in if he kills the wrong fox and declare the animal innocent. Tallyho!

✱

IN REPORTING OUT THE KILDAY BILL THE House Military Affairs Committee has struck a heavy blow against the development of a sound man-power policy for the prosecution of the war. The Kilday bill would defer from the draft all married men within a state until all single men, regardless of their work, had been taken, and would defer all men with children until all childless men had been drafted. The bill was specifically designed to frustrate Paul V. McNutt's recent "work-or-fight" order, which seems to have been misinterpreted. The fact that this order was issued some ninety days before it is to go into effect shows that it was not intended as a device for speeding up the draft of fathers but as a means of diverting men from non-essential to essential industries. Every person on the non-deferrable list has been given ample opportunity to shift to more essential work, and evidence that an effort has been made in this direction is to be regarded as cause for continuing the deferment. The Kilday bill ignores occupation, skills, and even physical fitness, and would virtually make dependency the sole factor in determining who shall be deferred. An amendment to the bill even goes so far as to make it illegal for the Manpower Commission to set up categories of non-essential workers for draft purposes. Meanwhile, a group of Senators under the leadership of Bankhead have attacked the selective-service policy from a diametrically opposite position. They are seeking to force the deferment of every bona fide farm worker whether or not he is engaged in the production of food. In this field Congress seems to be adding heavily to the "bureaucratic" confusion it complains so much about.

✱

"THE RUSSIAN OFFENSIVE IS REMARKABLE," writes a friend from an army camp. "I think the Germans are going to retire all the way to the border, claim to be defending Europe against bolshevism, wait for Rickenbacker to be elected President, and hope to win the war that way." We are glad that the War Department has disowned Captain Rickenbacker's attacks on labor. The hero himself showed signs, briefly, of thinking he might have gone too far; last week he said that when he denounced workers for absenteeism he meant both management and labor! But he has not changed his blind-spots, and his latest speech was a boring, blatant repetition of all his other effusions. For the record, he is an old-fashioned reactionary who hates unions and the New Deal; he is also a big employer. That is why, incidentally, he has been doubly a hero to the valets of big business—the labor-baiters high and low. He pretends, in attacking labor, to speak in the interest of "our boys." But the standards he would break down will be "our boys'" best protection against exploitation when the war ends and the labor market is overstocked, to the benefit of employers. The Captain may have been a hero in his Pacific adventure, but he shows himself to be something less than that when he sets up a soapbox in the limelight that is temporarily his and talks as if workers on the assembly line were slackers hugging safe berths while the men in the services take all the chances. The fact is that from December 7, 1941, to November 15, 1942, 44,500 men were killed in the foxholes of industry as against 5,694 in the armed forces.

✱

119 MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT, MOST OF them Laborites, voted against the government at the end of a three-day debate in the House of Commons on the Beveridge plan. This is the largest vote which has been cast against the Churchill administration on a major issue, and it would have been larger but for a closing speech by Herbert Morrison, Home Secretary and one of Labor's two representatives in the War Cabinet. Earlier in the debate statements by Sir John Anderson and Sir Kingsley Wood on behalf of the government had suggested to many members that the government was lukewarm on the subject and anxious to postpone until after the war even the preliminary steps toward enlarging social security. Anderson accepted some parts of the Beveridge plan in principle but rejected others and said the whole thing would have to wait, while Wood talked ominously about "the rights of the overburdened taxpayer." Morrison sought to remove the bad impression made by his ministerial colleagues by assuring the House that "the government has no wish to do a double-cross on this." Of the twenty-three changes proposed by Beveridge, he said, the government has accepted sixteen, left open six, and rejected one—significantly, the conversion of industrial insurance into a public service, a proposal bitterly opposed by insurance interests. Morrison's speech suggests that full agreement on the plan has not been achieved inside the government and that the decision to postpone action was taken in order to prevent war unity being shattered on a domestic issue. But as S. K. Ratcliffe pointed out in these pages last week, the Beveridge plan has seized the imagination of Britain, and it will not be easily thrust aside. It is becoming in fact the political touchstone distinguishing those of all parties who look forward from those whose slogan is "as we were."

✱

RAILROAD RATE INCREASES WERE GRANTED in 1942 on the excuse that the roads needed the extra revenue to meet a wage increase and certain other costs aggregating some $360,000,000. Actually the increase in war-time traffic was so huge that net railway operating income in that year was more than double the income in 1941. After deduction of all fixed charges and expenses, the roads earned $1,720,000,000—two and a half times as much as in 1941 and seven times as much as in 1940. Even without the emergency rate increases, the roads would still have earned an income of $1,450,000,000, which is far above pre-war levels. The OPA, through its special counsel, Max Swiren, and its economic adviser, Richard V. Gilbert, has appealed to the Interstate Commerce Commission to revoke the rate increases on the ground that railroad earnings are high enough without them. Gilbert estimated "very conservatively" that even if rate increases should be eliminated, net railway operating income in 1943 would be $2,610,000,000, or almost 34 per cent more than in 1942. These profits are huge enough to make up several times over the $725,000,000 in new wage increases now being asked by the railroad unions. The railroads seem to be the leading profiteers in this war. Last time the government was more sensible. It took them over.

✱

AN OKLAHOMA CITY POLICEMAN POSING AS an oil-field worker went to a Communist bookshop in that city in July, 1940, and bought a series of pamphlets published by the party. In August of that year the bookstore and three homes were raided on liquor search warrants and eighteen persons were arrested. Four were tried, convicted of criminal syndicalism, and sentenced to pay $5,000 fines and serve ten years in jail, a punishment almost worthy of a Nazi People's Court. The Oklahoma Criminal Court of Appeals has now reversed the convictions of three and remanded the cases to the lower courts, where we hope the original indictments will be dismissed. Judge Dick Jones, the presiding member of the court, wrote an opinion that does honor to his own good sense and to the good name of his state. He held that the prosecution had failed to produce evidence that the Communist Party was guilty of plotting the overthrow of the government or that the individual defendants had engaged in any such activities. The court went farther and in the best American tradition deplored prosecution for opinion. Judge Jones's plea for the wisdom of giving people "an opportunity to let off a little steam . . . against the possible wrongdoings of the government" would have delighted Holmes.

Bombing Tactics and a Western Front

THE recent promises of new fronts against Germany suggest that blows are being planned not only against the "soft under-belly of Europe" but against the Nazi's hard breastworks in the north and northwest. The advantages of striking near to the heart of the Axis are obvious. Moreover, an offensive launched across the Channel or the North Sea involves the minimum strain on Anglo-American shipping and enormously facilitates the provision of air support. On the other hand, the Germans have been intensively fortifying these coasts for more than two years, and if called upon to repel invasion, would be able to use the most complete network of communications in Europe for the purpose of bringing up reinforcements and supplies.

We have to take into account also the fact that, despite tremendous losses on the eastern front, the Axis still commands more trained man-power than do the Allies. Thus an attempt to penetrate the western defenses of "Fortress Europe" is not a task that can be undertaken without tremendous risks until means have been found of nullifying the factors favorable to the defensive.

Fortunately the means are at hand. Anglo-American air power is now growing rapidly on the basis of a productive capacity far exceeding that of the Axis. Fighting on three fronts—Russia, Africa, and Western Europe—the Luftwaffe is being forced to spread its strength ever more thinly. It has lost its superiority in the west and can only retaliate weakly against massive raids on German cities.

The idea that Germany can be knocked out by bombing alone has very little influential support; almost all authorities agree that invasion by land forces is essential to its final collapse. But air power can and must prepare the way by softening the inner defenses of Hitler's fortress, by crippling his war industries, disorganizing his transport facilities, and disintegrating the morale of troops and civilians alike.

This is the contention of a striking new book "The Air Offensive Against Germany" (Henry Holt, $2) written by Allan A. Michie, who as a correspondent has studied the war on many fronts. Mr. Michie has derived much of his material from official British sources and evidently reflects to a considerable extent the views of Air Marshal Sir Arthur Harris, chief of Britain's Bomber Command. It was Harris who last summer, at the time of the great thousand-plane raid on Cologne, warned Germany that an all-out bombing offensive was about to start. The plans on which he based this statement have, however, since been disrupted. Planes he was counting on had to be diverted to other theaters, and the support he was expecting from the American Air Force in Britain failed to materialize. The R. A. F. has continued to wreak havoc on German cities, but it has not been possible to administer to the fifty key centers of production the kind of paralyzing punch which Cologne, Essen, and one or two other places have suffered.

This does not mean that the R. A. F. has been wasting its time. Mr. Michie provides an impressive catalogue of vital war factories destroyed. He quotes from reports compiled by the R. A. F. showing the extent to which German economic life has been disorganized by the forced evacuation of millions and by the wholesale destruction of houses. There is no doubt that bombing has seriously reduced the efficiency of the German production front, but the dose has not yet been heavy enough to cause the kind of breakdown which would open the way to an invasion.

The R. A. F. experimented with mass daylight bombing early in the war but soon decided that when directed against heavily defended objectives it was too costly. The Luftwaffe reached the same conclusion only after suffering tremendous losses in the Battle of Britain. Daylight precision bombing, however, remains the central feature of American air tactics. It has been defended by a number of American authorities as making possible round-the-clock bombing of German objectives, with American planes attacking by day and the British by night. Actually, nearly all the American raids in the past eight months have been directed against targets in France. Only twice have the Flying Fortresses and Liberators ventured over Germany itself, and on both occasions the chosen target areas were northwestern coastal areas. No attempt yet has been made against any objective which would require a long flight across enemy territory in the course of which successive waves of Nazi fighters would be encountered. Mr. Michie suggests that such a raid would prove extremely expensive since the bombers would be forced to exhaust their ammunition beating off a series of attacks.

There is no doubt that daylight precision bombing can effect the maximum damage on the enemy when conditions are favorable. But they seldom are in Western Europe, Mr. Michie points out, for owing to the prevalence of mist and ground haze objectives are usually not clearly enough defined to allow perfect aiming from a great height.

The situation then, according to this book, is that saturation bombing of Germany is called for as a preliminary to invasion of the Continent. But the R. A. F. alone has not enough bombers to do the job, and as long as the American Army Air Force sticks to its theories, it cannot play a major part in the battle.

There are technical questions involved in this controversy on which we do not feel able to pass judgment. Mr. Michie, however, has stated his case moderately and backed it with impressive facts and figures. It clearly deserves close consideration, and it is disappointing to find the army dismissing it by means of a statement by Major General Eaker, air commander in Europe, declaring that "well-meaning individuals" who argue against daylight bombing are "more dangerous to the Allied cause than any fifth column." This resort to abuse can only strengthen the impression that the army would rather lose a battle than revise a doctrine.

Hitler's Subtlest Poison

THE Jews of occupied Europe could do with a little less pity and a little more help. We are tired of statements from Washington and London deploring the mass murder of the Jews by Hitler and declaring that the moral conscience of the world is shocked thereby. The truth is that the moral conscience of the American and British governments, always flexible, is not so much shocked as blunted. For when definite measures are proposed to help the victims of these horrors, the State Department and the British Foreign Office, though ever so politely, turn away.

A dispatch from London to the New York Times reveals that Rumania is willing to permit the transfer of 70,000 Jews who have been driven by the Nazis out of their homes and into the border territory of Trans-Dniestria. The Papal Nuncio is prepared to handle the arrangements, and the Vatican will supply its flag to protect the necessary shipping. If no ships are available the refugees could be sent by land to Istanbul and through Turkey to Palestine. Has the State Department followed this up at the Vatican? Is the British Foreign Office willing to let these poor folk join others of their people in Palestine? The answer, of course, is no, but that need not remain the answer if American editors and organizations bring pressure on Washington for action.

Men cannot accustom themselves to stand silent and indifferent before injustice and inhumanity anywhere without subtly poisoning and coarsening their relations with one another everywhere; without weakening the impulses that make for the preservation of freedom and justice; without undermining their will to resist the despot and the tyrant. The value to Hitler of butchering the Jews of occupied Europe lies precisely in the corroding effect that the repetition of cruelty and familiarity with arbitrary and barbarous government have upon the moral fiber of the democracies. That we are already becoming calloused is shown by the apathy that greeted the publication by the American Jewish Congress of the documented story of Nazi atrocities against the Jews, though the story itself is unparalleled in the long history of persecution. It is too late to help the dead, but there is still time to help the living. Let us start with the 70,000 in Trans-Dniestria.

The Red Star Rises

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

NO WEEKLY journal can match the tempo of the Russian advance. Leagues are covered while the presses run, and discussion of the significance of the recapture of Kharkov is made meaningless by the fall of Krasnograd. The only interesting speculations are those which themselves advance far beyond the present front and consider the consequences of a Russian victory more sweeping than the boldest "expert" dared suggest a month ago. The Nazis' 1941 "winter line" has already been overrun and its key anchors lost. Observers in Washington and in neutral observation towers in Stockholm and Berne have begun to talk about a probable stabilization of the front along the line running from the Baltic to Odessa—a line backed by the Pripet Marshes and the upper reaches of the Dnieper River. But the Soviet army may break through these predicted positions as it has through those established in earlier guesses. And even if the experts are right and a combination of spring thaws and extended communications checks the Red Army, it seems most unlikely that the depleted and exhausted Nazi troops can launch another major offensive this spring—much less conquer Russia in the long run. In spite of the losses and hard fighting that lie ahead, Stalin has won the Battle of Russia.

Reactions in the West to this tremendous reversal on the eastern front are curious and contradictory. Official public comment is, on the whole, carefully enthusiastic. The tributes to the Red Army on its triumphant anniversary were generous and sounded genuine. But the anxiety now openly expressed in many conservative quarters—even by some persons wholly in favor of fighting Hitler to a finish—shows how precarious are the underpinnings which hold up our alliance with Russia. Opinion in these quarters seems to be almost equally divided between a conviction that Russia will stop fighting any moment now, leaving the other Allied powers in the lurch and Hitler in control of Western Europe, and a fear that Russia will not stop fighting at all but will push on and on until all Europe is engulfed in the Bolshevik tide. Both fears, in their most extreme form, are absurd. Both have a few seeds of reality which circumstances might nourish.

Stalin is neither an altruist nor a fool. Neither is he an imperialist. He never wanted to be dragged into a world war. He wanted the security of Russia's frontiers. He was ready, from the time the Soviet Union joined the League, to accept the obligations of collective security, seeing in this method the only chance of averting the disaster that has overwhelmed the world. As long as any hope remained, his Foreign Minister, Maxim Litvinov, fought a tenacious fight at Geneva to turn the pretense of collective action into a reality. The betrayal of Spain by the major Western powers practically ended Russia's dream of a united front against the Axis threat. The collective surrender at Munich, and the exclusion of Russia from the four-power conference that emerged from it, drove Litvinov out of office and the Soviet Union into isolation. And the explicit knowledge that the Chamberlain government had been trying to interest Hitler in a campaign of expansion to the east rather than a general European war was not calculated to quiet Stalin's deep-rooted suspicions of the Western powers.

Russia will never again willingly permit itself to be jockeyed into such a position. And today it is strong enough to choose the policy which will best serve its national interests. That policy might be either one of armed isolation, buttressed by a group of satellite states, or one of conquest and revolution. It is up to the other Allied powers, Britain and the United States in particular, to decide whether they want a victorious Russia to adopt either of those courses. A return to pre-war power politics, built on a system of reactionary states held together by American food and Allied arms, would confirm Russia's old fears—fears which Allied foreign policy during the war has done little to dispel. If control in post-war Europe is restored to the elements in each country that fear social change above all else and seek only to protect the privileges of church and army and business, then Russia will make trouble—not because Stalin is an imperialist bent on conquest or an altruist concerned with extending the benefits of collectivism to the rest of Europe, but because he is selfishly concerned with ending the threat of Western power politics to his own position and Russia's security.

Peace with Russia can be won and kept by creating a Europe in which democratic elements control the diplomacy of each nation, in which the ordinary people control the government, in which collective security means more than pompous resolutions adopted by statesmen with fingers crossed and tongue in cheek. Harold Laski's article in this week's issue, though directed primarily to British labor, offers the only promising prescription for creating such a Europe. It should be read by all those fear-mongers who shiver at the westward march of the Red Army. Unfortunately they are the ones least likely either to see or to heed it.

Eight Hopeful Congressmen

BY RICHARD H. ROVERE

Washington, February 20

“FRANKLY I don't know what to do. Before I came to Washington I had a good, responsible job. I could measure the results of my work. Here I do nothing but sit and listen and get hopping mad. I'm a liberal, but there aren't many liberals where I come from, and I can't depend for support on a few people in Chicago or New York. If I say what I think, I'll never see the next session. If I compromise on the small things and wait for the big ones, I'm likely to lose my own self-respect, and I'll probably lose the next election too. I don't know what to do, but I know damn well I'm not a professional politician, and I don't have to do this for a living.”

Realistic, if not too hopeful, these remarks by one of the few newly elected liberals to the House of Representatives suggest the dilemma confronting his colleagues, though most of them do not share his sense of futility. In the light of Congressional antics during the past few weeks, it may be cold comfort to learn that there are any liberals at all in the Seventy-eighth Congress. Exactly how many there are it is yet impossible to say, for many Congressmen are still unknown quantities even to their fellows. But I recently talked with eight, and there are others, perhaps eight more, in addition to the handful left over from the preceding Congress. Most of them, more sanguine than the one I have quoted, point out that strictly on party lines the balance of forces is fairly even, and that in close fights the weight of the liberals can make itself felt. At any rate they are ready to try.

Who are these men? How, in a year when the tides were running the other way, did they manage to get elected? Except to say that all are liberals of firm conviction, it is difficult to generalize about them. Aside from Will Rogers, Jr., none of them was well known outside his own district before the election. All are solidly behind the President's foreign policy, and most of them made that their chief campaign issue. But not all were elected because of this view, and some won in spite of it. All are sympathetic to labor and were supported by the unions, but four of the eight come from rural areas where the labor vote is insignificant. The truth seems to be, as so often it is in American politics, that they were elected less because of their stand on specific issues than because they appeared to the voters to be more honest and reasonable men than their opponents.

George E. Outland of California is one of three professors among the new liberals. Coming from a district made up of four agricultural counties along the coast, he was bitterly opposed by the Associated Farmers, the powerful pressure group of California's large landholders. He won by 784 votes in a race so close that its outcome was not known until the absentee ballots of soldiers came in from the fighting fronts. The job of selling himself to voters was made no easier by the fact that he argued against confiscation of the land and machinery belonging to Japanese farmers moved inland after Pearl Harbor.

Before he took up teaching, Outland was a social worker who specialized in the problems of boys. After graduating from Whittier College in California and taking advanced degrees at Yale and Harvard, he worked at the Hale and Denison settlement houses in Boston and at the Neighborhood House in Los Angeles. In all three places he was in charge of boys' work. He is the author of "Boy Transiency in America," a standard book on the subject, and for a time he succored youthful hoboes as the California director of the Federal Transient Service. Later he taught sociology and government at Yale and Santa Barbara State College.

Most of Outland's attributes are of the sort one always associates with the successful leadership of young men. He is decisive in his opinions, aggressive, and physically formidable. But there is about him none of the prim smugness of a Gene Tunney. His ideas are generous and carefully conceived. An intense person, he looks upon Congress as a place in which to fight. "I've been wanting to fight fascism ever since Franco started this war, and now I've got the chance," he told me, as if he could swing at Hitler from the House floor. He is on the Labor Committee, and he wants to put up a fight for the National Youth Administration, a particular interest of his, and for post-war social legislation.

Michael J. Mansfield, Democrat, of Missoula, Montana, is the successor of Jeannette Rankin, the one pacifist in the Seventy-seventh Congress. He is far from being a pacifist himself. He has been in all three services and from his experience has come a desire to befriend all service men. At the time of the last war he was only fourteen. But he lied about his age and was accepted by the navy. In 1919 he received an honorable discharge, but having no other trade, he promptly enlisted in the army. After a two-year hitch, he got out of the army and joined the marines. He served abroad in the Philippines, China, Japan, and Siberia. A good part of his time he spent studying the culture and problems of the countries where he was stationed. When he left the Marine Corps, he found himself with no money and still no training for anything but the life of a professional fighting man. For several years he worked in the Butte copper mines and studied on the side. In 1929, when he was twenty-seven, he was admitted to Montana State University. He specialized in history and political science. When he graduated in 1933, the university hired him as an instructor in those subjects, and he studied for a master's degree. He taught at Missoula until his election last fall.

Although he is intensely concerned about the war and is a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Mansfield wants to concentrate his energies on issues closer home. Strongly pro-labor, he is a charter member of the American Federation of Teachers.

Daniel Ellison, Republican, of Maryland, is first of all a clean-government man. No other issue, he feels, could account for his election last year from a Baltimore district in which there are three Democrats to every Republican. He took a strong stand on the war, but so did his opponent, and he doubts whether that had anything to do with the election. He is a liberal in domestic affairs, too, but even so he feels that he was elected only because he had a long and clean record in city politics.

Compared with a man like Mansfield, Ellison's background is prosaic. He was born and brought up in Baltimore. He studied law at Johns Hopkins and the University of Maryland and has been practicing it in Baltimore for more than two decades. For the past twenty years he has been a member of the City Council, and in all but one of his five four-year terms he has been the only Republican member. He has a reputation in Baltimore as an honest politician, and when he decided to run for Congress last year, he got the Republican vote and about 35 per cent of the Democratic vote. He is the first Republican in his seat since 1896. The Baltimore Sunpapers lined up the middle class for him, and the unions got out the labor vote. In fact, almost no one but his opponent came out against him.

In Congress Ellison is likely to be a quiet but effective worker. Cautious and scholarly in his approach to a problem, he is also a capable politician, as is evidenced by the way he has upset Baltimore tradition.

Walter H. Judd, Republican, of Minneapolis, defeated Oscar Youngdahl, a veteran of the House isolationist bloc, in the Minnesota primaries last autumn. By profession Judd is a surgeon. As a young man during the last war he served as a medical officer in the field artillery. Until 1938, except for two years of study and practice at the Mayo Clinic, he was a Congregationalist medical missionary to China. In that year the Japanese blasted him out of house and home and took over the large mission hospital of which he was supervisor. No way remained for him to help China except to come home and carry on the fight in America.

A Nebraskan by birth, Judd stumped the Middle West for two years asking for aid to China. Often he made as many as three or four addresses a day. But although he spoke eloquently, the results in that period of appeasement were discouraging. Feeling that it was a waste of his energies, he gave up speaking and settled down in Minneapolis. He had acquired a large and prosperous practice by the time bombs fell on Pearl Harbor. Suddenly people began to remember his warnings against Japan, and the hundreds of talks made two years before became tangible assets. The Cowles newspaper interests boomed him for Congress, and the unions supported him. He beat Youngdahl in the primaries and won by a fairly narrow margin over his Democratic opponent, whose views on most questions differed only slightly from Judd's.

Judd is a small, frail man of tremendous nervous energy. Although he is not too optimistic about what he can do in Congress, he has a program neatly prepared for himself. "I want to get to the bottom of the State Department business," he told me. "I thought the White Book was the most insipid kind of apology for the most insipid kind of policy. I'm eager to see what can be done about that, and I want to do all I can for China. Two very practical things can be done: to end the poll tax and the immigration exclusion act. Both of them rankle in the mind of the Orient. We may win the war without getting rid of them, but we won't be able to prevent another one."

When I saw Will Rogers, Jr., he had just finished dictating a batch of letters to the mothers of boys in the army tank-destroyer division. He wanted to assure them, he told me, that in that branch of the army their sons would be well fed and cared for. Before he came to Congress Rogers was attached to the tank destroyers for seven months, and he is deeply devoted to them. That nostalgic sentimentality is perhaps the only way, apart from the strong physical resemblance, in which Will Rogers, Jr., is like Will Rogers, Sr.

Will Rogers, Jr.

Young Rogers is earnest, almost solemn, where his father was spoofing; militantly partisan where his father was a friend to everybody. He is terribly serious about the responsibility he bears as a young man of fighting age who was whisked from the army into Congress by his friends and supporters in the suburbs of Los Angeles. In the election campaign which put him into office Rogers played almost no part. He was in officers' candidate school, working for his lieutenant's bars.

Long before the war, however, Rogers was deeply involved in politics. He had been in Germany with his parents around the time that Hitler came to power. Later he was a correspondent in Spain for the McNaught Syndicate, and he was greatly moved by the tragic end of the republic. As publisher of the Beverly Hills Citizen, which he edited with journalistic distinction, he contributed a great deal toward making the motion-picture colony consciously anti-fascist. He was a logical choice, therefore, to run against Leland Ford, one of the cleverest of the Dunderheads. Rogers won by 10,000 votes, and his is perhaps the only clear case in which foreign policy was as much an issue in the voters' minds as in the candidate's.

Rogers is a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee. He makes no bones about his dislike of the State Department. "I think the whole mess in the State Department ought to be investigated by Congress," he said. "I don't like the Peyrouton affair, and I was disgusted by the White Book. I want an investigation as soon as possible." Alone among the new liberals, he was able to get the floor to speak against the Dies committee in the recent debate on appropriations. He is appalled by the berserk hatred for Roosevelt which he has encountered among his Congressional colleagues. In a radio speech made a few weeks after the session began, he remarked with astonishment that some of them were not above attacking the President through his wife and through his sons fighting on the battlefield. If these Congressmen dared to say to the men of his anti-tank force what they have said on the floor of the House, Rogers declared, "they would have their faces punched."

LaVern R. Dilweg of Green Bay, Wisconsin, also was elected as a liberal Democrat, but the fact that he was an all-American end for Marquette University and the Green Bay Packers unquestionably did him no harm. Tall, dark, and handsome, with a glint in his eyes as steely as Gary Cooper's, he could have won plenty of votes on any ticket. Fifteen years ago Dilweg was known as one of the outstanding athletes in the country. After Marquette he signed up with the Packers, then as now one of the most powerful of all professional football teams. His prestige in the athletic world was not diminished by his marriage to Eleanor Coleman, the swimming champion.

Dilweg got out of football in 1933 and devoted himself to his legal practice, which he had built up in the time he could spare from the Packers. Much of his work was done for farm cooperatives and trade unions. Since 1934 he has handled legal assignments for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the Federal Housing Administration. These connections and his association with his partner, G. R. Clifford, a liberal attorney, unquestionably molded his politics. At any rate, it was Clifford who persuaded him to oppose Joshua L. Johns, a Republican Representative who, together with Hamilton Fish, had toured the country for America First. Dilweg had the support of the Progressive Party and the personal aid of Senator La Follette.

When I asked him to what he attributed his victory over Johns, Dilweg told me a good deal about the local farm situation and his program for domestic reform. Then he added, just a trifle shamefacedly, "Most people are hero-worshippers, you know. Of course they don't always realize it, it's subconscious and all that." When the opposition called him a Communist in the campaign, he simply asked the voters if they could imagine an all-American end being a Communist. They could not. All his campaign literature carried the 1942 schedule of the Green Bay Packers. Dilweg has the makings of a popular political figure. It is a fairly safe bet that he will represent the Eighth Wisconsin District for some time.

Harold C. Hagen, Farmer-Laborite of Crookston, Minnesota, is a new Congressman, but he is hardly new to Congress. For the past eight years he has been secretary to his predecessor, Richard T. Buckler. Twice in that period he was president of the Congressional Secretaries Club, and in 1937 his colleagues honored him by naming him the most valuable secretary in Congress. For a time he was parliamentarian of the "Third Congress," a kind of mock legislature made up of employees of both houses. In Washington he has been known as a more influential figure than many an elected Congressman.

Word of these distinctions got back to northern Minnesota, and when Representative Buckler, who was in his eighties, decided last year to retire and back his secretary as a suitable successor, Hagen had an easy time of it. Like Buckler in the last session, Hagen is the only Farmer-Laborite in Congress.

He is a liberal by inheritance as well as by conviction. Fifty years ago his parents came to Crookston from Sweden and immediately began to publish a Populist weekly, Vesterheimen, which for years was the Bible of Scandinavian farmers in the corn belt. Hagen edited the paper himself after his father's death, but not for long, for by that time the need for a Swedish newspaper had passed. After a period as a school teacher he became editor of the Polk County Leader.

The eight years he spent as Buckler's aide have made Hagen an excellent strategist. He knows what it is possible to do in Congress and what is impossible. He is neither as hopeful nor as despairing as some of the other liberals. His enthusiasm for the war far exceeds his party's, and although there is no real labor movement in his district, he is strongly pro-labor.

Howard J. McMurray is among the most interesting of the newcomers. He is a short, quick-spoken man in his early forties; a university professor, urbanely academic, rather than pedantic. Before he taught political science at the University of Wisconsin, he was an executive of several large air lines in the Middle West. A licensed pilot and an aviation enthusiast, he was on his way into the army air force when some of his neighbors urged him to run against Lewis D. Thill, one of the worst obstructionists in the last Congress.

The Milwaukee district which Thill represented is traditionally isolationist and heavily populated by people of German descent. In recent elections it has consistently gone Republican. No set-up could have seemed more unpromising for a man of McMurray's views. He had spoken for armed intervention as early as the summer of 1940. As a lecturer he had frequently indorsed Clarence Streit's Union Now, and last summer he addressed a conference of the Union for Democratic Action at Fond du Lac. In seeking the Democratic nomination and in campaigning against Thill, he insisted that the war was the principal issue, and he did not hesitate to advance his neo-Wilsonian views on the peace. Yet he won by 6,000 out of a total of 98,000 votes in a three-cornered race.

McMurray is an ardent internationalist. He thinks that foreign policy is of transcendent importance, and he sits on the Foreign Relations Committee. But he is a liberal in domestic policy too. A few years ago, when he was working for his doctorate at Madison, he wrote a thesis on the influence of the university on Wisconsin liberalism. At the time he was an admirer of the La Follette movement but is so no longer. I got the impression that he has fears for the future of the Progressive Party, some of whose leaders, he believes, have dangerously demagogic inclinations.

Even added to the few aging Young Turks who have survived recent elections and to whatever other new liberals may turn up, these newcomers may be unable to initiate policies, but there are other ways in which they can be effective. Three of them are members of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and two serve on the Labor Committee. A veteran of Congressional liberalism recently told me that in his experience the progressives are always at their best when their only possible job is to pose issues, not settle them. There will be plenty of issues to pose in 1943 and 1944.

Howard McMurray

The Charming Mr. Baruch

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 19

BERNARD M. BARUCH, who has been building up his personal influence for months from a suite in the Carlton, is expected to return to power as a result of the renewed battle which has broken out between civilian war-production authorities and the armed services. This growing influence has many sources. Baruch is shrewd and charming. He likes people. He has money. Several Southern Senators and Director of Economic Stabilization James F. Byrnes are beholden to him for past campaign contributions and also for his good advice and friendship, for Baruch is no ordinary fat cat of politics.

Baruch gets along equally well with conservatives and New Dealers. He is consulted by Cordell Hull and he is consulted by Ben Cohen. He has more understanding of social issues than is common in one of his class and background. But while he does not pander to the vulgar prejudices which pass for political thinking in some sections of Wall Street, he is safe enough by their standards, as the Baruch rubber report showed. Whether or not the Standard Oil crowd took him into camp, they certainly got what they wanted from him. He may not have been as gullible as Conant or as complaisant as Compton, his colleagues on the rubber board, but he went along. The reward, for Baruch, was the kind of favorable publicity the press reserves for those who serve its ultimate masters. For Baruch, it was a glorious return to the spotlight, and his vanity is commensurate with his ability, which is admittedly great.

Why do so many people consult Baruch? He has been around for a long time and knows the ropes. He has sense. He is simpatico. He has a capacity for smoothing out ruckuses, a valuable talent in a town as full of them as Washington. He knows how to handle the press. The picture he has built up of himself is that of a contented old man feeding the squirrels from a bench in the park opposite the White House and occasionally running into old friends who stop to chat a while with him. This is a masterpiece of public relations. When Cissie Patterson's sheet disturbed this idyllic picture with the story of the big dinner party for Hopkins, Baruch hastened to wipe out the nasty story with a $1,000,000 contribution to war charities. And judging from the way he is now treated in the Times-Herald, he must have Cissie eating out of his hand.

It is my impression that Mr. Roosevelt does not like Baruch. They are too much alike; both are charmers.

Mr. Roosevelt feels about Baruch as a young married woman does when her mother tries to help her by showing her the right way to handle a maid or a baby. He resented Al Smith's attempt to "help" him when he first succeeded Smith as Governor, and there is reason to believe that he has been irked by Baruch's burning desire to show him how really to run a war. Baruch's vigil in the park across the way may have been a boon to the squirrels, but it was an annoyance to the President. It was a kind of humble picketing—"Mr. Roosevelt is unfair to elder statesmen."

Now it looks as though Baruch's moment had come. The Under Secretaries of War and the Navy are furious with WPB Chairman Nelson for dismissing Vice-Chairman Ferdinand Eberstadt and giving full scheduling powers to Vice-Chairman C. E. Wilson. The army-navy crowd are powerful and united, and the President will have to do something to appease them. His usual method of dealing with these intra-Administration squabbles is to set up a new super-board, and the indications are that there will be a new one, with Baruch as top man, on production. The army and navy supply chiefs would like Baruch in that job because his conception, like theirs, is that the civilian agencies should concentrate on materials and leave procurement and scheduling to the military and naval supply services. Baruch is satisfactory to big business because he is a strong believer in leaving a major part of war production to the industry committees. But he is also smart enough to make considerable concessions to labor, perhaps also to work out a compromise under which Wilson would have enough power over scheduling to do his job.

This current quarrel can easily be over-simplified and over-dramatized. It is only superficially a military-civilian struggle. Only 9 per cent of the men in the War Department's services of supply are regular army officers; the rest are business men in uniform. It is a clash between two groups of big-business men, one linked with the military bureaucracy, the other somewhat tenuously allied with New Dealers and labor. I think it would be unfair to accuse the military crowd of bad motives. They fear interference with their supply programs if Wilson actually digs down into the job of scheduling, for to schedule he must rearrange contracts, and in rearranging he will be passing on whether we need this gun more than that tank. It is easy to understand the desire of the military to keep the supply program in their own hands. Unfortunately, when a $260-billion war order is suddenly imposed on an economy which never generated more than $80 billion worth of income a year, the whole structure must be tightened up if the job is to be done. I have a great deal of respect for Wilson and believe that he is right in this dispute, but I should like to see it peacefully resolved, for the Under Secretaries of War and Navy also command respect and consideration.

Nelson, a very weak man, fired Eberstadt and delegated all power to Wilson from fear as much as from conviction. He felt that Eberstadt and the army-navy crowd were out to get his job, and he is staking his future on Wilson. Wilson started out to break the bottlenecks in the war-production program. These bottlenecks are in items which go into the final manufacture of many different war materials. But to get more aluminum extrusions for aviation, he found that he needed power to rationalize and schedule aluminum production. This is not popular with the aluminum industry. And to get maximum production of aviation, Wilson found that he had to go to the other end of the process and try to change army-navy specifications. Obviously escort vessels can be built more quickly if you concentrate on one type instead of six, but at this end he stepped on the toes of a lot of admirals. It seems to me that the size of the program and its urgency point to the need for centralizing full control of the program in one man's hands, and that man a civilian. For only a civilian can mediate between army and navy.

In my opinion Eberstadt represented too completely the Wall Street monopolist point of view to do an all-out job, and his dismissal by Nelson was all to the good. But labor and liberals cannot stop short at supporting Nelson and Wilson and working for the Toland-Kilgore-Pepper bill for a streamlined civilian-headed war agency. Wilson will find it much easier to break bottlenecks, to force through emergency methods and the use of emergency facilities in making components, if instead of depending on industry committees as he now does he also has the help of labor and small-business committees. For a fight between big-business men is not likely to result in a more democratic war-production program, and if we are to meet this year's goals we need the fullest help from small business and labor as well as from big business.

Add Water and Serve

BY ROSS L. HOLMAN

WHATEVER else the war does to our way of life, it now appears to be going to revolutionize our eating habits. The increase in dehydrated food to meet war needs is tremendous. Dehydration means nothing more or less than taking another useless element out of food before offering it for sale. That is water. Selling food without water is like selling onions without the tops or chickens without the feathers. Tomatoes, for instance, are 95 per cent water. Quick drying reduces 100 pounds of them to about 5 pounds of red flakes. Nearly all the vitamins, minerals, calories, etc., are retained in those few pounds of still visible tomato. Beans, cabbage, carrots, and other vegetables are reduced to shreds, powders, flakes, or chips.

Dehydration is not altogether new, though it is just now becoming important enough for most of us to hear about it. We have been manufacturing dried milk and powdered eggs since the First World War. The Egyptians sun-dried certain meats thousands of years ago to preserve them until they were needed. But it took the pressure of bottlenecks and blitzkriegs to give the idea widespread application. In one respect the quick drying of food serves the same purpose as quick freezing. It keeps it from spoiling. If you want to preserve a strawberry by the latter method you smack it with a blast of sub-zero temperature that holds its food values in a state of suspended animation until ready to serve. It is now recognized that water is the thing that makes most perishable foods perish. So you dry out the water.

Before the war there was very little dehydration except of milk and eggs. But the army and navy found it fitting so well into our war strategy that it has grown rapidly. In 1940, 5,000,000 pounds of dried vegetables were processed by seven firms—mostly for soup mixes. The goal for the year ending June 30, 1943, is set at 100,000,000 pounds, and for the year following at 400,000,000. The production of dehydrated apples has been stepped up to a 1942 output of 28,000 tons as compared with 13,000 in 1940. Apricots rose from 10,600 tons to 24,700 in the same period; meat from practically nothing in 1940 to a projected 60,000,000 pounds in 1943 and 120,000,000 for the year after that. Even the production tops in eggs and milk, which represented nearly all our pre-war dehydrating industry, have increased tremendously, and in the case of eggs have been doubling and redoubling so many times they make you dizzy. From a measly 10,000,000 pounds in 1939, dried eggs leaped to 240,000,000 pounds in 1942, with a prospect of 300,000,000 pounds in 1943; and skim milk from 408,000,000 pounds to 600,000,000.

An industry that is allowed to skyrocket at a time when construction bottlenecks are accumulating like barnacles on a ship must have tremendous war usefulness. To begin with, it relieves the strain on our shipping when ships are worth their weight in priorities. One shipload of quick-dried foods is equivalent to ten shiploads of fresh. If dried foods had been shipped in the first year of lend-lease instead of the perishable products, the equivalent of eighty ships would have been saved for other duties. Think what it will mean in terms of the vastly increased transport needs of 1943-44. If these foods were handled fresh it would take thirty to forty times as much bottleneck metal to haul the useless water bound up in them as to build the dehydrating plants needed to blast it out. Also, if you ship perishables fresh you not only have to give them a lot of cargo space but provide for refrigerating machinery as well. Dried foods keep almost indefinitely in containers of fiber, paper, cellophane, and other materials. This fact has had vital significance since Japan took more than 90 per cent of the tin with which we used to do our canning.

The saving of bulk and weight in food supplies gives an army in the field more mobility and allows a besieged force to store enough food to hold out almost indefinitely.

One reason surrounded German garrisons in key Russian strongholds like Rzhev, Millerovo, and Stalingrad were so difficult to overcome was that food in dehydrated form was flown in to them by plane.

A paratrooper or commando can carry in his kit a three weeks' supply of food in the form of powders, flakes, and briquettes. He has only to add hot water, and dinner is ready. The extent to which our armed forces are making use of these different advantages is a military secret, but the tremendous increase in dehydrated foods is practically all devoted to war needs.

Even as a nation's armed might travels on its stomach, its peace-time existence cannot be kept peaceable if it hasn't enough food. That applies not only to our country but to the peoples of Europe, whom we shall have to feed until they can readjust themselves to a normal business economy. Our merchant ships can deliver dried foods ten times as fast as they were able to take food to Europe at the close of World War I. To the most critical areas, such as Greece, converted Flying Fortresses could each deliver ten tons of dried food with amazing speed.

Dehydration means a saving not only in storage space but in consumer costs. Freight costs, of course, will be cut tremendously. Moreover, these dried foods can be packed in cheap containers. Soup powders may be put in envelopes; tomato flakes in cardboard packages like cereals; oyster powders in oversized capsules. Beans, carrots, onions, potatoes, cabbage, beets, and other perishables will be reduced to flakes, powders, shreds, or chips, and reconstituted (or rehydrated) on the consumer's table by the addition of hot water. Some foods, such as string beans, can, when freshened with water, be restored almost to their original appearance. In a recent test some army dietetic experts were served fresh and dehydrated vegetables at the same meal and couldn't tell the difference.

"STRAIGHTENING THE LINE"

During World War I crude efforts were made to dehydrate potatoes, but the resulting product was nothing to smack the lips over. Consumption of it by the A. E. F. was part work and part patriotism. Our present dried potatoes do not taste like cured swamp grass but like the spuds they are supposed to be.

While the leakage in vitamins varies with the class of foods dehydrated, the average loss, according to experts, is usually not more than 10 per cent. In many cases the vitamin deterioration is less than that of the fresh vegetables or fruits to be found on grocery counters.

Many authorities visualize the coming industry as an efficient method of storing crop surpluses. Perishable foods will not have to perish or be expensively refrigerated. The unused abundance of bountiful crop years will be dried and held in an ever-normal larder for years of scarcity, and thus the peaks and valleys of production will be smoothed out.

Dehydration is done in different ways, depending on the food processed and the company doing the processing. One manufacturer dries tomatoes by reducing them to a paste and spraying them on a steam-heated drum. The paste covers the drum in a thin layer 3/1000 of an inch thick, and when dried out is scraped off in a thin sheet like red tissue paper. This is broken, ground and packaged for market. In general, dehydration utilizes high temperatures, forced circulation of air, and sometimes controlled humidity.

Since practically all dried foods are now used for army, navy, and lend-lease, no one can predict with certainty just how our peace-time consumer market will respond to this method of processing. Dried-out food shreds are not going to have the show-window attraction of fresh garden and orchard products. An unprocessed juicy red apple will still have its juicy red appeal. But even if the dried-food boom is deflated by post-war conditions, there will not have to be any serious scrapping of plants. Practically all present dehydration is handled by established food industries which have merely added quick-drying equipment to their existing processing facilities. Deflation, however, is improbable. The dehydrating industry offers too many advantages to the consumer to be easily killed off.

In the Wind

REPRESENTATIVE HUGH D. SCOTT, JR., of Pennsylvania, contributed this thought to the celebration of Lincoln's Birthday in Philadelphia: "It might be just as well if the war doesn't end too soon. For if it does, it will mean that Russia will occupy most of Europe, particularly the capitals of Vienna and Berlin. . . . The American people are sore at New Deal nonsense. They are tired of fools in high places. It is time for the Republicans to take over. We are of the best stock . . . and represent the real grit, brains, and backbone of America."

BUT STALIN, it now appears, is not a Communist after all. Thomas F. Woodlock, associate editor of the Wall Street Journal, writes in the magazine America, "There is no evidence that Stalin is much more interested in Communist ideology than he is in any other ideology."

THE LINDBERGH WITNESSES, a spiritualist organization of Lindbergh admirers, objects to Paul McNutt's classification of mediums and ushers as non-essential workers. "Ushers," it says, "form a very essential part of every church service and are made up of judges, lawyers, and substantial business men. . . . One of the staunchest friends mediums ever had is Mr. McNutt's own chief, Franklin D. Roosevelt."

WANT AD in the Boulder, Colorado, Daily Camera: "School Board election, May 3. W. F. Luhnnow, editor, will purchase 500-word essays. Subject: The protection of our children from bastard Americans through the ousting of alien ideologists and their dupes from the supervision of American education." Mr. Luhnnow is not the editor of the Camera.

NORWEGIAN UNDERGROUND sources report that the annual apprentice festival of the Oslo Handicraft Society, which used to attract about 400 people, attracted only one this year. He was the son of the Nazi official in charge.

FROM ENGLAND comes word that the Ipswich Trades Council and Labor Party has gone on record as "of the opinion that the growing 'Vansittart' mentality, as expressed in some recent speeches by British national leaders, is to be deplored because its effect is to strengthen the Nazi grip upon the German workers and so lengthen the war."

QUID PRO QUO: During the recent debate on the Dies committee Hamilton Fish read to the House a telegram from William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, urging the committee's continuation. A week later Mr. Fish paid off by denouncing the Hobbs "anti-racketeering bill" as a "gratuitous affront" to organized labor, which he pointed out had kept its no-strike pledge to the extent of 99.7 per cent.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Platform for the Left

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, January

THE last months have given us all, at long last, the right to hope. The superb courage of the Russians, the turn of the tide in North Africa, the unbreakable endurance of the enslaved peoples, the growing strength of the United Nations, all these are an assurance that the peak of Nazi power has been passed. No doubt there will still be setbacks and disappointments. No doubt, also, the road before us will prove hard and grim and long. But all rational calculation entitles us to believe that decisive victory lies at the end of the road.

I suggest that it is time for the working-class movement of the world to prepare itself to use the victory. For the triumph will have been the work of the common man. It is his effort that has made possible the organization of resistance and the preparation of the weapons. His, too, has been the faith which, even in the darkest hour, has never wavered. When all the credit is given to the four great leaders of the United Nations, the foundation of their achievement has been their ability to evoke from ordinary men and women a quality of determination that has not been surpassed in history.

The hour of victory may well prove the hour of danger unless the workers are ready to act. At present, they are gravely divided. Ideological differences still keep Socialist and Communist apart. National differences are still allowed to transcend the common interests they all share. The Third International remains a pale wraith of the Soviet Foreign Office. The Second International has become a complex debating society in which bewildered phantoms search in the angry emotions of the past for the means to prevent the unity of the future. The emigration has reached that ultimate phase of tragic futility where some of its members spend more energy on hating one another than on building the basis of a common policy. That fraternity which is essential if the workers are to win the fruits of victory is hardly visible. There is no common doctrine. There is no common policy. There is lacking even the effort in a serious way to formulate either—and there is no serious means either of discussing the problems we have to solve or of formulating the attitude we ought to take to each of the massive issues by which we are confronted. There are eminent Socialists from foreign lands among us in Britain, some of whom occupy posts in the provisional governments of their countries. But they do not speak to the peoples of the world with that single voice which is so vital to the future. Even propaganda to the enemy countries by Socialists is confused and uncertain.

I admit at once that a heavy responsibility for this position rests upon the British Socialist movement. It has failed to mobilize, still less to unify, the resources it could have commanded; and some, at any rate, of its leaders have been so moved by the passions which war lets loose that they have been anxious to stigmatize as new enemies those whom they should have recognized as old friends. Not less important has been the failure, so far, of British socialism to build any effective relation with the progressive forces in America, in China, and in India, and to insist that if, when the war ends, there is to be a continuance of that fratricidal strife which did so much to wreck the labor movements of Italy and Germany, and to blunt their strength elsewhere, the result of the war for freedom may well be the achievement only of a more bitter slavery.

I suggest to my comrades of the international Socialist movement that it is time we began seriously to understand one another. We have to bring into being an organization which can prepare for that use of the victory which is possible only with serious preparation. We are relying upon chance improvisations, which brought disaster after 1918, and will bring disaster again unless we have an agreed policy for which, from now on, we ask in all ways open to us the support of the workers everywhere as the day of liberation begins to dawn.

What are the objectives for which we must seek agreement? The list which follows I put forward for discussion merely; it does not claim to represent more than the matters which seem important to me. Others might make a different list, or set them in a different perspective than I do. I present my list because of my conviction that the time has come for an effort by Socialists to agree on a policy for attaining these objectives; and I am convinced that those who seek to hinder this effort are guilty of an irresponsibility before our problems which history will regard as a betrayal of the workers.

The objectives upon which agreement seems to me urgent are as follows:

1. An approach to the Soviet Union with the purpose of ending the schism between the internationals before hostilities cease.
2. An undertaking to do all we can (a) to safeguard the security of the Soviet Union in the period of reconstruction, and (b) to promote friendly relations between the Russian working class and the workers of other countries.

3. A resolve to prevent, so far as we can, any attempt by the victorious governments to hinder working-class revolutions, especially by the denial of relief to Socialist governments which take power.

4. A resolve to prevent, so far as we can, the assumption of power in the liberated countries by vested interests which have cooperated with Nazism or its associates, or been favorable to its growth in the period before the invasion of Norway and the Low Countries.

5. A resolve to prevent, so far as we can, the resumption of imperialist exploitation at the close of the war; and a resolve to assist India to the attainment of full self-government.

6. While insisting on the disarmament of Germany and the destruction among its people of the social and economic foundations of militarism, a resolve to prevent the imposition upon them of a peace of revenge.

7. A resolve to do all in our power, as organized Socialist movements, to secure racial and religious equality for all peoples everywhere, and to fight against any regime which directly or indirectly denies this equality.

8. A resolve to do all in our power to recognize the right of each nation to the fullest possible cultural independence; but, at the same time, a resolve to prevent a return to the anarchy of sovereign states by organizing, as the basis of peace, a new international authority with the power, backed by the possession of force, to impose law upon states in matters of common concern.

9. A resolve to do all in our power that the various forms of propaganda make possible to stir up revolution in the enemy states, and a refusal to support governments which seek to come to terms with Quislings, actual or potential, in them.

10. A resolve to do all in our power to liberate the Spanish people from the Franco regime, and a refusal to support any government of the United Nations in its effort to "appease" Franco.

11. A resolve to urge upon the governments of the United Nations the right of the enslaved peoples freely to choose whether they will accept the personnel of the provisional governments now in London when Hitler is defeated.

12. A resolve to do all in our power to give education its full status in the post-war world in the knowledge that planned democracy is only possible as citizens are adequately trained to political and economic understanding; and an insistence that this status for education is only available in that expanding economy which a capitalist society can no longer evoke.

13. A resolve to demand now that the necessary organization be created, and the necessary personnel trained, to embark upon hostilities measures of relief and rehabilitation as soon as hostilities cease; it being fully understood that after the defeat of Hitler and his associates this relief shall not be withheld from the people of the enemy countries.

14. A resolve to seek to bring home to the workers of the United States the danger, both to themselves and to workers all over the world, of a return by their government to isolationism, with its inevitable result of driving the business interests of America into a policy of economic imperialism.

These are the central tasks to which a renovated international in London could, as I think, usefully devote itself. They are not tasks being undertaken today. We admire the great Russian resistance; we ought to make our admiration the road to unity. We watch with horror the grim spectacle of General Franco handing over refugees to Hitler's torturers; we do not organize protest against the steps taken by Britain and America to strengthen his power. The time for internecine disputes has gone; the time for action has arrived. The strength of our enemies lies above all in our own divisions. They are an invitation to the aggressor in that class struggle which continues while the war lasts and will not end with our victory as nations. If we could learn now that our danger is not less great than our opportunity is supreme, we might build that unity in the field of class struggle which is the condition of the workers' emancipation. But we must act today if we are to act at all; history gives men the favorable moment, but it leaves to their courage and wisdom the insight which takes advantage of its opportunity.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

AMONG the casualties of the recent battles in Russia is a thesis that has been for many months a favorite with Nazi propaganda—a thesis summed up in the slogan "Time is working for us." It was introduced about the middle of 1942, and was occasioned by an unhappy memory. During the First World War the word went all over Germany: "The English lose the battles, but we lose the war." Some time last summer Germans recalled this, and began to whisper that things were going that way again, that in this war as in the last, in spite of all the battles that had been won, "time" was on the side of the enemy. The expression arose: "We are killing ourselves with victories." To combat this, Goebbels launched one of his longest and most persistent campaigns.

In contrast to his usual efforts, which almost without exception are addressed to the emotions, this one was given a rationalistic basis. Through seemingly dispassionate arguments he sought to prove that the situation today was just the opposite of what it had been in 1917 and 1918. While Germany in those years was really becoming weaker and weaker as the result of the blockade, now it was almost automatically becoming stronger and stronger as a result of its conquests. The more land Germany occupied the more additional sources of raw materials and food it won. And the better it organized these additional sources the farther it surpassed its antagonists in strength. "Who forces space to serve him, is served also by time." To demonstrate this, special emphasis was placed on the space conquered in Russia. France and the Balkans were passed over as relatively unimportant. But the Ukraine! And above all—way above all else—the incomparable black-earth region of the Donetz and the Don! That alone, under superior German administration, could feed half the continent.

The Donetz-Don-Caucasus region, and to a lesser degree the Ukraine, was the chief element in the thesis "Time is working for us." Hitler filled great sections of his speech of September 30—the one in which he announced that Stalingrad would surely be taken—with variations on the theme that possession of these inexhaustible regions made a German victory ultimately certain. On October 4 Göring presented the same region as a guaranty that food difficulties had been overcome for all time—"1941-42 was the last bad winter." He prophesied enormous returns from the harvest of 1943. Even that most pressing of all German deficits, the fat deficit, he said would finally be made up. "For miles along the Don and the Kuban, as far as the eye can see, are fields and fields of sunflowers, and as you know sunflower-seed oil is better than rape-seed oil." With every year that followed, as the disorganization of war was overcome and "rebuilding" made rapid progress under the German masterhand, the blessing would grow.

It is certain that this was not just propaganda. The Nazi government had set its hopes on these regions. Of course the grandiose work of "German restoration" was and remained imaginary. But at least part of the acres were sowed in the fall or prepared for the spring sowing. The Berlin mathematicians expected not only that the army would live on the products of these provinces but that considerable quantities of food could be transported to Germany. Thus the defeats in Russia, aside from their military significance, have wrecked all German plans for feeding the people in 1943-44. And this was the second time such a thing had happened. One not inconsiderable source of grain, vegetables, fruit, eggs, and meat was lost with Algiers and Morocco. Much greater supplies were expected from Russia, and their loss will have a most distressing effect on a balance that was already precarious. It can be foreseen with absolute certainty that in a few weeks, or at most months, the defeats between the Volga and the Dnieper will lead to a sensible reduction of the German food ration.

The slogan "Time is working for us" is no less a casualty. For weeks it has not been heard on anyone's lips or appeared anywhere in type. It has evaporated into nothing, leaving not a trace; and that is logical. The astonishing gospel that this time Germany was becoming not constantly weaker but constantly stronger was based exclusively on the possession of just these fabulous regions. Now that they have been lost, or are in imminent danger of being lost, the foundations of the thesis have been shattered. Goodbye to "Time is working for us." But what substitute is offered to Germans? By what argument will they be convinced that in six months the prospect is bound to be better than it is today and in twelve months still better? No plausible Ersatz argument has yet occurred to Goebbels's propaganda machine. Never has it been so plainly at its wits' end to find some halfway substantial fare with which to nourish hope.

A People's Poland

AN INTERESTING document has reached America recently: a program for a democratic Polish government. Entitled Underground Poland Speaks, it is the work of many anonymous people in Poland, representing the underground groups of peasants, workers, and democratic intelligentsia. The document comes to us through the Polish labor Group in New York.

The program deals with the tasks facing the first government of an independent Poland, outlining in the following terms the necessary immediate reforms:

(a) Agrarian reform. The great landed estates will be expropriated and turned into land reserves for parceling. These expropriated estates will be placed under the supervision of communal and district committees for land reform.

(b) Expropriation and transfer to the state, local governments, or cooperative organizations, of industrial enterprises which are suitable for socialization, and their utilization for social purposes.

(c) Reform of the fiscal system in the direction of a just distribution of the fiscal burden among all social groups.

(d) Annulment of all the decrees of the occupant [Germany] relating to the property and welfare of Polish citizens. All such property to be placed under the control of special agencies established for its supervision and protection.

(e) Proclamation of the criminal responsibility of all citizens who betrayed Poland and served the interests of the occupant.

(f) Establishment of special courts to try the officials, civil and military, of the pre-war regime who were responsible for the abuses perpetrated under that regime.

(g) The People's Government will establish a new electoral system for Parliament, based on democratic suffrage.

After formulating this basic policy, the program defines the essential conditions upon which the future Polish state must be based, among which the most important are: political democracy and parliamentary government, with effective safeguards; equality of rights without distinction of race or religion; an adequate system of local government; planned economy and industry, democratically controlled; a just distribution of the national income, with work as the only basis for a share in this income; recognition by the state of the essential role of trade unions, cooperatives, and similar bodies; strong economic and political ties with all the countries of Central Eastern Europe, especially with Czechoslovakia; a broad system of social insurance; an agrarian system based on small peasant holdings functioning within the wider framework of the cooperatives.

File and Remember

Moscow Speaks

THE Hitlerites have now joined the disinterested defenders of Europe. Goebbels's speech and Hitler's message on January 30 showed that the Hitlerites have again resurrected the Bolshevik danger to split the bloc of freedom-loving nations. Dragging out the obsolete and morally stilted watchword of the so-called Bolshevik danger is a sure indication of how Germany's ruling circles fear the imminent and inevitable sterile defeat. The Hitlerites cannot but see that the existence of a mighty coalition of freedom-loving peoples headed by the Soviet Union, Britain, and the United States dooms Hitlerite Germany to defeat.

Last summer and autumn the entire Hitlerite propaganda machine insistently tried to cause dissensions in the coalition of United Nations by stating that the second front would never be opened, as the British and Americans wanted to make the Soviet Union bear the whole brunt of the war. The Hitlerites had evidently reckoned that their temporary successes on the Soviet-German front could shake the fighting alliance between the Soviet Union, Britain, and the United States. These calculations suffered a complete crash. So now the Hitlerites are resorting to a new swindle, in undertaking the mission of defending Europe from bolshevism.—Moscow short-wave broadcast.

TVA for the Danube

It seems possible that Stalin, who will never make peace with Hitlerite Germany, might be satisfied, if he doubts Allied good-will, to drive the Germans from Russia and then leave the final defeat of the Germans to us. Again, it is almost certain that, as the Soviet armies advance, the resistance movement in Central and Southeastern Europe will see in the Soviet Union the one hopeful and unifying force. All these peoples are tired of being the cat's-paws of rival great powers; their need is for peasant liberation. On such a question there is every reason to strive for real agreement with the U. S. S. R. The Foreign Office may easily mishandle this situation; its tradition is not to plan anything ahead and to rely on the universal power of British money and the British fleet to improvise when the time comes. This is a most dangerous outlook today when British power is still large but its sphere of influence far more limited. The most foolish policy would be to attempt to interfere in areas where our strength does not enable us to do so with success. In that way we should lose the possibility of friendship with the Soviet Union, and we should yield with a bad grace when we might have come to an agreement with credit. Moreover, by failing frankly to discuss these problems of post-war as well as war policy with Stalin we neglect the best chance of a constructive peace, which lies in the development of functional services on the Continent—in the organization, as Mr. Wallace urges, of joint air services for Europe and the world, in the development of a TVA for the Danube Valley, now widely canvassed in a hundred exciting and constructive enterprises. Here we may have a real hope of collaboration with the Soviet Union, and a chance of a Europe which is not a breeding ground for another war.—The New Statesman and Nation (London).

A Partnership for the Future

There can be no doubt that one of the great magnetic forces in the future of Europe will be the Federation of Socialist States under the Soviet banner. There is nothing in this possibility that makes a free and prosperous Britain an impossibility provided we, too, read the signs of the times. If we are going to set up an alternative attraction of our own, made up of the Tories, the Girauds and Francos and Horthys, we shall antagonize all popular forces in France, Italy, Germany, and the Balkans. They will, naturally, seek help against our plans to foist the bankrupt statesmen once more upon their shoulders. They would naturally gravitate around Russia and against Britain.

This we must avoid in the common interest of Britain, Russia, and Europe. This we can avoid only by our frank declaration for the democratic and planned development of post-war Europe. We can do this only in partnership with the Soviet Union and the United States, and we can do it only if this policy is conducted by men who believe in it.—The Tribune (London).

His Majesty's Government

There are some in this country, not very many, I believe, who think that the existence of a Communist regime in Russia makes cooperation between our two countries in the long run impossible. I do not agree with them any more than I agree with those who think it is necessary to hold the Communist faith in order to cooperate with the Soviet Union in the field of international politics. It has not been my experience. In this connection Mr. Stalin himself recently made some observations which I should like to quote to the House. He said:

"It would be ridiculous to deny the existence of differences in the ideology and structures of the states which form the Anglo-Soviet-American coalition. But does this circumstance exclude the possibility of coordinated action by this coalition against the common enemy who threatens them with enslavement? Definitely it does not."

That also is the view of His Majesty's Government. When Mr. Stalin contemplates, as he clearly does in that speech, the extension of this three-power cooperation into the period of peace, I would say bluntly that in the maintenance of that cooperation lies the best chance of building a new and better international society after the war.—ANTHONY EDEN before the House of Commons.

ONE-SHOT-WHILE-THEY-LAST SALE OF GOOD BOOKS!

We are clearing our shelves of hundreds of books which won't be reprinted. This is necessary in order to make room for hundreds of new books now being planned. This means a wonderful chance to pick up numerous bargains AS LONG AS THE BOOKS LAST, WHICH CAN'T BE LONG. We feel positive it won't be necessary to reprint this advertisement. It's certain that it will clean out every title we want to dispose of. For that reason please act promptly. You can get a wonderful library of fine books at extremely low cost if you go through the list below now, check off the ones you want, and rush us your order.

As an added inducement we are figuring everything on a DELIVERED PRICE. Just send us the amount stated below and you'll get your parcel of books CARRIAGE CHARGES PREPAID. This sale positively closes when present stock is sold out. This is a new low in prices for these books. We promise to ship books the same day we receive your order. Remember, these are NOT Little Blue Books. They are our larger volumes, measuring 5½ x 8½ inches in size, which is slightly larger than the average library volume. Minimum order is $1 worth. Take your choice of these book bargains before it's too late! This is a RED-HOT SALE, which means you have the chance of a lifetime to get the best kind of reading matter at almost give-away prices. As stated before, these bargains cannot be repeated. It's a case of now or never.

Take your pick of the books listed below. They cost only 15¢ each, carriage prepaid. Many of them sold for as much as a dollar per copy; none sold for less than 50¢. But you can order all you want for only 15¢ each.

15¢ EACH

NEWEST DISCOVERIES IN ASTRONOMY
—By Joseph McCabe.

THE FAILURE OF FASCISM—By Joseph McCabe.

ECONOMIC GAINS OF THE SOVIET UNION—By Joseph McCabe.

NAZIS AND THE STATE OF GERMANY
—By Joseph McCabe.

THE CAUSES OF THE CIVIL WAR IN SPAIN—By Joseph McCabe.

IMPERIALISTIC JAPAN AND ITS AIMS—By Joseph McCabe.

A BOOK OF PUZZLES, PROBLEMS AND BRAIN-TEASERS—Compiled by E. Haldeman-Julius.

THE EMANCIPATION OF MODERN LIFE AND LETTERS—By Joseph McCabe.

WHAT AMERICA COULD PRODUCE AND CONSUME—By Joseph McCabe.

TELEVISION—WHAT IT IS AND HOW IT WORKS—By Joseph McCabe.

MAN A MILLION YEARS AGO—By Joseph McCabe.

ECONOMICS—THE SCIENCE OF GETTING AND CONSERVING WEALTH—By Joseph McCabe.

HOW THE TALKIES TALK—By Joseph McCabe.

YOUR BODY AND ITS FUNCTIONS—By Joseph McCabe.

WHAT VITAMINS AND DIET WILL DO FOR YOU—By Joseph McCabe.

WOMEN WHO BECOME MEN—By Joseph McCabe.

EARLIEST MAN IN AMERICA—By Joseph McCabe.

OUR WONDERFUL GLANDS—By Joseph McCabe.

HUMAN BODY, AND HOW IT WORKS
—By Joseph McCabe.

PHALLIC ANCIENT CIVILIZATIONS AND CULT OF LOVE—By Joseph McCabe.

WHAT SHOULD BE TAUGHT ABOUT SEX—By Joseph McCabe.

FARMINGTON—Clarence Darrow.

ZADIG, OR DESTINY—Voltaire.

CANDIDE—By Voltaire.

AN EYE FOR AN EYE—Clarence Darrow.

A SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY—By Laurence Sterne.

THE FUN I GET OUT OF LIFE—Autobiographical sketch by E. Haldeman-Julius.

SORROWS OF YOUNG WERTHER—By Goethe.

CONGREVE'S WAY OF THE WORLD—A lively and somewhat naughty comedy.

THE WISDOM OF LIFE—Schopenhauer.

COUNSELS AND MAXIMS—Arthur Schopenhauer.

ON LIBERTY—By John Stuart Mill.

RESIST NOT EVIL—Clarence Darrow.

CLARENCE DARROW'S TWO GREAT TRIALS—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius.

DARROW'S PLEA FOR DEFENSE OF LOEB AND LEOPOLD—A gripping plea for the lives of the two boy murderers.

CULTURE AND ITS MODERN ASPECTS—By E. Haldeman-Julius.

A ROAD-MAP TO LITERATURE—By Lawrence Campbell Lockley and Percy Hazen Houston.

PANORAMA—By Dr. Isaac Goldberg.

SNAPSHOTS OF MODERN LIFE—An assemblage of notes and essays by E. Haldeman-Julius.

SENSIBLE VIEWS OF LIFE—Is sex sinful?

CLIPPINGS FROM AN EDITOR'S SCRAPBOOK—A collection of essays by E. Haldeman-Julius.

ELEMENTARY ALGEBRA SELF-TAUGHT—By Lawrence A. Barrett.

THE COMPLETE ANGLER—By Izaak Walton.

STUDIES IN RATIONALISM—By E. Haldeman-Julius.

CONFESSIONS OF A DEBUNKER—By E. Haldeman-Julius.

THE BUNK BOX—By E. Haldeman-Julius.

CHRISTIANITY'S SOCIAL RECORD—By Joseph McCabe.

ABSURDITIES OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION—By Joseph McCabe.

FREE SPEECH AND FREE THOUGHT IN AMERICA—By E. Haldeman-Julius.

AN AGNOSTIC LOOKS AT LIFE—By E. Haldeman-Julius.

MYTHS AND MYTH-MAKERS—By E. Haldeman-Julius.

(continued on opposite page)

(continued from preceding page)

THIS TYRANNY OF BUNK—By E. Haldeman-Julius.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE CATHOLIC CHURCH—By Joseph McCabe.

THE ANTICHRIST—By Nietzsche.

FOUNDATION OF THE UNIVERSE—By
Joseph McCabe.

HOW THE UNIVERSE IS CONSTRUCTED
—By Joseph McCabe.

THE GLOBE WE LIVE ON—By Joseph Mc-Cabe.

HOW LIFE SPANG FROM MATTER—By
Joseph McCabe.

HOW LIFE DEVELOPED—By Joseph Mc-
Cabe.

THE MARVELOUS KINGDOM OF PLANT
LIFE—By Joseph McCabe.

MARVELOUS KINGDOM OF ANIMAL
LIFE—By Joseph McCabe.

DOES ATHEISM REST ITS CASE ON LOGIC?—By Joseph McCabe.

WOULD A GODLESS WORLD MAKE FOR SOCIAL PROGRESS OR DECLINE?—By Joseph McCabe.

JOSEPH McCABE: FIGHTER FOR FREE-
THOUGHT—By Isaac Goldberg.

HOW THE BODIES OF ANIMALS ARE CONSTRUCTED—By Joseph McCabe.

MAN'S MASTERY OF LIFE—By Joseph
McCabe.

STORY OF THE EVOLUTION OF MAN—
By Joseph McCabe.

LIFE AMONG THE MANY PEOPLES OF THE EARTH—By Joseph McCabe.

TRUTH ABOUT AIMEE SEMPLE Mc-PHERSON—By Louis Adamic.

HOW THE HUMAN BODY BEGINS AND GROWS—By Joseph McCabe.

MYRIAD MYSTERIES OF THE MIND—
By Joseph McCabe.

MAN'S STORY OF HIMSELF—By Joseph
McCabe.

WONDERS OF ANCIENT EGYPT AND BABYLON—By Joseph McCabe.

SPLENDORS OF GREECE AND ROME—
By Joseph McCabe.

STRANGE CIVILIZATIONS OF INDIA
AND CHINA—By Joseph McCabe.

TRUE PICTURES OF EUROPE IN THE MIDDLE AGES—By Joseph McCabe.

STIRRING STORY OF THE RISE OF MODERN EUROPE—By Joseph McCabe.

DAWN OF THE NEW AGE AND BIRTH
OF MODERN SPIRIT—By Joseph McCabe.

THE HISTORY OF AMERICA—By Joseph
McCabe.

MAN AND HIS SUBMISSION TO BEING RULED—By Joseph McCabe.

HOW MAN ACQUIRES AND SPENDS HIS MONEY—By Joseph McCabe.

UPTON SINCLAIR FINDS GOD—By Joseph McCabe.

IS PHILOSOPHY OF DIALECTICAL MA-
TERIALISM OUT OF DATE?—By Joseph
McCabe.

STORY OF ECONOMIC IDEALS IN MAN'S SOCIAL STATUS—By Joseph McCabe.

MANUAL OF MONEY AND WEALTH—
By Joseph McCabe.

STORY OF HUMAN SOCIAL IDEALS—
By Joseph McCabe.

GREAT WRITERS OF ANTIQUITY—By
Joseph McCabe.

GREAT WRITERS OF THE MIDDLE AGES
—By Joseph McCabe.

GREAT MODERN WRITERS—By Joseph
McCabe.

WRITERS OF TODAY AND THEIR MES-SAGES—By Joseph McCabe.

ANCIENT ART EXPLAINED—By Joseph
McCabe.

MEDIEVAL ART EXPLAINED—By Joseph
McCabe.

MODERN ART EXPLAINED—By Joseph
McCabe.

THE ART OF THINKING—By Joseph Mc-Cabe.

STORY OF PHILOSOPHY—By Joseph
McCabe.

HUMAN MORALITY—By Joseph McCabe.

STORY OF HUMAN EDUCATION—By
Joseph McCabe.

THE PROGRESS OF SCIENCE—By Joseph
McCabe.

ALL ABOUT PSYCHO-ANALYSIS—By Joseph McCabe.

THE MORALS OF THE SAVAGE—By Joseph McCabe.

MORALS OF THE ANCIENT WORLD—
By Joseph McCabe.

PERSONS AND PERSONALITIES—By E.
Haldean-Julius.

CRITICAL REVIEW OF LATEST CLAIMS
SUPPOSED TO GIVE VALIDITY TO GOD
IDEA—By Joseph McCabe.

MORALS AMONG THE GREEKS AND ROMANS—By Joseph McCabe.

MORALS IN MEDIEVAL EUROPE—By Joseph McCabe.

MORALS IN THE ARAB-PERSIAN CIVIL-IZATION—By Joseph McCabe.

THE MORAL LIFE OF CHINA AND INDIA—By Joseph McCabe.

LIFE IN EUROPE IN THE LATER MIDDLE AGES—By Joseph McCabe.

MORALS IN RENAISSANCE—By Joseph
McCabe.

THE EFFECT OF THE REFORMATION
ON MORALS—By Joseph McCabe.

MORALITY IN THE 19TH CENTURY—
By Joseph McCabe.

CHANGING MORALS OF TODAY—By
Joseph McCabe.

WHAT SEX REALLY IS—By Joseph Mc-
Cabe.

ANTAGONISM BETWEEN THE SEXES—
By Joseph McCabe.

WOMAN AND MARRIAGE—By Joseph
McCabe.

ABNORMAL ASPECTS OF SEX—By Joseph
McCabe.

WOMAN AND THE CREATIVE URGE—
By Joseph McCabe.

WHAT IS THE "MYSTERY" OF WOMAN?
—By Joseph McCabe.

QUEST FOR SEXUAL HAPPINESS—By
Joseph McCabe.

MUSSOLINI EXPOSED—By Isaac Goldberg.

REASON OR FAITH: WHICH SHALL PRE-VAIL?—By Joseph McCabe.

GERSHWIN AND AMERICAN MUSIC—
By Isaac Goldberg.

ARE THE LATEST DISCOVERIES IN SCIENCE GIVING SUPPORT TO THE GOD-IDEA?—By Joseph McCabe.

WHAT DOES THE CATHOLIC CHURCH
WANT IN AMERICA?—By Dr. Isaac Goldberg.

IS POSITION OF ATHEISM GROWING STRONGER?—By Joseph McCabe.

WHAT WAR AND MILITARISM COST—
By Joseph McCabe.

VICE IN GERMAN MONASTERIES—By
Joseph McCabe.

THE RED PLAGUE—A complete discussion of every phase of syphilis.

THE SEXUAL LIFE OF MAN, WOMAN
AND CHILD—By Dr. Isaac Goldberg.

CONFESSIONS OF A YOUNG MAN—By George Moore.

THE WONDERS OF THE ATOM—By Joseph McCabe.

MUSIC FOR EVERY MAN—By Isaac Goldberg.

A STUDY IN SCARLET—By Doyle.

GRAFT, CORRUPTION AND INCOMPE-TENCE IN MODERN DEMOCRACY—By Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes.

TEXT OF SOVIET CONSTITUTION—13
chapters. 146 articles. Verbatim.

DEBUNKING THE LOURDES "MIR-ACLES"—By Joseph McCabe.

IS THEISM A LOGICAL PHILOSOPHY?
—Debate. Rev. Burris Jenkins and E. Haldeman-Julius.

BOOKS and the ARTS

EDUCATION FOR THE NEW ORDER

BY SIDNEY HOOK

ALEXANDER MEIKLEJOHN offers in his most recent book* a general theory of education from whose principles he derives a social and political philosophy as well. It is a significant work, but not by virtue of its insights or analysis. It commands attention because it brings into glaring focus assumptions of a school of thought which hopes to save democracy with doctrines that, until now, have been used mainly by those who would destroy it. One has to read this book in order to believe that it could have been written by a liberal convinced he is defending democracy.

As preliminary to the statement of his own position, Mr. Meiklejohn discusses the educational theories of Comenius, Locke, Dewey, and Rousseau. Comenius's universal pattern for education within the framework of a universal state is approved. But his theological bias is rejected as literally incredible in our scientific world. Locke is denounced rather than analyzed because, despite his piety, his individualism destroyed the theoretical basis of a unified society under a central authority. In treating of the individual and society, says Mr. Meiklejohn, "Locke has given expression to the characteristic Anglo-Saxon moral duplicity." Dewey is presented as a modern Locke, continuing the "false individualism of a disintegrating Protestantism." From Rousseau and his theory of the General Will Mr. Meiklejohn openly derives his clue. The General Will takes the place of God as the only and absolute source of all moral authority. The author seems unaware that weak as are the arguments for the existence of God, they are stronger than the arguments for the existence of a General Will.

Following Rousseau, Mr. Meiklejohn insists, in his own italics, that "the purpose of all teaching is to express the cultural authority of the group by which the teaching is given." Since the authority of the group is vested in the state, the state does and should determine the goal, methods, and context of teaching. Does this seem to imperil individual freedom? Not so, we are told, because human freedom "is freedom in and by the state." To the clarification of this paradox the author addresses himself. The state is not a secondary institution which administers common interests and mediates between conflicting interests that flow from primary activities. Nor is it ever an instrument of class or group rule. It is that without which men are not men. All we have, all we are, belongs to the state. It gives us our freedoms, can rightfully set limits to them and take them away. It can compel us to be free for our own good. No one has any rights against the state. If it constrains us or punishes us, we are still free, for, after all, "a state is its members, ruling themselves, obeying themselves, in accordance with a general mind, a general will, which is their mind, their will." Certain irritating situations may crop up in which there appears to be a conflict between ourselves and the state power, but this is an illusion produced by consciousness of interest which vanishes when we grasp the underlying and unconscious reason and harmony of the state. "The state is the whole body of the people, consciously or unconsciously taking directions over its own activities and those of its members." Conflict with the state is a form of self-conflict and is resolved when we understand that "the state is the best of us, trying to control and elevate the worst of us."

With a post-nescience that is truly uncanny Mr. Meiklejohn attributes these notions not to Hegel but to Jefferson and the Founding Fathers. The difficulty in this theory of "unconscious direction" is to explain how there could ever have been an American Revolution at all. Either Mr. Meiklejohn must believe that there was no English state at the time or that the Revolution was an illusion of interested consciousness. He cannot believe the latter. But if he believes that there was no English state at the time of the American Revolution, then it is hard to see how he can believe that there ever was such a thing as a state as he defines it—or how there could be. With all due respect, one cannot tell what Mr. Meiklejohn is talking about or how he would go about finding out whether what he is saying is true.

Less mystifying but no more satisfactory is Mr. Meiklejohn's discussion of the justification of democracy. With great fanfare he approaches the question: Why is democracy better than totalitarianism? He dismisses with scorn all attempts to answer it in terms of empirical fruits and consequences as they relate to concrete human interests. But although I have searched the pages of his book diligently, I have found no "proof" that will stand up for a minute. The nearest he comes to offering one is to be found in the alleged implications of two key statements: "The basic belief of our culture is that men are brothers"; "All those activities which we sum up under the term 'intelligence' are expressions of that kinship."

Take the first statement. Grant that it is the basic belief of our culture. Grant that the belief is true, that in fact men are brothers—theologically or biologically. What follows from it? How should brothers live together—like Cain and Abel, Jacob and Esau, or like David and Jonathan, who were not brothers? The validity of the democratic over the totalitarian way of life cannot be derived from kinship. Kinship, in fact, is not even necessary. With this Mr. Meiklejohn—rather inconsistently—agrees. For on the very next page he tells us that life cannot be lived rightly "unless men deal

*"Education Between Two Worlds." By Alexander Meiklejohn. Harper and Brothers. $3.

Just published

Number One

JOHN DOS
PASSOS

➤ This is Dos Passos' greatest novel, the story of a political big-shot who got there fast. The dynamic theme is developed with the swift pace and local color for which the author is famous. This is the world peculiar to the boys in the back room, a world of white Lincolns, five grand bets, expensive women, health resorts, and behind-the-scenes in Washington. ➤ Add a new humor and a more straightforward narrative to the writing critics call genius, and you have a book to head all fiction lists for 1943.

$2.50

Jefferson Himself

BERNARD
MAYO

➤ "JEFFERSON HIMSELF is a book for these times. The basic principles of American democracy, now under attack, take form from the life and work of a great American who can tell his own story. ➤ Mr. Mayo is skillful in creating a spirited and readable account out of the vital and abundant material at his command. It is a job well done."—New York Times

$3.75

Listen, Hans

DOROTHY
THOMPSON

➤ A program for political warfare and a new view of world peace, as seen by a great idealist and an astute political observer: "A brilliant work of illumination."—Raymond Gram Swing. "An admirably true analysis of the German character."—Thomas Mann

$2.50

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY, PUBLISHERS

with one another as if they were brothers." As if—even if they are not! On the next page he admits that the brotherhood of man "must be dealt with as a hypothesis." But no sooner have we reoriented ourselves to this new approach than we are told, "We must not treat men as brothers unless we 'know' that they are brothers." And in another eccentric spin we learn that "men are brothers only as they become so by their own moral and intellectual achievements." By this time the reader may not care whether men are brothers or not. Neither does Mr. Meiklejohn; for he now tells us that we can consider men as brothers even if they hate each other, provided we can say their hatred is wrong, since "the essential feature of the life of fellowship is the presence of principles in accordance with which judgments of approval and disapproval can be made." But this last is an essential feature of all social life, even of a head-hunting community, and not only of a democracy.

To his theory of human fellowship Mr. Meiklejohn tacks on, in the guise of a deduction, a recommendation for a world state, a common education with fixed goals and prescribed content, scholarship harnessed to true politics, training for world citizenship, and an extended program of adult education. Excellent suggestions—some of them. But those that a democracy can use are compatible with a theory of democracy entirely different from that of Mr. Meiklejohn. The impression some of these practical proposals make is like that produced by a speaker who, having lost himself and his audience in a fog of words, concludes with an impassioned burst: "Today is Tuesday!" And Tuesday it turns out to be.

Mr. Meiklejohn's book will undoubtedly gladden the hearts of semanticists, for it is a horrible object lesson in linguistic confusion. The pages are studded with capitalized abstractions that defy analysis. Customary distinctions are ignored. Words like "state," "government," "society," are used interchangeably; so that although the diction is clear, the thought is cloudy. Anything can materialize from it. In crucial passages one cannot tell whether Mr. Meiklejohn is stating a fact about political behavior or expressing a pious wish. The scholarship is faulty. Grave sins of omission and commission are made. Rousseau's thought had no influence on revolutionary America. There are many modern theories of natural rights that do not involve supernatural assumptions. The author is bitterly unfair to Dewey, whose thought he systematically misunderstands. He carries it to such a point that in one place he italicizes a quotation from Dewey giving the impression that the italics are Dewey's, thus creating a thoroughly false idea of Dewey's meaning.

Intellectually confused though this book may be, its social drift is clear, and its social importance enormous. In a world where the state is growing stronger every day it is an exaltation of the state in the name of freedom and reason. Mr. Meiklejohn is acutely aware that his doctrine is open to the charge of totalitarianism. His reply is that he agrees with only one of the two basic contentions of Hitler and Mussolini. This is that "the state must be strong and powerful, eager and able to achieve its purposes against all opposition within and without." (Compare this statement with the previous definition of the state as an absolute, albeit unconscious, unity of all its members.) The second contention, with which he disagrees, is that "the state can be strong and powerful only if it becomes a dictatorship, only if one man . . . rules ruthlessly over the many." The trouble is that if one unconditionally accepts the first statement, one must on occasions swallow the consequences of the second, for the latter is sometimes in fact true. If Mr. Meiklejohn insists that a state must be strong and powerful, then whenever it is in fact true that this can be achieved only by ruthless dictatorship, he is committed to it. One could argue, on the theory of the General Will, that in such a case the dictatorship is a dictatorship of all the people, including its victims, and therefore a democracy in a higher sense. But that would be a rhetorical indecency.

Mr. Meiklejohn sums up his rejoinder to the charge that he is unduly exalting the state over the freedom and dignity of the individual in a single assertion. On its truth, he tells us, he is content to let his whole position stand or fall. It is: "All the activities which give man dignity are done 'for the state.'" This is as false as anything can be, and its falseness is not mitigated by the converse proposition which Mr. Meiklejohn throws in as a sop to liberalism. There are other dignities than those of the market-place and public forum—the dignity of incorruptible scholarship, of courage against odds, of contained grief, of detachment, and of renunciation so complete that it transcends the state. It is not true that "man, at his best, is a political animal." On any reasonable philosophy, human personalities are prior to the state, not in the order of time or dependence, but in the order of significance. Every sensitive intelligence will reject the absurd alternative which Meiklejohn sets before us of worshipping either God or the state. The first may have therapeutic uses for the tender-minded, but the second means worshipping other men or, what is just as bad, ourselves. It is truer and more conducive to human happiness to regard the state as an instrument of social action whose goodness must be judged in relation to the interests of the personalities it affects.

"Interests" are precisely what Mr. Meiklejohn refuses to accept as a principle of understanding or evaluating state action. In consequence, when his book actually connects with the world of political realities, it turns out to be an attack upon an attitude which, so long as governments are run by men, we cannot have too much of, namely, vigilance against abuse of delegated powers. The trouble with us Americans, complains Mr. Meiklejohn, is that we have assumed that our public servants "need to be watched, to be kept under constant pressure by us. And the inevitable result is that we have had as public officials the kind of person who needs to be watched, who responds to pressure." And where in this wide world, in which temptation shadows opportunity, will we find an individual who does not need to be watched, and who can be infallibly relied upon faithfully to represent groups independently of their pressure? Can Mr. Meiklejohn name another?

The most charitable interpretation of Mr. Meiklejohn's position is that he has written a defense, not of democracy, but of a benevolent dictatorship by those who know what we ought to want better than we know ourselves. But one of the troubles with a benevolent dictatorship, even assuming that it has this remarkable knowledge, is that no one knows how long it will remain benevolent.

Important Macmillan Books

VICHY TWO YEARS OF DECEPTION

By Léon Marchal

"An honest, intelligent document. . . . It helps us to understand why so many people accepted, at first, the Marshal and his nondescript 'French State' and why our diplomats find it hard, even now, to purge their minds from the Vichy delusion. . . . The facts as recorded in this book, speak for themselves."—ALBERT GUERARD in The Nation. $2.50

A LATIN AMERICAN SPEAKS

By Luis Quintanilla

"What a challenge to Americans all! He has blazed a trail, for he writes in English to tell us some things Latin Americans think about the United States. . . . The glory of his book is his faith in Hemisphere Democracy. . . . The deep feeling and brilliant style, touched with humor, gay with epigrams, make this a milestone. . . . We shall profit from his speaking."—LEON WHIPPLE in Survey Graphic. $2.50

POSTMORTEM ON MALAYA

By Virginia Thompson

"Miss Thompson, an authority on the peoples of Southeast Asia, has produced, in the calmest tones, a scathing, almost irrefutable indictment of Great Britain's rule in Malaya. . . . There is no want of officials who can explain why Singapore fell. This book can stand as the answer until the British give a better answer."—CAROL BROWN in Chicago Daily News. $3.00

ITALY FROM WITHIN

By Richard G. Massock

"A comprehensive thoughtful and vivid account of the fascist regime in Italy. . . . He gives a graphic portrayal of the steadily increasing disappointment, disillusionment, hardship and misery of the Italian people."—HAROLD DENNY in N. Y. Times Book Review. $3.00

THE FARMER CITIZEN AT WAR

By Howard R. Tolley

The Chief of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the U. S. Department of Agriculture here gives a sound, detailed analysis of the problems which face the farmer today, among them—manpower, wages, fertilizers, machinery, price ceilings, production goals, pressure groups. This book places agriculture against its proper background of democracy. Foreword by Vice-President Henry A. Wallace. $2.50

W. B. YEATS

1865-1939

By Joseph Hone

"Irish revolutionary, prophet of a literary revolution, dramatist and stage-director, mystic and occultist, statesman, anti-democratic seer—and in all his manifestations and in every decade of his life, superlatively the poet—William Butler Yeats was a great and controversial figure. Joseph Hone's authorized biography is a mine of rich material about the man."—LEWIS GANNETT in N. Y. Herald Tribune.

"A valuable record of a man who was extraordinary in every facet of his character—as well as being a great poet. . . . The story told here is in many ways amazing."—MARY M. COLUM in N. Y. Times Book Review.

8 full-page illustrations. $6.00

A New History of Music

By Henry Prunières

Now, this most important work by one of the foremost music historians of the present time, comes in an English translation. From the origin of the Gregorian Chant to the flowering of the classical style in the music of Bach, Haydn, and Mozart, it includes all the latest researches in musicology. Many musical examples. Introduction by Romain Rolland. $5.00

The Burden of British Taxation

By G. Findlay Shirras & L. Rostas

A thorough and detailed account of the methods of taxation used in Great Britain from 1913 to 1942. All the various taxes are dealt with and the possibilities of increases shown. Valuable for reference as to future taxation in the United States. $3.00

Merchant Ships 1942

Edited by

E. C. Talbot-Booth, R.N.V.R.

What Jane's Fighting Ships does for the navies of the world, this great volume does for the merchant marine of every country. More than 3,000 illustrations, half-tone and line drawings. $19.00

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY, 60 Fifth Avenue, New York

We shall hear more of the social and educational philosophy advocated by Mr. Meiklejohn. It expresses with feeling and unrestraint a growing mood in the country. It is cut to order for groups who would like to save democracy from itself, not by appealing to common interests and negotiating those that are not common, but by invoking a Public Good or General Will, interpreted by themselves, that has no relation to anybody's interest except, accidentally, to their own. It is a philosophy for history's initiates who are so convinced they have the saving truth that all methods of discovery and teaching are to be judged exclusively by their capacity to affirm this truth. Finally, it is the "Mein Kampf" of all frustrated administrators whose enlightened projects have been shipwrecked in the processes of democracy, who would like to ram them down their colleagues' throats, make them like it—and still remain democrats.

In the pre-Hitlerian era it would be sufficient to say that this is a false and foolish book. In the era of Hitler it must be characterized as false and dangerous.

In Defense of Dante

DON'T TELL me," exclaimed an otherwise civilized person the other day, "that anybody ever really reads Dante." Well, I do; and what's more I read him for pleasure, and not to "improve my mind"—though the pleasure I speak of is probably not the same pleasure which enervates the readers of True Confessions. I hasten to assert that I have a conscience as well as a curiosity about experiencing those works of art which have entered, by common and continuous consent, the category of great literature. And it does not embarrass me in the least to say that every intelligent person ought to read Dante.

I seem to remember that Henry L. Mencken, who in spite of his late reactionary phase has the ingredients of a civilized person, once boasted that he had never read the "Divine Comedy." I thought at the time that he would probably be a better man if he had, though I myself had only read the "Inferno" in a literal English translation. Today, having negotiated most of the "Comedy" in Italian—ignominiously, with an English pony—I see all the more clearly that the joke, in this particular outflowing of Americana, was on Mencken and the other "leading intellectuals" who boasted in Books, and even in The Nation if I'm not mistaken, about the classics they had not read. Surely it is a curious and piquant circumstance that the vulgar desire for "culture" in this country had so infuriated those assorted highbrows that they themselves renounced culture (without quotation marks).

But to get back to the "Divine Comedy." It's very hard, as a matter of fact, to get back to the "Divine Comedy." It is hidden behind a mountain range of commentary, as high as the Himalayas, which has been thrown up in the course of five hundred years by scholars, critics, theologians. The fact that Dante's poem has given rise to so formidable an accumulation, which grows relentlessly year by year, is surely evidence of its vitality; for though one may smile at the spectacle of scholars carrying on heated arguments over the exact topography of the universe Dante created, such controversies are vivid tributes to the reality of that universe and to the imagination which created it.

Still, how is the average reader to discover that the "Divine Comedy" is a beautiful and simple story, as well as an exquisite poem, which has survived because among other things it is essentially the story of every human being who has achieved—or hoped to achieve—maturity?

The answer is simple: Turn your back on the mountain and read the poem itself. There is no question that the "Divine Comedy"—like the late great novels of Henry James—must show forth in its fullest glory to those who are nel mezzo del cammin de nostra vita—midway in the path of life—and have found themselves in a dark wood of which the very thought renews the fear (that too is better in Italian—que nel pensier rinnoia la paura). Perhaps that explains why even the intellectuals of a country which runs to middle-aged adolescents can dismiss as an antique theological poem Dante's story of the crisis of the human spirit and of that spirit's wilful reassertion.

The "Divine Comedy," to be sure, is much concerned with the careers and punishments of politicians and popes long forgotten, though many of them still live in their modern counterparts. Dante was fighting, in his tract for the times, the annual as well as the perennial battle of the moral man—what other man is worth our trouble? But his particular "local color" of medieval Italy is more than offset for the modern reader by the images—in a "montage" that Eisenstein has never equaled—of the human situation. Consider, for instance, the scene in the first canto of the "Purgatorio." Dante and Vergil have just emerged from Hell. What sensitive human being, if he is still alive at forty-five, has not been through Hell, and emerged—or hoped to? The lovely morning light of Purgatory

Dolce color d'oriental zaffiro, che s'accoglieva nel sereno aspetto
dell' aer puro infino al primo giro, agli occhi miei ricominciò diletto, tosto ch' i' uscii fuor dell' aura morta, che m'avea contristati gli occhi e il petto.

"restored delight, as I emerged from the dead air which had afflicted my eyes and my heart."

Don't, above all, be overawed by the foreign language. After all, millions of ordinary people speak Italian; and no human language is as difficult as the scholars would make it out to be. Persist, and you will have countless incidental rewards such as the small ageless scene in the second canto of the "Purgatorio": some newly arrived spirits ask Dante and Vergil for directions; to which Vergil answers, in effect, "We are strangers here ourselves."

TO CHANGE the subject rather abruptly, I'd like to pass on Louis Fischer's example of "Socialist realism"—which has fluttered the advocates of Stalinist and anti-Stalinist criticism. A Soviet writer went to Magnitogorsk to write a novel. (It's done that way in Russia.) He wrote a few chapters which he read aloud to the workers in the Magnitogorsk automobile plant he was celebrating. In the course of his narrative he referred to the fact that the road from the center of the city to the plant itself was very bad.

"But Comrade," said one worker-listener, "by the time you get this novel written and have it passed by the censors and see it into print, a year and a half will have passed. And by that time, Comrade, that road will be a good road. So why not say it's a good road?"

I find this story very touching. It reveals the contradictions of socialism so vividly—and for all my hatred of Stalin, I find the contradictions of socialism more ingratiating, more human, than the contradictions of capitalism. Confronted with those workers at Magnitogorsk, I think even I might have been tempted to call it a good road.

POSTSCRIPT: Two days after shoes were rationed I turned up in an elevator at John Wanamaker's. A female who looked rather harassed, even for a housewife, was inquiring for the shoe department. "If the Jews," she muttered "haven't bought up all the shoes." She muttered other things—about LaGuardia giving them a tip on Sunday. "They sure work together," she said. I stood it as long as I dared. Then I said, in a very objective tone, "This store was not open on Sunday." The housewife in extremis turned on me. She looked me up and down. She grew desparate. After all, I was born in Utah and I am sometimes referred to as a blonde.

"Isn't that too bad?" she screamed. "Isn't that just too bad?"

She paused, and then she let loose her full fury.

"You would say that," she said, "you lousy little refugee!"

The audience was with me and we laughed her out at the shoe department. But I couldn't help thinking of the countries, and elevators, where the laughter would have been on the other side.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Hoc Est Corpus

I who am nothing, and this tissue
Steer, find in my servant still my maker, rule and obey as flame to candle mated.
Whom bone has conjured, Banquo shall the bard command, the marble rule Pygmalion—did this tower build me, then, who am its garrison?

Strange that in me the shadow moving the substance speaks—strange that such air pulls the gray sinew, whom the blood maintains, whom the heart's coming, slight defection shall spill, speaks now and holds
Time like a permanent stone, its cold weight judging.

ALEX COMFORT

Goodby to Children

Their laughter's darken as I go;
Through double windows I detect
How they distrust the ogre train:
Its errand all at once suspect.

No need; I shall be home one night
As it is written in our books.
So they are wrong. But the strange thing
Is how to them the leaver looks.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE says:

"It's smart to be Geopolitical"

— but are you sure you know what GEOPOLITICS means — especially to America?

"All three books show that we will 'adjust' in vain unless we dig beneath the Nazi crust to that rotten core of Junkerism which inspires the dreamworld of General Haushofer." — ROBERT BENDINER, Chicago Sun.

GERMAN STRATEGY OF WORLD CONQUEST

By DERWENT WHITTLESEY

"STRIPS the mask from geopolitics . . . not a Nazi invention but a dream of expansion and conquest which reaches far back into German history. Whittlesey, one of our foremost geographers, does an excellent job of debunking." — Philadelphia Inquirer.

"Arrays a wealth of factual information, gathered from German sources, into a coherent statement of Geopolitik, its genesis and teachings . . . an admirably compact summary." — Saturday Review of Literature.

293 pages, maps, bibliography, $2.50

THE WORLD OF GENERAL HAUSHOFER

By ANDREAS DORPALÉN

"AN arresting study of the ambitions and theories of General Karl Haushofer, the guiding genius of Geopolitik . . . especially valuable for the extensive excerpts from the writings of geopoliticians not hitherto available in English." — Chicago Sun.

"A work of patient and scholarly research . . . Some of the selections, particularly those from writings on population policy, economic policy, and 'space strategy,' reveal more of what is valid and what is bumptious nonsense in Geopolitik than could be brought to light by another ream of books about Haushofer's strange world." — Sat. Review of Literature. 337 pages, $3.50

THE NAZI STATE

By WILLIAM EBENSTEIN

"A USEFUL and sober survey of the institutional aspects of Nazi Germany: its governmental structure, its party rule, its legal system, and the various aspects of what passes for its cultural life . . . may be read with profit along with the Whittlesey and Dorpalén volumes by anyone who cares to think of the monumental task involved in 'adjusting' Germany after this war."

— Chicago Sun.

355 pages, $2.75

Like something lost, their waving says,
Like something stolen, roars the steam.
Oh, these are wrong. I do deprive Myself of more than they shall dream

Till they are big enough to count,
Till they distinguish proper gold
From what I go this day to bring;
And coming home with it, am old.

MARK VAN DOREN

America: Theme or Saga

AMERICA: THE STORY OF A FREE PEOPLE. By Allan Nevins and Henry Steele Commager. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

THE AMERICAN SPIRIT. By Charles A. and Mary R. Beard. The Macmillan Company. $5.

IT IS natural enough that the war, marking a period in our national life, should provoke a deliberate estimate of what, historically considered, that life has consisted of. The two books under review, in very different fashion, exhibit facets of the same attempt. Messrs. Nevins and Commager retell with admirable succinctness and picturesqueness the history of America. Their very title defines their enterprise and their perspective. Our history is to them the story of a free people, that is, the story of a people which, whatever its failure and divagations from the ideal, has been with surprising unanimity committed to the ideal of freedom and to the contriving of its realization. The Beards, writing a coda to their "Rise of American Civilization" under the title "The American Spirit," try to define the idea of civilization in the United States. Far from unaware that our life in this country has its roots in a European past, they still make much of the idea that American civilization is a distinctive idea, a distinctive practice, and that it has a distinctive future. It is the distinctiveness of the future, indeed, which is the moral they draw, along with a fear that the involvement in the European and Asiatic worlds during the war may threaten that uniqueness and may imperil characteristically American civilization itself. Messrs. Nevins and Commager draw a different moral: that American freedom can only survive in a free world and that the war is the quite natural and fitting contemporary chapter of the story of America as a free people. Thus, for example, they conclude their work:

In the great Civil War of which Whitman wrote America had shown to the world what her children really were. She had seemed then, in Lincoln's stately phrase, "the last best hope of earth." Now once more she was vouchsafed the opportunity to show the world what her children really were, once more the opportunity to fulfil her destiny as the "best hope of earth," to vindicate her title to a nation of freemen.

The Beards, after citing innumerable examples—from both the obscure and the eminent—of the use of the word "civilization" in the United States, come to a less inspiring conclusion: "There is one invariable in the history of men and women. This is war. And inasmuch as the efficiency of war in spreading death and destruction depends upon some degree of civilization, it follows that . . . the future of civilization in the United States has at least this much assurance."

The Nevins-Commager account is an admirably conceived one-volume history of the United States, calculated to give, say, to a Briton ignorant of our history or to an American who has forgotten it, not only the facts but the great sweep and the characteristic episodes, the climaxes and consequences, of major movements in United States history. It is as simple as a school textbook, but has none of the usual banality and dullness. There could hardly be a more timely moment to see that story in its world perspective, and the authors vividly show "how upon our development have played the great historical factors and forces that have molded the modern world: imperialism, nationalism, immigration, industrialism, science, religion, democracy, and liberty." It is the story of the impact of an old culture upon a wilderness environment.

All this is in part an old tale, but it is here freshly told, and one could go far to find a more lucid and evocative picture of the familiar episodes, here revealed as chapters in our history as well as merely chapters in a book. The authors succeed, too, in documenting the conviction suggested in their preface that there has been a "tenacious exhalation of liberty and a steady growth of democracy in the history of America." One of the intellectual graces of the book, and a moral grace as well, is that it does not for a moment hint that there have not been recessions from the ideal; and it gives frank consideration to those forces of industry, commerce, and politics which have impeded the translation of democracy into complete realization in all avenues of American life. Yet I do not see how anyone could read the tale here unfolded, from the "planting of the colonies" to the New Deal, without feeling a constant residual sense of freedom as a central motive and democracy as a constant growth in our national life.

The Beards interpret our history in terms of a controlling "idea of civilization." Charles and Mary Beard have been known so long for their probing and enlightened concern with the origins and character of American institutions that their attempt to define the American spirit in terms of a directive concept of "civilization" demands respectful attention. As one who has been long indebted to these authors for their insight and scholarship, I confess to a certain real disappointment. I leave the book not quite clear what the "idea of civilization" in America is. Nor do I feel that the idea is illuminated by the catalogue of quotations from all and sundry who have hazarded definitions of it, often incidentally in the course of other concerns. I am, furthermore—though the word and the idea appear often enough in American or in other writers—somewhat diffident of assent to the proposition that the course of American history has been controlled or directed or given momentum by such an "idea."

The Beards do, after 670 pages of an extraordinarily various and not always critically selective list of quotations, attempt finally to reiterate the notion:

The idea of civilization embraces the conception of history as a struggle of human beings in the world for individual and social perfection, for the good, the true, the beautiful, against ignorance, disease, the harshness of physical nature, the forces of barbarism in individuals and society. It assigns to history in the United States so conceived unique features in origin, substance, and development.

The uniqueness of the idea of civilization in the United States is defined in terms of "the social principle," "respect for life," "optimism" (versus pessimism). It includes "total determinism and predicates an open and dynamic world in which creative intelligence can and does work." Many of the characteristics of the American idea of civilization can be found, as the Beards of course know, in thinkers of the French and English revolutions. Nor at the present time is belief in an open universe, in the dignity of man, in the "social principle" confined within our borders. Some of these characteristics have had, in special ways, a chance to flourish here, partly because it was once a new and pioneer society. But it begins to look as if they could not flourish here alone. The "American spirit" does not hover here only, nor could the "idea of civilization" survive here if it perished everywhere else. Quite apart from drawing different morals than the Beards seem to draw, however, it seems to me that a study of American civilization would be more fruitful if it exhibited more adequately the arts and ideas and institutions which exemplify civilization rather than traced the way in which the word has operated in the differing vocabularies of different writers from politicians to philosophers. Civilization is a complex flowering, not an idea beckoning in the local heaven above each separate country. I regret to have to say that the American spirit is better defined by other methods than by a record of the verbal attempts to define it.

IRWIN EDMAN

The Dyer's Hand

WILL SHAKSPEARE AND THE DYER'S HAND. By Alden Brooks. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

WHAT Mr. Brooks sets out to prove in this book is that Will Shakspeare was a boorish if witty butcher's son who made a name for himself as a coarse jester, became a play broker and brothel keeper, and acted as the agent for a retiring courtier named Sir Edward Dyer who wrote great poetry and drama but always produced it under Shakespeare's name. According to Mr. Brooks, Shakespeare was merely the Dyer's hand, the sottish and disreputable agent who took credit for the genius of somebody else.

On the surface Mr. Brooks seems to be the usual kind of crank whom students of Shakespeare have for many years exasperatedly done their best to ignore. But as we think farther about his volume, this explanation does not quite cover the facts. Perhaps if we examine the work of Mr. Brooks in the same spirit in which he has examined the work of Shakespeare, we may arrive at a different and more significant conclusion.

We are confronted by an anomaly at the outset. Why, in a time of war, when publishers are faced by a paper shortage, should one of our most prominent publishing firms issue a volume of 704 pages which is patent nonsense? Surely only the work of a distinguished writer could justify the procedure. At once we are tempted to look farther. What, we ask, is suggested by this name "Brooks"? It suggests water, shortage of Victory

By GABRIEL JAVSICAS

ERNEST ALBERT HOOTON says "I am certain that the author is well-informed, clear-sighted, and straight-thinking. I am convinced that Mr. Javscas offers a much needed purgative to idealistic peace-planners whose systems are clogged with undigested humanitarian dogma."

H. V. KALTENBORN says "I like particularly his emphasis on the fact that the emergence of the totalitarian state anywhere in the world is an act of aggression against all. If we can remember that and act accordingly we will be able to keep the peace once we have won it."

WILLIAM STARR MYERS says "Very interesting and stimulating." $3.00

APPLETON-CENTURY • 35 West 32nd Street • N. Y. C.

Who is the American Jew?

Where did he come from?

What is his religion?

What is his education?

THE AMERICAN JEW

Edited by Oscar I. Janowsky

HERE is the first fully integrated study of the Jew in this country. Prepared by a distinguished group of authorities it is filled with facts about all phases of Jewish life in this country. It is of value to Jews and non-Jews alike.

"Deserves to be read widely . . . searching and comprehensive."—N. Y. Times Book Review. $2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS

49 East 33rd Street, N. Y.

movement, flowing. United with "Alden" it reminds us still more strongly of water, for the alder bush always grows near lakes and streams. Put the two names together, and you have ■ double image, a tree and a stream. Unquestionably there is something revealing here.

But at first sight neither of these facts seems to lead us to ■ satisfactory result. It is not until we turn to page 262 of "Brooks's" volume that we find a clue. On this page occurs the following highly significant phrase: "Jonson was certainly the player in question; for, as Ohambers shows," etc. The important word in this passage is the mysterious "Ohambers." To a casual reader it would seem to be merely a misprint for "Chambers," the name of the leading authority on Elizabethan stage history. But this is inconceivable:

FORMULA FOR 100 YEARS' PEACE

By Theodore G. Mitchell

By formulas we are advancing our scientific and economic progresses and by formulas we shall advance our social progress toward peace. $1.75

At bookstores or from publisher

DEARBORN PUBLISHING COMPANY
727 S. Dearborn St. Chicago, Illinois

READ

Articles that no other magazine would dare to publish—in the current issue of

THE PROTESTANT

Edited by KENNETH LESLIE

NORTH AFRICA:

FORMULA FOR FASCIST SURVIVAL

By Pierre van Paassen

We Are Doing Business with Hitler

The facts about the bank operated jointly by Axis and Allied Financiers

By HEINZ POL

Who Uses the State Dept.?

A review of the United States Foreign Policy 1931-1941

By BENJ. MARSH

ULTIMATE PROTESTANTISM . . . by Robert Whitaker

THE SHOE IS ON THE OTHER FOOT—

An Exposé of Roman Catholic Aid to Fascism in Latin America . . . by W. S. Ryeroff

OTHER ARTICLES AND BOOK REVIEWS

Special Offer: $1.00 for Five Issues

THE PROTESTANT, 521 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription at $1.00 for 5 issues.

Name _____

Address _____

no publisher who considered it important in war time to produce ■ work like that of "Brooks's" would allow any errors in proofreading. We must find another alternative. Only one is possible. In spite of the omission of the apostrophe, "Ohambers" must be the name of an Irishman.

Who, then, is this "O'Hambers," and what is he showing? In Old Icelandic the word "hamalt," of which "hambers" is an obvious corruption, means "to draw up in a wedge-shaped column." It is used in no other sense. A column is a kind of tree. But the name "Alden," as we know, is also derived from the name of a tree.

We have, therefore, the following facts: (1) the book is written by an Irishman; (2) the author's name is connected with trees and flowing water; (3) any argument about the book, as the previous discussion has shown, is primarily circular. The final question remains: Who is the real author of this volume? Who is the retiring writer who conceals himself under the name of "Brooks" but who gives himself away under the name of "O'Hambers?" What modern Irish author has written in terms of recurrent cycles, and has used trees and streams as symbols? Why does the fourth line on page 688 of this volume begin with the letter "J"?

The answer is under the skin of your teeth.

THEODORE SPENCER

The Wicked Wits of Hartford

THE CONNECTICUT WITS. By Leon Howard. The University of Chicago Press. $4.50.

A CONTRIBUTOR to the Atlantic Monthly for February, 1865, admits that "Connecticut is pleasant, with wooded hills and a beautiful river; plenteous with tobacco and cheese; fruitful of merchants, missionaries, peddlers, and single women—but there are no poets known to exist there. . . . The enterprising natives can turn out any article on which a profit can be made, except poetry."

Eighty years before this Massachusetts opinion was set down it would have been thought as absurd as it manifestly is today. Any bright Connecticut schoolboy would have felt able to refute it by the mere mention of John Trumbull's "M'Fingal, a Modern Epic Poem," Timothy Dwight's "Conquest of Canaan, in Eleven Books," David Humphreys's "Poem on the Happiness of America," and Joel Barlow's "The Vision of Columbus, a Poem in Nine Books." Were not some of these lucubrations almost as long as "Paradise Lost"? Were they not all composed in close imitation of the best eighteenth-century English models and according to the specifications of the standard textbooks on the art of rhetoric? The fact was that long before Massachusetts or Harvard College had even scraped acquaintance with the Muses, Connecticut had a whole school of native poets, and Yale might have called herself ■ nest of singing birds. Sometimes called "the Connecticut Wits" and sometimes "the wicked wits of Hartford," these poets had been much admired—at any rate by one another.

Of course it has long been clear that these "wits" were not very witty, that they were not really "wicked" at all, and that the grandiose and pretentious "poems" with which they burdened the press of their day were almost devoid of poetry, occasional humor they are less amusing in mass than they are taken one at a time.

February 27, 1943

There are four thrillers to be reported on. Although none can be guaranteed to set your hair on end, only one of the four—surprisingly enough in these times—rides its story

The Planning Age

GOALS FOR AMERICA: A BUDGET OF OUR NEEDS AND RESOURCES. By Stuart Chase. The Twentieth Century Fund. $1.

IN "The Road We Are Traveling," the first of a series of six reports on post-war problems written for the Twentieth Century Fund, Stuart Chase gave "a fast movie of a quarter of a century of economic history." In swift sequence he turned his camera on some of the basic trends which developed in that period, such as the acceleration of technological advance and the decline of the birth rate, and went on to show how these trends had influenced the growth of chronic unemployment, the expansion of monopoly, and the mounting participation of government in business. He concluded that planned economy was here to stay and that the urgent task of the planners was to satisfy the tidal demand for security while holding fast to democracy.

In his second report Mr. Chase sets up the mark at which a planned economy should shoot—a budget for the "national family," drawn up not in financial terms but on the basis of physical needs and resources. We now have in effect such a budget operating for the purposes of the war. On the income side we have the utmost production that our plant and manpower can make available; on the expenditure side we allot for civilian consumption the minimum amount of goods and services necessary to maintain health and efficiency, leaving the vastly larger balance to satisfy the multitudinous demands of total war.

When peace returns, we should, Mr. Chase thinks, adapt the techniques of war-time planning to insure that certain basic needs of every member of the national family are satisfied. Our vast resources, he argues, can supply a nutritionally efficient diet, adequate shelter ("where children can be reared in health and well-being"), and necessary clothing for all. In addition, education through high school or its equivalent and basic medical care should be the birthright of every citizen.

Mr. Chase has little difficulty in showing that we could achieve these goals without straining our capacity to produce. Nor would man-power be an obstacle, although the health and education programs would lag until more trained manpower in certain categories became available. On the other hand, we might reach these goals and still suffer from mass unemployment. Mr. Chase looks hopefully toward a revival of private investment after the war, but in view of the tendency of savings to outrun "profitable" opportunities for their employment, he anticipates the necessity for a long-term program of government-financed public works. As he recognizes, there is nothing original in this idea, which is now indorsed by large numbers of economists, but he does add to his advocacy of public works a valuable plea for a wider conception of the meaning of that term. "We can," he writes, "challenge our citizens with the greatest, most splendid, most uplifting series of public works which any civilization ever dreamed of. . . . Whole cities to be rebuilt and decentralized; mighty watersheds to be tamed, like that of the Tennessee; the forests of America to be put on a perpetual-yield basis, the grasslands to be restored, the entire transport system to be reintegrated; civic centers, libraries, museums, research laboratories, universities, public buildings, to reflect an aspiring culture in a new architecture."

Stuart Chase is so engrossed with his view of the Planning Age rising above the horizon that he tends to minimize if not ignore the political and psychological mine fields that we have to pass through first. Planning under the stress of war does, indeed, lend strong support to his arguments, but we have to remember that many ordinary citizens find their experience of war-time planning not altogether pleasant. They tend to see it less as a guaranty of future plenty than as a concomitant of present scarcity, as a kind of economy that implies rations and restrictions, cold houses and empty shelves. Thus a psychological resistance to planning is being built up and preparing the way for another political fling by those whose post-war program adds up to a revival of the slogan "back to normalcy."

Although Mr. Chase has not taken this situation fully into account, he has provided the best possible antidote to the kind of regressive escapism on which political reaction thrives. If his book circulates as widely as it deserves, it will

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine

- ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

- ☐ 13 Weeks $1
Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

have a great educational effect in promoting realistic and progressive economic thinking. For Mr. Chase remains the most persuasive of writers on the subject and the easiest to read.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Music and Society

A NEW HISTORY OF MUSIC: THE MIDDLE AGES TO MOZART. By Henry Prunières. The Macmillan Company. $5.

WHEN I listen to arias from "Persée" or "Atys" it does not increase my powers of appreciation to know that Lully, formerly a palace cook, one day struck his foot with his conductor's baton and died of the resultant injury. And when I listen to early music I am not helped by knowing all about organum. But it does not follow that because loveliness is not revealed to me by these things I should scorn the study of great men's lives or take no interest in the history of the art of music. Again, Dr. Tovey once said that critics who are floored by the Eroica often prefer to talk about the French Revolution, to which that revolutionary music is supposed to have some relation. But ready as I am to admit that a familiarity with the deeds of Robespierre will not help one's reception of the music, I will not let Dr. Tovey bamboozle me into believing that there is no connection between music and society. And since there is a connection, then it is a proper object of study and one that a historian of music may discreetly touch upon from time to time, provided that he does not shirk the Eroica. Knowledge of is more important than knowledge about, but once a literature has become voluminous and quality is no longer a guaranty of currency, then knowledge about is often the necessary condition of knowing. And, rejecting the Handel-throws-his-wig school of history, as well as the criticism that rejects all scholarship not to be gained by the ears, it seems to me that the rule applies here also that the richer a man's general culture the deeper will be his penetration of any single part of it. What I demand, then, of a history of music is that it be principally a survey of the whole literature with emphasis upon the three musical values, but with a sober tracing of influences and developments also. The historian must have a grasp of musical techniques, which is not to say that I will accept a plateful of dry musicological crackers as a history. He must have a sense of personality, too, and a lively enough enthusiasm to send me to beauties I had not known about.

These qualities M. Prunières possesses in uncommon degree. Very simply, then, "A New History of Music" is a good book. In it the author's delight in music and his discrimination are as evident as his familiarity with libraries. He is lively, often piquant, and invariably honest, and in some fields his special enthusiasm readily communicates itself to the reader. M. Prunières will not displace the "Oxford History," but he will save you the weariness of Wilm and the mediocrity of Gray. Many, many yawns are saved you by a critic who can write of Palestrina's two books of Madrigali Spirituali that they "show some characteristic effects of harmonic transparency, but the listener soon tires of the shameful mass of conventional patterns and clichés. Palestrina may no publisher who considered it important in war time to produce a work like that of "Brooks's" would allow any errors in proofreading. We must find another alternative. Only one is possible. In spite of the omission of the apostrophe, "Ohambers" must be the name of an Irishman.

When then we turn to the Middle Ages to Mozart which fails with Mozart is rather like the Giralda without the added topmost tower which makes of the less than perfect original structure a thing of flawless beauty. But M. Prunières does fail. Mr. Haggin has often remarked that French musicians commonly misrepresent the music of Mozart, making of it a cold and classical bric-a-brac of porcelain and silver gilt. M. Prunières occupies himself far too much with biographical matter. He does not fulfil the intention expressed in his chapter headed The Formation of the Classical Style, and if he had done so it would not have been to the point in the case of Mozart. True, Mozart's idiom is principally the so-called classical idiom, though listening to the music one often is tempted to reject even this never-disputed thought. But examine that incredible andante of the pianoforte concerto in C Major, K467. Play over the heart-quelling phrase that begins in bar 37. Every single motif of it is a stock piece of the contemporary idiom and can be found again and again in Mozart and in his forgotten contemporaries too. But the whole sentence is of almost unbearable beauty, a beauty that suggests no period of time at all, that has nothing at all to do with idiom or style. Mozart, in a sense, barely fits into history, and the realization of that truth may have cramped M. Prunières's wit in dealing with him. This is a severe thing to say, I know, and having said it I must repeat that on the whole "A New History of Music" is a brilliant survey, guided by fine taste.

RALPH BATES

Fiction in Review

UNFORTUNATELY most of the fiction of the last few weeks can pass in review only too quickly. Two women published novels which, by staying closely within the limits of their authors' talents, win at least minor laurels for good sense and taste: Janet Lewis's "Against a Darkening Sky" (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50) is the nicely felt biography of a middle-aged woman devoted to her home and family, and Grace Campbell's "Thorn-Apple Tree" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2.50) is a small but very gracious restoration of Scottish-Canadian life a century ago. "Beneath Another Sun" by Ernst Lothar (Doubleday, Doran, $2.75) is the tragic account of what happened to a South Tyrolean family under Nazism; by no means a book of first rank, Mr. Lothar's story is conscientious and moving and has the distinction, among anti-Nazi novels, of avoiding the exploitation of horror for horror's sake. More pedagogy than fiction is Chard Powers Smith's "Turn of the Dial" (Scribner's, $2), in which the history of a small-city radio station provides the opportunity to repeat excerpts from several of Roosevelt's most important speeches as well as for the author to argue his own logic of personal and international morality. Twenty-five of S. J. Perelman's funny pieces—why do they always start so much better than they end?—are collected in a volume called "The Dream Department" (Random House, $2), but like most occasional humor they are less amusing in mass than they are taken one at a time.

There are four thrillers to be reported on. Although none can be guaranteed to set your hair on end, only one of the four—surprisingly enough in these times—rides its story merely as a political hobby-horse. The political equestrian is Mark Saxton, whose "The Year of August" (Farrar and Rinehart, $2.50), a rather tedious story of intrigue among the treasonable anti-Administration forces in this country, would have been improved by more action and less ideology. Inevitably, however, because their stories deal with spies and therefore with international affairs, the three other authors still make clear their political temperaments, if only indirectly. David Rame, author of "Tunnel from Calais" (Macmillan, $2.50), looks very much like an orthodox old-school Englishman whose characters go through their fairly incredible adventures with more energy than thought, and with excellent manners. David Keith, author of "A Matter of Accent" (Dodd, Mead, $2), is an orthodox American, or what I like to think is an orthodox American; his paralyzed hero—he had his first appearance in Mr. Keith's prize-winning "A Matter of Iodine"—loves Free France and undergoes his discomforting adventures in order to preserve for freedom the short waves to that stricken country. J. B. Priestley, author of "Black-Out in Gretley" (Harper, $2.50), is what I very much hope is a type of new-school Englishman; his agent of the British Intelligence has the mind to pause in his not very exciting adventures to speak forcefully if briefly of the social changes that this war must bring.

Finally, there is a novel by Stephen Longstreet. Last fall, under the name of David Ormsbee, Mr. Longstreet published a novel called "The Sound of an American"; now, under what I take to be his right name, he has published a new novel called "The Land I Live" (Random House, $2.50), in which David Ormsbee's brother, Driscoll Ormsbee, is nominated for President of the United States. If I fail to respond properly to the element of fancy in these splits in Mr. Longstreet's personality—and, oh yes, I forgot to mention that Gramp, maternal grandparent to the four Ormsbee brothers, in another phase of his life concocts recipes for the readers of Gourmet magazine—it is probably because I thought "The Sound of an American" one of the really unpleasant books of recent memory, so vulgar, lush, and self-indulgent that in comparison "The Land I Live" is almost a work of maturity and restraint. By any name, Stephen Longstreet is scarcely my favorite literary figure: to borrow the manner of his own irritating title, the man I read is not the kind of man I like to think wandering with a typewriter through the land I live.

Diffuse and pretentious, "The Land I Live" is difficult to get the point of. It is dedicated to "all the little people"; so undoubtedly it is a patriotic effort. Although the narrator is an artist, the hero has no such weakness: Driscoll Ormsbee is a lawyer who comes to power with the aid of a corrupt political machine but in maturity breaks with the political organization in favor of support from the masses and a life of idealism. And he, too, has his touch of schizophrenia; victim of a common form of political split personality, he is half a little person himself and half savior of the little people. Still, he is neither entirely distasteful nor entirely incredible as a potential President. It is Driscoll's youngest brother, David Ormsbee, creator of Presidents, who worries me both for the future of American art and the future of American politics.

For, as an example, when Driscoll is still an adolescent boy, his author has him talk to his kid brother about the "good rich mud," and this single phrase—there are scores of others—would be enough to make me suspect that no member of the Ormsbee family could ever grow up to be my hero. Or when David is inspired with a vision of Driscoll's future, he writes:

A star fell and hit me. This was the time for Dris! I had figured it all out suddenly. Logic—schoolroom logic. What was lacking in the world was faith. A faith like old-time religion. A faith honest, earnest, and true to all these things handed down from a mountain in Sinai . . . a return to a faith of the little people, a love of mankind, an understanding, a tolerance of the rights of people. Of the rights of lovers and children and fields and . . . Perhaps my head was a little hollow, my stomach empty of everything but whiskey and schoolroom logic.

Faith, stars, mankind, lovers, children, fields, and little people! I have the impression that to run this particular combination of words together into so few lines is to be drunk with platitudes, and that the alcoholic excuse is the final platitude of all. We have all the proof we need these days that to be soft with words and sentiments is to be irresponsible with ideas and eventually dangerous; so here is at least one reviewer who gives notice that should David Ormsbee's brother be acclaimed for nomination to the White House, she will not vote for him because she doesn't like his author's style.

DIANA TRILLING

Drama Note

THE MOON VINE" (Morosco Theater) is a comedy about a small-town Southern beauty (period 1905) who jilts a missionary to run away with a barn-storming trouper. When I saw it, the piece had already been playing several nights, and the not too sophisticated audience seemed to be finding the whole thing amusing enough. Yet it had got a pretty bad press for the obvious reason that it is both rather old-fashioned and rather amateurish in exactly the way that critics and sophisticated playgoers alike find especially hard to forgive. Of the author, Patricia Coleman, I know nothing at all, but somehow her play kept suggesting to me that it had probably been prepared by a promising pupil in somebody's course in practical playwriting. At any rate it presents just that combination of elementary competence so far as the simple tricks of the trade are concerned with an equally obvious unsureness of touch which the eager amateur is likely to produce. Probably such plays have no place on Broadway, but it does seem a pity that there are a few ways in which they can be tried out with profit to the author and satisfaction to the right audience. Haila Stoddard is very lovely indeed as the belle, and Arthur Franz is attractive as the young trouper. Philip Bourneuf and Will Geer, two fine actors, apparently found it impossible to make anything out of relatively minor parts.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

DEBUSSY'S "La Mer," possibly his greatest work, of which a performance by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony has been available for three years on Victor records, has now been recorded for Columbia by Rodzinski with the Cleveland Orchestra (Set 531, $3.68).

The new set offers one of Columbia's good recording jobs, which reproduces the sound of the performance with excellent fidelity to timbre (except for the muffled quality of the string basses at the beginning of the third movement) and lifelike distinctness and sharpness of definition. What is reproduced in this way is the well-disciplined and well-sounding playing of the Cleveland Orchestra under Rodzinski; whereas the Victor records reproduce with less distinctness and sharpness a great deal of the time what nevertheless is unmistakably the greater beauty and refinement of sonority and execution of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky. Moreover, the music depicting the noon sun at the end of the first movement is one of several climactic passages which come off the Victor records with more power and splendor than off the Columbia; and the detail at the end of the second movement is heard more clearly in the Boston version.

Rodzinski's performance has been pronounced an effective statement of the work; but I'm afraid I must dissent. As I explained a few weeks ago, the years of listening to Toscanini have left me with the need of hearing in a performance the rhythmic and plastic continuity that one hears in his performances, in Beecham's, in Barzin's. One of Koussevitzky's deficiencies as a musician, for me, is his lack of the rhythmic and plastic sense that makes every tempo, every acceleration or retardation, every crescendo or decrescendo rightly proportioned to what proceeds and follows; in Rodzinski the deficiency is even more marked, and in addition he lacks the finesse that Koussevitzky has. If Debussy asks that a passage be retenu (shortly after the beginning of the sixth side) Rodzinski holds it back to the point where it all but curls up and goes to sleep; if Debussy asks for nothing at the end of a phrase (the English horn solo near the end of the first movement) Rodzinski makes a sizable pause before continuing; if Debussy asks for a swell in a violin trill marked p léger (shortly after the beginning of the second movement) Rodzinski produces a minor explosion; and he produces similar crude exaggerations of inflections and staccatos of chattering violins when this passage reaches on the fourth side. There are dragging tempos and excessive retardations and discontinuities in Koussevitzky's performance also, but not the crudities and brutalities of inflection—Koussevitzky's one comparable offense being his thunderous swell of drums and horns at the entrance of the cellos (shortly after the beginning of the second side).

Another recording job which reproduces the sound of the performance with fidelity, brightness, and clarity—though also with some hardness, and with the solo violin near and strong and the orchestra distant and weak in the slow movement—is to be heard in Columbia's set (530, $3.68) of Bach's Violin Concerto in E major, played by Adolf Busch and the Busch Chamber Players. Busch's simply and sensitively phrased playing of the solo part is beautifully integrated with the engagingly spirited and finished playing of the orchestra; and the performance will be enjoyed by those who hear in the work more than Bach's technical expertness coasting along on its own momentum, which is all I hear in it.

Very clear and hard also is the recorded sound of the Stuyvesant Quartet's excellent performance of Shostakovich's String Quartet Op. 49 (Set X-231, $2.63). This work, written in 1938 after the Symphony No. 5, is offered as a brief, simple, unpretentious lyric interlude between large-scale projects; but one hears in its brevities, simplicities, unpretentiousnesses, and lyricisms the same self-conscious, posturing, glib smart-Alec; and it is clear that whether he writes big or small, epic or lyric, Shostakovich writes as Shostakovich, and writes bad music.

Why Columbia should be able to produce recorded orchestral sound as good as that of "La Mer," and not be able to produce anything better than the noisy, confused, dull sound of the performance of Sibelius's First Symphony recorded by Barbirolli with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set 532, $5.78) I do not know. Nor does the heavily over-emphatic performance itself provide a reason for choosing this set in preference to the one issued last spring by Victor, with a good performance by Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra that is superbly recorded.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

RICHARD H. ROVERE, formerly on the staff of The Nation, is now managing editor of Common Sense.

ROSS L. HOLMAN has written on farm problems for many national magazines.

HAROLD J. LASKI is professor of political science at the University of London. He has long been influential in the British Labor Party.

SIDNEY HOOK, chairman of the Department of Philosophy of Washington Square College, will shortly publish a book entitled "The Hero in History."

ALEX COMFORT is an English poet of twenty-three whose work has appeared in various magazines and pamphlet collections in England.

IRWIN EDMAN is professor of philosophy at Columbia University.

THEODORE SPENCER, a member of the English Department of Harvard University, is the author of "Shakespeare and the Nature of Man."

ODELL SHEPARD, professor of English at Trinity College, won the Pulitzer prize for his biography "Piedlar's Progress: The Life of Bronson Alcott."

BOOKS

BOOK BARGAINS

The Malediction: F. E. Sillanpaa (Nobel Pr. ed.)	35
The March Violets: Rebecca West (orig. ed.)	50
Dutch Vets: A. Rothaert (2.50 Macmillan ed.)	50
The Basic Thought of Confucius: M. Dawson, Ed.	50
The Official Record of the United States' Part in the Great War, 2nd pr.	50
The Hills Beyond: Thomas Wolfe (orig. 2.50 ed.)	75
The Forgotten Village: Steinbeck & Kilian	1.00
The Hills Beyond: Thomas Wolfe (orig. 2.50 ed.)	1.00
Prisoners of Hope: H. L. Brooks (orig. ed.)	1.00
Goodbye Japan: Joseph Newman (orig. ed.)	1.00
The Harlequins: Otto Zell (3.50 ed.)	1.00
That Day Alone: Pierre Van Paasden (orig. ed.)	1.65
Science for the Citizen: Lancelotti Hooban, the original $4.50 Knopf edition	2.49

The Inductee's Mental Test	$.25
Practical for the Army Tests	the general classification test—the original and best proven (121 pages) I. Q. math, cube-counting, vocab., etc.

BOTH SENT FOR $1.50
Free R. postage = $1.50 min. order or add 10¢ postage
DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR, 212 B'way, N. Y. C.

40% OFF

In place of its regular yearly subscription rate of $5, The Nation offers a special 40 per cent reduced rate of $3 a year to all men now in the armed forces who have a service address in the United States or United States possessions.

TO THE MEN in the Armed Forces

Letters to the Editors

Not "Unessential"

Dear Sirs: Dero A. Saunders's otherwise good article on Men, Jobs, and Politics referred to the "millions of gardeners and jewelers and beauticians and clerks" who will have to be transferred to war jobs.

Few gardeners have asked for deferment on account of their occupation, and few will object to any other wartime responsibilities. But most will and do most strenuously take issue with the listing of their occupation as unessential, unnecessary, or superfluous.

At the present time, when food production is of prime importance, why throw aside the services of professional gardeners? These men are trained and experienced in growing the best quality of fresh vegetables and fruits. They have been quietly redoubling their efforts during the past year both in private and commercial gardens. Also their work in developing better economic plants and methods of culture should not be forgotten.

Due to stern economic and military necessity the work of the professional gardener in ornamental horticulture may have to be curtailed to a certain extent. But as a liberal art and as a builder of morale it should be preserved as much as possible.

The Department of Agriculture has been constantly exhorting the public to "garden for victory." The response of women and amateurs has been laudable. However, to prevent waste of precious seed, fertilizer, and man-power, who are better fitted to carry out and direct these efforts than the experienced men of the ancient and honorable gardening profession?

WILLIAM H. SHEARNE

Locust Valley, N. Y., February 13

Décret Crémieux

Dear Sirs: I. F. Stone, in your issue of January 30, makes an error in historical fact that I should here like to correct. He writes: "The Grennieux decree of the 1870's . . . gave the Jews of France the right to be naturalized." Actually, French Jews were permitted to take the oath of citizenship in accordance with a law passed September 28, 1871.

The Jews of Algeria were given equal rights as French citizens on October 24, 1870, in a decree called the "Décret Crémieux," named in honor of the French Minister of Justice in 1870, Isaac Adolphe Crémieux. Chances are this is the "decree" Mr. Stone had in mind when he inadvertently wrote "Grennieux decree."

BARUCH BRAUNSTEIN

New York, February 10

Among the Stars

Dear Sirs: I read with interest Professor Reinhold Niebuhr's article entitled Russia and the West. It seems to me that it is rather academic, founded more on theories than facts. The professor's head is among the stars.

Russia's policy for many years has been to abandon the former ideas of international revolution and to support Russian nationalism, to build up the Russian state. I believe that Joseph Stalin was sincere when he accepted the Allies' proposition to allow all people to select their own form of government. Anyway, after this very destructive war Russia will be busy for many years rehabilitating itself and repairing the destruction. The other Allies will also have troubles of their own readjusting themselves to changed conditions.

Professor, let us not cross the bridge until we get to it.

CHARLES W. SHERMAN

Vallejo, Cal., January 29

White-Collar Economics

Dear Sirs: I would guess that my complaint is similar to that of thousands of white-collar employees. Our salary increases are not nearly as great as those of workers in war industries, but the cost of living is up by one-third for us as well as for them. My salary, for example, is 11 per cent higher than fourteen months ago. My income tax, besides the Victory tax, is more than double last year's. If a 17 per cent pay-as-you-go tax should be enacted, my income tax would be still higher.

My claim is that the war worker who was earning $25 a week a year and a half ago and is now earning $75 isn't hit so hard if he pays a $600 yearly tax. His increments take care of that and still leave him in better financial condition than previously. Not so the white-collar worker. Taxes far exceed his increment.

My basic living expenses total $150 per month, not including clothing, medical attention, or entertainment. I contribute toward the support of an aged father, for which I am entitled to no exemption. And I no longer pay the whole upkeep on my car. Where can I cut?

Furthermore, I can no longer save a single dollar except for the purpose of paying taxes. It would be interesting to learn among which group those tremendous bank balances are accumulating. I'll wager it's not among white-collar workers. We present no danger so far as inflation is concerned.

It seems to me, there is a real problem for a large segment of the population. I know there's a war going on and I know we're expected to make sacrifices. I know that compared to the armed forces, we're being asked for very little. And I'm perfectly ready to pay my income tax, even if I had an alternative. But as someone before me has said, you can't get blood out of a turnip. Another tax increase and I must withdraw support from my home, 900 miles away. I've already cut my contributions to charity and the purchase of war bonds. I just don't have the money any longer.

Have you an answer?

B. H. C.

Camp Tyson Area, February 11

(Adv.)

Dear Sirs: As the publishers announced in a recent advertisement in The Nation, the authors of "The Survey-History of English Literature" have prepared a reply to my article, M., W., F. at 10, and this pamphlet will be sent free upon receipt of a postcard.

I should like to urge readers of The Nation to send for the pamphlet. It quotes far more from the "Survey-History" than I had space for, and its exposition of theory will be interesting to anyone concerned with literature or literary education. The address is Barnes and Noble, Fifth Avenue at Eighteenth Street, New York.

LIONEL TRILLING

New York, February 18

OUR MEN WANT BOOKS★

SEND
ALL YOU CAN SPARE

That book you've enjoyed—pass it along to a man in uniform. Leave it at the nearest collection center or public library for the 1943 VICTORY BOOK CAMPAIGN.

For WAR Books

THAT EXPLAIN: WHAT HAS HAPPENED
WHAT IS HAPPENING
WHAT WILL HAPPEN

—consult your bookseller, who knows every book published on the subject and can help you select the ones you want.

AMERICAN BOOKSELLERS ASSN.
Members Everywhere

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 2

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Seeing me in my little bed is a heavenly spectacle
- 4 It states the newspaper's own opinion
- 9 Anxiety about a bin produces a cavalry weapon
- 10 Aunt is in this sort of house and she can't leave it
- 11 What the tactless steward offered the seasick passenger?
- 12 Chair formerly carried by Danes
- 13 No wonder progress looks alarming with this at the heart of it!
- 16 Attack started by a donkey
- 17 Word for word
- 19 Horseshoe rivet
- 22 Is beer intended for this complaint?
- 24 Girls thus named would form an army
- 25 Palindromic feminine title
- 26 "One hug" from him would be "enough"
- 29 Are men glad when their shirts are this by the laundry?
- 30 A daily journal
- 31 Cat = Ma ran (put it together and see what you get)
- 32 Wait a minute, I'm covered with tar!
- 4 Eve is followed by the rest up a mountain
- 5 An outcast makes his meal
- 6 Here the burden is on us
- 7 Think of a number! this may be it
- 8 "And where care-----s, sleep will never lie" (Romeo and Juliet)
- 14 Maud's all over the place with a French novelist
- 15 Fashion that sounds as if it wanted some getting over
- 18 A belated recovery comes from the side
- 20 One bart (anagram)
- 21 Hero worshiper
- 22 A good cigar should not be smoked with this
- 23 Her husband made her cross all over the kingdom
- 24 Ape
- 27 The best part of all
- 28 Work of art that isn't really smashed

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1

ACROSS:—1 SHADE; 4 LAP; 5 TITAN; 6 TOBACCO; 10 LATTICE; 11 RECITE; 14 GLOSSY; 15 BRASURE; 16 RITE; 17 ASIA; 19 ANCHOVY; 20 EXIT; 22 NOAH; 24 STAL-EST; 26 SPECIE; 27 THWART; 31 OMIT-TEP; 32 LOUNGER; 33 TENOR; 34 TEA; 35 HOSTS.

DOWN:—1 SATYR; 2 APRICOT; 3 ECARTE; 4 LOOT; 5 FILE; 6 TATTLE; 7 THIRTS; 8 NERDY; 12 RHINITE; 13 ASPHALT; 14 GRAVEST; 16 ROE; 18 ASH; 21 IBERIAN; 23 ORANGES; 24 SITTER; 25 THRUSH; 26 STOUT; 28 TIRES; 29 EDIT; 30 FLEA.

DOWN

- 1 Bird and fish produce an insect
- 2 The Elgin ones are in the British Museum
- 3 This will give you a hint, though slender

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 6, 1943

NUMBER 10

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

325

EDITORIALS

Food and the Farm Bloc

327

Otto's Freikorps

328

The New Axis by Freda Kirchwey

329

ARTICLES

Thurman Arnold and the Railroads by I. F. Stone

331

Why Food Is Scarce by James G. Patton

333

The Russian Miracle by Donald W. Mitchell

335

The War and the Liberal Arts by Irwin Edman

337

Hamlet on Ruml by J. W. Abels

339

Houses for Millions by Richard M. Bennett

340

In the Wind

342

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

Report Out of Spain I. Politics and War

by A. del V.

343

Program for Austria by Julius Deutsch

345

Behind the Enemy Line by Argus

347

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Years: The Image and the Book

by Morton Dauwen Zabel

348

The Spirit of Norway by Bjarne Braatoy

350

Lessons of Dieppe by Marcus Duffield

351

Frank Norris by Isaac Rosenfeld

352

Power and Justice by Reinhold Niebuhr

353

In Brief

355

Drama Note by Joseph Wood Krutch

355

Music by B. H. Haggin

356

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

357

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 3 by Jack Barrett

360

The Shape of Things

THE APPROACH OF SPRING HAS CHECKED THE great Russian offensive in the Ukraine, but it brings a hope of renewed pressure on the Axis in North Africa and Western Europe. In Tunisia Rommel gambled on splitting the Allied forces and lost, though by an uncomfortably close margin. Now he is being forced to relinquish his gains in the center, and the heavy German assaults on the British lines in the north are probably a covering operation rather than a new offensive. With the rainy season drawing to a close and the formidable British Eighth Army completing its reorganization, we may look forward with some confidence to the recovery of Allied initiative in this theater. Meanwhile the rapidly increasing tempo of the Anglo-American aerial offensive in Northwestern Europe has revived hopes of an early invasion of the Continent. Targets have been varied, but the heaviest concentration of bombs last month was reserved for submarine bases and building yards. Reduction of the U-boat menace is, of course, an essential preliminary to the landing of an expeditionary force, which would multiply the strain on Allied shipping. Next must come efforts to paralyze German land communications and to smother the Luftwaffe.

★

FOR MORE THAN TWO AND A HALF YEARS ships of the Fighting French navy and merchant marine have crossed and recrossed the Atlantic carrying goods to our Allies in Britain and Russia and the eastern Mediterranean. Many of them today lie at the bottom of the sea, their sailors with them. And the arrival in American ports of Fighting French ships—and indeed of British ships as well—has been treated as a military secret. No parades of De Gaulle's sailors on Fifth Avenue; no parties at City Hall. Contrast the reception given the Richelieu and the other French ships recently arrived in various American ports from Dakar. Their crews have paraded with American troops, their officers have been feted, and Vice-Admiral Fenard has been received by Secretary Knox. No secrecy about the appearance of these prodigal daughters of the French fleet! Evidently the need of the State Department to justify its Vichy policy is more urgent than the precautions previously applied. It's curious, though, how the little triumphs of appeasement always turn to ashes. The whole gaudy

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Music Critic

Drama Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1943, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

celebration has been made a mockery by the stream of sailors who, at the rate of fifteen a day, have been deserting the ex-Vichy ships and heading straight for England via Halifax to enlist in the Fighting French navy. They explain that they prefer to fight under officers who give their allegiance to De Gaulle rather than to Pétain. They openly accuse their own officers of fascist sympathies. These sailors are undoubtedly simple people. They don't understand the subtle maneuvers of international diplomacy. But they manage, somehow, to make those maneuvers look pretty contemptible.

✱

GANDHI APPEARS TO HAVE SURVIVED HIS twenty-one-day self-imposed fast without permanent injury to his health. This piece of good fortune must be credited both to Gandhi's own amazing constitution and to the beneficent value of sweetened lime juice. His death during the fast would have provoked extremes of disorder in India. His survival brings us no closer to a solution of the Indian problem than we were before his fast was announced, but it has dramatized as nothing else could the continued irreconcilable bitterness of the Indian nationalists, and it would be used by a wise government as an occasion for reopening negotiations. If a compromise settlement is to be reached, Gandhi's approval is indispensable. His high sense of mission may convince him that he was allowed to live so that he might reach a settlement consistent with India's aspirations.

✱

"WELLES SAYS NOW IS THE TIME FOR ALLIES to fix peace aims." This New York Times headline over the story of the Under Secretary of State's speech at Toronto undoubtedly exaggerated the scope of his proposals. Mr. Welles did not announce or even suggest a conference of the United Nations to discuss war aims in general. He merely gave notice of the intention of the United States government to undertake at once discussions with other members of the United Nations regarding the ways in which machinery might be set up for the purpose of studying "all international aspects of problems under the general heading of freedom from want." No doubt this is a step in the right direction but not exactly a bold one. Nor is it easy to see why the State Department should want to confine its discussions to only one of the four freedoms. For it is hardly possible to talk about freedom from want without getting into the question of freedom from fear. There has been a good deal of rather vague talk in Washington about using the lend-lease agreements as the basis of a post-war plan for worldwide economic cooperation. But another school of thought, with representatives both in Congress and the Administration, is beginning to regard lend-lease as a lever which should be used to prize concessions from our Allies now. Mrs. Luce, in her famous speech, hinted that we should exploit our position as the arsenal of democracy to procure American domination of post-war air transport, and some of her colleagues on Capitol Hill have even more ambitious ideas in this direction. Secretary of the Navy Knox also wants to cash in on lend-lease by using it for bargaining purposes in acquiring overseas bases. If this grabster spirit is to inspire our approach to war aims, conferences are worthless, for the four freedoms will prove stillborn.

✱

NOT EVEN IN THE MIDDLE OF A "WAR FOR survival" can we escape the obligation to elect a President every four years. So for the next eighteen months we must expect politics as usual. In Washington a good many members of Congress seem more intent on stopping Roosevelt in 1944 than on defeating Hitler in 1943. Mr. Farley is roaming the country trying to make friends and influence people, and in every state in the Union Republicans are coyly allowing their faithful followers to advertise their qualifications. Wendell Willkie, after testing the temperature in his native Indiana, has stripped for action and plunged into the political waters—the only avowed candidate among a herd of G. O. P. hopefuls. We welcome this move, for although we have our fingers tightly crossed, especially in regard to his undisclosed domestic program, we honor him for the enemies he has made. If he is to get the nomination, he will need to work hard in the next fifteen months, for the party bosses are dead set against him. And this time they will be better prepared to meet the blitzkrieg tactics which overwhelmed them at Philadelphia. On the other hand, Mr. Willkie has 22,000,000 good arguments in his favor—arguments which practical bosses cannot entirely ignore. Moreover, the increasing probability that Mr. Roosevelt will submit to drafting for a fourth term—at least if the war continues—is calculated to strengthen Willkie's claims. There are many millions of voters who will not take kindly to yet another period of office for Roosevelt but will vastly prefer that to making a Bricker our commander-in-chief. The latest Gallup poll is significant in this respect. Of those voters with definite opinions, 58 per cent were for Roosevelt if the war is still on, but only 44 per cent should the war be over. If victory is not achieved by 1944, the President is going to be a hard man to beat.

✱

THE DEBATE OVER THE SIZE OF THE ARMY continues despite the President's firm stand for the goals set by the armed services. Latest to speak out against an 8,200,000-man army in 1943 is William Green of the American Federation of Labor, who insists that we must "preserve the balance between production, fighting, and morale," with particular regard to our responsibilities as

"the arsenal of democracy." Although supporting the large army, Donald Nelson told the Senate Military Affairs Committee that the country is short by 2,250,000 workers of the number needed to achieve and maintain present production goals and added that too sharp a reduction in civilian man-power should not be made when the country faces the necessity for increasing munitions output by 60 per cent this year. So far the only evidence submitted by the army in support of the figure it has set consists of rough estimates of the total number of divisions available respectively to the Axis and the United Nations. But these calculations omit the vital question of how many men can be equipped and transported to the fighting front in 1943 and 1944. The indications are that the army is planning a total expeditionary force of only about 4,500,000 by the end of 1944. The limiting factor is the number of ships, not the number of men under training. The inevitable question, then, is: What do we plan to do with the remainder? Are they, as several writers have delicately hinted, to be held in reserve for bargaining purposes against Russia at the peace table? If so, the decision on the size of our army is certainly not one to be left to military men alone.

✱

PASSAGE OF THE McKELLAR BILL REQUIRING Senate confirmation of all federal appointees for jobs carrying salaries of $4,500 or more would be highly undesirable at any time; but enactment of the measure at this time could hardly fail to have a paralyzing effect on the prosecution of the war. The bill quite obviously represents an effort to set aside civil service and the merit system so that the best jobs may be thrown open to Senatorial patronage. No one even pretends that the Senate has the time or the capacity for passing judgment on appointments for the 33,000 or more federal jobs that are covered by the bill. But by holding up all appointments except those made on the basis of patronage, the Senate could readily exercise the same control over all administrative appointments that it now exercises in the selection of postmasters. The immediate effect of the bill's passage would be a wholesale turnover in the ranking executives of numerous Washington agencies. If only a few career men—officials who gained their posts by dint of their experience and ability—were forced out of high-paying jobs to make way for some Senator's political friends, we should see a wave of resignations by others, of similar abilities, who would find it impossible to render effective service working with or under hack politicians. In war time this would be, as the President points out, "little less than tragic." The government has enough difficulty as it is in obtaining and holding first-rate men—considering its low salary scale, red tape, and the activities of Mr. Dies. Must it further risk losing these men because a group of Senators want to return to the pork barrel?

THE HOUSE'S ACTION IN DENYING FUNDS for the National Resources Planning Board so eloquently expresses the contempt of the present Congress for the welfare of the public that it hardly requires comment. For nearly three years the NRPB has been at work on a long-range program for post-war reconstruction in America. In preparing this program it has enlisted the aid and services of many of the chief business interests of the country. Its planning has embraced both public and private enterprise. It has also cooperated in drawing up a far-reaching plan for the needed revision of the Social Security Act. Because this work was done under White House auspices, Congress would now throw it all on the scrap heap and trust that the American genius for improvisation will somehow see us through the difficult post-war period. The same issue of the Times which carried the story of the denial of funds to the NRPB outlined the British government's plans for a twelve-year building and town-planning program which would provide jobs for 1,250,000 Britishers after the war. The contrast is instructive. Which country is "muddling through" today—Tory England or New Deal America?

✱

THE MOST GRUESOME NEWS ITEM WE HAVE seen for some time is the report that Magda Goebbels is playing hostess, at the Bavarian estate of Heinrich Himmler, to the wives of Europe's quislings. It is suggested either that the ladies who make up this unique house party did not feel safe in their homelands or that Himmler is keeping them under his thumb as potential hostages should their husbands try to desert. We can't help wondering what these "molls" of the quislings talk about as they sit at table or stroll through grounds landscaped by the Gestapo. And how about the quisling kids, if any? Are they in Bavaria too? And do they quarrel sometimes about whose father can outlick the Nazis' boots?

Food and the Farm Bloc

IN THE past week more than 120,000,000 Americans have received War Ration Book 2, and housewives are busy working out point budgets and contriving ways and means of feeding their families on half the usual amount of canned goods. There has been some grumbling, but there seems to be general acceptance of the fact that rationing is the only fair means of distributing necessities where the demand far exceeds the supply, and most people will hail the day when meat, butter, and other scarce foods are added to the rationing list.

The Department of Agriculture has promised the country "a reasonably adequate diet per capita" for the duration. But this promise is not likely to be kept unless consumers take time out from wrestling with their immediate problems and turn the heat on Capitol Hill, where our future supply of food is now being treated as a political football. In an article on page 333 James Patton, president of the National Farmers' Union, details the growing shortages and suggests some of the steps which must be taken to expand production. His remedy is not higher prices but a program enabling the small and medium farmers to employ their unused margin of land.

The program of the Congressional farm bloc, which claims to speak for all agricultural interests but actually represents the large farmers and plantation owners, is quite different. Its demand is for higher and higher prices and to hell with the anti-inflation program. As Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, puts it: "There must be a price incentive for food production just the same as for industrial production. Inflation? Well it looks like we are headed for it." If the farm bloc succeeds in putting over its program, Mr. O'Neal is right, for the upshot will be so steep a rise in farm prices that the dams holding back wages and industrial prices will burst under the pressure.

The immediate objective of the big farmers' spokesmen on Capitol Hill is to force up ceiling prices even though on a great many leading products they are already well above parity level. The Senate has just passed a bill making it mandatory for the Price Administrator to leave out of account, in fixing price ceilings, all payments made to farmers by the government—payments estimated to exceed $600,000,000 in the present year. This will mean an upward readjustment of many ceilings. In the House an even more dangerous proposal is being pushed. It is the old plan, defeated last fall, for recalculating the parity formula so as to take into account the cost of all farm labor. Department of Agriculture experts estimate that the result would be to raise farm prices from 10 to 15 per cent.

Leading members of the farm bloc have made it clear, moreover, that they will not be satisfied by the passage of these two measures. "We want the law of supply and demand to operate," Senator "Cotton Ed" Smith of South Carolina roared recently. In other words, he wants prices to be allowed to soar, ■ in the last war, to whatever heights they might be borne by the winds of war-time necessity. There is this to be said for his simple program: it would probably enlarge our total supply of food and industrial crops provided that the return to laissez faire in agriculture included the removal of all the artificial props which are underpinning the prices of certain staples.

We are sure, however, that Senator Smith is not going to accept this qualification. A cotton planter and a representative of cotton planters, his main interest is in keeping cotton at its present very profitable level. It is not held there by supply and demand but by government action. We have on hand a two years' supply of short-staple cotton, and if the government's holdings were released to the market, the price would collapse. That might be a very good thing for the country at large and, in the long run, for the South itself. It would be an immediate stimulus to the diversion of acreage from cotton to crops sorely needed in the war effort, for instance, peanuts, dairy products, vegetables, and meat. And as every agricultural expert agrees, diversification is the only long-term solution for the Southern farm problem.

The farm-bloc bourbons are not interested, however, in freeing the South from slavery to cotton. They want a war program which will enable them to go on raising their traditional crop on a profitable basis. They want draft deferments for plantation workers and their full share of fertilizers and machinery regardless of the fact that, as far as the war effort is concerned, the growing of a short-staple cotton crop this year is total waste. Indeed, the situation is worse than that, for if only half the resources which are going to be used to produce unwanted cotton were diverted to raising crops we do need, the food problem would be largely solved.

Claude Wickard, Secretary of Agriculture and Food Administrator, is undoubtedly aware that the farm bloc's plans are likely to mean less food at higher prices. Unfortunately, he is not ■ strong man, and he has adopted the fatal policy of appeasement. Under pressure he has revised the program formulated last fall for all-out food production, and he has sacrificed several of his best subordinates who had incurred the wrath of the commercialized farmers' lobby. It is doubtful whether he will put up ■ fight to expand the Farm Security Administration, which has proved its ability to assist the smaller farmers to increase their contribution to the food supply.

The farm bloc can be beaten, but only if the small farmers and the consumers make their voices heard in Congress. The first necessity is strong leadership on the food front and enlightenment of the people about the facts—the desperately serious facts—of the era of real scarcity toward which we are drifting.

Otto's Freikorps

IN THE interests of military expediency Secretary of War Stimson should personally examine that unit of the American army which goes by the name of the Austrian Battalion. For what the Secretary no doubt intended to be a spirited auxiliary of fighting Austrians has turned into a dispirited aggregation of Austrians, Czechs, Hungarians, Italians, and Slavs. Men who joined the American army to liberate Europe from Hitler suddenly find themselves furthering the fortunes of the Haps-burgs, who among Central Europeans are only slightly more popular.

The so-called Austrian Battalion got off to an inauspicious start last fall when Mr. Stimson addressed a letter to one "Otto of Austria," by whom he meant Dr. Otto Hapsburg, who for twenty-five of his thirty years has not even been allowed to set foot on Austrian soil. In this painfully ill-advised letter the Secretary of War bestowed an official blessing on the Hapsburg project to recruit men for an Austrian Battalion. Democratically minded Austrians were outraged at this formal recognition of the man who has never renounced his claim to the throne of the Holy Roman Empire, and who as "His Majesty" still receives the bows of his pitiful retinue in the drawing-rooms of Washington and New York. Americans of Central European extraction were horrified at the implications in Stimson's form of address. A storm whirled about the head of the Secretary, who promptly advised reporters that the State Department had given its approval. State, in turn, denied responsibility, and through it all Otto proceeded to set up his Military Committee for the Liberation of Austria.

So negligible was his success that the storm abated and would have died down entirely if army officials had not stepped in to compound Stimson's original folly. When it became apparent that Otto's recruiting powers were low, someone with more authority than intelligence directed that pressure be brought to bear on all Austrian nationals in the army to accept transfer to the new infantry battalion, set up in a camp in the Middle West. "Austrian nationals" was interpreted to mean all soldiers whose papers showed they were born in the old Austro-Hungarian Empire. Overwhelmingly the men refused. Whereupon they were transferred without consent.

Today letters are trickling back East from the unwilling men of the Austrian Battalion. They tell of schools set up in the camp to teach the "Austrians" German. They tell of the low morale of the men and of the pressures put upon them to refrain from applying for transfer to other units. The War Department denies reports that special Austrian insignia have been prepared for the battalion.

Secretary Stimson is not insensitive, we believe, to the deeper issues of this war, and we hope he will take advantage of the current fiasco to make his position perfectly clear. One of his subordinates has expressed surprise that non-Austrians have been transferred to the "Hapsburg legion," and promised that the matter will be rectified. But the Hapsburg farce has gone on long enough. Mr. Stimson could ring down the curtain by specifically withdrawing his blessing of the Hapsburg committee and by forbidding the transfer of men to such "national" contingents against their will. Neither he nor Otto Hapsburg, after all, can hope to make Free Austrians out of coerced Czechs.

The New Axis

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

A NEW Axis is being formed. It runs from Washington to Rome by way of Madrid. Three men are busy bolting it together—Colonel Beigbeder in Washington, Archbishop Spellman in Rome, and Ambassador Hayes in Madrid. The idea isn't new: in one shape or another it dates back to Vichy and before. Indeed, it is the end product of appeasement, the object of all those statesmen who consider expediency a permanent necessity. As long ago as last June Alvarez del Vayo, in his article World War III?, described the preparations for a return to the old balance-of-power order in Europe as an alternative to Hitler's new order; the policy of creating as many centers of reactionary force as possible to withstand the certain post-war swing toward the left. The Washington-Madrid-Rome axis has been on the assembly line a long time. But today its mechanics are working fast, tightening the bolts at every joint, because events demand hurried decisions.

Like all political decisions in war time, these hang on military developments. Soon or late, Hitler will be defeated. It is this fact that has sent Spellman to Rome and Franco's emissary to Washington. It is this fact that is forcing a dozen quislings to throw out storm anchors, that tempts even small dictators like Generalissimo Franco to hedge their bets on Hitler. And it is this fact that is moving the exponents of permanent expediency, in and out of the State Department, to try to complete the structure of their old order before the people have a chance to get the smell of freedom in their nostrils.

When The Nation first spoke out against the State Department's North African policy we were accused by some of our friends of a combination of impatience and irresponsibility. We were told that we lacked that detailed inside information which our leaders possessed and which alone could justify criticism of official acts. I wonder what those friends thought when they heard or read the speech made last week by Edgar Ansel Mowrer at the French-American Club in New York. Mr. Mowrer had just resigned from his job as deputy director of the Office of War Information because of his differences with the State Department on North African policy. His differences were not based on the decision of Eisenhower to use Vichy officials who were on the spot. "What was wrong," he said in his speech, "was putting them in political control as the price of their aid—considering them not as our instruments but as our allies." Mowrer refuses to accept the necessity of giving fascists power even as a "temporary military expedient." He believes the cost is too high. And he is certain that the popular disillusionment resulting from our support of fascist regimes will "promote the easy spread of bolshevism." Mowrer deserves fuller quotation than this page can provide, not only because what he said so desperately needed saying, but because his opinion is buttressed by all the war information possessed by the official agency receiving and dispensing war information. The State Department's most passionate defenders could hardly ask for more.

The overshadowing fact that emerges from North Africa and all that led up to it can be expressed in Mowrer's own words:

So long as there remain in high places in North Africa Frenchmen who aim at preserving fascism in France; so long as there are those in this country who do not understand why a nation engaged in warring against fascism cannot ally itself with fascists; so long as there are American officials who toy with the idea of beating the Axis by utilizing one quailing after another "right up to the German frontiers"; so long as conservatives dream of hemming Russia in behind a barrier of dwarf states whose existence merely would provoke the Bolsheviks without in the least holding them back—so long we cannot be sure that there will be no more "temporary expediency" unless the President's policy receives the firm backing of informed and vigilant American opinion.

And these words lead us straight along the new axis line to Colonel Beigbeder in Washington. The Colonel, it seems, as an emissary from Generalissimo Franco, is on a mission to "inspect the United States army." The results of his investigation should prove fascinating to the German officers and technicians who help run the Spanish army—so fascinating that we must assume our own officers have exercised restraint in showing Colonel Beigbeder the sights. But in addition to his military inquiries his trip has obvious diplomatic objectives. For he came on our invitation. And only a day or two after he arrived our ambassador at Madrid made his unbelievably frank statement about the quantities of oil and other raw materials the United States has been shipping to Franco with the object, as Mr. Hayes remarked, of extending "any help it can to Spain, which is doing so much with such obvious success to develop a peace economy that can, and will, carry [it] safely into a future period of world peace." (At this point I want to call the attention of readers to the report of Franco's "peace economy" reproduced on a later page of this issue.) And while these astonishing words were being spoken, the smiling little Archbishop Spellman, having consulted with both Hayes and Franco in Madrid, was in Rome carrying on extended conversations with the Pope.

About these conversations little has been reported; but the air of Vatican City has been thick with rumors. And it requires only a little understanding of the underlying facts to realize that the Vatican has become the rallying point of the reactionaries of the Continent—pro-Hitler and anti-Hitler alike. A new Holy Alliance is in process of gestation. If it is finally born it will be composed of conservative Catholic regimes in Poland, Hungary, Croatia, Slovakia, Italy, France, Spain, and Portugal, and will not only serve as an antidote to domestic radicalism in each country but provide a counterpoise to a victorious Russia at the peace conference. Dominant influences in Britain oppose such a coalition. They understand the necessity of good relations with Russia, now and after the war. But in Washington the balance of opinion tilts the other way. Fear of revolution combines with arguments of expediency to support on a broader scale the policy already applied in Vichy and Madrid. The proposed alliance will retain the best features of fascism with none of its ugly by-products. So its press agents hint. But we may have to wait a while for the details. And meanwhile we are asked not to worry, just to follow our leaders. Wait patiently and with trust for the new Old Order that is being fixed up in Washington and Madrid and Rome. Expediency, frozen into policy.

FOOTNOTE I

Most of the Spanish Loyalist refugees in North Africa are still in concentration camps. But a few have been let out. A brief item in the New York papers reports that Spanish soldiers, freed from a prison camp at Kasserine and fighting under British officers, have carried out "special and dangerous missions." This is fine, and I hope indicates that full use will soon be made of the tough fighters of the Loyalist army who have waited so long for a return engagement with the fascist enemy. Fine. But just the same I wonder how these men feel when they hear of Colonel Beigbeder's equally special but not so dangerous mission in Washington and of Ambassador Hayes's promises to Franco. And I wonder how true is the rumor that when the Colonel agreed to come to America he made several conditions, the first of which was that the Spanish refugees in North Africa should not be released.

FOOTNOTE II

What Stalin thinks of the export of oil and other war goods to Franco and our reception of Beigbeder can be imagined. Mr. Welles, it is true, has solemnly announced that none of the goods sent to Spain will be allowed directly or indirectly "to reach enemy hands." On this point, he says, he has "fullest assurances" of the Spanish government. Such assurances may satisfy the State Department, but it is possible that they will prove less convincing to the Russians. For Stalin has never recognized Franco, much less addressed him as his "good friend." And Franco's Blue Legion must have needed a lot of oil for its expedition against Russia. If I were Stalin I think I should ask for some very detailed reports on the use being made of American war materials in Spain.

Thurman Arnold and the Railroads

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 28

I HOPE to be able to take the time soon to make a study of the work Thurman Arnold did as head of the Anti-Trust Division of the Department of Justice. I can only record at this time the regret that most progressives here feel over his retirement—for that seems the word for it—to the bench. His division was one of the last places in Washington where the old fighting New Deal spirit still survived. Almost everywhere else one sees the big-business crowd in power.

Arnold is a very odd character, and there is no telling where he will end up politically. He is mercurial, not too profound, thoroughly opportunistic—distinctly a populist middle-class radical who might even end up on the far right. I should like to emphasize the word "might" because it would be unwise to draw too logical conclusions from some of Arnold's weirder ideas. It is just as possible to imagine him a fervent anti-fascist in a period of crisis. For he is courageous, generous, and warm-hearted, equally removed from the poles of bigotry and milk-and-water liberalism.

The Anti-Trust Division is the battered citadel of a romantic lost cause, usually betrayed by its own nominal leaders. It contains some of the most devoted and hard-working officials in the capital. There are men in it with an extraordinary and detailed knowledge of the industries under their supervision, men who could make many times their government salaries if they chose to serve the monopolies they have fought. It is a tribute to Arnold that he won the devotion of these men. He won it by putting up a better battle against monopoly than the Anti-Trust Division had ever been able to wage before.

I need hardly add that this battle was fundamentally as ineffective as Arnold's evangelical efforts to persuade a middle-aged, paunchy capitalism to leap back into the competitive scrimmages of its youth. Neither legislation nor lectures will cure its economic arteriosclerosis, and the war has both speeded up the growth of monopoly and weakened such countervailing forces as the anti-trust laws. Today the WPB, the War and Navy departments, the Office of the Petroleum Administrator for War, and large areas of the BEW are run by business men and lawyers who have devoted much of their activity to violating the anti-trust laws. Little wonder that they proved powerful enough, first, to force weak consent decrees on Arnold, then to shut off one scheduled prosecution after another, and finally to promote Arnold to the bench.

A complaint one hears against Arnold from the fuddyduddies—the ex-liberal careerists and picayune opportunists who are rationalizing themselves into comfortable acquiescence in the appeasement of big business—is that Arnold "talked too much." By this they mean that Arnold, when forced to take a consent decree or to stop a prosecution, often let the inside story leak to the press or to a Congressional committee. The fuddy-duddies regard this practice as somehow ungentelemanly, indecent, and improper. Apparently the facts of life, the actualities of economics, are too delicate for the ears of common folk. The same gentlemen who spout about democracy on minor provocation resent Arnold's habit of taking his cases to the people. Had it not been for Arnold's refusal to act according to the mores of our better social clubs, the facts of the Standard Oil-I. G. Farben cartel would have been safely buried with the consent decree instead of spread on the record of the Truman committee and broadcast in the press. Arnold fought the hush-hush policy that more and more pervades the capital and prevents disclosure of the facts.

The anti-trust laws seem to have a beneficial effect, in one way at least, upon the courts. We owe Chief Justice Stone of the United States Supreme Court to the Aluminum Company of America. Alcoa, according to a familiar story, preferred to have Coolidge put his Attorney General on the bench to having his Attorney General put Alcoa in the dock. It is difficult to determine to which monopoly we owe the new Circuit Court justice, Thurman Arnold. The honor seems to go to the railroads of the United States and to their friend, that tired radical, Joseph B. Eastman, director of the Office of Defense Transportation. For Arnold's last major venture before being kicked upstairs to judicial honors was his attempt to take on that twenty-six-billion-dollar giant, the American railroads. Little of the story of that last battle has leaked to the press, though we shall hear more of it one of these days from Congress.

Arnold has had twenty-one anti-trust cases shot out from under him by the arrangement of last spring whereby the corporation lawyers and bankers who man the offices of the War and Navy departments are permitted to suspend the anti-trust laws for the convenience of themselves, their ex-clients, and their friends. Among these cases are no fewer than five against the du Ponts and two against General Electric. All but one of them are criminal, not civil, cases. In all but two instances the prosecution was stopped after indictments were obtained. These indictments act as a considerable deterrent. Recently the Secretaries of War and the Navy have begun to stop investigations before indictments can be returned. One such case was the inquiry into the Hawaiian pineapple industry. The other involved a group of three indictments prepared against the Illinois Freight Association and the Central States Motor Freight Bureau. These were to be the beginning of the first major attack on the greatest monopoly in this country, the growing monopoly in transportation—on the methods whereby the railroads fix not only their own rates but impose uneconomic and non-competitive rates on the movement of goods by air, water, and highway. The investigation was stopped at the request of Eastman, with the approval of Under Secretaries Patterson and Forrester.

A letter to Attorney General Biddle by Secretary of War Stimson and Acting Secretary of the Navy Forrester throws new light on the curious procedure now being followed in anti-trust cases. It reveals that drafts of the proposed indictments were presented by the Anti-Trust Division to the Secretaries of War and the Navy before submission to the grand jury in Chicago, and that this was done "in pursuance of an arrangement made at a conference held in your [Biddle's] office." The War and Navy departments, and Eastman, prevented the proposed indictments from ever reaching the grand jury. War, Navy, and Eastman were willing only to permit prosecution of labor leaders and others who were alleged to have used a strike to coerce a motor carrier to increase its rate. Arnold and Biddle refused to do this. They objected that the basic conspiracy was to enforce fixed and non-competitive rates, that the strike was only one of the means used to enforce these rates, and that "it would not be possible to draw an indictment which contained only the means used and did not describe the basic plan." This readiness to prosecute labor rather than capital under the anti-trust laws is worth noting, though it is hardly a new phenomenon.

The situation in transportation today may be visualized if one imagines what it would have been like a century ago had the canal-boat companies possessed the financial means and political power to control the railroads. The railroads have become a gigantic racket in which a group of financial and managerial insiders enrich themselves at the expense of the properties in their care and the shippers these properties serve. Ostensibly their rates are fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Actually they fix their own rates through rate associations declared illegal under the anti-trust laws in 1897 but still going strong. Powerful shippers have their own ways of getting around these rates, but the weak have only the costly recourse of an appeal to the ICC and the courts. Regulation by these processes may be compared to an attempt at finding one's way through a Brazilian jungle with the aid of a handbook on Swedenborgian theology. On the one hand, we have a hopeless maze of nearly half a million freight rates fixed by private associations. On the other, we have a highly metaphysical system of government regulation which attempts to check the tariff on prunes from Santa Clara by reference to the lofty, if subtle and arid, concepts of fair return on the fair value of the railroad property used. The resultant controversies would have delighted the medieval philosopher, though they are well calculated to bewilder and discourage the shipper.

In our society, the gravitational pull exerted by huge masses of capital inevitably forces into their orbit the agencies set up to regulate them. This is what happened long ago to the ICC, which has not only permitted the continued operation of these private price-fixing associations but has enabled the railroads to reach out for control of waterways and highways. The railroads have been allowed to drive water-carrier competitors out of business by discriminatory rate practices and to obtain ever greater control of competing bus and truck lines. This development tends more and more to deprive the public of the benefits of these cheaper forms of transportation and to enable the railroads to maintain obsolete methods free from the healthy prod of competition.

More important to the future of our society is the control exercised by the railroads over aviation. The Anti-Trust Division was preparing to take action against the contract by which the Railway Express Agency controls air freight. Under the agency's contract with the air lines, air express rates cannot be less than twice the rail rate, but they are actually held at five to seven times the railroad rates. Yet according to Grover Loening, technical consultant of the War Production Board's Air Cargo Plane Committee, cargo planes today can be run at 8 to 10 cents a ton mile as compared with rail rates of 10 to 15 cents a ton mile. To stifle the development of air transport is to stifle development of national defense.

A mass of facts on uneconomic railroad practices was gathered by the Anti-Trust Division in preparing the railroad cases. It will take a Congressional investigation to bring them to light. The railroads, fresh from their victory over Arnold, are now preparing to ask Congress to free them from the restrictions imposed by the anti-trust laws, the Panama Canal Act, and the Transportation Act of 1940. They want the right to bring water carriers and trucks under common ownership, to place air transportation under some agency, like the ICC, which the railroads control, and by these means to saddle uneconomic rates upon the nation's industry and agriculture. We see here the use of political power to maintain and expand economic privileges. This is as far as possible removed from classic conceptions of the free market. If we had good sense, we would take the railroads over now, end their war profiteering, and increase their efficiency. The railroads, as Arnold's elevation to the bench indicates, are—with their brother monopolies—taking us over instead.

Why Food Is Scarce

BY JAMES G. PATTON

I

Washington, February 24

SEVERAL million people in the United Nations and in countries that we may have been able to liberate are going to be unnecessarily hungry next fall, winter, and spring. Why? Because the tightly organized forces of commercialized agriculture have prevented the conversion and expansion of our farm plant to meet the war-time demand for food. And because we do not have a single integrated office of war mobilization, such as is provided for in the Kilgore-Pepper-Tolan bill.

Without a plan for all-out production in the past two years, agriculture has been unable to protect its resources of experienced man-power, machinery, fertilizer, and other supplies. Now that these are all critically short, panicky efforts are being made to repair the damage, not with the hope of increasing food production in 1943 but in a desperate effort to keep it from falling below 1942 levels.

Leaders of three national farm organizations—the Farm Bureau Federation, the Grange, and the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives—have set a high price for continued maximum production by the two million best farms in the country, farms which customarily produce 75 per cent of marketed farm commodities. They demand removal of ceilings on farm prices. And they propose to write off two million farm families as of practically no use for increasing the production of food. Other farm organizations, including the National Farmers' Union, which I head, state units of still other associations, and various religious and civic groups, point to the achievements of the Farm Security Administration, which last year assisted 7.6 per cent of the nation's farm families to produce 36 per cent of the total increase in milk, 10 per cent of the increase in chickens and eggs, 9 per cent of the increase in pork, 7 per cent of the increase in beef, and 27 per cent of the increase in dried beans, all 1943 deficit foods. We say these figures prove that the nation's best hope of increasing food production lies in furnishing financial aid and when necessary farm-management services to the 2,000,000 farm families who in 1940 had gross incomes of less than $600 and to most of the 2,000,000 or more farm families who had gross incomes between $600 and $1,500. The 4,000,000 farmers in these two lower income brackets, who customarily produce about 16 per cent of marketed farm commodities, form agriculture's great under-employed reservoir of experienced farm labor.

The struggle will be bitter. Family-type farming in fighting for participation in the prosecution of the war is fighting for survival. Big agriculture, like big industry, moves to use the war needs to extend its grip on our economy. Present plans for providing farm man-power are designed primarily to fill the big farmers' labor needs, perhaps by furloughing soldiers to work in units. A bits-and-pieces program in agriculture, using under-employed farm families as operators and hired labor, will have a hard time, as it has had in industry. If the working farm families realize where their long-run interests are, and if the public can be made to see that its best hope of getting food lies in our program, we can win. If not, the Farm Security Administration, instead of being expanded and brought into a single integrated food-production program, will be assassinated, and food will become even scarcer and dearer.

Food has already become a paramount political issue, as well as the No. 1 topic of conversation. City folks, Senators, Representatives, industrialists, administrators, economists, and editors are today obsessed by the food problem. One and all they want to be saved from food shortages, and from the resultant public resentment, absenteeism in war plants, and lowered productivity. They want to be saved from the inflationary spiral that is certain to follow the ripping off of price ceilings.

The gravest consequence of a food scarcity will be its effect on the United Nations' prosecution of the war; their very unity will be destroyed if we betray the starving millions of the countries we have promised to liberate and feed. The argument that will be used has been indicated: the American people must not be given "the leavings." The less food we have, the smaller the share that will go abroad. If public opinion is inflamed by gross misrepresentation, which already portrays lend-lease as the star boarder stuffing himself at the expense of Uncle Sam's own children, that share will be given more and more grudgingly. Resentment will be pumped up by those who still believe that the United States can live apart from the rest of the world, maintaining a standing army of ten million men and an empire extending from the North Pole to below the bulge of Brazil. Thus food, which Secretary of Agriculture Wickard, now also Food Administrator, said a year ago would "win the war and write the peace," may lose the war and bring about revolutions that will postpone real peace indefinitely.

FOOD FOR ISOLATION

WAITING FOR THE LEAVINS

Reprinted from the Washington Times-Herald

Within the United States the 1943 crop will be the last to move to market before the 1944 elections take place. That harvest—both grain and thistles—is being planted now. Food shortages—and the danger that we will renege on our pledges to feed the other nations—appear inevitable, but we shall not feel their full impact until the end of the coming crop season, which will begin in a few weeks as seeds germinate and livestock drop their young. Many people, particularly city folks, delude themselves with the thought that perhaps the food situation won't turn out so badly after all. But more than half of last year's 12 per cent increase over 1941, the previous high for crops, was due to better than average weather. Farmers will have to run faster than ever to stay where they were in crop production.

From farmers, packing-house workers, wholesalers, retailers, and consumers come disquieting reports that we have for several months been neglecting the conservation of our livestock capital—that is to say, we have slaughtered hogs too soon and killed young stock that was too old for veal and too young for beef. We have built up our herds to some extent, but not enough. The situation recalls the slaughter of their herds by the kulaks during the period of forced collectivization of farms in the U. S. S. R. In this country farmers have slaughtered their stock because of the rising cost of feed, the shortage of farm labor, and high livestock prices, bid up by the armed services and lend-lease. This squandering of livestock capital has increased the volume of meat, but at a ghastly price. It is as if we had increased our current supply of steel, copper, and lead by melting down our machine tools. Since the cycle of cattle is approximately four years—287 days' gestation, 2 years for the heifer calf to mature, bear her first calf, and become a milk producer, and another 18 to 24 months for the calf to become a marketable steer—the folly of the past few months will haunt our food economy until 1947.

I believe the food crisis may awaken the government and induce it to act to bring about a better distribution of inadequate supplies. More important, it may compel the government to face up to the job of increasing food production this year and next. Public opinion is an alarm clock which Congressmen and smart administrators are not likely to ignore.

Let us look at the statistical picture of food deficits, a picture that is probably too optimistic since it does not allow for the increased food needs of the 2,000,000 more workers who will be drawn into war production this year and next. In January the Department of Agriculture estimated that the supply of meat available to civilians in 1943 would be 98 per cent of our consumption in 1942 and 97 per cent of that in 1941. This estimate and the estimates for other products that follow are based upon 1942 accomplishments and 1943 production goals, assuming average weather in the growing season. (There's many a slip 'twixt crop and lip; the milk goal, for instance, is set at 122 billion pounds, but we will be lucky to get 110 billion pounds.) They have been computed after deductions have been made for the needs of the armed forces (as projected in December, 1942) and lend-lease, and for a very small reserve for contingencies of all kinds.

Total dairy products (milk equivalent) available for civilians will not be more than 97 per cent of 1942 consumption, 95 per cent of 1941 consumption.

Butter will not be more than 80 per cent of 1942 consumption and 80 per cent of 1941 consumption.

Except in the lowest-income families we are going to eat more chicken and turkey, because the supply of poultry can be more easily expanded than that of other meats. The 1943 production is expected to provide 129 per cent of 1942 consumption and 146 per cent of 1941 consumption.

Eggs will be 96 per cent of 1942 consumption and 97 per cent of 1941 consumption.

Canned fruits will be 46 per cent of 1942 consumption and 36 per cent of 1941 consumption.

Canned vegetables will be 65 per cent of 1942 consumption and 57 per cent of 1941 consumption.

And the needs of the armed services, lend-lease, and the liberated countries are rising. So is domestic consumer demand.

Our wheat stocks on January 1 were 1,162,000,000 bushels. Until recently they were being tapped at the rate of 7,000,000 bushels a week for livestock feed. This flow is now being cut off because the Congressional limit of 125,000,000 bushels on such sales is being reached, but it must be reopened and increased. Congress should remove all restrictions on sales of government-owned feed grains by the Commodity Credit Corporation. This feed should be furnished to farmers at no more than the present 86 cents a bushel (85 per cent of the parity price of corn) or—to stimulate the feeding of livestock to maximum weights and milk production—at a price as low as 50 or 60 cents a bushel. Such use of our great granary in the war emergency will in no way mean a loss to the farmer since he has been paid in full for the wheat. Incidentally, such action is needed to clear storage space for the oncoming 1943 crop.

Of course, the Farm—or "Corn"—Bureau bosses want the feed wheat sold at not less than the parity price for corn, or about $1.02 a bushel. This is like asking the government to withhold its support from its own war effort; it reduces the amount of feed available for livestock and poultry at a time when we have a critical shortage of high-protein livestock feeds.

Should peace come tomorrow, it is estimated that one-sixth of our total food production would be needed to stabilize Europe. The contest between democratic law and order and some form of dictatorship born of chaos and desperation may well be decided by food. Those who get there fastest with the mostest food for emaciated bodies may capture the mind of Europe for the next hundred years. If we can't or won't do our part, the misery and disorder will increase until food from the newly sown fields of Central Europe and from the tractor-plowed stretches of the Ukraine can be harvested and brought in to relieve starvation.

We have a heavy responsibility. On Farm Mobilization Day, January 12, President Roosevelt spelled out in simple words the following pledge:

We are using food to earn the friendship of people in liberated areas and to serve as a promise and an encouragement to people who are not yet free. In terms of total food supply, the United Nations are far stronger than our enemies. But our great food resources are scattered to the ends of the earth and we no longer have food to waste. Food is precious, just as oil and steel are precious.

As part of our global strategy, we must produce all we can of every essential farm product; we must divide our supplies wisely and use them carefully. We cannot afford to waste any of them.

[In the second half of this article, to appear in the next issue, Mr. Patton will discuss the steps that have already been taken to raise food production and will outline a program for more drastic action.]

The Russian "Miracle"

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

AS THE Battle of Russia progresses, the world seems to be witnessing a modern miracle, though what has happened is actually the result of superb genius and infinite human fortitude. The winter offensives of the Red Army, now in their fourth month, have turned a contest that had seemed fairly even into a smashing Russian victory. Six short weeks have seen the final liquidation of the German army at Stalingrad, the raising of the siege of Leningrad, the expulsion of the Wehrmacht from the Caucasus, the abandonment by the Germans of their powerful Donetsk defense lines with the strong fortified points of Belgorod, Kursk, Kharkov, Voroshilovgrad, and Rostov—all enormously important to Hitler. The date of final victory has surely been put forward by months, perhaps by years.

The Russian front is too long to be considered as a whole, and success can best be measured by an examination of the various sectors. North of Voronezh there has been very little winter activity on either side. The salient driven into the German lines by the capture of Velikie Luki early in the campaign was almost certainly intended to be a strong feint, designed to distract German attention from the vital points of attack. The reported lifting of the siege of Leningrad, never admitted by the Germans, has represented the only other marked movement in the north. Later dispatches have revealed that heavy fighting has continued in this area and that the Russians are still experiencing difficulty in supplying the city. The relative inactivity here means that the Russians weakened their defenses in the north in order to have sufficient troops for a crushing offensive in the south. The failure of the Germans to take advantage of this condition of affairs by launching vigorous attacks of their own may reasonably be counted one of their fatal mistakes.

Stalingrad can be explained only as the greatest of Hitler's recent blunders. Vanity induced him to continue an attempt pronounced fruitless by his generals. Continued frontal attacks on strong defenses caused very heavy casualties, and the failure to retreat in time assured disaster without even a compensating military service to justify such a sacrifice. The final surrender wiped out some of the best Axis troops.

Less expensive but still a major German defeat is the unfinished campaign in the Caucasus. While the troops isolated here are neither as numerous nor of as good quality as those lost at Stalingrad, they are mainly from high-grade divisions. A few have escaped via the Kerch Straits. But even those units which have reached the Crimea and have a rail line of retreat are in danger of being cut off by Russian armies in the eastern Ukraine moving westward toward the Perekop Isthmus.

These Soviet victories, impressive as they are, have less strategic significance than the offensives by Generals Vatutin and Golikov in the Donetz Basin. The Germans here, as in the initial attack at Stalingrad, were caught completely by surprise, with resultant heavy casualties among the inferior Axis satellite divisions which bore the first shock; and as the Red Army spearheads advanced rapidly and with confusing changes of direction, the Nazis were given no chance to recover. The southern wing of the great offensive sealed the fate of Rostov by threatening its encirclement. With little serious opposition, the Russians filtered between and behind the key points in the German defense system. Last year these points, even when cut off, were able to hold out, but at that time the German field armies were largely intact and Russian offensive methods were much less effective. The abandonment of the Donetz defense line and the loss in quick succession of important centers like Kharkov were caused not so much by the application of Red Army force as by the German fear of being surrounded and cut to pieces. The Germans were not actually driven from these lines but abandoned them in the conviction that to attempt to hold them would mean an even greater military disaster. That fact should warn against too great optimism. With hundreds of miles of occupied country to their rear, the Germans can retreat for long distances without disastrous consequences.

Too much credit cannot be given to Stalin himself, his able field commanders, and the personnel of the Red Army. From first to last the Germans were out-thought, out-maneuvered, and out-fought. Red Army offensive tactics had improved so markedly that the Germans, as some of them admitted, were beaten much as the French were in 1940—though not so badly. Throughout the campaign the paramount object was the destruction of enemy man-power; territorial gains were incidental.

Yet the territory retaken by the Red Army is in itself important. By last summer's retreats the Russians lost some 150,000 square miles. They have now recovered 200,000 square miles and may perhaps gain as much more in the immediate future. This area, unlike that recovered last winter, is of great economic value. Its reconquest deprives the Germans of their only captured oil field and safeguards the Soviet supply. Half a dozen of the most important cities in the Soviet Union are removed from Axis hands, though most of them may be in a ruined condition. Deposits of coal, magnesium, and iron and sources of food have been obtained. The whole front has been greatly shortened, and the Soviet transportation lines behind the front are better located.

German prestige has inevitably been reduced by such heavy disasters, and morale among the troops cannot in the very nature of things be very high. This is borne out by the large number of prisoners reported taken by the Russians. A Europe tightly regimented under the Axis cannot adequately reflect changes in the military situation, but the few remaining neutrals are now apt to prove adamant against any German attempt to involve them in war, and the Axis satellite powers can be expected to dissociate themselves so far as is possible from the German cause.

The Germans' really vital losses, however, are in man-power. The destruction of an entire army at Stalingrad, of several divisions on the Don, and of large numbers of troops in the Caucasus and the Donetz Basin hit Germany where it is weakest. The British Office of War Information estimates that 4,000,000 Germans have been killed or taken prisoner. Probably one-fourth of these casualties have occurred in the past four months.

Nevertheless, German reverses should not lead us to underestimate Axis strength. They were caused by a series of military blunders committed by Hitler, as well as by the power of the Red Army. These mistakes have been godsend, but are not likely to be repeated. As the Nazis retreat westward they get closer to their sources of supply and thus free more troops for combat. The new troops now being raised in Germany and those units which were withdrawn last fall for rest and regrouping will also be available shortly and will help to redress the numerical inferiority in the south from which the German armies all during the winter have suffered. In addition, the spring thaws, with their attendant transport difficulties, are apt to slow down the attackers. Thus unless other factors intervene, the outlook is for a careful German retreat over a considerable area until the circumstances just mentioned bring about a substantial equality of strength and positions are reached which can be held without too great risks. Meanwhile, as spring thaws restrict mobility in the south, the weight of Russian power is certain to be applied farther north, especially since the conquests in the Ukraine offer an excellent opportunity for flanking the German positions on the central front.

In this situation, the one thing needed to upset an approaching balance and tilt the scales heavily against Germany is an instant and heavy Anglo-American attack in areas close to the center of German power. Whether sufficient shipping and troops are available to support such an invasion is a question which few persons not close to the High Command can answer. But there can be little doubt that Stalin is right in every military sense. Big talk followed by lack of action will no longer do.

War and the Liberal Arts

BY IRWIN EDMAN

THE plight of the humanities in the war has reached the consciousness of the general public in the form of news about the draft of eighteen-year-olds and its effect upon the liberal-arts colleges. The law drafting eighteen-year-olds, as soon as it is in full operation, will have removed for the duration practically the whole undergraduate male population of American colleges and universities. All those fine projects and discussions of higher education—the Chicago plan, the St. John's program, the house plan at Harvard, the tutorial system at Princeton, the humanities course at Columbia; all the arguments over the decline of the classics and the possibility of their revival in translation; the "education of the whole man" versus the "discipline of the mind"—all these things, such lively issues in print and on the campus only a few years ago, have been given a quietus for the duration. The liberal-arts college will sketchily survive in institutions with sufficient endowment or sufficient income from army and navy units. But the army program, still not definite in detail, provides practically no liberal-arts work; the navy program, a very limited year's training in English or history. There will be some civilian freshmen, admitted at the age of seventeen by a combination of combing the schools for the most talented and remitting the severer standards. There will be a scattering of boys rejected by the army and navy. But no one save the most callous optimist imagines that serious undergraduate education will continue in anything but the most meager proportions during the war.

It has been repeated almost ad nauseam that educators themselves, students, and even that small section of the general public interested in questions of higher education are sadly content that this should be so. First things come first, and the war effort is, in this as in food or medicine, first. The colleges have been perhaps readier to "convert" than business proved to be before Pearl Harbor, and readier in most instances than some businesses are even now. There is, indeed, a suspicion that administrators and professors, supposedly the guardians of the liberal-arts tradition, have been almost too willing to agree with the notion, not unfamiliar in peace times, that the liberal arts do not count very much, that in sacrificing education in these fields the country is sacrificing very little. Occasionally voices have been raised—among them that of Wendell Willkie in a recent national broadcast—reminding the nation of how disastrous would be the abdication of liberal studies, especially if the war should be long.

There have been two general reasons for the lack of concern over the abandonment of the liberal-arts studies for the duration of the war. The first is that the humanities in this country have always been regarded as a polite viceroy. Even in peace times they have not been granted much social or political consequence. The liberal arts have meant culture, and culture has been connected with the genteel tradition—sweetness and light with a predominant proportion of sweetness. It has been held that, along with fancy wrappings for candy and department-store gift boxes, courses in music appreciation or the Elizabethan poets and seminars in Plato could and should go. The second reason for the absence of concern over the collapse of liberal-arts education in this country is that many persons both in and out of the academic world, and persons once in it as students, have with sound reason been suspicious that the colleges were not strictly by virtue of giving a B. A. degree centers of serious light and learning. There are about 700 institutions giving instruction of collegiate grade in this country. That instruction notoriously varies. There are freshwater colleges the quality of whose work is hardly to be measured against that of a first-rate high school in a progressive suburban community in the metropolitan East. Even where the instruction has been officially of a very high order, routine and pedantry have often taken the place of scholarship and insight.

As for the student world, as Woodrow Wilson put it in a Phi Beta Kappa address delivered in 1909 at Princeton, the "sideshowes have taken the place of the main tent." No one familiar with American colleges can fail to have been depressed at times by the remoteness of the concern of the average student for anything resembling a humanistic ideal. The folderol of the fraternities, the hippodromes of intercollegiate athletics, the snobbishness of the socially sanctified institutions of the East, the mass-production education of the state universities of the West, the slipshod, second-rate, pampering standards, the thin nutriment of the spoon-fed textbook courses, the run-of-the-mill teaching—all these things have been the stock in trade of critics of our educational set-up. And in varying degrees at different places these charges have been true.

Yet despite the failings of American colleges, those who know them best have recognized a grace which is saving in more senses than one. In almost every scholastically reputable institution there has been a core of serious students who have been awakened to intellectual sensitiveness and trained to intellectual competence and distinction by some of their teachers or some of their courses, or by the contagion of the place itself.

Among the best students in the best institutions, small private college or large state university, the humanistic tradition has been kept, however tenuously or thinly, alive. The vertebrate severities of the older American college, with its strict but narrow curriculum and its dedication of its students to teaching or preaching—these, of course, have vanished. There have been snap courses and factitiously fashionable ones. There have been vagues, now of social psychology, now of literary "appreciation" or grandiose sociology or jargon-studded economics. The "ends" of a "college education" have been vague. The pre-medical, the pre-engineering, the pre-law student has at least known what he was headed for. The liberal-arts student has felt himself destined to anything from bond salesmanship to membership in the Book of the Month Club. In many cases the four-year college course has been simply a socially approved place for members of the comfortable classes to send their sons so that these might make contacts, join the right clubs or fraternities, become well-rounded little snobs, or merely, as someone has put it, pass those crucial last years between puberty and adultery.

